Years ago, about 5,000 cars were towed each year, while today that number is down to 1,500, Brennan said. And after 5 p.m., towing is not under Parking Services' purview. "Anything that happens with ticketing and towing after these hours [5 p.m. to 7 a.m.] falls under the police department's responsibility," Anderson said.

Anderson sits on the Parking and Transportation Advisory Board (P-TAB), a 16-member committee with four student spots. Until November, only one of those four spots was filled, but Student Government Association President Pavel Payano recently appointed three more students to the committee.

Shaquille Onikoro, Attorney General of the SGA, is one of those three students. He said the student body is not aware of P-TAB's existence because "students are detached."

Onikoro encouraged students who are interested, aware and committed to parking issues to contact the SGA about being a part of P-TAB.

Iraq set to start parliamentary elections today

By Bassem Mroue
Associated Press

KRT

An Iraqi woman casts her vote for president at a polling station in Southern Baghdad, Iraq, on Jan. 30, 2005. The Iraqis are holding another election, which begins today, for parliament seats in their government.

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Voting begins Monday in hospitals, military camps and even prisons across Iraq, launching the process to choose a new parliament that the United States hopes can help quell the insurgency so U.S. forces can begin heading home.

Iraq's government announced it will close its borders, extend the nighttime curfew and restrict domestic travel starting Tuesday — two days before the main election day — to prevent insurgents from disrupting the vote.

"We are very prepared for the elections, and we are highly determined," Interior Minister Bayan Jabr said. "We hope that everyone participates and that it will be a safe day ... We are at a historic juncture."

Voters will be choosing their first fully constitutional parliament since the 2003 collapse of Saddam Hussein. The 275-member assembly, which will serve for four years, will then choose a new government that U.S. officials hope can win the confidence of the disaffected Sunni Arab minority — the foundation of the insurgency.

Although most of the 15 million eligible voters will cast ballots Thursday, soldiers, police, hospital patients and prisoners not yet convicted of crimes can vote Monday starting at 9 a.m. (1 a.m. EST).

Officials said Saddam — who is jailed and facing trial for the deaths of more than 140 Shiites in 1982 — has the right to vote, but it was not known whether he would.

Suspected insurgents held in U.S. or Iraqi detention but who have not been convicted of an offense would also be eligible, Iraqi officials said.

On Tuesday, the estimated 1.5 million Iraqi voters living outside the country can begin casting their ballots over a two-day period at polling centers in 15 countries, including the United States, Canada and Australia.

Voters must produce a passport, certificate of citizenship or military service papers and dip an index finger in indelible purple ink to prevent them from voting more than once.

With security so tenuous, campaigns have been waged primarily through media advertisements, colorful banners and placards on the streets, and press conferences before audiences packed with supporters.

Most attention has focused on Sunni Arabs, who largely boycotted the Jan. 30 election to protest the continued U.S. military presence.

With most Sunni Arabs staying home, Shiites and Kurds won more than 220 of the 275 parliamentary seats — a move that sharpened communal tensions and fueled the Sunni-dominated insurgency.

This time, more Sunni Arab candidates are in the race, and changes in the election law to allocate most seats by province instead of based on a party's nationwide total all but guaranteed a sizable Sunni bloc in the next assembly.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad urged all Iraqis to vote.

"We need more cross-sectarian and cross-ethnic coalitions that are issue-oriented," he told reporters Sunday in Sulaimaniyah. "We need a government that brings Iraqis together."

Khalilzad expressed hope "there will be more Sunni participation and that the turnout should be quite high." Turnout in January was about 58 percent but less than 5 percent in the predominantly Sunni province of Anbar, a hotbed of insurgency.

U.S. officials hope that a big Sunni turnout and a strong Sunni bloc in the new parliament will help curb the violence so the United States and its coalition partners can begin drawing down their forces in 2006.

An American soldier was killed Sunday by a roadside bomb in Baghdad, the U.S. command said. That brought to at least 2,142 the number of U.S. military members who have died since the war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

During an appearance Sunday on CNN's "This Week," Khalilzad held out hope that the election would be a turning point, saying "conditions are moving in a direction that can allow a significant decrease in the size of the American forces starting next year."

Even with a big Sunni vote, Shiites are expected to win the biggest share of parliamentary seats. Shiites form an estimated 60 percent of Iraq's 27 million people compared to 20 percent for the Sunni Arabs.

On Sunday, Iraq's leading Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, issued a binding religious decree, or fatwa, instructing followers to vote for candidates "who can be trusted to protect their principles and safeguard their interests."

That appeared to be a veiled endorsement of the United Iraqi Alliance, a coalition of Shiite religious parties that dominates the current government.

Al-Sistani also urged Shiites to avoid "splitting the vote and risking its waste."

Write for News!
Call Dan, Matt, or Megan
545-1762

The Roadhouse Cafe features
"WHERE BAY ROAD MEETS ROUTE 9"
A Healthy Place To Eat!
· Organic fruits and vegetables
· Healthy and nutritious homemade meals
· Custom-baked cakes
Mention this ad and receive $1.00 off a breakfast special!
Sit by our cozy fire, enjoy great food, relax, and catch up on some reading. We are happy to serve you. The sky's the limit!
OPEN: Monday-Friday 6 to noon; Sat.-Sun. 7 to 2 p.m.
BELCHERTOWN, MA • 323-6175

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTERS
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Regency Hair Stylists
"Get a new look for fall"
$ 5.00 OFF a haircut
Monday - Thursday
Bring this ad
and your Student ID.
Call for an appointment or stop by the salon
253 - 9526
189 N. Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002

Dance Stuff
Dance into the holiday season!
Go to Dance Stuff
for all your dancing needs.
220 N.Pleasant St.
253 - 5201

Professor seeks bone marrow donors at drive

By Christina Baron
Collegian Staff

In response to his recent diagnosis of acute leukemia, a Hampshire College professor is asking the community one very important question: Will you marrow me?

Eric Schocket, an associate professor of American literature, and his colleagues are organizing a bone marrow registration drive at Hampshire College on Monday, Dec. 12 in hopes of finding a bone marrow donor not only for himself, but for one of the 5,000 currently waiting on donor lists, according to a press release from Hampshire College.

The drive will be held from noon to 6 p.m. on the second floor of the Robert Crown Center. It is planned as a festive event with refreshments, live music and DJs, said Yaniris Fernandez, one of Schocket's colleagues helping to organize the drive. Schocket is expected to attend.

The drive is being held by the Caitlin Raymond International Registry, a non-profit organization of the UMass Memorial Medical Center in Massachusetts. Anyone between the ages of 18 and 60 and in good health is a potential bone marrow donor. The test is simple and painless, just a swab of the inside of both cheeks, said the press release.

Each donor's tissue is then entered into a national registry, where it can be compared to and potentially matched with someone in need. Half of those waiting are children, according to the press release.

"The drive was all Professor Schocket's doing," said Fernandez. He decided that he needed to act against the disease, said the press release.

Schocket was diagnosed this past September, and his only hope is a bone marrow transplant. "He struggled against feeling that he had no power over the illness that had unexpectedly invaded his body and his life," said the press release.

Fernandez said that some of his students have been involved in spreading the word about the drive. She recently received an email from a Hampshire College student who received a bone marrow transplant and survived.

"The personal stories are what really bring this home," Fernandez said.

The drive is being sponsored by local businesses such as Atkins Farm, Hampshire Dining Services, Ben and Jerry's and the Black Sheep Deli, said Fernandez.

Every year, 30,000 patients are diagnosed with diseases treatable by a bone marrow transplant, said the Caitlin Raymond International Registry.

According to the press release, one in 20,000 white donors will prove to be a match for a patient, but the numbers for minority patients are much less hopeful. A diverse population of donors is desperately needed to help all patients with these life-threatening diseases.

Frist works to prevent filibuster on Alito vote

KRT

Samuel Alito, nominee for Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, stands in front of the American flag. Alito's nomination will go before Congress soon and some democrats are discussing the possibility of a filibuster.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said Sunday he is prepared to strip Democrats of their ability to filibuster if they try to stall Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court.

"The answer is yes," Frist said when asked if he would act to change Senate procedures to restrict a Democratic filibuster. "Supreme Court justice nominees deserve an up-or-down vote, and it would be absolutely wrong to deny him that."

A Democratic spokesman said Frist's words were "silly and unhelpful" and that Democrats want the Senate Judiciary Committee to act on Alito's nomination before they decide what they may do.

In recent weeks, Senate Democrats have questioned whether Alito, a federal appeals court judge, has the proper judicial temperament and ideology to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Several Democrats have said that Alito's views on issues such as voting rights and abortion could provoke a filibuster unless he allays their concerns about his commitment to civil rights. Alito's confirmation hearings begin Jan. 9 before the committee.

Frist, R-Tenn., said Alito is qualified for the high court, noting that Alito was confirmed by the Senate for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

"Sam Alito, who has a modest judicial temperament ... is someone who deserves advice and consent by the Senate," Frist told "Fox News Sunday."

Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said in an interview that senators should be debating Alito's qualifications on their merits rather than speculating about the possibility of a filibuster.

But, he added, once the committee acts, "all procedural options are on the table. But we are months away from facing these kinds of decisions."

The filibuster is a parliamentary tactic whereby senators use their right to virtually unlimited debate to block measures, legislation or nominations. It takes 60 votes to stop a filibuster.

Passing a bill or confirming a nominee requires a simple majority — 51 senators if all 100 senators are present. The vice president can break 50-50 ties.

Under Frist's scenario, the GOP would seek a parliamentary ruling that declares filibusters are not permitted against judicial nominees. That ruling ultimately would go before the full Senate for a vote, with a simple majority required to prevail. Republicans hold 55 seats.

If that plays out, it then would take a majority of senators present to vote to approve a nominee such as Alito.

—Associated Press

Many do not have access to clean water, says panel

By Kira Glassman
Collegian Correspondent

Did you know that more than one billion people do not have access to clean water, that over 40 percent of the world's population lives in places under water stress, and that bottled water companies get checked just once every six years?

These were some of the startling water-related facts revealed during "Water Privatization: Global and Local Issues in the 21st century," a panel discussion held Wednesday evening in the Campus Center at the University of Massachusetts.

The talk, which was sponsored by the department of Social Thought and Political Economy, ran from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. and featured guest speakers Karl Flecker, director of the Polaris Institute, and Carolyn Toll Oppenheim, founder of the Holyoke Citizens for Open Government.

The Polaris Institute is a Canadian advocacy organization that enables citizens to fight for democratic social change, and the Holyoke Citizens for Open Government seeks to raise citizens' demands for open governmental procedures in examining private contracts of municipal services.

"I believe it should be fundamentally illegal to privatize basic human needs," said Oppenheim, a Northampton resident and former journalism professor who became suspicious of "public-private" partnerships in the '70s. "Privatization is taxation without representation."

According to "Our Communities, Our Water," a Massachusetts Global Action project, 85 percent of the municipal water systems in the United States today (a market valued at $90 billion) are publicly owned and operated.

Those who oppose water privatization argue that if control is handed to corporations whose declared purpose is to maximize profits rather than to serve the public good, hundreds of millions of people could lose access to water.

Both Oppenheim and Flecker were sharply critical of multinational corporations and specifically implicated Coca-Cola, PepsiCo and Nestlé, citing their deception and exploitation of the public.

"Where does Coke's water come from? A municipal tap system," said Flecker. Approximately 25 percent of the bottled water on the market is just purified tap water, he said, but can cost up to 10,000 times as much as water from the tap.

"We have this perception that bottled water is pristine," added Flecker. "But studies have found [it] to contain arsenic, fungi and bacterial contamination."

According to the Polaris Institute, PepsiCo, which markets Aquafina bottled water, has been accused of depleting scarce water resources in India and in the western United States. Aquafina is purified tap water that many consumers mistakenly believe to be spring water. Coca-Cola, on the other hand, bottles Dasani water in the United States and has been implicated in the depletion of aquifers and the pollution of ground water in drought-stricken regions of India.

Flecker and Oppenheim pointed out that water privatization directly affects students at UMass. "Coke and Pepsi are moving across our country and signing exclusivity contracts with schools and public institutions," said Flecker.

The prevalence of Dasani water at the UMass can be attributed to the result of such an "exclusivity contract" between UMass and Coca-Cola. "These contracts are long-term — sometimes 10 years," Flecker explained.

"How much are you worth?" he continued, pausing for effect. "As a market, you are worth 20 billion dollars. Coca-Cola, Pepsi and Nestlé are after the money in your pockets."

Oppenheim argued that UMass's partnership should be not with a multinational corporation but with a local water company in the Pioneer Valley. But, she admitted, this would never happen because smaller companies "simply cannot offer the money large corporations can."

SGA votes on polling station

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association overwhelmingly passed a measure Wednesday to allocate funds for a centralized voting facility to be located in the center of the Amherst campus.

"This program is the first time nationwide where students have said, 'It is so important for us to vote that we are willing to buy the equipment to do so.' That says something really exciting about students at UMass, and it makes me proud to be a student here," said Morris Singer, a UMass student and member of the Amherst Town Meeting.

The exact location of the polling place is not yet known. However, the new location would be far more convenient for students who live on campus, allowing them to vote in a centralized location where most students attend class and conduct their daily activities.

The current polling places for on-campus students are located at the New Africa House in the Central Residential Area of UMass, Kellogg Avenue in Amherst Center, Strong Street in Amherst and two North Amherst locations.

"By increasing opportunities for students to vote on-campus, we will be able to put greater pressure on the legislature to increase funding for UMass and other public colleges and universities across the state," said Elvis Mendez, who works for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) at UMass.

Before the SGA measure is passed, it must be signed by UMass Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano.

"I'm really looking forward to working with town officials and the vice chancellor of student affairs to make this a reality," Singer said.

Singer easily passed one hurdle to getting the voting booths installed during Monday night's Amherst Town Select Board meeting.

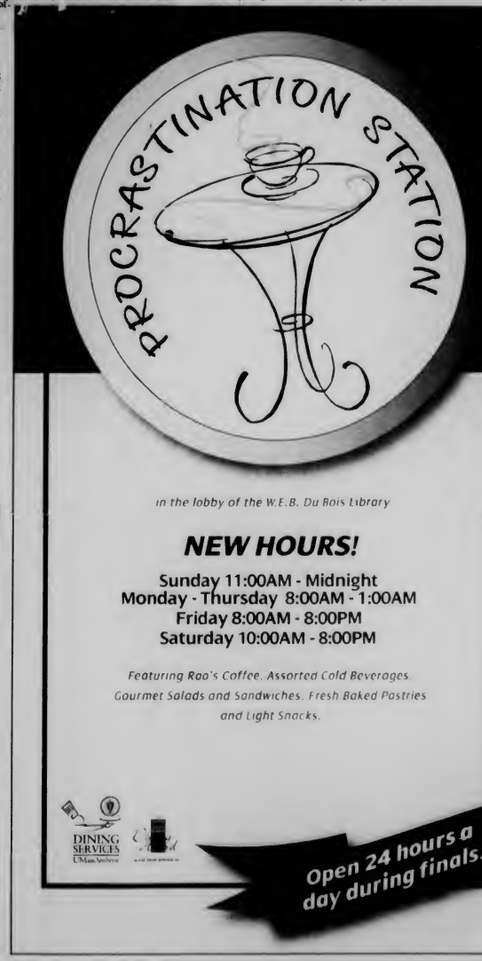
Singer originally asked the board to sign a resolution that would provide the funds "pending allocation approval from the [UMass] SGA."

Amherst Town Clerk Anna M. Maciaszek opposed this aspect of the proposal, because she said if the university decided not to fund their end of the project, then the town would have to pay for the entire project under federal law.

Members of the board also suggested drafting a letter to university officials stating their full support of the voting booth project.

The SGA vote will allocate $60,000 for the new voting booths.

There was only one dissenting vote.



The Republican newspaper of Springfield recently extended its support to the measure. The paper congratulated the Citizens for Electoral Participation for pushing the issue.

"If the Select Board approves the new polling place, students could cast votes in the 2006 election on their way to and from classes. We think it's a fine way to encourage students to participate in the political process," the Republican wrote in an editorial on Oct. 11.

Due to a slew of concerns stemming from the 2000 presidential election and other occurrences, federal law now prohibits certain types of voting machines. Newly constructed voting booths and machines will be used if the UMass voting plan passes.

The new voting booth would be a "UA Poll Master 1," which is described as a "high impact, heavy-duty plastic case ... [with] florescent light, aluminum legs with stabilizer bars." The booth can fold into a suitcase and carries a five year warranty from the manufacturer if there are any problems.

Delivery:
413.549.0077
Tel: 413.256.8923
413.256.8924
Fax: 413.253.1173
103 N. Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA
Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
Featuring:
• Vegetarian options
• Lunch Specials
• Sushi Bar
• "Light and Healthy" entrees
~ We Bring China Town to you ~
Semester Special
Bring in this ad and receive 10% off your total
*Cannot be combined with any offers, coupons or OCMP.
visit us at: www.pandaeastamherst.com

in the lobby of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library
NEW HOURS!
Sunday 11:00AM - Midnight
Monday - Thursday 8:00AM - 1:00AM
Friday 8:00AM - 8:00PM
Saturday 10:00AM - 8:00PM
Featuring Rao's Coffee, Assorted Cold Beverages, Gourmet Salads and Sandwiches, Fresh Baked Pastries and Light Snacks.
DINING SERVICES UMass Amherst
Open 24 hours a day during finals.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Communication is key

Debbie Friedman

[illegible] bash the Communication [illegible] to set Sut Jhally on them. [illegible] know who he is, and that is [illegible] antages to not being in the [illegible] at this University.

[illegible] about my major, from [illegible] communism." Since [illegible] Jersey, I am [illegible] like these. And [illegible] Jersey too well. [illegible] major is [illegible] who can't decide what they [illegible] students who want an easy ride. [illegible] for some people, but it is a [illegible] and would disappear. While the [illegible] different than any major [illegible] Social and Behavioral Sciences. [illegible] human mind like psychol- [illegible] studies like anthropology, it [illegible] between people, texts and [illegible]

In an average day you could see anywhere from a hundred to thousands of ads. So I think it's vitally important that someone is studying where these things are coming from, who is controlling them, and how they affect people and cultures specifically.

[illegible] some point in the day, [illegible] radio, and hopefully read the [illegible] typical day, do you ever [illegible] how all this is affecting you? [illegible] big world, and the people [illegible] and information that we [illegible] immense power in shap- [illegible] an average day you could see [illegible] hundred to thousands of ads. [illegible] important that someone is [illegible] these things are coming from, [illegible] how they affect [illegible] culturally.

Communication studies [illegible] communication and rheto- [illegible] everyday life. Words are the [illegible] that anyone has, and humans [illegible] here. It is so interesting to think about what makes us use the words we do when talking or writing. Each word choice, each communicative interaction, carries such an impact on how things are perceived and how events come into play. As Communication professor Stephen Olbrys always says, the line "sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me," is complete B.S.

Another great reason to be in the Communication major is that you will not find any "Ben Stein"-like teachers in this field. All the professors have great personalities, senses of humor and the ability to teach what they are the most passionate about. They are not out to make your life miserable; they simply want you to learn.

I will admit that if you want to get through the Communication major somewhat easily, there is a path you can take that will not be as difficult as some other majors out there. This major does not require you to take classes that don't interest you. It is not like the SOM, where everyone has to take accounting, even if they want to go into marketing or something that will never involve accounting skills. There is no way to weed people out like that in the Communication major.

However, the people in my major that are taking the "easy ride" are obviously not in college for the right reason. These people are easy to spot out, because they really just don't care to learn, and they will be easy to spot out after graduation too. The majorities of people in my major want to learn, are interested in the field and are here to challenge themselves.

Sometimes these digs taken at the Comm major actually make me re-assess my choice. However, when I think about spending my four years here studying the periodic table in the Chemistry department, learning how to build bridges in the Engineering department or practicing crunching numbers over at SOM, I quickly remember how I got here. Okay, I realize that those are stereotypes as well. So, how about I study what interests me, you study what interests you, and we can all be friends?

Debbie Friedman is a Collegian columnist.

UMass fan from abroad

World Perspectives

Zach Oelschlegel

I couldn't tell you two players from Brondby, or show you exactly where Brondby is on the map, but I still hate them. Watching my team, FC Kobenhavn (FCK), pull out a tie last week against Brondby, their biggest rival, was nothing short of sweet.

I've been studying abroad in Denmark now for the past three and a half months, and have had the privilege of seeing my soccer team, FCK, twice in the past three weeks. Seeing as how the same night I saw FCK was when UMass played UConn last week, this was as close as I could get to rooting for my school vicariously in another country and through another team. The difference between hating Brondby and hating UConn is that I can at least name (and pronounce correctly) players from the UConn squad we played.

For now, FCK is my home team. They are named after the city I've resided in during this adventure in Europe. They play in the Parken, a short five-minute bike ride from my apartment, and I consistently hum the team fight songs and cheers throughout the week, just like I bleed maroon and white when I'm singing "Fight Mass" at a basketball or hockey game. It's something you have to do as a sports fan. Your team had better be one of your passions.

You see, FCK was supposed to lose to Brondby. FCK has had a poor season, Brondby has the better record, and Brondby beat FCK earlier in league play this year. Until stoppage time began in the second half, Brondby had dominated FCK. They had scored a goal in the twelfth minute and held onto it until the game was nearly over, but they committed a foul inside their box, setting up an FCK penalty kick.

Andre Bergdolmo scored the easy goal, putting the crown into a frenzy and silencing the horde of Brondby fans across the stadium who had been jumping and screaming and lighting multiple road flares in anticipation of a big win (I doubt we'll be seeing any road flares at McGuirk or the Bill anytime soon). Stealing a win, not just from the Brondby players but from their legions of fans, was worth every one of the 120 kroneris cost me to get in.

Your team might be a heavy underdog, but there's still that chance they'll pull off the upset. They've lost to the favored team the last ten times, but you still remember when you beat them last; the taste is still there. That was UMass-UConn for me last year.

Riding my bike home, I remembered why you go to these types of games. Your team might be a heavy underdog, but there's still that chance they'll pull off the upset. They've lost to the favored team the last ten times, but you still remember when you beat them last; the taste is still there.

That was UMass-UConn for me last year. I showed up to that game 90 minutes early, getting fired up with other members of the boisterous student section, expecting a loss but hoping for the taste. Rushing the court after Rashaun Freeman made that shot with only seconds left remains the finest moment of my college career. Hugging the other students who I had sat with and come home disappointed with for the previous two years, I knew I had witnessed something special.

I had a similar feeling when FCK scored on that penalty kick last night. Even though UMass lost to UConn later on in the night, I still got to see something special. I got to high five and hug men I didn't know, and I got to snicker at the Brondby fans who came out to the Parken and were that close to seeing their team win. That was my UConn this year.

Expecting a loss and stealing a win from Brondby has been one of the greatest moments in my study abroad experience thus far. It's why you go. You sit and wait until the end of the game, because something could happen. As the great UMass fan Alice Bishko said to me once, "who cares about what happened last time? Tonight's a whole new game." That's what it's all about. See you guys at the Mullins in February.

Zach Oelschlegel is a World Perspectives columnist. He is currently abroad in Denmark.

Bible promotes war

Brian Sayler

[illegible] Westerners were [illegible] abducted in Iraq by Islamic [illegible] cal peace activism, it would [illegible] world that is unfortu- [illegible] appear. He doesn't even endorse [illegible] nately ordinary in [illegible] Geneva Convention. If the [illegible] their particular group and [illegible] Christian Peacemaker Teams [illegible] the particular incident deserve [illegible] organization has found some [illegible] a separate comment. [illegible] other God or Gospel, they are [illegible]

The three men abduct- [illegible] those of their own invention, [illegible] belong to a group called [illegible] not the Biblical ones.

"Christian Peacemaker Teams." [illegible] This depiction does not end [illegible]

My contention is this: [illegible] with the Hebrew Bible. [illegible] according to its other [illegible] The New Testament [illegible] name, it still has an ide- [illegible] also depicts God as a [illegible] ology. Call it Christian, [illegible] vengeful God, indeed, [illegible] call it what you will, this group [illegible] almost the entire Book of [illegible] is nothing more than secular, [illegible] Revelation (the book which con- [illegible] anti-war crusade that would like [illegible] cludes the canon of Christian [illegible] to impose a Utopian, Socialist [illegible] scripture) is devoted to the pre- [illegible] order and disguise it [illegible] diction of the cataclysmic war [illegible] under the cloak of the Gospel. [illegible] that Jesus promises upon sinful [illegible] This deserves analysis, hence [illegible] mankind. Prophecy regarding [illegible] the present commentary. [illegible] divine warfare can be found in [illegible]

For [illegible] the group's ide- [illegible] all four Gospel accounts and in [illegible] ological motivation and bare [illegible] numerous epistles as well. The [illegible] by a [illegible] at the [illegible] Gospel Jesus presented was, [illegible] moment of the [illegible] indeed, a Gospel of mercy and [illegible] of their [illegible] forgiveness for some, but simul- [illegible] link regard- [illegible] taneously a promise of judgment [illegible] ing "Zealot [illegible] and punishment for others. [illegible] This sec- [illegible]

The take-home message is this: [illegible] visiting [illegible] the Bible never forbids all killing, [illegible] protests, [illegible] it forbids only murder. There is [illegible] outside [illegible] a big difference. While the truly [illegible] they are found to [illegible] faithful may not particularly like [illegible] that promote [illegible] everything they read in the Bible, [illegible] content [illegible] they cannot simply trim away [illegible] becomes to [illegible] those parts that make them squea- [illegible] campus [illegible] mish; the journey of faith requires [illegible] mean a [illegible] that they contend with every part [illegible] of it in some way.

Whenever a group uses piec- [illegible] es of scripture that are taken [illegible] out of their historical and liter- [illegible] ary context, and uses them to [illegible] motivate and influence people, [illegible] trouble usually follows. With [illegible] such a large piece of literature [illegible] as the Judeo-Christian Bible, it [illegible] is not difficult to find something [illegible] that can be extracted, explained, [illegible] and "spun" in such a way as to [illegible] deliberately lead someone down [illegible] the path of incorrect understand- [illegible] ing. The problem really emerges [illegible] when a group uses it to lead [illegible] people into harm's way. [illegible]

In my opinion, anyone that [illegible] uses religion in that way is [illegible] no better off than Jim Jones [illegible] or David Koresh, who lead [illegible] well-meaning but weak-willed [illegible] religious seekers to their own [illegible] demise. This so-called Christian [illegible] Peacemaker Team organization [illegible] is perpetrating essentially the [illegible] same fraud, using a distorted [illegible] interpretation of the Bible to [illegible] motivate ideologically anti-war [illegible] people to go into dangerous [illegible] parts of the world and insert [illegible] themselves into the situation in [illegible] protest.

I am confident that many [illegible] of those who fall under the [illegible] sway of groups like Christian [illegible] Peacemaker Teams are probably doing it with the best intentions, but that doesn't mean their rhetoric can withstand scrutiny. It also doesn't mean that anyone should excuse their activities because of some assumed nobility or chivalry owing to the religious character of their claims; the religious motivation cannot be a shield from proper criticism.

It is my judgment that this group is nothing more than a politically-correct, neo-hippie, anti-war radical bunch, seeking to influence people through the more palatable rhetoric of the Christian Gospel. While that rhetoric correctly asserts that the Biblical Jesus is the Prince of Peace, and the Biblical God is the God of mercy, it ignores volumes of other biblical material that tells us otherwise. The God of the Bible is indeed peaceful, but not exclusively; He is also the God of judgment, wrath, and yes, warfare.

One last point to ponder: there is a Biblical precedent, straight from the mouth of Jesus Himself, that contradicts the thinking of the Christian Peacemaker Teams. Jesus does not tell His followers to "get in the way", as the CPT Web site claims its members are doing; to the contrary, He tells His people to "get out of the way" and take refuge in the mountains.

Whatever the fate of the kidnapped foreigners in Iraq, it should be clear to everyone that these were not "aid workers" as the media is reporting, nor were they here doing any true Christian work. These were, in the main, politically-motivated anti-war activists who placed themselves in harm's way by their own choice. They did it to discredit their own governments, not to advance the Gospel.

Indeed, the CPT Web site lays the blame for their abduction not with the insurgents who abducted them, but with Western governments: "We are angry because what has happened to our teammates is the result of the actions of the U.S. and U.K. governments due to the illegal attack on Iraq and the continuing occupation and oppression of its people." Their actions defy common sense, and my response borders on a lack of sympathy. Their ideological motivation is just as transparent as their theology is unconvincing. I will, however, still pray for their safety.

Brian Sayler is a UMass alumnus.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

ABORTION IS MURDER

Many may feel that the controversy over abortion is an old subject, but it should never be accepted as a way of life. Abortion is the worst holocaust in the history of the world. Mother Teresa said that "the fruits of abortion are nuclear war." By that, she meant that if we don't protect the life of an innocent child, then the lack of respect for life will escalate to nuclear war. It appears we are on that path.

The medical profession knows full well about the existence of life in a pregnant woman and has published a great deal of medical fact on prenatal conditions. This includes the formation of human form, the ability of the baby to sense and to feel, and so on, all showing the existence of life. Yet the term "fetus" is purposely used to avoid any recognition of human life.

A terrible, brutal procedure is used in late-term abortion to kill a child. How can anybody possibly not be outraged by this? An abortion clinic in Kansas specializes in and actually proudly advertises late-term abortion. They alone have taken the lives of several thousands of babies. How can it be that we all stand silent?

Freedom to choose what we do is a God-given right. When we make a choice we live with the consequences, whether small or major, good or bad. This freedom extends to ourselves only, not to others and the way others may be affected. In abortion, we are taking the life of another, separate human being. We have no right to do that. Words such as "freedom of choice," "reproductive rights," and "fetus" are used to make the killing of a child seem acceptable . . . but it isn't and will never be.

Members of the medical profession, who know full well about the facts concerning the existence of life during pregnancy, should be totally ashamed of themselves for not only performing abortions, but for failing to speak up. The clergy and leadership of all religions have failed to speak up enough and band together in their opposition to abortion. Legislators, political leaders and judges have failed miserably in protecting human life; in fact, many are adamant in their support of abortion. Imagine. We have several large and very powerful organizations that actually lead and encourage many young girls and women toward abortion. In Massachusetts we have one of the most shameful situations in the country. We have both elected and appointed politicians, many of whom are Catholic, that strongly support abortion, including late-term abortion.

Pope John Paul II said, "A nation that kills its own children is a nation without hope." There are attempts underway to try to take God out of every aspect of American life. In the absence of God, evil forms. Make no mistake about it — there is no greater evil than abortion, taking the life of a child.

Al DiLascia

We need an assistant Ed/Op editor.
If interested, fill out an application in the Daily Collegian office, located in the Campus Center basement.
Deadline is TUESDAY, DEC. 13.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Music is best part of 'Rent'

By Jess Mesh

"Rent"
Directed by Chris Columbus
Starring Anthony Rapp, Rosario Dawson
Sony Pictures
Rated PG-13
135 mins.
Grade C-

[illegible] Roger (Adam Pascal) [illegible] [illegible] who's [illegible] addicted [illegible] [illegible] to AIDS. He is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] relationship with [illegible] Mimi Marquez (Rosario Dawson) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Maroon and White prepare to take on the Terriers tonight

M HOOPS from page 8

averaging 11.2 points per game, while junior Rashaun Freeman leads the team in scoring with 16.8 points per game.

Defensively, junior Stephane Lasme has been blocking shots left and right in the paint.

Lasme is third in the nation in average blocked shots with 5.2, just behind Justin Williams of Wyoming (6.6) and Shawn James of Northeastern (6.0).

With a roster made up of six freshman and three sophomores, the Terriers are a primarily young team that will try and stretch their winning streak to four games.

Corey Hassan leads the scoring attack for the terriers with 11.1 points per game and has connected on 23-of-60 three pointers. Right behind him is Kevin Gardner with a 10.5 average and 13 blocks over the course of eight games.

Defensively for the Terriers, Shaun Wynn has 11 steals and will try and shake up the Minutemen when they have the ball.

This contest will be somewhat of a grudge match for junior transfer Etienne Brower, who traveled to Western Mass. this past offseason from Boston University.

Although the game tonight will make for interesting pre game talk, Brower will not play, as he is sitting out this season as a transfer and will watch from the Minuteman bench.

When tip-off rolls around, Viggiano and the Minutemen look to forget about UConn and get the well-need win at home.

"We just need a consistent effort from everyone and we've got to forget about [the loss to UConn]," Viggiano said.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Freshman point guard Chris Lowe will have a shot to put his team back to the .500 mark when the Minutemen take on B.U. tonight at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

Eagles sweep away Minutemen

HOCKEY from page 8

box for two minutes. Despite being down a man, Benn Ferriero didn't let the score stay tied for long. The Minutemen turned the puck over at the blue line of the BC goal and it was scooped up by Ferriero.

UMass junior Mark Matheson then found himself on the short end of a two-on-one with Ferriero and Peter Harrold. Ferriero skated all the way in with the puck and ripped the scoring shot from the left point.

The first period scoring was capped by Dan Bertram's fifth goal of the season. The assist on the play was awarded to Chris Collins who skated into the UMass zone and faked a shot from the right point. Quick committed to the fake and Collins flicked the puck over to Bertram. The UMass netminder got a piece of Bertram's shot but it still had enough on it to cross the goal line.

Neither team generated any offense through much of the rest of the game until Ferriero scored on a UMass empty net with just 18 seconds remaining in the contest.

"I think we got beat by a superior team tonight and a team that's playing extremely well," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "They have a lot of tools, a lot of fire power, and they're really a balanced team as young as they are."

In all, BC out shot the Minutemen 39-15 in the contest. After UMass had seven shots in the first, it was only able to get eight off in the next two periods combined. On five man advantage opportunities, the Minutemen were only able to muster four shots.

"Obviously I don't think we generate offense as a team," Cahoon said. "I think you look right at your special teams and you see that our power play is not firing at a very high percentage. I think that speaks to the low goal total more than anything else."

On Friday night at Conte Forum it was all BC. By the end of the first period the Minutemen were already trailing 3-0. Nathan Gerbe had a shorthanded score in the period while Collins and Andrew Orpik each added a goal of their own to put UMass in the early hole.

The Eagles then scored two in each of the last two periods, which put the Minutemen away. Collins had two of those scores for his first career hat trick. Gerbe chipped in his second of the game and Ferriero also added a score for BC.

"We have struggled with this team more than any other team we play," Cahoon said. "My biggest concern with this team right now is that we haven't shown that we can play in anybody else's rink."

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

During Saturday's 4-1 loss against B.C., senior captain Marvin Degon recorded an assist in the first period. Degon has accounted for seven points this season.

Patriots take full control of AFC East

PATS from page 8

Moulds attended the game, watching from a suite.

The game turned in the first quarter when Losman — facing third-and-goal from the 22 — ignored a wide-open receiver underneath and threw a pass into the end zone intended for Sam Aiken that was easily intercepted by Asante Samuel.

Brady took over and went 5-of-6 for 73 yards passing, capping the eight-play drive himself by taking the ball up the middle. Brady came up limping after he was hit diving into the end zone by linebacker Jeff Posey.

Dillon made it 14-0 in the second quarter, and Brady then made it 21-0 late in the third quarter by completing a swing pass to Brown, who stiff-armed cornerback Eric King, and scampered into the end zone from 5 yards out.

Bush has shot at two Heismans

BUSH from page 8

unmatched in the history of college football.

Even without Leinart, USC would have been tough to beat this season.

With him, the Trojans have run their winning streak to 34 games and can become the first team to win three straight national championships by beating Texas.

Bush thanked Leinart on Saturday saying, "Your decision to come back has changed my life."

If Bush returns to USC, he'll make life a whole lot easier for highly touted quarterback John David Booty, Leinart's likely successor.

The pipeline of talent running into USC these days is unsurpassed, but replacing Bush and Leinart in the same year would be daunting.

If Bush does come back, he'll be the third straight Heisman winner to play another year of college football and a huge favorite to repeat.

Oklahoma quarterback Jason White, whose NFL prospects were suspect at best, got a sixth year of eligibility after winning the Heisman in 2003.

White finished third in the Heisman voting last year behind Leinart and fell short in his bid to become the second two-time Heisman winner, along with Archie Griffin.

Leinart finished third behind Bush and Texas quarterback Vince Young.

Bush's victory was one of the most lopsided in Heisman history. Only O.J. Simpson, another star tailback from USC, received more first-place votes (855) than Bush's 784.

Young, also a junior, has said he intends to return for his senior season, but his NFL stock has been on the rise, too.

He and Bush could both be back in New York next year for the Heisman presentation.

In losing the Heisman, Young said he felt he had let down his team, family and hometown of Houston."And he promised to take that feeling into the Rose Bowl.

"This will give me a little more edge, a little more ego," Young said.

Davis is seeing double

By Paul Newberry
Associated Press

MARQUETTE, Mich. — Shani Davis could have stuck with just one sport. But what's the fun in that?

Davis is attempting a historic double leading to the Turin Olympics, hoping to represent the United States in two related but distinctly different events.

There's the traditional, more sedate form of speedskating, where Davis already is a world record holder and a lock to make the U.S. team that will be completed at the national championships in late December.

But Davis wasn't content with that. He'll also try out for speedskating's wild and wooly sidekick when the U.S. short track championships begin Monday at Northern Michigan University.

"I've been doing this since I was a kid," the 23-year-old Davis said. "It's going to be difficult, but the bigger the challenge, the better. It's only going to make me better as a person. Win or lose, I can go away from this experience having learned a valuable lesson."

Apolo Anton Ohno is the leading contender for the U.S. men's team, still one of the world's best short-track skaters nearly four years after his memorable performance at the Salt Lake City Games.

But much of the attention in Michigan's frigid Upper Peninsula will be directed toward Davis — the rare black athlete competing in a winter sport, an outspoken critic of the U.S. speedskating hierarchy, a guy who wants to muscle his way onto not one, but two, Olympic teams.

Those skeptics who say Davis should focus on one sport serve only as motivation for the tall, lanky skater who grew up on Chicago's South Side.

"I don't go on what people say, I go off my heart," Davis said. "My heart tells me to do short track. That keeps me happy, that keeps me fresh and I don't bored with it."

He knows it won't be easy to make both Olympics teams. Davis already got a sampling of that when he didn't qualify for the American squad that's been competing on the World Cup circuit this fall.

Despite that setback, he still has a chance to make the Olympics in this free-for-all of a sport where the skaters race each other — not the clock — within the tight confines of a hockey-sized rink.

"It's going to be harder to make the short-track team," Davis conceded. "I already prequalified in a lot of distances for long track. I think I will retain those spots no matter what happens. But in short track, you can't prequalify. You've got to show up for those couple of days and be strong, be in the top five."

Anything goes in short track, as Ohno discovered at the 2002 Olympics. In one event, he claimed a silver medal even though he was taken out by a crash on the final turn, forcing him to crawl across the line with a bloody leg. In another event, he again finished second but was awarded the gold when a South Korean skater was disqualified for an illegal block.

Many sports, including long-track speedskating, have turned away from make-or-break trials to determine the Olympic team, preferring a system based on long-range performance that ensures a top athlete won't be knocked out with one poor day or some other fluky event.

But short track still does things the old-fashioned way, which means no one — not even Ohno — is assured a spot in Turin.

Ohno would have preferred a guaranteed spot on the Olympic team, but he also realizes that his presence at the trials will draw attention to a sport that gets scant coverage in non-Olympic years.

Harris tears up Celtics off bench

DALLAS (AP) — With starting point guard Jason Terry hampered by a strained right hamstring, the Dallas Mavericks needed some help in their backcourt.

Devin Harris gave Dallas a lift off the bench with 19 points, including a 13-for-17 performance from the free throw line, and the Mavericks extended their winning streak to five games with a 103-94 victory over the Boston Celtics on Saturday night.

Harris' ability to penetrate and break down the Boston defense resulted in Harris' career highs for foul shots made and attempted.

"I just attacked the basket," Harris said. "That's why I got (to the free throw line) so often."

Terry had missed the previous two games but he got pregame treatment for the injury and started against Boston despite being at less than full strength. He finished with 12 points in 22 1/2 minutes.

"It's an injury that will be there, but I can play through it," Terry said. "I'm not 100 percent, but I was able to get up and down."

Dirk Nowitzki led Dallas with 24 points, nine rebounds and converted all 10 free throw attempts. Adrian Griffin added 11 points and 10 rebounds, and Marquis Daniels had 15 points for the Mavericks, who've taken 12 of the last 14 meetings with the Celtics.

Dallas won the game on the free throw line, connecting on 33 of 43 attempts.

Boston got to the line only 14 times, converting eight.

"I thought we attacked the basket as much as them, but we didn't go to the line," Boston coach Doc Rivers said. "They were more forceful."

Paul Pierce led Boston with 28 points. Al Jefferson added 21 points and 12 rebounds, both career highs, and Ricky Davis had 20 points for the Celtics, who wrapped up a 2-3 trip.

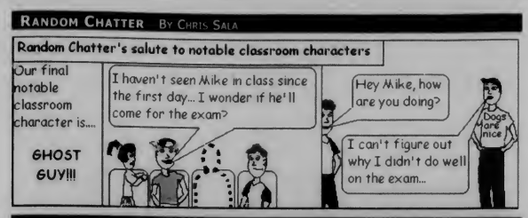
Pierce sustained a bruised right ankle in the third quarter after a collision with Harris under the Boston basket, but stayed in the game.

Rivers said Pierce told him during a timeout that if he sat down, he wouldn't be able to get back up.

"If we take him out with the bruise, we would have had to keep him out," Rivers said.

-Associated Press

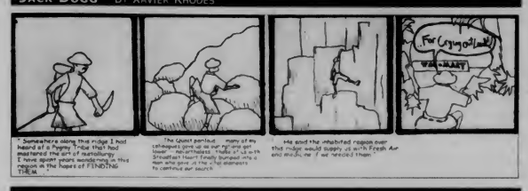
J. CONRAD WILLIAMS JR./NEWSDAY



Ricky Davis, a guard for the Celtics, managed 20 points against the Mavericks on Saturday, but it proved not to be enough as Boston fell 103-94.

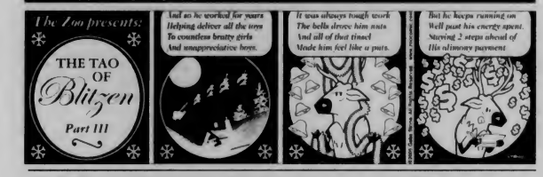
555 deal
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas
$5 Each!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911

CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS
Receive up to 50% of your purchase price.
JEFFERY AMHERST COLLEGE STORE
253-3870
Located between La Veracruzana and Jeffrey Amherst Bookshop in Downtown Amherst



RANDOM CHATTER By Chris Sala

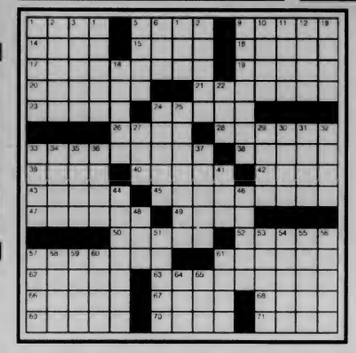
ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski



JACK DOGG By Xavier Rhodes

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

THE ZOO By Gabe Strine



QUOTE OF THE DAY

"It's hard to soar with the eagles when you're surrounded by turkeys."

—Mr. Deeds

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will forget to double space your paper today.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Everyone will compliment you on how pretty you look today.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You are going to need a lot of Tylenol tomorrow morning.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
The wings you order tonight will make you very sick.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
You have a severe addiction to Facebook.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Crayons are a kindergartner's best friend.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Use up all of your YMPC swipes as soon as possible.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You will have much success in the coming years.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You will have an awesome interview this morning.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You should probably set your alarm clock before you start drinking.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Stay away from cranberry sauce this week.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You will eat an entire bag of gummy bears on Wednesday night.

NEW IN TOWN!
AMHERST HAIRSTYLISTS
Caren's Place
Get it done right the first time!
Full Semester Coupon Specials!
10$ Clipper Cut
Free blow dry with haircut (straightening extra) or 10% off a regularly priced cut.
10 % Discount on Body & Facial Waxing
* only with this coupon *
40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
(413) 253-7200

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

APARTMENT FOR RENT

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 in to campus.

$380/month plus utilities. In Sunderland. Rebecca 302-359-1455

1 BR Near town.campus. Low utility cost $550/month 413-586-0746

Spring Semester Sublet – Master bedroom in Puffton Village, $461/month plus cable/internet and electricity. Looking for a subletter Jan-May. Share apartment with two other roommates, partially furnished. Call 203-915-7679.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Winfield family. Large open floor plans 2 to 3 Bdrm Apts. Rent starting at $995.00 Call for Winter Special 256-0600.

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

EMPLOYMENT

PART-TIME POSITIONS Ideal for students or 2nd job $8.00 Hr. 20+ hrs/wk; Conduct surveys over the phone Hadley location – NO SALES! Night & wknd shifts; PVTA accessible. RSW Recruiting Office 1-888-423-5381 or email: dhayes@retail-solutions.us

Instructors/Performers P-T for fun after-school programs, parties and more. Experience managing groups of children, Love of kids, availability some afternoons. Theatrical experience helpful. Car required. (413) 584-7243

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

FOR SALE

Moving Boxes Best Prices Campus Center Concourse 12/12 – 12/14

FURNITURE FOR SALE

Bedroom / Study Set Must Sell! 413-222-5707

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

Happy Birthday, Eric!

Wish your friends Happy Birthday in the Collegian! 545-3500.

HOUSE FOR RENT

For January, 2-3 Bedroom house. Walking distance to Northampton Center, close to bus. 1,000 + utilities, no pets. Skibiski Realtor 586-1827

ROOM FOR RENT

One Bedroom Close to campus 2 Girls looking for Roommate. 400 plus utilities 973-580-6713 Jan – Aug.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

SERVICES

Pregnant? Consider adoption. Free confidential counseling to help you make fully informed decisions for your baby and you. Choose your baby's parents, meet and stay in touch. Stable, loving two parent families waiting to adopt. Call 24/7 Brightside 1-877-777-7774 License # 1465107

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

TRAVEL

Alternative Spring Break Birmingham Cherokee, Mississippi Gulf Coast, NYC, 2 credits, umass.ash@gmail.com Apply Now.

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Terriers coming to town

By ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Battling as instate rivals, the Massachusetts men's basketball (2-3) team will take on Boston University (3-5) at the Mullins Center at 7 p.m. The Minutemen have a chance to return to the .500 mark and regain some strength after being taken down by the No. 3 Connecticut Huskies 78-60 on Thursday.

UMass will be facing a Terrier team that is recovering after a rocky start.

BU dropped its first five contests of the season, but then went on to win three in a row, including a 58-55 edge over Maine on Saturday.

Although the Minutemen are recuperating from their loss to UConn, the Terriers understand the feeling of facing a top-tier program, as they were ousted by No. 1 Duke 64-47 on Nov. 14 at the NIT Season Tip-Off.

The Terriers are in a rebuilding stage, despite posting a 20-9 record and reaching the NIT tournament last season.

Countering BU coach Dennis Wolff and the Terrier game plan will be a Minuteman squad that is still adapting to UMass coach Travis Ford's new style of play. With some players having to play at two different positions, and only eight scholarship players on the bench, the Minutemen have been looking to find a groove.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

UMass junior swingman Brandon Thomas will try and take down the Boston University Terriers at the Mullins Center tonight. Thomas is averaging 11.2 points per game so far this season.

Senior Jeff Viggiano is coming off of a career-game against the Huskies in which he put up 17 points and hit two shots from the perimeter. The Suffield, Conn. native has been contributing primarily off of the bench this season, but has seen minutes regardless and is averaging 8.8 points per game.

In preparing for BU, Viggiano knows that there will be a lot less attention and face time than the UConn contest, and that excitement has to be produced regardless.

"It's games like BU, where there won't be that many people in the stands, and you won't be on TV," Viggiano said. "You've got to hype yourself up."

Newcomer Brandon Thomas, a junior transfer from Long Island University, has earned a spot on the starting lineup, and

See M. HOOPS on page 6

Minutemen get clawed by Eagles

By JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Going into the final weekend before the holiday break, the Massachusetts hockey team (5-10-0 3-7-0 Hockey East) was looking to receive an early gift against No. 6 Boston College (9-4-1 8-2-1 HEA). But all it got was a lump of coal.

UMass dropped both games to the Eagles in Chestnut Hill and Amherst. At Conte Forum on Friday night the Minutemen were whitewashed by the Eagles, 7-0. Saturday's game was closer, but the 4-1 score ended in the same result for UMass.

B.C.	7
UMass	0

In all during the home-and-home series, the Maroon and White never held a lead over the Eagles. The best it could muster was having the game tied for 9:15 out of the possible 120 minutes on the weekend.

B.C.	4
UMass	1

The Minutemen will be off until they take on Bowling Green at the UConn Huskie Challenge on Dec. 29. The puck is scheduled to drop at 4 p.m. in Storrs, Conn.

With the series shifting back to the Mullins Center on Saturday night, the Minutemen looked to bounce back in front of their largest home crowd of the season at 6,372.

The opening period was filled with action as the Eagles netted three scores to UMass's one. BC took little time to pick up where it left off Friday night as it took only 54 seconds to put the Minutemen in an early hole.

BC freshman Benn Ferriero chased down the puck against the boards in the right corner and flipped it towards the crease right out in front of freshman goalie Jon Quick. Brian Boyle one-timed the slow rolling puck into the net past the rookie to get the scoring started.

Midway through the period, with BC's Joe Rooney in the box for high sticking, UMass freshman Chris Davis scored the fifth goal of his career to put the Minutemen up on the board. The play began when fellow freshman Topher Bevis controlled the puck above the left point and slid the puck across the ice to senior Marvin Degon. The captain then sent it in towards the Eagles' net.

The bouncing puck never quite made it to goaltender Cory Schneider but it did find Davis' stick. The rookie slapped the bouncing puck to the back of the net past Schneider.

Just after Davis' power play goal, Brian Boyle of BC was called for roughing and sent to the penalty

See HOCKEY on page 6

Maroon and White drop two

By DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team lost its fourth consecutive game in a heart-breaking 81-76 loss to Syracuse on Saturday at the Carrier Dome.

It was the third of a five-game road trip that will continue after Christmas.

The Minutewomen (2-7) now have a few weeks to re-focus and will be back in action on Friday, Dec. 30 in Atlanta, Georgia, as they take on Brown University.

Syracuse	81
UMass	76

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Despite putting up 10 points, senior Katie Nelson and the UMass women's basketball team could not get past Syracuse on Saturday.

UMass will play two games in the Atlanta Marriott Northwest Holiday Invitational, and will then head back to Amherst to open up the New Year.

The Maroon and White gave a valiant effort late in the game to try and overcome an 11-0 run by the Orange, but came up just short.

The Orange had a 10-point lead with less than three and a half minutes left in regulation when senior guard Ashley Sharpton buried a three-pointer from the corner to cut the lead to seven.

Sophomore Pam Rosanio followed that up with a steal in the back-court, leading to an easy lay-up and a Syracuse timeout with 1:59 remaining.

Rosanio cut the Orange lead to four points with less than a minute remaining when she drained a three-pointer after a pair of Syracuse free throws. Thanks to a nice pass from Rosanio, sophomore Kate Mills came up with a huge basket with 23 seconds left, making it a 76-74 ball-game, and giving the Minutewomen some hope.

All UMass would need was a missed free-throw from the Orange, but once again, the Minutewomen could not get things to work out in their favor, and suffered their seventh loss of the season.

Things looked promising for UMass as it ended the first half with a 9-2 run, giving the Maroon and White a 38-34 lead after the first 20 minutes. But in a game that had 10 lead changes, the score at halftime was pretty much worthless.

Both teams shot 50 percent from the field, and UMass outrebounded Syracuse 41-31, but were still unable to grab their third win of the season.

Part of that might have been because the Minutewomen had only five free-throw attempts, making just three of them, as opposed to the 14 points that Syracuse made from the line.

UMass outscored Syracuse 52-34 in the paint, but it was the Minutewomen's 18 turnovers that led to 22 Syracuse points.

Mills led the Minutewomen in scoring with 20 points, shooting 10-of-13 from the field, while Rosanio was right behind her with 19.

Leading the Minutewomen in rebounds in the game was junior Tamara Tatham with eight boards.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

In a home-and-home series against Boston College, freshman Cory Quirk and the UMass hockey team was swept, losing 7-0 and

Bush to make decision about football future

By RALPH D. RUSSO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Reggie Bush is on the clock.

The Heisman Trophy winner has a little more than a month to decide whether he'll enter the NFL draft or become the second straight junior from Southern California to pass up a chance to be the No. 1 pick and go back to school.

But it's not as if Bush can spend the holiday season weighing the pros and cons, pondering the biggest decision of his young life.

There's still a national championship game for which Bush must prepare.

For now, he's putting his future on hold.

"I won't think about it until after this Rose Bowl game," he said Saturday after becoming the third USC player to win the Heisman in the last four years. "We've got our work cut out for us with Texas."

Bush and Trojans quarterback Matt Leinart, last year's Heisman winner, play Texas for the national title on Jan. 4, marking another historic moment for the USC dynasty. Never before have Heisman Trophy winners played together in a college game.

The deadline for underclassmen to declare for the NFL draft is Jan. 15.

Bush did allow for a moment of speculation at his post-victory news conference at a Manhattan restaurant.

"I love the whole East Coast atmosphere," Bush said. "I can definitely see myself playing here, playing for the New York Jets."

The Jets are among the hapless teams, including Houston, San Francisco and Green Bay, in danger of finishing with the worst record in the NFL and the first pick in the draft.

Leinart said he wasn't ready to give up college life after winning the Heisman in 2004. But he also knew he was coming back to play with Bush in an offense that might be

See BUSH on page 6

Bills no match for Brady, Pats

By JOHN WAWROW
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. — Neither a limp, nor snow, nor a slick field could prevent Tom Brady from leading the New England Patriots to victory.

Brady banged up his left knee on a 3-yard touchdown run in the first quarter, shook off the injury, and finished with 329 yards passing and two touchdowns in leading New England to a 35-7 victory over the unraveling Buffalo Bills on Sunday.

Corey Dillon added a 12-yard touchdown run and 102 yards rushing. Troy Brown and Christian Fauria each caught short touchdown passes as the Patriots scored the first 35 points.

New England's defense did the rest, shutting down a popgun Bills attack by generating three interceptions and limiting Buffalo to 183 yards offense and eight first downs. Safety James Sanders capped New England's scoring with a 39-yard interception return of J.P. Losman's pass tipped by Tedy Bruschi in the final three minutes.

The game was played amid a steady snowfall and a stiff breeze that made the 30-degree kickoff temperature feel like 20.

JOHN SLEEZER/KANSAS CITY STAR

Christian Fauria's fourth quarter touchdown pass from Tom Brady was more than enough for the Patriots to overcome the Bills, as they pounded Buffalo 35-7 yesterday.

Brady has been at his best in such conditions. He improved to 14-0 when the temperature is colder than 35. Brady was lifted with 7 minutes left, replaced by former Bills quarterback Doug Flutie, who received a big cheer from the few fans left in the stands.

Losman lost his seventh straight start, going 10-of-27 for 181 yards. Losman's only bright spot was a 51-yard touchdown completion to Josh Reed in the final minutes, allowing the Bills to avoid their first home shutout loss since 1979.

The loss capped a tumultuous week for the Bills (4-9), a team which running back Willis McGahee described to be in a state of "chaos." Bills veteran receiver Eric Moulds was suspended for the Patriots game for conduct detrimental.

The Bills, who have lost six of seven, have been outscored 59-9 in their last seven quarters since blowing a 21-0 first quarter lead in a 24-23 loss at Miami last weekend.

The fans showed their displeasure Sunday, leaving en masse after Rian Lindell missed a 32-yard field goal attempt in the final seconds of the third quarter.

One fan, standing behind two Moulds' jerseys draped over the wall in the end zone, wore a bag over his head. Another fan held a sign reading, "Free Eric."

See PATS on page 6

WINTER BREAK WORK

1-5 Week Work Program!
Locations Near You

$16.00 – $20.00
base-appt.

All Ages 17+. Conditions Apply
No Experience Necessary
Customer Sales / Customer Service
Great for Resume

Call Now, Begin After Finals

Connecticut
Massachusetts
New York
Maine
Pennsylvania
New Hampshire

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, December 13, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 65

University posts 'Amherst 250' plan for public

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The blueprints for the "Amherst 250 Plan" at the University of Massachusetts have been posted for public viewing on the University's Web site.

The plan, which can be viewed at umass.edu/budget/250/analysis, outlines the steps being taken to use $7.5 million in new state funding to hire 250 additional faculty members on the UMass Amherst campus by 2010.

Chancellor John Lombardi strongly endorses the 250 Plan and believes it is an essential part of the University's overall goal to become more competitive among large universities.

"While we are doing very well meeting our teaching obligations, and while our faculty are remarkably productive in their research, we just do not have enough of them to compete effectively," Lombardi said this past summer when the 250 Plan was first announced.

Raising the amount of faculty at UMass is the key goal of the 250 Plan, which officials say is needed after a steady drop in the number of tenure faculty over the years.

One reason for the drop in faculty was due to the early retirement incentive programs that began in 2003, UMass officials say.

"This campus initiative comes after a period of great budgetary stress for the institution that saw a significant reduction in faculty numbers due to early retirement programs," the new report stated. "These early retirement programs left some parts of the campus significantly understaffed for the teaching and research responsibilities they perform, in addition to overcommitted to a wide range of service activities."

The data in the interim report also stated that the departments with the greatest need for instructional-investment include Communication, Political Science,

See PLAN on page 2

Many attend Hampshire College's marrow drive

By Christina Baron
Collegian Staff

A steady flow of students, faculty, and community members filled the second floor of the Robert Crown Center at Hampshire College yesterday afternoon, engaging in light conversation, enjoying refreshments and listening to live music.

However, despite the festive atmosphere of the event, these people were there for a serious reason: to potentially save someone's life.

Many people came to show their support for Hampshire College Professor Eric Schocket, who was diagnosed with acute leukemia in September 2005, by registering to be a bone marrow donor.

Potential donors undergo a simple test, just a q-tip swab of the inside of both cheeks, and then each donor's tissue is then entered into a national registry, where it can be compared to and potentially matched with someone in need.

"How many opportunities do you get to save someone's life?" asked Schocket.

The drive was organized by Schocket and his colleagues in hopes to find a bone marrow donor not only for himself, but perhaps for one of the 5,000 currently waiting on donor lists, half of whom are children, said Schocket.

The drive was held by the Caitlin Raymond International Registry, a non-profit organization of the UMass Memorial Medical Center in Massachusetts. Schocket said that he chose this organization because they were well-funded and "super enthusiastic."

A bone marrow transplant is Schocket's only hope to beat his cancer because of a rare chromosomal abnormality he has which makes remission impossible.

Schocket was diagnosed with acute leukemia at the end of September. He is currently undergoing chemotherapy treatment. He suffered a number of problems during his first round of treatments and had to spend some time in the hospital because of diabetes, a rare side effect of the chemo.

It was during this time that Schocket got the idea to hold a bone marrow registration drive.

"I was feeling like the most unlucky person, and I am not the type to sit around and take it," he said.

Even though the chances of finding a donor for him are slim, Schocket said he believes that he owes it to other victims to get as many people registered as possible.

"Because someone else held a drive like this one, I might find a donor. So I want to do my part in return and hopefully help someone else," he said.

Christina Baron/Collegian

Students, faculty, and community members line up at Hampshire College to take part in a bone marrow donor drive. Potential donors were tested and typed to be entered into the bone marrow donor list.

Every year 30,000 patients are diagnosed with a disease treatable by a bone marrow transplant, said the Caitlin Raymond International Registry Web site. According to the press release, one in 20,000 white donors will prove to be a match for a patient, but the numbers for minority patients are much less hopeful. A diverse population of donors is desperately needed to help all patients with these life-threatening diseases.

Schocket said that he believed that being a donor would be an incredible experience. "Someone that you have never met literally allows you to be reborn," he said.

Schocket said that it has been difficult to have his health control his life, but that community support has been great. Because he was diagnosed at the end of September and had to start treatment right away, he had to leave Hampshire College and his students in the middle of the semester. He said that he was grateful for his colleagues who took on extra responsibilities to allow him to focus on his health.

Schocket said that his students showed their support early on with cards and e-mails. On Monday they were able to go a step further and register to be a donor.

"It is an important event for all of us to make a difference and for the Hampshire community to show our support for Eric," said Rachel Conrad, one of Schocket's friends and colleagues who helped organized the event.

S.H.A.R.E. sponsors University book drive

By Anna Doulantis
Collegian Staff

S.H.A.R.E. (Students Helping Area Reach-Out Efforts) will be sponsoring a textbook drive at the University of Massachusetts from Monday, Dec. 12 to Thursday, Dec. 22.

S.H.A.R.E. is "a community service organization run by students who wish to incorporate volunteer experiences into their school careers," according to the group's mission statement.

The organization is working in collaboration with Better World Books, "a company whose mission is to utilize the value of the book to fund literacy initiatives locally, nationally, and around the world," said Leslie Salomone, the publicity officer of S.H.A.R.E., who is coordinating the drive. "Better World Books supports various non-profit groups, such as Books for Africa, Room to Read and the National Center for Family Literacy (NCFL). Better World Books donates 100 percent of their profits to their non-profit literacy partners."

"We are trying to get books to help the NCFL. More than 370,000 school-aged children have been displaced – and their education disrupted – due to Hurricane Katrina. Better World Books has already provided the NCFL with $15,000 for immediate relief efforts," Salomone continued. "These funds have been used to provide over 5,000 brand-new, award-winning children's books to two major projects: rebuilding an elementary school library in Mississippi that lost every book, and providing books to be distributed through literacy programs in five Texas cities."

The group is interested only in collecting relatively recent college textbooks in good condition. "We are unable to accept magazines, academic journals, mass-market paperbacks (supermarket novels) and books with outdated content. All other books are good," said Salomone.

"S.H.A.R.E. is setting up collection boxes in the three buy-back areas on campus – the Textbook Annex, Campus Center, and in Southwest." S.H.A.R.E. volunteers will be monitoring the collection boxes at all three drop-off locations, and will be able to assist in determining the acceptability of a textbook's condition.

"S.H.A.R.E., as a group, decided that the National Center for Family Literacy (NCFL) would benefit from the drive. So the books we collect in the drive will go toward helping Katrina victims," said Salomone. "Their mission is to create educational and economic opportunities for the most at-risk children and parents; since it's establishment in 1989, the NCFL has grown to be recognized worldwide as the leader in family literacy development," she continued.

The National Center for Family Literacy has partnered with Better World Books and they share the goal of "putting books and other educational resources in the hands of those who have so little left."

Once the books have been donated, they will be packaged and sent to Better World Books. "Better World Books will decide what the best use of the textbooks will be. They will either send them directly to victims of Katrina or sell them and send the money to the victims," said Salomone.

"S.H.A.R.E. is pretty involved with student activities on campus. There has never been a book drive on the UMass campus, and it seems as though a great deal of books go to waste. So we get to save books from being wasted, and help those in need," said Salomone.

The group has been working with this relief effort since the beginning of the semester. According to Salomone, they hope to continue the book drive at the end of each semester, when people begin selling or disposing of their textbooks. "Right now, we are expecting mostly UMass people to support the drive. We haven't advertised outside our school community. Since this is our first drive, we thought we'd focus more on UMass. If things go well, [for] the next drive we'll set up collection boxes at bookstores in town, as well."

In addition to books, donations of time or funds are also welcome. For more information about the textbook drive, or about getting involved with S.H.A.R.E., contact Leslie Salomone at lsalomon@student.umass.edu.

Iraqi insurgents call elections a 'satanic project'

By Patrick Quinn
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Soldiers, patients and prisoners began voting Monday in national elections, three days ahead of the general population, while insurgents denounced the balloting as a "satanic project" but did not threaten to attack polling stations.

The early voting went ahead despite the sound of detonations rumbling across the capital and at least 15 deaths in ongoing violence.

President Bush offered encouraging words from Washington to Iraqi voters but cautioned that the parliamentary elections "won't be perfect."

"Iraqis still have more difficult work ahead, and our coalition and a new Iraqi government will face many challenges," the president said in a speech in Philadelphia.

Asked about the number of Iraqi casualties from the war and the insurgency, Bush said: "I would say 30,000, more or less, have died as a result of the initial incursion and the ongoing violence against Iraqis." White House counselor Dan Bartlett later said the number was not an official figure but that Bush was simply repeating public estimates reported in the media.

In a rare joint statement, Al-Qaida in Iraq and four other Islamic extremist groups denounced the election as a "satanic project" and said that "to engage in the so-called political process" violates "the legitimate policy approved by God."

The groups vowed to "continue our jihad [holy war] ... to establish an Islamic state ruled by the book [the Quran] and the traditions of the Prophet Muhammad."

However, the statement contained no clear threat to disrupt voting as in the run-up to the Jan. 30 election and the Oct. 15 referendum on the constitution.

KRT

An Iraqi army soldier places his ballot into the ballot box after voting in Hayji, Iraq yesterday. On Dec. 15, Iraqi citizens will elect their first permanent parliamentary government. Iraqi security forces vote early so that they can provide security during the general election.

The authenticity of the statement could not be verified, but it appeared on a Web site that often publishes extremist material.

The absence of a clear-cut threat could reflect the growing interest among Sunni Arabs, the foundation of the insurgency, to take part in the election. The Sunni decision to boycott the January ballot left parliament in the hands of Shiites and Kurds — a move which increased communal friction and cost the Sunnis considerable influence in drafting the constitution.

A leaflet that appeared Monday in the Baghdad Sunni stronghold of Azamiyah acknowledged that Sunni Arabs could make gains in the election but that "fighting will continue with the infidels and their followers."

The statement was unsigned but was written in a style favored by Islamic extremists.

U.S. officials hope for a large turnout among the disaffected Sunni Arab minority, a development which could produce a government capable of winning the trust of the Sunnis and defusing the insurgency. That would enable U.S. and other foreign troops to begin heading home next year.

"Many Sunnis are campaigning vigorously for office this time around," Bush said. "Many Sunni parties that opposed the constitution have registered to compete in this week's vote."

In the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, hooded men carrying assault rifles erected campaign posters.

The men, who claimed to be insurgents, raised a large banner supporting a Sunni Arab candidate. Standing next to them was a man, wearing no mask and carrying no weapon, holding up a poster for other Sunni candidates.

Mass. ranks as one of the least charitable states

By Mart'n Caballero
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON — The 2005 Catalogue of Philanthropy, which ranks states based on a statistical calculation called the Generosity Index, lists Massachusetts as the 49th-most charitable state in the country, outranking only New Hampshire.

To determine a state's generosity, the catalogue subtracted the state's total charitable donations from its income.

"Generosity is a function of the amount [a state] has and the amount they give," said Marty Cohn, a spokesman for the Catalogue of Philanthropy.

Massachusetts has consistently placed in the top three states for average adjusted gross income since 2000, when it ranked second only to Connecticut. But since the catalogue was created in 1996, the state has never placed higher than 44th in itemized charitable donations. Mississippi and Arkansas, on the other hand, states that have two of the lowest gross incomes, ranked first and second in itemized donations.

The catalogue's Web site offers some insight to the statistics.

"Nationwide, giving is not consistently related to income. Rather, giving is shaped more by cultures, which tend to be regional, and by religion (not politics)," said a statement explaining the formula for calculating the Generosity Index. "The Bible Belt and Utah are, with generally low incomes, giving so much ... that in effect, they set a high example."

The wealthiest taxpayers in wealthy states can afford to give significantly more, according to the statement.

Setting an example for giving is exactly what Cohn said he hopes the release of the catalogue will do.

"The purpose of the Generosity Index is to stimulate discussion in hopes that it will lead to an increase in charitable donations," he said.

This strategy appears to be working.

Despite the state's low ranking, Massachusetts has been making progress in increasing its charitable donations. The amount of donations has doubled from $2 billion to $4 billion, the highest rate of increase of any state during the first four years since the catalogue was first published in 1996. Almost 1,000 new private foundations were created in Massachusetts between 1997 and 2002.

Suzanne Fountain, director of the Jimmy Fund, a Boston-based charity for cancer research, said Massachusetts's low rank in this year's Generosity Index came as a surprise.

"The amount of donations we receive continues to increase every year," she said. "People [in Massachusetts] are very giving, and we are thankful for that."

Fountain said she was hopeful that this year's Generosity Index would stimulate Massachusetts residents to give more.

"Anytime you talk about philanthropy, it increases awareness," she said. "This is true for [the Jimmy Fund] and for philanthropic organizations in general."

ARTS & LIVING
THE TOP FIRE OF 2005
Arts writer Nick Romanov shares his picks of this year.
Page 7

EDITORIAL/OPINION
LEGALIZED PROSTITUTION
With all the things that are illegal in this world, should prostitution be one of them?
Page 6

WEATHER
TODAY Sunny, H22°
TONIGHT Clear, L3°
TOMORROW Sunny, H24°, L9°

SPORTS
SECOND HALF SURGE
A strong second half keyed a 64-45 UMass win over BU last night.
Page 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael Busack
Managing Editor Cameron J. Woods
Business Manager Hirak Shah
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Sherel Widnik
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egasian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Sneller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Mackenzie Issler
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Belliveau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Carnati
Assistant Sports Eric Athas
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently owned, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life. Became the College Signal in 1901, the Writer's Collegian in 1904, and the Daily Collegian in 1906. Published daily since 1965. The Collegian has been printed on recycled paper since 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 413-545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Julie Teece
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Jeston Sussman, Tiffany Van Langen

UMass releases new plan to hire more faculty members

PLAN from page 1

Sociology, Economics, Exercise Science, Languages, Literatures and Cultures, and Philosophy.

The report says that only the "Step One" phase has addressed these issues, which will be more comprehensively addressed in Step Two.

"In the first step, we have made some progress in addressing these deficits, but we have not completely resolved all of them by any measure," the report said.

Thirty-one tenure track positions have been named to meet the requirements of the first round of hiring over the next year. Lombardi and Provost Charlena Seymour said 17 other faculty allocations within the Natural Sciences and Mathematics, Social and Behavioral Sciences, Engineering, Natural Resources and the Environment, and Public Health and Sciences could also be targeted.

In addition, the administration plans to hire 48 other faculty members for the Fall 2006 semester as part of the regular process to fill vacancies created by requirements, the report said.

The interim report stated that because no new faculty appointments will be made with state funding, the current funds will be diverted toward other University expenses, including a reserve of about $732,000 established by the President's Office to support potentially unfunded collective bargaining agreements. Another $300,000 is being allocated to support library acquisitions related to faculty hired under the 250 Plan; and another $2.4 million is being set aside for continuing start-up costs, administrative support for faculty, and costs of providing space for faculty and teaching. About $537,000 is being reserved for possible costs associated with higher than anticipated market salaries for new faculty, for unexpected opportunities that may arise, and for underestimates of start-up costs, according to a press release from the UMass News Office.

A study by the Massachusetts Society of Professors shows that the number of tenure track professors at UMass decreased from 1,113 in 1990 to 874 in 2005. Over 40 percent of teaching was done by non-tenured professors in 2004 at UMass.

American economy ready for effects of holiday shopping spree

By Clayton Bauman
East Carolinian (East Carolina U.)

GREENVILLE, N.C. — With the impending Christmas holiday only weeks away, the American economy is braced to feel the effects of a massive shopping flock at malls and department stores around the country.

With children and teenagers being a big proportion of Christmas gift giving, the toy industry comes away from the season smiling. Toy sales alone accounted for nearly $30.6 billion in 2002, according to the Census Bureau's Web site, census.gov. Of this amount, $10.3 billion was a result of video game sales. With the release of Microsoft's X-Box 360, expect this number to rise dramatically this year.

Dec. 2002 had retail stores pocket around $32.4 billion in consumer cash. This amount was up 47 percent from the previous month, which was $21.9 billion. Other stores that had sizable jumps in profit between November and December were clothing stores (44 percent), jewelry stores (163 percent), book stores (87 percent), sporting goods stores (59 percent) and radio, TV and other electronics stores (56 percent).

The Internet managed to pull in $13.8 billion in sales back in 2002. With the increasing popularity of the Internet, expect this number to increase even more three years later.

Many holiday shoppers fall victim to the allure of credit card spending. According to holidays.about.com, many people do their holiday shopping with a credit card, promising themselves that they will pay off the debt in the next few months. Thanks to credit card interest and other factors, people end up over their heads in debt unexpectedly. Most people refer to this as "holiday hangover."

The Web site goes on to offer advice as to how to avoid the misconceived credit card benefits. Cash is the best way. Throughout the year, set aside money for the purpose of buying gifts. It helps to figure out ahead of time who you are purchasing gifts for and how much you plan to spend. Once your money runs out, you are finished with your shopping.

Many students have found responsible ways of dealing with an alternative to cash, while others are determined to stick with cash when paying for their gifts.

"I attempt to use a department store cards like Sears and Belks," said Derrick Foss, sophomore political science major.

"I've found that interest rates are lower with these cards than credit cards. Plus, it's easier to budget because that money is only going toward one store."

"I usually use cash. It makes it easier to balance my money without going into debt," said Kathy Bruggers, freshman print journalism major.

People who have difficulty saving money can join groups at banks that specialize in setting aside money for the holiday season. Knowing where you will be shopping is important as well.

Correction:

In the December 8th edition of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, in an article about the scholarship set up to honor a slain student, it was incorrectly reported that Franklyn Nwachukwu was killed on July 17, 2005. The correct date was July 15, 2005.

Congress to vote on Patriot Act renewal

By Erica Pelzek
The Daily Cardinal (U. Wisconsin)

MADISON, Wis. — A plan to extend the Patriot Act, the anti-terrorism law implemented after Sept. 11 that allows circumstantial wiretapping and controversial monitoring of library and business records, is expected to receive final votes in the House and Senate early this week.

Based on a compromise agreement reached by a bipartisan House-Senate committee last week, the Patriot Act may be renewed in a revised form for at least another four years.

However, a group of six senators, including Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), two other Democrats and three Republicans, oppose the reauthorization plan, explaining they "cannot support a conference report that does not contain modest but critical improvements, similar to those in the Senate-passed bill, to the most controversial provisions of the Patriot Act."

Feingold, the only U.S. senator that voted against the Patriot Act in September 2001, said in a statement that he "will do everything [he] can, including a filibuster, to stop this Patriot Act conference report, which does not include adequate safeguards to protect our constitutional freedoms."

In order to defeat a filibuster in the Senate, a cloture is required – 60 of 100 senators must vote to overcome it.

The Senate may vote on the bill officially this week, according to Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

"I don't think there will be a filibuster," Specter told The New York Times. "I don't think it will succeed if there is one."

Rep. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.) said the House of Representatives will likely take up the conference report this week as well.

"I remain very concerned about the powers associated with the Patriot Act and believe that Congress should retain strong oversight," Baldwin said. "I am proud of Senator Feingold for playing such a key leadership role on The Patriot Act."

Although Baldwin said she wants to study the final Patriot Act report package more closely, she said it was her understanding that the reauthorized act does not address the concerns she has had previously.

While The Patriot Act's most controversial elements, including government access to semi-private records and wiretapping, would be extended for another four years, certain less inflammatory elements of the law could be extended permanently, including anti-money laundering policies and banking account restrictions.

Attourney General Alberto Gonzales testifies before a Senate committee on the USA Patriot Act earlier this year.

Hofstra University offers you a future of excellence.

- With more than 140 unique programs in five schools, Hofstra has a program for you in:

  Frank G. Zarb School of Business: M.B.A., M.S., Executive M.B.A. and advanced certificate programs

  School of Education and Allied Human Services: M.A., M.H.A., M.S.Ed., Ed.D. and advanced certificate programs

  Hofstra College of Liberal Arts and Sciences: M.A., Au.D., Ph.D. and advanced certificate programs

  School of Communication: M.A. in Speech Communication and Rhetorical Studies

  New College: M.A. in Interdisciplinary Studies

- With an outstanding, dedicated and accomplished faculty and state-of-the art educational facilities, Hofstra's resources are among the finest in the country.
- Hofstra is ranked 14th on The Princeton Review's ranking of America's Most Connected Campuses.
- A student-faculty ratio of 14 to 1.
- New technologically-advanced facilities in Hagedorn Hall and C.V. Starr, such as SMART Board™ interactive whiteboards and wireless locations.
- And our location, 25 miles from Manhattan, affords students a suburban setting within an easy commute to the resources of New York City.

For more information, or to arrange a campus tour:
Hofstra University Graduate Admissions
105 Memorial Hall
126 Hofstra University
Hempstead, NY 11549
Phone: 1-800-HOFSTRA, ext. 657
E-mail: graddean@hofstra.edu

HOFSTRA UNIVERSITY™
Hempstead, New York 11549 • www.hofstra.edu

NATIONAL NEWS

Opponents of gay marriages get signatures

By Mindy Gray
The Daily Free Press (Boston U)

BOSTON — Opponents of same-sex unions who have spent recent months collecting thousands of signatures on a petition for a statewide constitutional ban on gay marriage celebrated their progress at the State House on Wednesday, the deadline for signatures for any ballot questions.

Thousands of volunteers in the 351 towns and cities across Massachusetts worked to collect nearly 148,000 — about 80,000 more than the required minimum validated signatures in 60 days, exceeding their goal of 120,000 signatures.

After a signature drive that was at one point marred by allegations of unethical gathering tactics, supporters of the amendment said they were overwhelmed by the enthusiasm that signatories showed. What began as a grassroots effort, they said, resulted in the collection of nearly 170,000 signatures, but some have not yet been validated.

The boxes, filled with petitions, were delivered in installments, and today's press conference marked the third and final installment in Boston, which included about one-third of the validated petitions.

Supporters of the petition said the ballot initiative campaign in Boston was one of the most successful in the state. Holding signs that read "Let the People Vote" and wearing stickers advertising the Web site VoteOnMarriage.org, supporters said that marriage should be limited to one man and one woman.

Evelyn Reilly, a coordinator of the movement to collect the signatures, said petitioners spent months on the project, and the volunteers "were always there."

Everyone involved shared the same "sense of accomplishment," Reilly said.

Coordinators noted that there were certain allegations involving volunteers who received compensation for their efforts, but Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute and spokesman for VoteOnMarriage.org, said he was "not worried [because] paid gatherers played a minor role."

Mineau acknowledged that gay marriage is a big issue, particularly in Massachusetts.

"Marriage is what people hold dear in the Commonwealth," he said. "Let the people vote."

Mineau said this is a "tremendous time of celebration," because so many people were more than happy to sign the petition, and many were also willing to appear on the Web site in support of the ban.

Mineau touted the Web site for increasing people's awareness about the movement to ban gay marriage. On VoteOnMarriage.org, people can download and fill out petitions, sign up to become volunteers and download informational documents.

VoteOnMarriage.org acknowledges Catholic Citizenship, a Catholic grassroots group, for providing much of the support they received.

Judge rules to extend hurricane victims' hotel stay

By Kevin McGill
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — A federal judge ruled Monday that a program that is putting tens of thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees up in hotels must be extended until Feb. 7 — a month beyond the cutoff date set by FEMA.

U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval said victims must be given more time in hotels because FEMA cannot guarantee that all applications for other aid, such as rent assistance or trailers, will be processed by the agency's Jan. 7 deadline.

The temporary restraining order was part of a class-action lawsuit filed in November by advocates for hurricane victims.

Attorneys pressing the lawsuit had argued that sticking to a January deadline would mean homelessness for thousands of evacuees.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency continues to pick up the tab for about 41,000 hotel rooms in 47 states and the District of Columbia at an estimated cost so far of about $350 million. In addition, the agency has provided rental assistance to more than 500,000 families who lost their homes to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, spokeswoman Nicol Andrews said.

The agency "will review the judge's decision and continue to reach out to help those evacuated get the help they need as they get back on their feet," she said.

The agency had set a Dec. 1 deadline for ending the hotel program but extended it to Dec. 15 after widespread criticism. In addition, 10 states — Alabama, Arkansas, California, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Nevada, Tennessee and Texas — were allowed to apply for extensions that effectively stretched the deadline to Jan. 7 for most evacuees.

Duval ruled that those who have not yet received FEMA aid to rent an apartment or move into a trailer can stay in their government-paid hotel rooms until two weeks after their application is approved or denied. But he said everyone will have to be out by Feb. 7 at the latest, unless FEMA decides to extend the deadline again.

Duval noted that even those who have FEMA rent money in hand are finding it difficult to find housing in some areas.

"FEMA cannot assure the court that it will process all or most of the applications of the persons living in hotels and/or motels by Jan. 7, 2006," Duval wrote. "The court is convinced that many persons in the putative class will be irreparably harmed by FEMA's admitted inability to process the pending applications."

Two children go through the boxes of clothes donations for victims of Hurricane Katrina. Victims such as these will be allowed to stay in hotels past the FEMA cutoff date, by order of a judge.

A spokesman for the U.S. Justice Department, which defended FEMA in the lawsuit, said no decision had been made on whether to appeal.

Lawyers for evacuees said victims often got conflicting information about when they would have to leave. At a hearing Friday, one hotel occupant, Lenora Brantley, said she received a letter dated Dec. 2 telling her she could stay in her hotel room until Jan. 7. Later she got a Dec. 5-dated letter telling her she would have to leave by Dec. 15.

"It is unimaginable what anxiety and misery these erratic and bizarre vacillations by FEMA have caused these victims, all of whom, for at least one point in time, had the very real fear of being without shelter for Christmas," Duval said.

Duval's ruling dealt only with Hurricane Katrina victims who applied for FEMA aid, not victims of Hurricane Rita. But attorney Howard Godnick, one of the lawyers who brought the lawsuit, said the decision sets a precedent that Rita victims could use to fight eviction from a hotel, if necessary.

The plaintiffs did not get everything they sought. Duval refused to order that FEMA act immediately on more than 84,000 and applications still listed as "pending." He said federal law is unclear on when FEMA must act on such applications.

Cape Cod still reeling from effects of snow

BREWSTER, Mass. (AP) — Residents of Cape Cod are still feeling the effects of Friday's fast-moving snow storm, which left thousands without power for more than two days, sent hundreds to shelters and may have contributed to the deaths of at least nine pilot whales and 24 dolphins.

Five of the whales and seven of the common dolphins had to be euthanized after they stranded on the shores of Cape Cod Bay. The rest of the marine mammals were found dead, according to Kristen Patchett, stranding coordinator for the Cape Cod Stranding Network.

"There were signs that they were going into shock," Patchett told the Cape Cod Times. "It's always a tough decision to put an animal down, one that we take very seriously, but in [this] case it was clear that it was the right thing to do to prevent suffering."

Necropsies were performed on several of the animals but the findings were not immediately known.

Meanwhile, utility crews continued their work to restore power in four communities after high winds knocked down trees and power lines.

Caroline Allen, a spokeswoman for NSTAR, said less than 500 residents in Brewster, Chatham, Eastham and Orleans remained without power on Monday, and the utility expected all power to be restored by the end of the day.

Officials suspect that high winds and strong tidal fluctuations from Friday's storm caused the dolphins and whales to become trapped in shallow water. However, the network says illnesses also can contribute to strandings.

The stranding network was notified of several animals in trouble Friday evening, but road closures and storm conditions prevented its members from responding.

Every year, the stranding network responds to an average of 204 strandings of marine mammals. Mass strandings are not rare: 18 Atlantic white-sided dolphins stranded on Massachusetts beaches during a storm in April 2003, and more than 50 pilot whales on Cape Cod in July 2002.

Pilot whales, which have a rounded head and slight beak, measure up to 20 feet and weigh up to three tons, making them second only to the killer whale in size, according to the American Cetacean Society's Web site.

Common dolphins, which are roughly eight feet long and can weigh nearly 300 pounds, have colorful hourglass patterns on their sides, curved dorsal fins and long, thin flippers. They travel in herds of hundreds if not thousands.

—Associated Press

Stick with eRecruiting and find great job!

We bring employers to you through job postings, interviews, and career fairs!

Search for up-to-the minute info on jobs and internships!

Look for specific positions related to your interest & qualifications!

Job postings added every weekday!

Have a fun & safe winter break!

phone: 413-545-2224
fax: 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers

CareerServices

Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building

a division of Student Affairs & Campus Life

WACKY WEDNESDAY

Join us for our special sales event

ONE DAY ONLY!

Wednesday, December 14, 2005

SHOP EARLY FOR BEST SELECTION.

Buy 1 clothing or gift item and get an item of equal or lesser value 50% off!

UMASS AMHERST
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

efollett.com ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

*Does not apply to sale items, regular priced merchandise only. Not valid with any other offer. See store for details. In-store only. Select items only. Excludes textbooks, computer hardware and software, and professional reference.

WORLD NEWS

Several killed in Lebanon car bombing

By Zeina Karam
Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A prominent anti-Syrian journalist and lawmaker was killed by a car bomb Monday, a day after returning from France, where he had been staying periodically for fear of assassination.

A previously unknown group claimed responsibility, saying Gibran Tueni was "spreading poisons and lies despite our repeated warnings to him."

Tueni played a major role in the huge demonstrations that, combined with international pressure, forced Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon in April, ending a 29-year presence in the neighboring country. Those demonstrations were triggered by a February car bomb that killed former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Tueni's uncle, Telecommunications Minister Marwan Hamadeh, and the leading Lebanese politician Walid Jumblatt blamed Syria for the bombing.

Pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud, a frequent target of Tueni's verbal assaults, described the slain journalist as "one of the symbols of freedom in Lebanon."

In Washington, the White House strongly condemned the bombing and called Tueni a "Lebanese patriot."

"His murder is another act of terrorism aimed at trying to subjugate Lebanon to Syrian domination," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

"This savage attack is clearly intended to intimidate those in Lebanon who would courageously and openly speak their minds."

McClellan said it was too early to know who was responsible for the attack.

Germany also condemned the killing.

Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora said he will ask the United Nations to set up a new inquiry into Tueni's slaying and previous bombings and to create an international tribunal to try suspects in Hariri's killing.

"The matter transcends individual assassination and threatens the fate of a people and its future," he said.

The Cabinet was due to meet later Monda

Police said Tueni was one of three people killed when a bomb exploded as his motorcade drove through Mkalles, an industrial suburb of Beirut. The others killed were his driver and an unidentified passer-by.

Another 30 people were wounded in the bombing, which started a fire that destroyed at least 10 vehicles.

Firefighters work to quell oil depot blaze

By Beth Gardiner
Associated Press

HEMEL HEMPSTEAD, England — Fears that one tank could contain highly volatile fuel forced firefighters to temporarily halt their battle Monday against a blaze raging at an oil depot that has spewed smoke as far away as France and caused jitters on the global oil market.

Authorities said they believe the explosion Sunday at the Buncefield depot north of London was an accident, but will examine other possible causes, including terrorism.

The 150 firefighters fighting the blaze with torrents of chemical foam withdrew at 3 p.m. after extinguishing flames in 12 of the 20 tanks that were initially ablaze, said Chief Fire Officer Roy Wilsher.

The terminal stores 4.2 million gallons of fuel, and the fire has caused unease on the oil market and raised questions about safety at the nation's oil facilities.

"There is nothing to suggest that it is anything other than an accident, but we're keeping an open mind and when we get into the site we'll treat it as a ... scene which could be a crime. We'll be doing full forensics," said Chief Superintendent Jeremy Alford of Hertfordshire police. "We'd be remiss if we didn't."

Firefighters battled the enormous fire for more than 30 hours before pulling back Monday. Authorities shut a highway nearby and extended a closed-off zone around the depot 25 miles north of London because of the chance the tank might explode, Wilsher said.

He said flames had reignited in one tank where they had been extinguished earlier, and its proximity to another tank whose contents were unknown had prompted fears of another explosion.

"I don't want a human tragedy to go alongside the environmental tragedy that we've already got," he told reporters. "We intend to go back on the offensive as soon as possible."

Wilsher told reporters the firefighters were in "uncharted territory."

"This is the largest fire of this kind that the U.K. and Europe have dealt with," he said.

Police said the ferocity of the blaze would make it extremely difficult for forensic experts to determine its exact cause, but there was no indication of foul play. Chief Constable Frank Whiteley said eyewitness accounts and closed-circuit television footage would be key to the investigation.

The series of explosions came four days after an al-Qaida videotape on the Internet called for attacks on facilities carrying oil, but officials drew no link.

Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott told Parliament there would be a full investigation once the fire was extinguished.

"Does this latest incident prove that proper safety procedures were still not in place?" Conservative Party lawmaker Caroline Spelman demanded.

Gemma Shepherdson, a spokeswoman for Total U.K., which operates Buncefield, said security was tight and anyone entering the site had to go through a security gate and show a photo pass.

She said the depot was ringed by closed-circuit TV cameras.

Heavy plumes of black smoke continued to billow Monday from the depot, the fifth-largest in Britain.

A severely damaged warehouse in Hemel, Hempstead, England, which was damaged by the blast from the nearby oil depot explosion on Sunday.

Most of the 43 people injured in the blast before dawn Sunday were treated for cuts and bruises from flying glass. Two men with more serious injuries remained in hospitals Sunday night, and one was released Monday, police said.

The smoke cloud has drifted over Brittany and Normandy in northwestern France and was headed toward Spain, France's national weather service said Monday.

"Poison cloud hits London ..." warned the Evening Standard newspaper.

Environment officials said tests [illegible] have not contaminated drinking water near Hemel Hempstead.

Most of the 2,000 people evacuated from their homes Sunday were still waiting to return.

Racial unrest spurs bouts of violence in Australia

By Mike Corder
Associated Press

SYDNEY, Australia — Violence spilled into a second night Monday as scores of youths drove through predominantly white suburbs of Sydney, smashing windows of cars, homes and stores and raising fears of spreading racial unrest.

Prime Minister John Howard called the violence "sickening," but denied it was rooted in racism. Arab community leaders said the unrest would heighten racial tensions as cell phone text messages warned of retribution by the Arab community and attacks by neo-Nazi groups.

About 5,000 white men, many of them drunk, targeted people believed to be of Arab or Middle Eastern descent on Cronulla Beach on Sunday after rumors spread that Lebanese youths assaulted two lifeguards earlier this month.

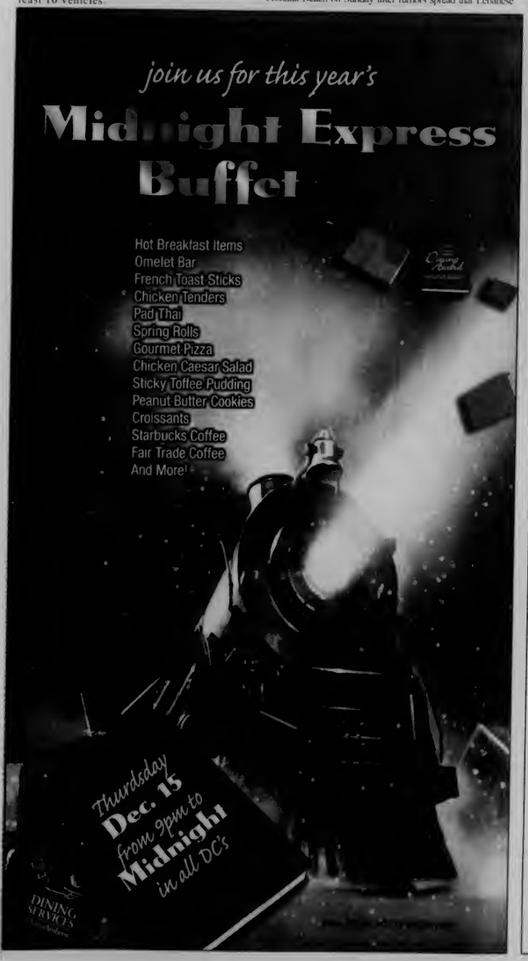
Police, who had stepped up patrols on the beach after learning of cell phone text messages urging people to retaliate for the attack on the lifeguards, fought back with batons and pepper spray.

Young men of Arab descent struck back in several Sydney suburbs Sunday, fighting with police for hours and smashing dozens of cars with sticks and bats, police said. They said 31 people were injured, including a white man who was allegedly stabbed in the back, and 16 arrested.

Carloads of youths also tore through the suburbs Monday night, attacking vehicles and throwing bottles through windows. While only one person was reported injured and six arrested, there appeared to be more damage to cars and stores than on Sunday.

Police who had stepped up patrols on the beach after learning of cell phone text messages urging people to retaliate for the attack on the lifeguards, fought back with batons and pepper spray.

Young men of Arab descent struck back in several Sydney suburbs Sunday, fighting with police for hours and smashing dozens of cars with sticks and bats, police said. They said 31 people were injured, including a white man who was allegedly stabbed in the back, and 16 arrested.



Carloads of youths also tore through the suburbs Monday night, attacking vehicles and throwing bottles through windows. While only one person was reported injured and six arrested, there appeared to be more damage to cars and stores than on Sunday.

Television images of Sunday's riot showed Australians, who pride themselves on tolerance and [illegible] an influx of immigrants with helping build up the country after World War II.

Tensions between youths of Arabic and Middle Eastern descent and white Australians have been rising in recent years, fueled by the [illegible] attacks in the United States and deadly bombings in Bali that killed 202 people, including 88 Australians.

Many Muslims also were angered over Howard's decision to contribute troops to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

The president of the Islamic Friendship Association of Australia, Keysar Trad, said the violence was "bound to happen" following angry calls to radio talk shows after the attack on the lifeguards. Police have denied the assault on the lifeguards was racially motivated.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Liberty demands prostitution

Ben Gaines

Sex sells. It's an old established rule of advertising. Just look at any commercial, Hollywood movie or magazine. The relationship between sex and money is etched into our culture. "Chicks dig guys with money." Unfair or not, it's a cultural perception. What I wonder, though, is why, given how closely we tie the two, selling sex is illegal in almost every part of this country.

The question, when you look at it from a perspective in keeping with the spirit of our laws, is not why prostitution should be legal, but rather why it should be illegal. As an ostensibly free society, our laws are crafted around the idea that we are free to do as we like, unless society needs a certain behavior to be curtailed in order to protect it. Eating a sandwich is legal because there is no legitimate reason for it to be illegal.

Now, there are of course a plethora of moral-religious concerns surrounding the oldest profession. As a part of a larger ethical code often based on faith, it would be foolhardy to bother trying to convince an individual that selling sex is morally right or wrong. Fortunately, this is unnecessary. The constitution upon which our liberty rests draws a heavy line between church and state. Religious laws are anathemas to our way of life. Many would consider it immoral to work on the Sabbath, or to drink alcohol, but these are matters between a man and his God, not a man and his government.

The social reality is that prostitution will exist as long as sex does. There's a reason why it's called "the oldest profession." Unlike the ever-present drug problem, though, the activities inherent in prostitution are not intrinsically socially harmful.

So now I ask once again what case can be made against prostitution, when individual morality is put in the hands of the individual and not the state. The answer, of course, is "several." However, these are not indisputable points, but rather matters open to interpretation.

One of the arguments against legal prostitution is that it demeans women (which is a sexist statement, but possibly accurate). Another is that it is harmful to the prostitutes. There are of course the concerns regarding public health, STIs and pregnancy.

The social reality is that prostitution will exist as long as sex does. There's a reason why it's called "the oldest profession." Unlike the ever-present drug problem, though, the activities inherent in prostitution are not intrinsically socially harmful. We need to accept that people will always be willing to buy and sell sexual favors, if nothing else than for the simple reason that sex is fun.

Imagine if selling sex became legal, but, due to the health concerns, was government regulated? Government-run brothels would employ men and women who were required to always use protection and contraception and undergo regular and thorough testing. They would make a reasonable salary, and would be required to prove their age before taking work. The sex would be more securely anonymous than now, safer and we could ensure that children wouldn't be working there.

Since these brothels would be cleaner, safer and more secure than illegal prostitution, the regular illegal operations would dwindle because of a loss of customer base. Yes, some child prostitution would still exist, and the police could more easily focus on that when the larger portion of the element died out. Government brothels won't protect the 10-year-old girl being taken advantage of by a cruel pimp and perverted cliential, but it will protect the 15-year-old girl who looks 20 and is selling her body because a) she doesn't think she has a choice, and b) there's a market for her.

There will still be incidences of pregnancy and STI transmission, even in the government brothels. But there will be vastly less, and the employees will know the risks. People are going to be paying for sex, and getting sick as a result, so why not minimize that? Take a look at life expectancies for radiologists and coal miners then tell me we don't have legal careers more damaging than a small chance of STI infection.

Much of the reason prostitution is so degrading is a function of it being illegal. Our images of prostitutes are of cheap, dirty women standing on street corners, waiting to do anything for the right price. Criminals. Barely people. Phrases such as "dressed like a whore" and "doing it like a pro" evolved from the degrading nature of illegal prostitution. In a situation that removed the most demeaning elements, and didn't involve women on a street corner with miniskirts and ridiculous feather boas, some degree of basic human dignity could be afforded the prostitute. It may not be glamorous or respectable, but then again neither is slinging fries at a burger joint.

Ben Gaines is a Collegian columnist

Exploit our troops?

Mike Sances

I'd like to take this opportunity to defend President Bush against the recent charges that he's been exploiting the soldiers killed in Iraq and Afghanistan by constantly invoking their memories, in speeches and public appearances, as justification for his political beliefs.

I really would like to. The problem is, all the mud that's been flying about exploiting the troops has been directed solely at Cindy Sheehan, the proverbial "commander in grief" and "peace mom" credited with energizing the anti-war movement this past summer. Emboldened by anger and loss, Sheehan set up camp outside the president's ranch in Crawford, Texas during his record-breaking vacation to demand an answer as to why her son had to die in Iraq.

Note the first of several important distinctions: Sheehan wants a dialogue about the war; in contrast, her detractors, constantly in fear of any serious debate, would give almost anything for her to shut up or, failing that, to scare her audience away.

It's an attitude that should be familiar by now. Freedom of speech is fine, as long as you say the right things. Say something I don't approve of, and you're obviously motivated by an insidious desire to put U.S. troops in danger. Similarly, democracy in general is to be lauded, but only when a country "democratically" chooses a course of action suitable to American interests. In this view, policies contrary to these interests are by definition the very opposite of democratic.

It's an attitude that should be familiar by now. Freedom of speech is fine, as long as you say the right things. Say something I don't approve of, and you're obviously motivated by an insidious desire to put U.S. troops in danger.

The attacks on Sheehan go further than basic hypocrisy, however. There is again the strange contrast between her lack of influence and resources compared with the president's unmatched power. Sheehan might get a half hour before a thousand people to speak her mind; the president commands the bully pulpit and his every utterance virtually guaranteed a spot on the front pages of every major newspaper. And yet it is Sheehan who is accused of exploiting her son to advance an agenda, when the president's constant invocation of the fallen as justification for "staying the course" elicits no comment whatsoever.

Don't misread me. It is not my contention that the president should be prevented from saying such things, though I do admit that it sickens me to hear them. What I would like is for those accusing Sheehan of exploiting her son's death to show a little consistency in their zeal.

Nor is it my opinion that those without family members involved in the current wars have a greater right to speak than the rest of us — all rights are granted equally in this country. We might want to pay more attention to what they have to say, sure, but it doesn't necessarily mean their point of view is more correct than the other.

Those who oppose the war are often reminded that it is the military that allows them to speak their minds. I don't entirely agree with that idea; but let's accept it as true for the moment. Which is a better way to honor the memories of those who died to protect our freedom of speech: to use this freedom to speak one's mind proactively, to challenge conventional beliefs and speak truth to power, or to tell those who would speak their minds to shut up and fall in line?

It is also often suggested that those who don't agree with certain aspects of this country should move to, say, Saudi Arabia, or some other country less tolerant than ours. While it should be noted that changing citizenship is not as easy as it might first appear, I'd propose that those expressing this point of view might consider moving to said dictatorship themselves. I feel they'd fit in a lot better there, where dissent is unheard of and the state is properly worshipped, than here, where my inalienable right to vocally disagree with you won't be going away anytime soon.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist

Sexless marriages are a farce

David Shenkenberg

For any young couple considering the future, marriage may enter their mind, but that often leads to negative thoughts. Why even seek marriage in the first place? There is more fun in numbers, or so they say. We have heard that at least half of all marriages will end in divorce. Married people do not have sex anymore. However, the truth is that marriage is more lasting than people think, only a few marriages are sexless and marriage provides certain additional benefits.

While the statistic that 50 percent of today's marriages will end in divorce cited by the U.S. Census Bureau in 2002 is often referred to, this data does not consider individual circumstances. A well-educated person (some college) who marries over the age of 25, has a child after marriage, has a religious affiliation, whose own parents are still married and who has an income of over $50,000 has a much lower chance of divorce during the first 10 years of marriage than people who do not fall under these categories, according to a Rutgers University study. Considering age alone, an article in USA Today states that the divorce rate for those marrying over age 25 is about 25 percent. The statistics lead to the positive, common-sense conclusion that if you get married when you are ready and sure, your marriage is far more likely to last.

The statistics lead to the positive, common-sense conclusion that if you get married when you are ready and sure, your marriage is far more likely to last.

One key to a lasting relationship that experts often cite is communication. Dr. Susan Sprecher of Illinois State University stated that her studies have shown that love is more likely to grow rather than die over time, but couples break up because they are dissatisfied with aspects of the relationship. If love is present in a relationship, surely it can be saved. A 2003 University of Minnesota-Brigham Young University study that analyzed 23 marital studies found that simply communicating with one's partner can raise the success of marriage by 30 percent.

Newsweek states that only 15 to 20 percent of couples have sex only 10 times a year or less, defined as a sexless marriage by experts. Newsweek also states that over half of couples have sex more than once a week. While the male virility is celebrated in the media, research suggests that the death of sex in a marriage has as much to do with men as with women. The medical term for loss of sex drive is hypoactive sexual desire disorder (HSD). Twenty to 30 percent of men and 30 to 50 percent of women say they have little or no sex drive, according to USA Today. As a remedy for hypoactive sexual desire disorder, psychologist Michele Weiner-Davis recommends in Psychology Today, "Just do it." Since the problem could be hormonal or disease-related, it would also be wise to seek a physician's advice.

There are additional benefits to a healthy marriage besides regular sex, one of which is increased health. At a meeting of the American Heart Association, researchers stated that a healthy relationship decreases blood pressure that has increased from job strain. Married people also suffer less from long-term illnesses, according to Dr. Todd Linaman, citing a 1997 study. Dr. Linaman also states that married people are happier than singles and make more money over time, citing other studies. In addition, there are about 1,000 federal legal benefits to married couples and about 400 for each state in the United States.

We need to keep in mind that marital benefits are not just for couples, but also for children. If the goal for a couple is to have children, separation is a poor choice for children. Most single-parent families headed by a mother are in poverty, regardless of her job, according to an article by David Wood in Pediatrics. A 2000 report by Todd Michael Franke synthesizing the result of 23 studies indicates that children from single-parent households are almost two times more likely to have pulled a knife or gun on another person in the past year. In "Criminal Justice and Behavior," Knight and Prentky conclude that a majority of violent rapists in their study came from a single-parent household. Researchers from Ohio State University, cited in USA Today in 2002, determined that children of divorce perform more poorly than the children of married couples, even after the emotional upheaval of separation has subsided.

We live in a society that places an emphasis on material goods and short-term satisfaction, but as the statistics show, marriage is not impossible for the children of baby-boomers and it brings long-term benefits to health, sex life, legal status, financial prosperity and the welfare of our children. In addition, marriage appears to be safer than believed by our popular culture. This is not to say that maintaining a marriage is easy or that marriage is not endangered, but rather to say that marriage is worthwhile and attainable.

David Shenkenberg is a UMass graduate student.

Red Sox: where are they now?

David B. Lawrence

Though their post-season was far from exciting, the Boston Red Sox's off-season has been enthralling. Major moves have shaken up the organization at every level, from players to management, and more changes are yet to come.

The first major shakeup of the off-season was not a signing or trade; it was the lack of a signing. Sox general manager Theo Epstein, who many credit with building the team that brought us the first World Series in 86 years, and most expected to re-sign with the Sox, did not. After weeks of discussions and negotiations between the young Epstein and the Red Sox ownership group, Theo politely declined to re-sign as GM, effectively resigning from the position. The decision has been widely attributed to a power struggle between Epstein and Sox CEO and President Larry Lucchino. According to popular rumor, tension between Lucchino and Epstein over how the team should be run led the split.

The team has yet to replace Epstein and name a new general manager, but they have continued to be productive nonetheless. Since Theo's departure a flurry of trades have been made by a team of front-office personnel acting as a sort of "GM by committee." Prior to baseball's winter meetings, the Red Sox executed a blockbuster trade that sent several Sox prospects (including the valuable Hanley Ramirez) to the Florida Marlins for starting pitcher Josh Beckett, third baseman Mike Lowell and reliever Guillermo Mota.

Though the Sox gave up some young prospects, the risk could pay off with performance from 25-year-old starter Josh Beckett, who is young enough to be considered a "prospect" himself.

Beckett (15-8 in 2005) is only 25 years old, has several seasons in the majors under his belt, and looks to have turned the corner in terms of his age and maturity as a pitcher by having a good winning season last year. On top of that, Beckett has proven postseason mettle; he was World Series MVP for the 2003 championship Marlins, pitching a complete-game shutout in Game 6 of the series against the New York Yankees ... on three days rest. Lowell has good career statistics, but had a serious slump last season, and the Marlins were willing to give us Beckett to unload Mike Lowell's salary. If he makes a turnaround, this deal could prove to truly be a windfall for the Sox, if he does not we still gain quite a bit in Beckett.

At the winter meetings the makeshift "GM by committee" continued to make moves and improve the Red Sox. Disappointing free-agent signing Edgar Renteria was traded away to the Dodgers for a top prospect, Andy Marte. Marte is a corner infielder with good power who has been named the Dodgers #1 prospect, and has considerable potential. The move left the Red Sox without a shortstop, however, and it seems clear that the move was made to unburden the Sox of the three remaining years on Renteria's contract. Edgar performed well below his potential in Boston, and the gold glove-winning shortstop led the league in errors. It may be that Renteria was getting used to playing in Boston, but the Sox front office didn't want to wait another year to find out.

The Sox left themselves with a gap at shortstop with the Renteria trade, but they filled another infield hole during the winter meetings by trading backup catcher Doug Mirabelli for second baseman Mark Loretta. Loretta is a career .301 hitter and a solid second baseman. Though it is sad to see Mirabelli go, picking up a good everyday player for a backup catcher is certainly a good move.

Though the Sox have been busy thus far this off-season, there are more moves to come. With a gaping hole at shortstop the Sox will have to fill in there. If center fielder Johnny Damon is not re-signed, the Red Sox will need to pursue other options at his position. Manny Ramirez has asked for a trade, but while it does not look like there is anywhere suitable to trade him (in terms of getting value in return), the team is sure to continue shopping him. The amorphous present structure of the Sox front office should be redefined by the time this column goes to print, and it is possible that Theo Epstein will continue to play some roll. Rumors yet abound that Roger Clemens or Miguel Tejada could be starting the season in a Red Sox uniform. It has been an exciting off-season ... with more to come.

David B. Lawrence is a Collegian columnist

Write for ED-OP!

We need an assistant Ed/Op editor. If interested, fill out an application in the Daily Collegian office, located in the Campus Center basement. Deadline is TUESDAY, DEC. 13.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The top five of 2005... by Nick Romanow

1. Sigur Ros Takk... (Geffen Records)
The most unlikely success story in recent history, Icelandic post-rock experimentalist group Sigur Ros' latest release, "Takk..." finds the band continuing to grow, transcending contemporaries, peers, and themselves. "Takk..." is the sound of a band evolving; pushing themselves and the envelope, from twinkling atmospherics to moments that border on full-blown rock. The best and brightest band around has officially sealed their place as the first great band of the 21st century.

2. Okkervil River Black Sheep Boy (Jagjaguwar)
Alt-folkers Okkervil River embrace the electric guitar and mature musically and lyrically with their concept album "Black Sheep Boy." From the jolting stabs of guitar in "I'or Real" to the hushed intimacy of "In A Radio Song" to the grand climax, "So Come Back, I Am Waiting," "Black Sheep Boy" doesn't relent for a moment. The over-arching sense of gloom makes for a deeply compelling listen and Okkervil never disappoints, making "Black Sheep Boy" intelligent, challenging, and brilliant.

4. Team Sleep – Team Sleep (Maverick)
Deftones frontman Chino Moreno uses his more-then-a-side-project Team Sleep to highlight his well-publicized love of groups like The Cure, The Smiths and My Bloody Valentine, creating a genre that could best be described as electro-shoegaze. Team Sleep sounds like no one else and Moreno and Co weave beats, guitars and vocals into soundscapes that are both warm and curiously foreign. From lush waves of sound to hard breakbeats, Team Sleep provides it all and more.

3. Little Brother The Minstrel Show (Atlantic)
In a year where the biggest event in rap was 50 Cent's movie, Little Brother released a jaw-dropping retort to the state of the genre. Little Brother has provided one of the few glimmers of hope with "The Minstrel Show," fearlessly calling out the fakes and corporate hacks that have brought rap to its knees. Entertaining and intellectual, rappers Phonte and Big Pooh deers the modern-day minstrels of mainstream rap, while 9th Wonder provides the type of beats that got him high-profile gigs with Jay-Z and Kanye. "The Minstrel Show" isn't just the far-and-away best rap album of 2005, it's a shoo-in to join the legendary status of artists like Public Enemy and Dead Prez that mixed message with talent and brought rap to a new level. "The Minstrel Show" is history in the making.

5. Bob Mould Body Of Song (Yep Roc)
The return of a legend; ex-Husker Du and Sugar frontman Bob Mould comes back with his best album in nearly 10 years. "Underneath Days" and "Best Thing" are ferocious slices of Mould's guitar-heavy sound that invented alternative rock and "Days of Rain" is one of his best ballads. However, the beauty of "Body of Song" is in tracks like "Circles" and "Paralyzed" that combine Mould's past with his present infatuation with electronics and form, exactly what Bob Mould should sound like in 2005. "Body Of Song" is Mould's, reassurance to the new millennium; he hasn't gone away, he hasn't backed down, and he hasn't burned out. Bob Mould remains a living legend and "Body Of Song" is the latest piece of his legacy.

New Music Tuesdays

"Remember your soul is the one thing you can't compromise." - David Gray

Week of 12/13 to 12/20

Beck

5/10

Guerolito
Interscope

Beck's latest offering, "Guerolito," an album composed of remixes from this year's "Guero," provides an interesting quandary for listeners. Beck is one of the most talented and original musicians today but remix albums are almost entirely lame, boring and unnecessary. How would the man that represents the antithesis of lame, boring, unnecessary music handle a remix album? The answer is that while "Guerolito" is superior to many remix albums, it still falls far short of the original product.

When "Guero" came out earlier this year it was both criticized and commended for being a sort of return-to-form for Beck, an artist who made a career out of not having a cut-and-dry "form." While it recalled the glories of "Odelay," often regarded as Beck's shining moment, many were a little let down that Beck seemed to be relying on what he knew would be successful rather than continuing down his experimental trail. Regardless, "Guero" was packed with great songs, making it a worthwhile addition to Beck's catalogue.

"Guerolito" features interesting reinterpretation of "Guero" songs that never add to the originals, but don't take away, either. Remixes of "E-Pro" (titled "Ghost Range") and "Girl" are both good listens, especially "Girl," which builds up from a slow piano piece to a Beach Boys-recalling prechorus into a hard-hitting, almost industrial chorus, and even has a glitched-out bridge. Unfortunately, the whole remix concept gets boring after a while. Tracks like "Shake Shake Tambourine" and "Ghettochipp Malfunction" — which, to its credit, sounds exactly like the title indicates — don't really have anything interesting to say. And while Beck has gotten some big-name collaborators to remix — often more of a complete musical retooling a standard remix — "Guerolito" is clearly a case of quantity over quality. While artists like Boards Of Canada, Air, and Ad-Rock of the Beastie Boys might attract fans and up the artistic credibility of the project, it all generally adds up to nothing.

"Guerolito" does have some interesting moments and Beck diehards, especially those that loved "Guero," should be able to find some joy in hearing these reimaginations of songs, but the remixes are often lacking major creative spark. The new album's source material does still get a chance to shine and a handful of the remixers do have something to say, such as on "Scarecrow," but even best ones don't really warrant relistening and the worst ones are sure to just make listeners ache to put on the original. "Guerolito" is best saved for those that simply couldn't get enough "Guero" and those fascinated with remix albums, and even they may be more then a little let down.

Clap Your Hands Say Yeah

6/10

Clap Your Hands Say Yeah

One of the more unlikely success stories of 2005, Clap Your Hands Say Yeah, emerged out of New York with no record label and no publicity machine — aside from themselves — and skyrocketed to indie-stardom, finding themselves objects of adoration by press outlets like Pitchfork and even landing a gig on Conan O'Brien. Clap Your Hands Say Yeah indeed deserve some acclaim for coming up one of the more innovative albums of 2005 but it does feel as though it's lacking some parts, making their self-titled debut one of the more interesting, but not rewarding, listens of the year.

From the intro track "Clap Your Hands," it is very clear that Clap Your Hands Say Yeah is not the average new-millennium indie band. With irritating lead vocals and wonderfully quirky backing vocals, "Clap Your Hands" walks a line that essentially leaves the listener helpless, bound to continue to listen. The first proper track, "Let The Cool Goddess Rust Away" features the same vocal dynamic, this time over muted electric guitars that dissolve into two separate lead parts that each push and pull for attention. While each track on the self-titled album does have a different feel, the band has carved out a distinct niche in the indie-rock world, somewhere in between Modest Mouse and Neutral Milk Hotel.

While often the best moments of "Clap Your Hands Say Yeah" lies within the music, such as on the instrumental "Sunshine and Clouds and Everything Proud," the group can pull it all together for a generally, and genuinely, good song, such as the folk-flavored "Details of the War." Often, however, Clap Your Hands' affable arrangements are underrepresented by similar-sounding vocal lines on many of the songs. However the album does contain many bright spots. "In This Home On Ice" has a Cure-like guitar riff and an incredibly strong chorus, making it one of the best songs on the album. Likewise, "Gimme Some Salt" is a strong, memorable track lead by muted guitars and quiet electronic background noises.

Clap Your Hands Say Yeah have already proven to have made a strong impact with their debut album, and in a terrain of overly-publicized, styled, and clichéd so-called indie-rock bands, it is great to hear a band that is fresh, interesting and unique, even if perhaps they are not fully developed. Clap Your Hands may not be the next great band but they are certainly a band that has worked hard, developed their own sound, and deserves all the attention they have been receiving.

Brian Jonestown Massacre

7/10

We Are The Radio
Tee Pee Records

Ever-prolific Brian Jonestown Massacre singer/guitarist/multi-instrumentalist/songwriter Anton Newcombe lives and breathes his music, which explains why he has released 10 albums in 10 years. The latest, "We Are The Radio" is, curiously, an E.P. that lasts only 15 minutes. Ostensibly a teaser, or a stopgap, until the next full-length comes out, "We Are The Radio" is also Newcombe's most experimental work to date. Working with Sarabeth Tucker, who also sings on the majority of the tracks, Newcombe still retains elements of his retro-'60s sound, while simultaneously advancing in a bigger way then he ever has before — perhaps signaling a new phase in the Brian Jonestown Massacre's career.

Opener "Never Become Emotionally Attached To Man, Woman, Beast, or Child" has the BJM's trademark West-meets-East sound of acoustic guitars layered with Eastern instruments and wondrous, floating vocals. While Newcombe's genius has always been his talent to make music that is decidedly retro, yet somehow futuristic – often sounding as if the 1960s led directly into the 2000s – "We Are The Radio" has electronics and synth noises wavering in and out of every track. "Seer" highlights Tucker's voice with a male counterpart, presumably Newcombe, quietly backing her up, creating a haunting, ethereal effect. "Teleflow 5 vs. Amplification" is easily the most experimental track on the record, an instrumental piece that sounds entirely futuristic and unworldly.

Newcombe has recently seen his cult of fans grow exponentially larger following the release of "DiG," a documentary that followed the BJM's highs and lows as they and the Dandy Warhols competed with each other, themselves, and a take-no-prisoners music industry. While the film ends with an unflattering representation of Newcombe, practically neglecting the fact he has cleaned himself up after years of a harrowing, destructive drug habit, it has brought his music to a far wider audience and the knowledge of Anton Newcombe: Musical Genius has now moved from obscurity to being on the fringe of indie-rock mainstream. Luckily, as any BJM fan knows, Newcombe has never been interested in being part of a trend or a fad. Putting Tucker on lead vocals on almost every song — the final track, "God Is My Girlfriend" is the only one where Newcombe is the lead singer – is perhaps a way of stepping out of the spotlight and keeping the focus on his music.

Wherever Newcombe is going after "We Are The Radio," it will certainly be interesting and will most definitely be remarkable. While the EP's length keeps it from being in the same league as most of the BJM's albums — and it is probably not the best introduction for new fans — track-for-track it stands up next to Newcombe's best work. "We Are The Radio" stands by its title: rip the antenna off your car, BJM is all you need.

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Oil, politics, fuel Clooney's intricate Middle East thriller

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Staff

It's the paradox every filmmaker must face: Nothing is more praiseworthy than a movie that intones a solid political statement, and nothing is more laughable than a movie that makes such a statement overtly. For a film to strive for a message is no easy task, as the filmmakers must aim for the wafer-thin area where a movie can clearly dictate a message without drawing attention to the message. Lay it on too light and audiences will fail to pick up on it. Lay it on too thick and you'll look like a third-grader assigned to illustrate your point on an issue by arranging a skit with your teammates and showing it in front of the class.

In an era when ignorance of socio-political issues is considered shameful by everyone except the ignorant themselves, it would be predictable that film audiences would welcome a politically-oriented movie. Filmgoers would wish to establish themselves as socially conscious, even when taking in a film — something regarded as a leisurely, passive activity. This is certainly not the case in Stephen Gaghan's "Syriana." Gaghan exerts quite a bit of effort into packing far more characters and subplots into his film than one would think a movie could hold, and as a result, the viewer must harness all of his mental energies into comprehending the movie.

'Syriana'
Directed by Stephen Gaghan
Kayvan Novak
George Clooney
Amr Waked
Warner Brothers
Rated R
104 mins.
Grade
B+

The film is essentially a compendium of events and people related to a main story: that of a shady merger between two oil companies, one a formerly thriving business until they were outbid in a vie for a number of fields, the other having just acquired assets in Kazakhstan under questionable circumstances. An energy consultant (Matt Damon) exploits the death of his young son, which occurs after a nastily suspenseful scene by a swimming pool, and takes a job under a progressive-minded prince. A CIA spook (an uncharacteristically frumpy George Clooney) bungles a job and crosses the line while attempting to fix his mistake, with painful consequences. An attorney for the oil conglomerate (Jeffrey Wright) stumbles into an ethical quagmire while overseeing the details of the merger. A young oil worker (Wasim Khan), disillusioned after being laid off, makes easy prey for an extremist looking for suicide bombers. The film takes up plenty of plots to juggle, and nobody should be surprised when it is forced to drop some of them before it ends.

"Syriana" chucks the viewer into the center of the drama, and gives him the responsibility of figuring everything out for himself, including whom to root for. He's doomed to fail in doing so, however, as hardly any of the characters exhibit enough of the positive traits required to establish themselves as heroes. Of course, it's easy to identify the villains, as they are the same villains from most politically correct films of the past — white men in expensive suits. All of the undesirable actions of the other characters could be considered to do so because of the well-dressed Caucasian males. One WMIES even goes above and beyond the call of duty of being a rich-bastard villain by delivering a groan-inducing speech on how corruption is his and every businessman's lifeblood. But perhaps Gaghan can be forgiven, because the majority of the characters are three-dimensional, and are played by actors talented enough to display the needed range of emotions.

George Clooney stars in "Syriana," his latest political film which traces the complex web of connections between politicians and corporations.

"Syriana" achieves modest success as a movie alone, but what is open to debate is whether it reaches the other goal it obviously has, that of causing audiences to ponder what others went through to get the gasoline in their tanks. "Syriana" puts on a hell of a show, a solid presentation of situations that could occur given the current laissez-faire laws in regards to big oil. It probably would cause viewers to ponder their consumption of oil and its impact on the global political climate, provided they manage to wade through the labyrinthine plot first.

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
- a grade dispute?
- teacher, roomate or lab concerns?
- billing problems?
- harassment?
- ...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)

students, faculty, and staff are all welcome

823 Campus Center

Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.

telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

2X Tuesday
Domino's Pizza
Buy Any Large Pizza...
Get One FREE Delivered!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911

DO IT.
Write for arts
email Ian at
arts@dailycollegian.com

CASH FOR BOOKS!*

© Rapsall

Get top dollar for your books at the University Store and Textbook Annex!

Enter to win $10,000 AND get 20% off your next purchase!

UMass Amherst
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

efollett.com bookstore network

*Current market value applies.
See store for details.

Now or never for UM

LEADERSHIP from page 12

coach. But before you go pointing fingers at Dacko, take a look at the overall picture here.

Mills has been outstanding since the move was made by Dacko and her staff. She was averaging 9.3 points per game and 3.0 rebounds per game as a starter, while shooting 41 percent from the field, and 67 percent from the free-throw line. Since her transition to the bench, Mills is averaging 13.6 points per game and 6.2 rebounds per game, and has increased her shooting and free-throw percentages as well.

So what is the problem?

The Minutewomen have a handful of players on the A-10 leader boards, but yet, only two wins to show for it. Three-fourths of their offense has returned from last year, so there should not be much of an excuse.

The reason for the Minutewomen's early disappointment is simple: They need a leader.

"We need leadership on the floor," Dacko said after Thursday's 83-44 loss to Boston College. "And that has been plaguing us since the day I got the job at UMass."

The Minutewomen certainly have the talent to compete with just about any team that they face, but it is finding a leader on the court that has been hard to come by.

But it's not too late for UMass to find an identity. There are still 18 games remaining in the 27-game season, and the Minutewomen have yet to play in a conference match-up.

So there is still time, but not much.

While they can blame most of their losses on missed opportunities and an overall lack of confidence in their shooting, the seniors must step up and give Dacko the leadership that her team so desperately needs.

For the three fifth-year seniors, it is now or never. This is it. This is your last call. Take the next 20 days off and regroup. Prepare for the first A-10 conference game against Dayton on Jan. 3, because no matter what anybody says, that is when the real season begins.

— Danny Picard is a Collegian Columnist.

Rouleau continuing tradition

ROULEAU from page 12

Award, and was the runner-up in the final voting.

After the season, Rouleau signed on to become the first full-time ski coach in UMass' history, demonstrating the school's commitment to keeping UMass at the top of the Eastern College Ski Conference. With his experience, Rouleau feels he is the man for the job.

"I have one year of college [coaching] experience, which may not sound like a lot, but it was in the best possible league," Rouleau said of his year with Harvard. He did not count his experience coaching while still an undergraduate at UMass.

Rouleau went on to explain that Harvard's league, the EISA, is comparable to NCAA football's division I-A, while UMass is part of the ECSC, similar to division I-AA. After winning the ECSC Regionals last year, UMass will come into this season as the defending champs. Rouleau jumped at the chance to work with such a successful program.

"Basically I went from one of the small fish in the biggest pond to the biggest fish in, not a small, but a smaller pond," Rouleau said.

Before Rouleau even travels with the team to its first race, he has lofty goals set for himself. The expectations will be high as he inherits a very successful squad. However, his personal goals are no different from those set for him by others.

"This is a full-time, year-round position now for the first time in its history," Rouleau said. And with that position comes a lot more responsibilities than there have been in the past, such as the effort to "recruit new athletes, or fundraise for an expensive trip to Europe or out west to find snow before it falls in New England."

"Those are all the things that the D-1 schools like [Harvard] are doing, and now there's someone doing them here at UMass," Rouleau added.

Rouleau will have a strong staff to begin with when he begins recruiting new skiers to Amherst. Led by junior Rush Hawkins, UMass is the favorite to repeat as champions of the Easter College Ski Conference. Rouleau expects to help continue the team's success and build many more successful teams in the future.

"I see myself in this office and on the snow, working with UMass athletes for a long time."

Blue Devils retain top spot

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

Duke's runaway win over Texas kept the Blue Devils a runaway No. 1 in The Associated Press' men's college basketball poll yesterday.

The next three places in the Top 25 were Big East schools Connecticut, Villanova and Louisville. The only newcomer to the poll was Houston, ranked for the first time in almost 13 years.

Duke (9-0) beat Texas 97-66 on Saturday, the third-biggest margin ever in a 1-vs.-2 matchup. The Blue Devils received 66 first-place votes, 13 more than last week, and 1,793 points from the national media panel.

Houston (4-1) moved into the rankings at No. 25 a week after the Cougars beat then-No. 25 LSU 84-83 and then-No. 15 Arizona 69-65. Houston was ranked 25th in the Jan. 18, 1993 poll. The last time the Cougars were ranked for more than one week was the 1983-84 season, when they were in the top eight all season and climbed as high as No. 2.

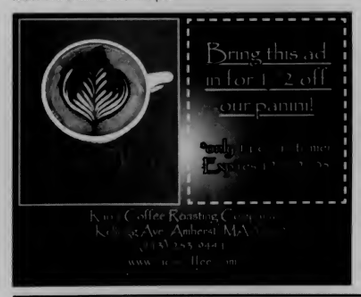
"Being ranked is important for recruiting and credibility and later on when they pick teams in March, the committee tends to look at that as some sort of barometer," Houston coach Tom Penders said Monday. "It's a sleeping giant here. It's been down since Guy Lewis retired in 1986, but it's a tradition-rich school with five Final Fours and banners all over the place."

This is the 172nd consecutive time Duke has been ranked, tied for the second-longest run in the history of the AP poll which started in the 1948-49 season. UCLA holds the record at 221 consecutive polls, from the preseason of 1966-67 through Jan. 8, 1980. North Carolina also was also in 172 consecutive polls, from the preseason voting of 1990-91 through Jan. 17, 2000.

Kentucky has the second-longest current streak at 85 polls, a run that started on Feb. 12, 2001.

Connecticut, Villanova and Louisville moved up one place apiece with Texas' drop to sixth. It's the first time one league had teams ranked that high since last season, when the Atlantic Coast Conference had Wake Forest, Georgia Tech and North Carolina in those same positions in the preseason poll and the first Top 25 of the regular season.

Connecticut (7-0) had five first-place votes, four fewer than last week, and 1,703 points. Villanova (6-0) again received the only other first-place vote.



Memphis moved up two places to fifth, its highest ranking since it was No. 3 in January 1996, and was followed by Texas, Florida, Oklahoma, Illinois and Gonzaga.

Washington was 11th and was followed by Michigan State, Boston College, UCLA, George Washington, Wake Forest, Maryland, Indiana, North Carolina and Nevada.

The last five ranked teams were North Carolina State, Iowa, Kentucky, Arizona and Houston.

The Cougars, who lost 62-61 to Virginia Commonwealth in the second game of the season, bounced back with the wins over ranked teams.

"Rather than get giddy after beating LSU, which is an unbelievably talented team, the guys immediately turned their focus on Arizona and that final score wasn't indicative of the margin of that game," Penders said. "This is best defensive team I've ever had. They really get after it. These are very athletic, quick long-armed kids who pressure all over."

Charlotte favored in Atlantic 10

TRACK from page 12

took the 5000-meter run (15:48.3) and Michael Kearney, who won the 800-meter run with a time of 1:15.0. The Fordham 'A' team also took first-place in the 4x800 relay (8:21.4).

At the Christmas Classic, Mike Carroll won long jump (21-9 1/2), Mike DeLorenzo won the 1000-meter run (2:29.3) and the Fordham 'A' team won the 4x400 relay (3:25.8).

Three athletes won their event at both meets, Matt Spaccarelli (pole vault), Matt DiBuono (weight throw) and Mike DeLorenzo (1000-meter run). DeLorenzo was named the A-10 Men's Performer of the Week for his 1000-meter IC4A qualifying time of 2:29.3 at the Christmas Classic.

Saint Joseph's

The Hawks started the season finishing third overall at the Lafayette Invitational with five first-place finishes. They did especially well in the one-mile run, with Justin Heinze first (4:39.20), Stephen Young second (4:40.30) and Richard Ryan taking third (4:43.60).

Other events won by the Hawks were the 60-yard dash by Bobby Staten (6.21), the 440-yard dash by Andrew Thomas (48.90) and the 500-meter run by Matt Petrocci (1:04.70).

The St Joseph's 'A' team took first place in the 4x440-yard relay event with a time of 3:26.1. The Hawks scored a total of 97 points in 14 events.

Temple

In Temple's first meet of the season at the Jack Pyrah Invitational, three athletes finished first in their event and the Owl's 'A' team won the 4x400-meter relay with a time of 3:32.57.

Winners for the Owls were David Jackson in the 300-meter (36.01), Andrew Schultz in the high jump (6 feet) and Mitch Stroh in the one-mile run (4:38.43). Matt Kobialka finished second in the one-mile run with a time of 4:38.45, a mere .02 seconds behind his teammate.

At the New Year Invitational, Dave D'Adderio shattered a 28-year old school record in the 3000-meter run, finishing in 19th place with a time of 9:13.98. The previous mark of 9:30.00 was set in 1977 by Tom Hurd.

Freshman Jason Sullivan was named A-10 Rookie of the Week for his performance at the New Year Invitational, in which he finished 6th in the 500-meter run with a time of 1:06.43. He also ran a leg of the 4x400-meter relay that placed 12th with a time of 3:34.95.

Richmond

The Spiders opened up their 2005-06 season at the Liberty Collegiate Invitational. Notable finishes for Richmond included Paul John, running a personal best 9:00.48 in the 3000-meter run. The event was his first in 22 months, as he is making a return after having surgery.

The high jump event saw Rusty Burrell put in a strong performance. The Spiders return John Ciccarelli, who finished first in last year's A-10 Indoor Championship, with a time of 8:32.03 in the 3000-meter run.

Xavier

With a team of only 15 athletes, the Musketeers are predicted to finish last in the A-10, as voted upon by the coaches. Xavier finished last season's A-10 Championship in last place, finishing no higher than ninth place in any individual event and as high as sixth place in relays.

Paul Staudigel placed ninth in the 5000-meter run (15:19.61) last spring, while Tony Matheus also finished ninth in the 3000-meter run (8:53.02). Also returning for Xavier will be Ryan Schutte, who placed 14th in the 400-meter dash (53.85), Mike Hammersmith, who placed 13th in the one-mile run (4:28.97), Greg Reichert, who placed 12th in the 800-meter run (2:04.42) and 11th in the 1000-meter run (2:41.79).

Riley takes over for Van Gundy

By Tim Reynolds
Associated Press

Harry E. Walker/KRT

Pat Riley took over as head coach of the Miami Heat yesterday. Stan Van Gundy resigned from the position to spend more time with his family.

MIAMI – Pat Riley is again the coach of the Miami Heat, replacing Stan Van Gundy following his resignation yesterday for family reasons.

Riley, whom Van Gundy succeeded on the bench shortly before the 2003-04 season, will make his debut tonight when Miami opens a four-game road trip in Chicago.

"I will get back into this quickly," said Riley, the 60-year-old team president. He said he hasn't even looked at a playbook for two years.

Riley coached the team from 1995-03 after winning four titles with the Los Angeles Lakers and a stint with the New York Knicks.

Players were not available for immediate comment. The team left for Chicago yesterday, shortly before the news conference announcing the shake-up and learning of Van Gundy's decision.

Van Gundy said he resigned voluntarily.

"I made this decision for one reason and one reason only: I love my family," Van Gundy said. He said that because of travel, games and practices, he would have seen his children at home only 49 days out of 170 this season.

"That's just not enough any more for me. It's just not enough," Van Gundy said. "I mean, it's been like that for my kids' entire lives. I've got a 14-year-old daughter and it started to hit me when I started thinking about her birthday, which was last month. I've got four more years left with her. Four. And then she'll be off to college and I'm just not willing to sacrifice any more of those four more years."

Riley's eyes welled with tears as Van Gundy announced the reasons for his decision. Van Gundy said Riley has tried for weeks to persuade him to stay.

"It came down to a choice, and for me, the choice was clear," Van Gundy said.

He said he will remain in the organization, and insisted he had no desire to coach elsewhere in the NBA.

Van Gundy's job status was the subject of speculation in South Florida for months, starting when Riley – his mentor – said shortly after the Heat's 2005 playoff run ended that he may take a larger role in the team's day-to-day operations.

That comment, which seemed innocuous at the time, set off speculation that Riley was planning to dismiss Van Gundy and take over a team with two of the NBA's biggest stars, Shaquille O'Neal and Dwyane Wade, in his quest to bring the Heat their first title.

This year, the team was in first place but with only an 11-10 record, although without O'Neal for 18 of those games because the 12-time All-Star had a badly sprained right ankle. Rumors that Van Gundy's job may be in jeopardy continued to swirl. But Van Gundy insisted yesterday his relationship with Riley has never been better.

The 46-year-old Van Gundy left with a regular-season record of 112-73. Riley has won 1,110 games in 21 seasons as a coach, plus led the "Showtime" Lakers of Magic Johnson and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar to titles in 1982, 1985, 1987 and 1988. He also coached the Knicks (1991-95).

Van Gundy was Riley's top assistant for eight seasons, getting the top job shortly before the 2003-04 campaign when Riley walked into his office unexpectedly and told him he was stepping aside.

And now, in a move perhaps not so unexpected but certainly just as sudden, Van Gundy is gone, hours after leading the Heat to an overtime win over Washington on Sunday night.

The move came nearly four years to the day after Jeff Van Gundy, Stan's younger brother, resigned as Knicks coach 19 games into the 2001-02 season. Jeff Van Gundy, now the Houston Rockets coach, said at the time he'd lost his focus and thought about quitting since that summer.

"The question I've always had for him is 'why did you go back,'" Stan Van Gundy said.

Brady says injury not 'too major'

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. – The one player the banged-up New England Patriots could least afford to lose limped through most of Sunday's game and had X-rays taken after it.

A day later, though, coach Bill Belichick said Tom Brady was "fine," and the quarterback said he didn't think his lower left leg injury was "too major."

Brady has started 84 consecutive games, beginning with his first pro start on Sept. 30, 2001. And New England really needs him on Saturday when it plays the Tampa Bay Buccaneers (9-4), a strong defensive team that has won more games than the Patriots' last two opponents combined.

Brady was hurt less than 10 minutes into Sunday's 35-7 win at Buffalo (4-9) on his 3-yard scoring run, his first touchdown on the ground in two seasons. He was injured while diving into the end zone where he was hit by linebacker Jeff Posey.

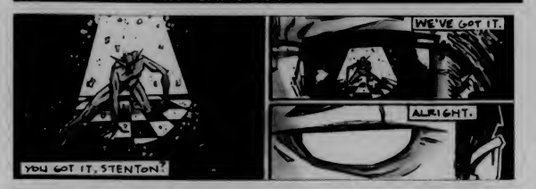
But he stayed in the game until Doug Flutie entered with 7:02 left and the Patriots leading 28-0.

"I don't think it's anything too major," Brady said on his regular Monday appearance on WEEI-AM. "It's feeling kind of what I expected this morning. It's exactly like I got hit on it, a little stiff. The only time I get banged up, though, I'm running around."

He said the injury was "below the [left] knee."

No Patriots players were available to reporters on Monday. The team policy is for Brady to talk with the media on Wednesdays.

The Patriots (8-5) can clinch the AFC East next weekend despite being hit hard by injuries all season. They can do it with a win Saturday or a Miami loss Sunday at home to the New York Jets (3-10).



Shopping for a Health Club?
Do your homework first!
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS CLUB
Has it ALL for you!
JOIN FOR THE "WINTER SPECIAL"
15 WEEKS - $209 INDIVIDUAL
$377 COUPLE - $188 STU/SR
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
WHAT DO YOU GET?
Full Sized Indoor Pool • Aqua Aerobics
Cybex Nautilus Circuit • Cybex Free Weights
Full Court Basketball • Volleyball • Indoor Tennis
Cardio • Saunas • Indoor Cycling
Jacuzzi • Yoga/Pilates • Aerobics/Step/Bosu
COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL WITH JERRY
MONDAY & THURSDAY 6-8 PM
MONDAY & THURSDAY 6-8 PM
NO INITIATION FEE OR LONG-TERM CONTRACT NECESSARY
90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill) Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10PM MON-FRI • 8AM-9PM SAT & SUN

CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS
Sell us your textbooks, whether purchased here or not.
Receive up to 50% of your purchase price.
JEFFERY AMHERST COLLEGE STORE
253-3870
Located between La Veracruzana and Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in Downtown Amherst

FUNCTIONAL DYSTOPIA By Zeid Rusan

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

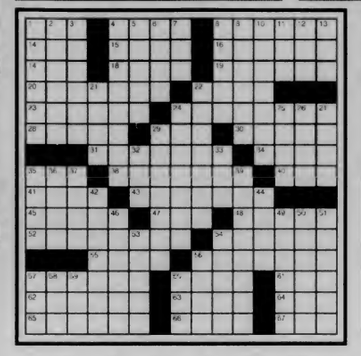
JACK DOGG By Xavier Rhodes

THE BURNING EMPANADA By J.R.

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Don't you love New York in the fall? It makes me wanna buy school supplies."



—You've Got Mail

ACROSS
1 Tavern
4 Festive event
8 Wide shots
14 Lyric poem
15 Weedy
16 Type of tax
17 Appendage
18 Light gas
19 Sentence part
20 Fans
22 Persian Gulf nation
23 Turn aside
24 Spring bloom
28 Office worker, briefly
29 Escalates
30 Finnish bath
31 Number that showed up
34 Permits to 35 Genetic letters
38 Makes safe
40 Period
41 Divisions of geological time
43 Inventor's grants
45 African language group
47 Realm or Beatty
48 Chicago hub
52 Grand
54 Rouse from sleep
55 Refuse to acknowledge
56 Celebration
57 Grief-stricken
60 Killed violently
61 Me in Marseilles
62 Seventh planet
63 Hebrides isle
64 Large storage container
65 In a mild manner
66 Swing to and fro
67 Mine's yield

DOWN
1 Explains
2 Sure-handed
3 Take away
4 Unselfish
5 Warn
6 Thailand's neighbor
7 Blyth or Sheridan
8 Chip starter?
9 Acquired relatives
10 Public disgrace
11 Old French coin
12 Printer's measures
13 Understand
21 Collapsible shelter
22 Covered by a policy
24 Gushed forth
25 Regretted
26 Informed about 27 Gone by
29 Weird
32 Age
33 Sawbuck
35 Obligation
36 Ark builder
37 A.D. word
39 Free passage seeker
42 Pupil
44 Crusader Irish
46 Beneficial
49 With hands on hips
50 Impressionist painter
51 Locomotive
53 Frigidly
54 Field of endeavor
56 Look of love
57 Annoy
58 Afore
59 Operated
60 Bro's sibling

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
December Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight: • TRIVIA NIGHT!
Wed. • Cold Duck Complex
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will find a dollar blowing around outside today.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You will make out with someone hot before leaving for vacation.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You will discover a T-shirt in your closet that you'd completely forgotten about.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You will not pass all of your classes this semester.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Someone will give you a free bag of chips today.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You should watch a movie involving Will Ferrell today.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You are an extremely unorganized person.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Your mother will be very happy to see you next week.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Your plugged-up ear will miraculously unplug itself today.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Don't be a skeptic, four-leaf clovers really do exist.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Your computer mouse will mysteriously disappear tonight.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You will have the theme song from James Bond stuck in your head all day.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Winfield family. Large open floor plans 2 to 3 Bdrm Apts. Rent starting at $995.00 Call for Winter Special 256-0600.

1 BR Near town.campus. Low utility cost $550/month 413-586-0746

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 in to campus.

$380/month plus utilities. In Sunderland. Rebecca 302-359-1455

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments. Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Spring Semester Sublet – Master bedroom in Puffton Village, $461/month plus cable/internet and electricity.

Looking for a subletter Jan-May. Share apartment with two other roommates, partially furnished. Call 203-915-7679.

EMPLOYMENT

PART-TIME POSITIONS Ideal for students or 2nd job $8.00 Hr. 20+ hrs wk; Conduct surveys over the phone Hadley location – NO SALES! Night & wknd shifts; PVTA accessible. RSW Recruiting Office 1-888-423-5381 or email: dhayes@retail-solutions.us

EMPLOYMENT

Instructors/Performers P-T for fun after-school programs, parties and more. Experience managing groups of children. Love of kids, availability some afternoons. Theatrical experience helpful. Car required. (413) 584-7243

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

FOR SALE

Moving Boxes Best Prices Campus Center Concourse 12/12 – 12/14

FURNITURE FOR SALE

Bedroom / Study Set Must Sell! 413-222-5707

HOUSE FOR RENT

For January, 2-3 Bedroom house. Walking distance to Northampton Center, close to bus. 1,000 + utilities, no pets. Skibiski Realtor 586-1827

ROOM FOR RENT

One Bedroom Close to campus 2 Girls looking for Roommate. 400 plus utilities 973-580-6713 Jan – Aug.

SERVICES

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

SERVICES

Pregnant? Consider adoption. Free confidential counseling to help you make fully informed decisions for your baby and you. Choose your baby's parents, meet and stay in touch. Stable, loving two parent families waiting to adopt. Call 24/7 Brightside 1-877-777-7774 License # 1465107

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

TRAVEL

Alternative Spring Break Birmingham Cherokee, Mississippi Gulf Coast, NYC, 2 credits, umass.asb@gmail.com Apply Now.

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

SPRING BREAK FROM $569 BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS. Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian would like to wish everyone good luck during final exams!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Strong second half lifts UM

BY DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the first 20 minutes of last night's game against Boston University, the Massachusetts men's basketball team played a lethargic brand of basketball.

Despite holding a 31-29 lead at the break, UMass coach Travis Ford was not happy with how his players were performing and he let them know about it in the locker room.

UMass	64
Boston University	45

"Coach Ford is a machine," junior guard James Life said. "Basically [what took place] was a lot of screaming. He's kind of like a drill sergeant. We feed off of that. It's nothing negative. He's a great coach and sometimes you can't just talk to players; you have to raise your voice and make your presence known."

Clearly Ford's motivational tactics got through to the team, as the Minutemen (3-3) responded in the second half, and pulled out a 64-45 win in front of 4,598 fans at the Mullins Center.

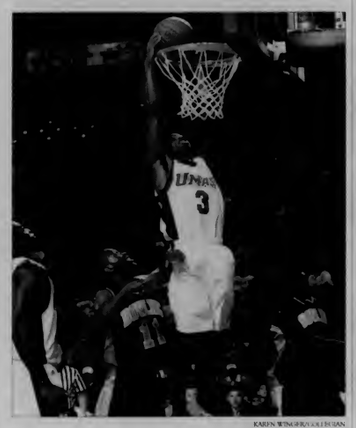
"At halftime there was a 'discussion' amongst me and the players about our defensive effort and our rebounding effort, and I think we got some of that straightened out," Ford said. "In the first half I thought we were just going through the motions.

"I was really excited that our guys listened at halftime, and they came out and really played well at both ends of the court."

While the second half of last night's game was the best half the Minutemen have put together this season, it will be tough to build momentum, as their next game is over a week away, when they host Sienna on Dec. 23.

The main thing the Minutemen will look to carry over is the stifling defense they played in the second half, as they held BU (3-6) to just 16 points after the break.

Holding a 39-37 edge with 12:07 remaining, UMass turned up its defense and held the Terriers without a field goal for over eight minutes.



During that span, the Minutemen went on a 21-2 run, sparked by Life's hot shooting.

The junior college transfer drilled three of his six three-pointers during the spurt, and finished with a game-high 20 points. The six shots Life drained from downtown in the game matched the total he had for the season entering last night's contest.

"James Life coming off the bench was huge," senior forward Jeff Viggiano said. "I think we're going to get that more often."

Maurice Maxwell played a key role during the second half stretch, as the junior swingman-turned-point guard ran the Minuteman offense flawlessly. UMass came into the game averaging 19.2 turnovers per game, but committed just 10 last night. Maxwell finished with seven points and four assists.

In the first half, it was freshman Chris Lowe who led the UMass offense from the point, as Lowe collected five of his seven assists in the first frame. Lowe didn't know until game time if he would be able to play, as he had a painful surgery done to remove a tooth earlier in the day.

KAREN WING/COLLEGIAN

Junior guard Maurice Maxwell had seven points and four assists in a 64-45 win over Boston University last night at the Mullins Center.

The game began like a trip to the dentist for the Minutemen, as BU took a 7-2 lead early, aided by some miscues by UMass.

The Terriers opened up a 16-6 lead five minutes into the game, but UMass battled back thanks to eight points apiece from Life and junior center Rashaun Freeman.

Freeman recorded his 22nd career double-double, finishing with 12 points and 10 rebounds.

A three-pointer by Viggiano (10 points) with 1:57 remaining in the half broke a 28-28 tie, and the Minutemen never trailed again.

NOTES: Amherst native Ben Coblyn returned to his hometown as a member of the Terriers and scored six points, including a thunderous dunk early in the second half.

The Minutemen have won eight straight games against BU, and will look to extend the streak next year when they meet at the Agganis Arena in Boston.

Life's clutch shooting sparks UMass victory

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Following a 93-57 trouncing of Savannah State on Nov. 28, junior James Life of the Massachusetts basketball team (3-3) had an issue. The problem wasn't with the way his team routed the Tigers, or with the 18 points he put up in the process.

Life was trying to maneuver around a different type of dilemma: his confidence. The 6-foot-6, 190-pound guard was still adjusting to playing for a Division I college basketball team after transferring from Manatee Community College in Bradenton, Fla.

During the Minutemen's 64-45 victory over Boston University (3-6) last night, Life, who was reeled into the UMass program because of his shooting ability, looked anything but apprehensive.

Coming off the bench at the beginning of the contest, Life sunk a jumper at the 14:12 mark, looking comfortable in the process.

"[Last night's game] is definitely a confidence booster," Life said. "I intend on building on it and try to come out every night and score."

The Junior College All-American led the team with a career-high 20 points, and hit 6-of-12 from three-point land – totaling the six treys he had made leading up to the game against the Terriers.

Life netted 12 of his points in the second half, with all of his points after the break coming via three-pointers.

Going into the clash against BU, Life was averaging 7.8 points per game and was shooting 23 percent from the perimeter. Last night's game bumped those numbers up to 9.8 points per game and 32 percent from the floor, and consequently, brought up Life's confidence.

Although Life is viewed as a shooter, UMass coach Travis Ford told him prior to the game to be patient with the ball and dish it out to another Minuteman if the look was open. Life took Ford's advice and set up teammate Stephane Lasme.

With 9:43 remaining in the contest, Life got an inbounds pass in the corner and made a move past his defender. As only eight ticks were left on the shot clock, Life kicked the ball out to Lasme, who drove up the middle and for a dunk.

"The last few games, I'd come into the game and I'd have an open look and I'd shoot right away," Life said "Coach just wanted me to be a little patient, maybe get a steal or an assist and get a feel for the game first, and then when I get an open look try to knock it down."

One aspect of the game that helped Life put up threes is the play of his surrounding cast. The rest of the Minutemen were able to find Life in desirable positions and enabled him to make the comfortable shots last night. Junior Maurice Maxwell accounted for two assists which led to Life three-pointers.

"Our guys did a good job of getting [Life] the basketball in a position where he can score – that was the key for us," Ford said. "There's going to be times where he makes shots – that's what he does."

Minutewomen need leadership

Danny Picard

It was a Tuesday night in late November, and Siena was in town to face the Massachusetts women's basketball team at the Mullins Center. I can remember watching same old shoot-around session take place prior to tip-off. Everything was going as expected, that is, everything up until the UMass (2-7) starting lineup was introduced.

The usual starting five for the Minutewomen had been altered in a way that only they could fathom, as senior center Patrycja Gulak and sophomore guard Alisha Tatham replaced sophomore forward Kate Mills and senior guard Ashley Sharpton.

It wasn't exactly an earth-shattering move, and the crowd didn't seem too concerned. But what was alarming was the reason for the move. Mills was one of the team's leading scorers. She was leading the Atlantic 10 in shot-blocking with 2.75 blocks per game. So why, then, was last year's A-10 All-Rookie Team pick watching from the bench as the tip-off ensued?

After 15 points and 10 rebounds, we all understood Coach Marnie Dacko's reasoning for making her block-shot machine the sixth man.

"It helps her," Dacko said. "It helps us get some bench points, but it also helps her being able to watch the opponent play for a while and seeing what she has to do when she comes in. I think some people are better as the sixth man, and other people are better starters, but I think Kate coming off the bench has proven to be effective."

And Mills did not seem to mind, after all, why would she? The sophomore forward notched her first career double-double in her first game coming off the bench, and she has thrived on it ever since.

"I guess it's a little different," Mills said after the win against Siena, "just because you get to see the game before you actually have to play in it. Either way I know I have to come out and get rebounds and hopefully score some points. I know I have to step up and play hard."

While Mills' statistics may have increased, the Maroon and White's number of wins haven't. The Minutewomen have lost their last four games since the win over Siena, and will head into their 20-day winter break with a dismal 2-7 record.

Whenever a team is in a major downward spiral, the first person questioned is always the head

KAREN WING/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore forward Kate Mills has stepped up her play since moving to the bench two weeks ago. Mills is averaging 13.6 points per game since the move.

See LEADERSHIP on page 10

Rouleau takes over ski team

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Replacing a mainstay in the University of Massachusetts athletics department is not an easy task to ask of someone. Neither is continuing a string of dominance that represents one of the most consistently successful programs UMass has had for nearly 50 years. But that's exactly what Justin Rouleau plans to do.

On Aug. 29, UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon announced Rouleau had been hired as the head ski coach for both the men's and women's teams.

After one very successful year coaching the skiers at Harvard, Rouleau was brought back to UMass, where he graduated in 1998 and competed as a skier himself. Immediately, Rouleau began working toward another successful year of UMass alpine skiing.

Rouleau will be replacing one of the longest tenured coaches at UMass in Bill MacConnell, who saw major success with the program. MacConnell had been the team's coach for 43 years before retiring after last season. He was just the second head coach for UMass skiing since the inception of the program in the 1950s.

MacConnell was so influential in his time as coach that the division the team competes in is now named after him, so Rouleau will certainly be under the shadow of his predecessor as he begins his own legacy.

Rouleau played under MacConnell as a student athlete in the late 1990s and was very successful as a competitor. A regular in the top-10 at each race, Rouleau helped the team to fourth and fifth place finishes in the NCAS standings. Rouleau also had several top 25 finishes in the National Championships. In addition to racing, Rouleau also coached the team while still an undergraduate.

After graduating, Rouleau employed the teaching certificate he had earned to teach English at Greenfield High School. He did so from 1998 to 2000, when he found a way to be involved in both teaching and skiing.

"I found an interesting niche in northern Vermont," Rouleau said of his opportunity to coach at Mount Mansfield Academy. "[Mount Mansfield] has a great reputation for academics and athletics, and the emphasis is on ski racing."

Rouleau remained there for three years, from 2000 up to 2003, helping develop some of the top skiers of today, including Jimmy Cochran, who will be a member of the U.S. Ski Team in the 2006 Olympic games.

After three successful years in Vermont, Rouleau decided it was time to do something he had missed out on during his college days. As a full time student-athlete, Rouleau never got the chance to travel abroad. In 2003, he took advantage of an opportunity to travel to Siberia, where he spent a year as an English professor at Tomsk Polytechnic Institute.

"I was a student-athlete myself, so I never took the risk of traveling abroad," Rouleau said. "The schedule is year round as a student-athlete – you have in-season practice as well as out-of-season practice. Not having had an opportunity, but always wanting a year abroad, I found a way to use my education once more."

When Rouleau returned from his year abroad, he began searching for work in skiing once more. That's when he was hired by Harvard's skiing program. Despite being one of the original two schools in the nation to have a collegiate skiing program (Dartmouth being the other), Harvard had not been very successful in recent years, something Rouleau helped remedy in just one year with the program.

"I got a short stint just for the season as a club coach, working with younger kids [on the Harvard ski team]," Rouleau said.

That year, Harvard enjoyed their best results in 70 years, since their original rivalry with Dartmouth in the 1930s. Rouleau earned consideration for the Eastern Intercollegiate Ski Association Coach of the Year

See ROULEAU on page 10

Breaking down the Atlantic 10

BY BEN HODGKINS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The 2005-06 Atlantic 10 Men's Indoor Track & Field season is currently underway. Six of nine teams have already started their seasons. Rhode Island, Massachusetts and Xavier are the only three teams that have yet to have a meet. The following includes a list of the A-10 teams in order of their predicted finish this season as voted upon by A-10 coaches.

CHARLOTTE

Charlotte started the season at the Clemson Opener and Appalachian Invitational in the first week of December. Jason Moore and Chase Eckard won the A-10 Men's Performer of the Week and A-10 Men's Rookie of the Week honors, respectively.

Seven school Top-10 times/distances were set in the two meets: third best 60-meter dash (6.82 seconds), fourth best 200-meter dash (21.80), fifth best 60-meter dash (6.86), seventh best shot-put (42-9 1/2), seventh best long-jump (22-9) and ninth best one-mile run (4 minutes 20.39 seconds).

RHODE ISLAND

The two-time defending A-10 champions will be led into the 2005-06 season by captains Eric Groce, Robert Johnson, Ashbad Agyapong and Adam Zucconi.

Agyapong set two URI indoor records last season, running a 21.14 in the 200-meter dash and 47.01 in the 400-meter dash. He was named the Most Outstanding Track Performer at the 2005 A-10 Indoor Championship and was the 2004 Most Outstanding Rookie Performer at the A-10 Indoor Championship.

Groce is a three-time individual champion, Johnson a two-time champion, Agyapong a five-time champion and Zucconi a two-time champion.

LA SALLE

The Explorers started off the 2005-06 season with a meet at the Jack Pyrah Invitational in which they saw senior Ryan Mosseley and freshman Orestes Medina take first-place finishes in the 55-meter dash (6.45 seconds) and long jump (6.88 meters), respectively. Medina set a meet record with his 6.88 meter jump.

La Salle placed second in the 2005 A-10 Indoor Championship, having two athletes who return this season place first in the 55-meter dash and 5000-meter run (James Jefferson and Sean Quigley).

FORDHAM

Fordham has opened up the 2005-06 season strong, winning 16 individual events and two relay events. Dan Tucker led the way for the Rams at the Fordham opener, winning the long jump (21-7 1/2), high jump (6 feet), 60-meter high hurdle (8.30 seconds), 60-meter dash (6.90 seconds) and 200-meter dash (23.50 seconds).

Also taking first place in events on the day were Chris McCutchan, who

See TRACK on page 10

Duo to fill Sox GM opening

BY HOWARD ULMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON – Instead of hiring a new general manager, the Boston Red Sox decided assistant general manager Jed Hoyer and director of player development Ben Cherington will share the job.

"Between them, Ben and Jed have intimate knowledge of every player in our organization, from top to bottom," team president Larry Lucchino said yesterday. "They complement each other well with their varied experiences."

The GM job had been vacant since Theo Epstein's contract expired Oct. 31. There was no mention whether Epstein, who left after lengthy negotiations with Lucchino, would return as a team adviser.

The 31-year-old Cherington and 32-year-old Hoyer were part of a four-person crew the Red Sox sent to the winter meetings last week in Dallas.

Boston's lack of a GM hasn't stopped the team from making trades. Boston landed pitcher Josh Beckett, third baseman Mike Lowell and reliever Guillermo Mota from the Florida Marlins for prospects, and sent shortstop Edgar Renteria to Atlanta.

Boston is trying to re-sign center fielder Johnny Damon, who is a free agent. In addition, left fielder Manny Ramirez and left-hander David Wells have asked to be traded.

Hoyer will control the organization's Major League operations, including free agent signings and trades, while Cherington will oversee the Red Sox's farm system, player development and scouting.

Epstein turned down a three-year, $4.5 million contract extension. Once the youngest GM in history, Epstein helped put together the 2004 team that won Boston's first World Series title since 1918.

Epstein didn't state a reason for his departure, but reports focused on a falling out with Red Sox president Larry Lucchino, his longtime mentor.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 66

Student war veterans attempt to expel military stereotypes

BY JOHN FENUCCIO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Former and current University of Massachusetts student veterans agreed Monday that the key to expelling stereotypes and misconceptions of those enlisted in the armed services is through discussion.

"The issue at hand is opening the paths of communication. There's not a lot of veterans who're willing to speak and a lot of that is from fear of judgment," said U.S. Navy Veteran and UMass student Lyle Phipps.

Phipps is one of six student veterans asked to speak in an open forum at the Campus Center Monday evening to discuss experiences coming home from war and returning to college. Phipps discussed the added difficulties student veterans face in the Pioneer Valley.

"Students coming back from war are often ostracized by the community here in western Mass. because it's a very liberal community," said Phipps. "A lot of people around here will turn their heads if you said you've been in the military."

A graduate student before enlisting in the U.S. Army in 1964, John Fitzgerald shed a different light.

"I thought it was very therapeutic to have interaction with graduate students. I did not encounter any real hostility, it was curiosity, people had serious questions about the war," said Fitzgerald.

Many of the speakers said some of the stereotypes veterans face is that they are pro-war.

"I really want people to understand that regardless of what your views are about the war, about the government, that you're an individual with a soul, with a heart, with mixed feelings of confusion" said U.S. Army Veteran and UMass student Nicole Darden.

Speakers discussed the decision to enlist not based on personal politics, but rather out of necessity.

"I challenge you not to look at them as people who had a choice not to go because let me tell you, when you sign up for the military, you're taking an oath of duty, you're swearing to follow the orders that you're given. You're giving up your rights as

See WAR on page 4

Three more dorms deemed 'All-freshman'

BY ADAM SUTTON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Three additional dormitories at the University of Massachusetts are scheduled to house only freshmen students for the fall 2006 semester.

Van Meter and Butterfield dormitories in the Central Residential Area and the Thoreau dorm in the Southwest Residential Area will become part of the expanding Epoch first-year student program already implemented in Pierpont, Moore, and Melville in Southwest.

According to the Residence Director of Pierpont and Moore, Matthew Patashnick, "Epoch" is the British pronunciation of epic.

The program is designed to "provide an easier transition to a large university" for incoming students and is expected to expand to accommodate all incoming students in 14 different dormitories by 2008, according to Director of Resident Life, Dawn Thompson.

Other halls scheduled for future Epoch expansion include Dickinson in the Orchard Hill Residential Area and Emerson, James and Kennedy in Southwest by 2007, and Cance, John Adams in Southwest and Wheeler in Central 2008, according to Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael Gargano. No dormitories in the Sylvan or Northeast residential areas are targeted for the Epoch program, Gargano said.

Epoch was originally considered when Gargano first arrived on campus in the fall of 2003 to deal with complaints he received from incoming students feeling "lost" at the large university. With programs to orient the students to use the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority bus system, to navigate the University's library system, to resolve roommate conflicts and to provide academic assistance — among others — Epoch is designed to make students comfortable with the University and its surrounding area.

The all freshmen residence halls are also being considered for "18 hour... uninformed security at the door... [and] an additional security card swipe" required to get into the buildings and an increased Resident Assistant to student ratio, Gargano said.

Despite the program's intentions, some students currently living in Epoch express little interest in its services.

"It doesn't effect your life that much... it's just living with all freshmen," said Cameron McCurdy, a freshman Pierpont resident who admits to not participating in Epoch's activities.

One Moore resident, who refused to be named, said that she enjoyed living in the same hall as her classmates. However, Moore resident Shanell Saunders, says she does not enjoy living in an all freshmen dorm.

"I don't think [the program] was a good idea," Saudners said.

MASS DAILY

Van Meter, shown above, is one of three dormitories scheduled to house only freshman in the fall of 2006.

No part of Epoch is mandatory, but "the key... is participation" and the planners are "considering having a required program or two throughout the semester in the future," Gargano said.

Students currently living in areas designated for Epoch expansion are required to change residence halls or move off of campus to accommodate for the incoming students in the fall.

Residents of Van Meter were alerted to the expansion by letter from Assistant Director of Housing Services David C. Vaillaincourt on Nov. 28. The letter stated that "all eligible Van Meter residents seeking on-campus housing for fall 2006 will be required to choose a new residence hall."

"I think it really stinks," said junior Van Meter resident Megan Mercadante. "You really get used to living here... now I have to find some where else."

Mercandante expressed hope that the new "suite style" dormitories near Sylvan living area will be done in time for her to move into next fall, but is doubtful. The administration will decide if the new dorms will be ready by fall during the first week of February, Gargano said.

Sophomore Van Meter resident Jarryd George believes that Van Meter was selected for the program to "cleanse central" of the "partying" reputation some dormitories have.

"[First year students] don't know you can party here," George said.

George's commonly held conception is not without merit. Addressing the alcohol abuse problem was in the mix of conversation on which halls were to be selected for Epoch, according to Gargano.

"The maintainers are fed up... and other students are fed up with [the destructive behavior resulting from alcohol abuse]...it's not healthy living conditions," Gargano said.

Thompson, however, maintains that "we are not trying to use [Epoch] to solve any problems currently in the residence halls."

Bush, Republican party, stumble through year in shadow of Iraq

BY DONNA CASSATA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—Republicans ruled the White House and Congress in 2005, but a pox descended on both their houses through a staggering series of investigations, indictments and political missteps.

The vice president's chief of staff was indicted and resigned in a special prosecutor's inquiry of the outing of a CIA operative, a long-running probe that raised doubts about the fate of other senior White House officials. The House majority leader stepped down after his indictment in Texas on conspiracy allegations in a campaign scheme. The Senate majority leader faced a federal investigation of his stock transactions.

And then there is the war in Iraq.

Shadowing the legal dramas and Capitol Hill maneuvering was a prolonged conflict that surpassed the sobering milestone of 2,000 Americans killed, claimed billions in U.S. dollars, undercut President Bush's standing and exacerbated the partisan divisions.

Bush promised an unwavering commitment to the unpopular war.

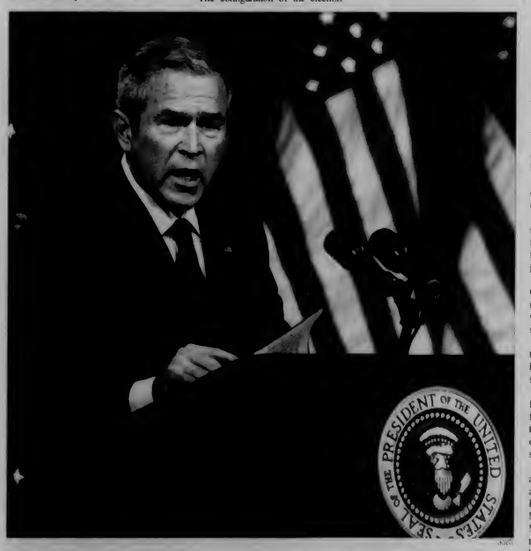
"Most Americans want two things in Iraq," he said. "They want to see our troops win and they want to see our troops come home as soon as possible. And those are my goals as well. I will settle for nothing less than complete victory."

Bush and congressional Republican leaders start the 2006 election year hobbled by a sense of unease in the nation — two-thirds say the country is headed in the wrong direction in the most recent AP-Ipsos poll — that threatens their legislative agenda and perhaps their political survival.

"My colleagues are getting nervous," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said recently. "We talk a lot about the president's unfavorable ratings. Have you noticed the ratings of Congress lately?"

Republicans have controlled the House since 1995, the Senate for most of that time and the White House since 2001, and their woes give hope to out-of-power Democrats looking ahead to next November's elections.

The configuration of the election map and the oft-repeated argument that the Democrats lack a clear-cut agenda reduce the chances of the GOP losing its grip on the House and Senate.



The party appears finally to have found its voice on Iraq and come more in tune with dispirited public opinion as the rationale for the war has unravelled and the insurgency claim- scores more lives by the week, pushing the U.S. death toll past 2,100.

Bush did bolster his standing with quick Senate approval of his choice for chief justice, John Roberts, and received high marks from the Republican conservative base for his nomination of Samuel Alito to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Democrats see an opening based on a combination of the Republicans' self-inflicted wounds and outside problems that have buffeted the GOP.

The devastation of Hurricane Katrina and the administration's slow-footed response made the Bush administration look ill-prepared for a crisis.

See BUSH on page 2

AGIP

In 2005, President Bush pushed through various bumps, including the indictment and resignation of the vice-president's chief of staff, the House majority leader stepping down after his indictment on campaign scheming, and the war in Iraq.

Jewish groups claim discrimination

BY MELISSA KEY
UWIRE (U. WIRE BUREAU)

WASHINGTON—A number of pro-Israeli and civil rights advocates called on public officials last week to act against anti-Semitism and anti-Israel bias on college campuses.

At a Nov. 18 hearing before the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, representatives of four Jewish and education rights groups said that anti-Semitism at American colleges and universities is a widespread problem that needs to be realized.

"Most students nor most faculty member cannot be classified in belief as anti-semantic," said Gary Tobin, president of the Institute for Jewish and Community Research, before the panel, but added that "a climate that tolerates anti-Semitism through language of anti-Israelism."

Tobin is the author of the new book "The UnCivil University: Politics and Propaganda in American Education," which approaches anti-Semitism at universities through the ideology and expression of anti-Israeli beliefs. The hearing also featured speakers from the Zionist Organization of America, the American Jewish Congress and the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education.

Having served in college facilities for 25 years, Tobin said he "treasures the university as a place of importance to American society, and this lack of attention to this issue is wasting a precious resource."

The commission is a non-authoritative body that investigates complaints of discrimination and submits reports, findings and recommendations to the president and Congress. The hearing marked the first time the commission has examined the issue of anti-Semitism on college campuses was thrust into the public sphere last fall when a documentary was made depicting professors at Columbia University intimidating pro-Israel students. Tobin said such incidents are not isolated.

"What should be a civil, intellectual debate about the Middle East, turns into the use of anti-Semantic images," Tobin said.

Tobin added that college should be a place where issues are discussed openly, but that it "crosses the line when images of Nazis are used to describe Israelis in the classroom or when a map a professor uses in class does not include Israel, only Palestine."

Tobin called on trustees, donors, alumni and faculty members to let "as much sun shine on this issue as possible" by holding workshops and generally spreading the awareness that discrimination for pro-Israel beliefs will not be tolerated.

"It's still out there and it shouldn't be there at all," Tobin said. "Students should not suffer any discrimination just because they support Israel."

Tobin said he encourages Jewish students who feel discriminated against to file complaints with the Office of Civil Rights if their schools do not provide the proper means for resolving such grievances internally. He added that many schools are reluctant to address the problem due to fears of infringing on free academic speech.

Tobin hosted his conclusions on several interviews with Jewish students across the country. However, some student students said they do not notice the problem.

"Our campus has such a large Jewish population, one of the largest in the country. I believe, that I don't see any discrimination happening here," said Daniel Newman, a Jewish student at the University of Maryland College Park, adding, "I feel like we're the majority sometimes."

International students face difficulties going home for break

BY ELIZABETH GEORGE
MINNESOTA DAILY (U. MINNESOTA)

MINNEAPOLIS—For many students, winter break is a time to relax at home with friends and families.

But some international students have difficulty going home or don't have the opportunity to go home at all.

Psychology professor Kate Briggs said the scheduling of international flights can be difficult when determining final exam times and when students can go home.

"A student who is flying to, say, Greece or China, for the semester break may have less flexibility than students who are traveling to Wausau (Wis.)," she said.

For some students, going back to their homes overseas isn't an option because it is such a short break, Thomas said.

Whereas many of their college friends may spend the break at their family's homes, the majority of international students don't go home because of cost or because of a lack of time, she said.

"When students don't have people around it becomes kind of a downtime and they become homesick," she said.

International Student Friendship Ministries vice president Johannes Marliem said many students choose not to go home during the semester break because they would rather wait until summer, when there is more time to spend at home.

International students who decide to travel home during semester break must be sure to get a travel clearance signature on their visa at International Student and Scholar Services before leaving, Thomas said.

After Sept. 11, 2001, there were several incidents in which individuals were withheld from the United States, and there were some cases of students not getting back in time for classes, she said.

"These problems have been pretty much solved, and it is less of an issue than it even was last year," she said. Asking for help

Although finals can create a large amount of stress for the average student, it can be even more stressful if English is a student's second language.

One of the main things professors can do is be attentive about the use of the English language, Briggs said.

Briggs said written exams in straight-forward English can prevent errors as well as reduce confusion during exam time.

Another minor difference is the format of the testing. Some international students have never used a Scantron exam. It is best for students to ask professors to double-check their test for logistical errors, she said.

International Student and Scholar Services Director Kay Thomas said communication between professors and students is key for students to be successful.

"The hardest thing for many international students is to just ask for (help)," she said.

Most professors are very flexible in working with students regarding their concerns, Thomas said. If students are hesitant about the strength of their English or if they are concerned about whether they will be able to finish the exam in time, they must communicate these concerns.

She said many University students turn to family and friends for support during finals time.

But Thomas said that for some international students, the lack of family and friends in the area can increase their loneliness.

The Minnesota International Student Association tries to open its office as often as possible so students can have a quiet place to study or a place to relax, said Aditya Mallvtra, electrical engineering senior and former Minnesota International Student Association president.

Marliem said the International Student Friendship Ministries offers counseling to students who are having a difficult time managing their stress during finals time.

"We gather to talk about how to encounter stress during exams and how to manage time," he said.

The group advises students to plan and try to not spend entire days studying, Marliem said. It is important for students

See STUDENTS on page 2

ARTS & LIVING
ALL HAIL THE 'KING'
Director Peter Jackson returns with his remake of the classic film 'King Kong.'
PAGE 8

EDITORIAL/OPINION
TEXTBOOK BUY-BACK
The current options afforded to students are not good enough.
PAGE 6

WEATHER
TODAY Sunny, H23°
TONIGHT Clear, L5°
TOMORROW Sunny, H29°, L19°

SPORTS
BACK IN THE GAME
UMass Men's Hoops defeat FSU last night at the Mullins Center.
PAGE 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael A. Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egnian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smolker
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Dales
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

PRINTED ON RECYCLED PAPER

On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael A. Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Allie Mamone, Tiffany Van Langen

Happy Holidays from the Collegian staff!

UMass students share concerns over marijuana penalties

AMHERST — A group of concerned students, which included members of the University of Massachusetts' Cannabis Reform Coalition, shared their concerns about local law enforcement at the town's Select Board meeting Monday night.

Several of the speakers expressed concern over how the Amherst and UMass police departments handle marijuana violations in light of a town-wide referendum, which passed in 2000. The referendum asks the police departments not to strictly enforce marijuana violations and encourages fines over imprisonment.

However, since the vote passed, there have been over 500 marijuana arrests in Amherst.

"A lot of this is undue enforcement," Justin Sawyer, a UMass student and member of the CRC, told the board. "At the CRC, we feel strongly that the police are going beyond legal conduct ... We feel that's not the correct way to allocate [town] resources."

Terry Frank Iin, an Amherst resident who supports the CRC, submitted written statements to the board, which he provided to the Daily Collegian. Franklin claims that Amherst's police chief, Charles L. Scherpa, has barred him from speaking at the CRC's annual "Extravaganja" event on the Town Common due to his outspoken pro-marijuana legalization views.

"Chief Scherpa's hostility to the legalization movement has, on a number of occasions, crossed the line to harassment and intimidation," the statement read. "I hope you don't think this is just a personal thing with me — but to have the chief try to order people not to allow me to speak at the rally is outrageous."

After the concerned community members were done speaking, the board thanked them for their comments.

Outside the meeting, some people praised the group for taking a stand.

"If we had this much energy from all the kids in town, Amherst would be a much happier place," said former Select Board member Dave Keenan. "They did a great job."

Nobody from either the UMass or Amherst police departments attended the meeting.

— Dan O'Brien

Several concerned students and members of the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition shared their views with local police during Monday's Town Select board meeting.

Preparing for disaster: learning from Katrina

By Sarah Light
The Daily Universe (BYU)

PROVO, Utah—When Brigham Young University student Shawna Windom drives around her hometown in Covington, La., she doesn't even flinch at the sight of the broken down trees or crushed homes on the side of the road.

For her, the destruction from Hurricane Katrina has become a new way of life — almost the norm.

A little more than three months ago, Windom, a senior in communications, was scheduled to fly back to BYU for the new semester. But when her flight was canceled before the hurricane hit, she decided to stay home with her family.

During the weeks that followed, Windom described the scene of her neighborhood as one of chaos. Because of knocked out phone lines and blocked roadways, there was no emergency assistance for almost a month, she said. Although her family had food storage, most of her neighbors were not as fortunate. Outside on the streets, people begged for water and food.

"It was scary because we weren't sure how long we had to live like this," she said. "The whole thing was depressing. Nobody knew where their next meal would come [from]. Nobody knew when it was going to end."

Now, as the cleanup has only merely begun, Windom and others across the country have recognized a heightened need to prepare for future emergencies and natural disasters. While many begin to prepare physically, many others have also acknowledged the need to prepare emotionally and spiritually for times of disaster.

Kerry Baum, emergency preparedness coordinator for BYU, said one of the best things people can do to prepare for emergencies is to learn how to respond in a given disaster situation.

"I always tell people that what you know about how to respond to emergencies is more important than what you have," Baum said.

For example, in an earthquake, people should not run outside because there are always objects falling, he said. Instead, they should look for places to get under things to protect themselves from falling debris.

In addition to this knowledge, he said the university encourages students to buy enough groceries for the week when they go to the store and to store at least three gallons of water.

The university has enough food to feed 33,000 people a survival diet for about two meals a day — for three days. The food is rotated through a warehouse and into the dining halls each day, he said.

Because the system does not have baby food or diapers, Baum encouraged students with babies to keep at least a three-day supply of those essentials on hand. People should also never let prescription medicines go below three days.

Elizabeth Keel, community outreach director at the Mountain Valley Chapter of the American Red Cross, said the Red Cross encourages people to have a complete 72-hour kit, including enough food and water for three days that will help until local government can get there.

Bush anixous to leave behind past year

BUSH from page 1

The president's and Republican-controlled Congress' efforts to keep alive a brain-dead Florida woman unnerved some Americans wary of government intrusion in their private lives.

Rising energy costs and charges of cronyism, first with former FEMA director Michael Brown and later with Bush's failed nomination of White House Counsel Harriet Miers for the Supreme Court, took a toll on the president's reputation.

By November, just 37 percent in an AP-Ipsos poll approved of the job Bush was doing, the lowest level of his presidency in this survey.

Just a year earlier, Bush had secured a second term with more than 62 million votes and talked about spending his political capital on an ambitious agenda that included overhauling Social Security.

By the end of 2005, there was little talk of Social Security changes and plenty of discussion of courtroom proceedings.

Among the legal woes that hit the GOP included: I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, faces charges that he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury about how he learned about the identity of Valerie Plame, a CIA operative. Plame's identity was revealed in July 2003 by columnist Robert Novak after her husband, Joseph Wilson, accused the Bush administration of twisting intelligence about Iraq.

Partial face transplant creates hope for disfigured patients

By Lindsey Tanner
Associated Press

CHICAGO — In some circles, the partial face transplant performed on a woman in France is more than a medical oddity. It is an exciting new source of hope to burn victims like Bernhard Heitz.

Burn survivors "go crazy about it, they love the idea," said Heitz, who suffered extensive disfiguring burns to his nose, lips, ears and body in a 1997 plane crash and is now president the World Burn Foundation, a support group. "Now that they know they can do it, I'm sure people are going to start asking their doctors."

During the Nov. 27 operation, a 38-year-old Frenchwoman mauled by her dog received a new nose, lips and chin from a brain-dead donor. It was the world's first face transplant and an operation many medical experts consider experimental, but Heitz said many burn victims are undaunted.

"They're very happy to take the risk if they would be given the chance because anything is better than what they have," he said.

Face transplants are not available in the United States, although two medical centers, the Cleveland Clinic and University of Louisville, hope to offer them eventually.

Exactly how many burn survivors might be eligible for such surgery is difficult to say. Some patients might not be psychologically stable enough. And some patients — such as those with severe injuries to the bones — would not be ideal candidates for the operation. The French operation involved a transplant of flesh, and would do nothing to correct the underlying bone structure.

Heitz, 43, said he gladly would have had a face transplant when he was first injured. Instead, doctors used grafts of skin from his buttocks to rebuild his face, and other grafts for the rest of his body. "I stopped counting at 50 operations," he said.

Dr. Bruce Cunningham, president of the American Society of Plastic Surgeons, based in Arlington Heights, Ill., said the French case opens up tantalizing possibilities. Such transplants could overcome some of reconstructive surgery's biggest obstacles, such as: "How do you make lips? How do you make a mouth that moves or eyes that open?"

Still, he said his group has not gotten inquiries from patients wanting a face transplant.

"I think everybody's just waiting to see how this turns out," Cunningham said. He said it could come down to whether the results are better than what doctors can accomplish with reconstructive surgery.

"It's a fascinating thing and if we can move forward with it and get it to work, the applications would be huge," he said.

Amy Acton, executive director of the Phoenix Society burn survivors' support group, said many survivors are intrigued by the French case, but she has not heard about anyone clamoring for an operation. Many are leery of the operation's still-experimental nature and the potential psychological aspects of dealing with a completely new face, Acton said.

Sharon Everett, 56, of Cold Spring, Ky., whose eyelids, nose and ears were burned off when pool chemicals exploded in her car five years ago, has been thinking about the transplant case but worries that her body might reject facial tissue from a stranger. The patient in France will have to take potent anti-rejection drugs for life.

Rejection might be less of a risk if the donor were a relative, but Everett said the prospect of taking a loved one's face makes her even more squeamish.

"One of my daughters said if something happened to her, she would want me to have her face. I said, 'Oh, Laura, I just could never take your face. ... I just couldn't think of that,'" Everett said.

Phoenix detective Jason Schechterle, who lost his ears, eyelids, eyebrows and all but a stump of nose after his police cruiser erupted in a fireball in a 2001 crash, said he is simply not interested in the procedure.

A few years ago, Schechterle received a questionnaire from a team of U.S. doctors gauging interest in the transplant procedure. Schechterle never bothered completing the survey.

"I wouldn't go through the pain, the recovery and hoping that it worked, all the chances that it wouldn't. What for?" the 33-year-old Schechterle said. "Some people whose appearance is not socially acceptable, they've been deeply affected by that. This, to me, is who I am now. That's my identity."

THE HARP
Great Food till Midnight!!
Never a Cover!
"Come party like you're Irish"
Trivia Night Every Tuesday!
Live Music Wed- Sat
COME VISIT US DURING WINTER SESSION!
From All of Us at The Harp, We Wish You a Safe and Happy Holiday Season.

NOW THROWING at PETE'S
NEW BURGERS
NEW MEAL DEALS
FAMOUS FOR 2 BURGS FOR 2 BUCKS
HAMBURGERS - HOT DOGS - GRINDERS
CHICKEN - SEAFOOD - FRIES
PHILLY CHEESE STEAKS
SHAKES - SMOOTHIES - FLOATS
HARD ICE CREAM & SOFT SERVE
287 Russell St. Route 9 - Hadley
585-0241
petesdrivein.com

555 deal
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas $5 Each!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911

Summer 2006 in Paris
A multitude of undergraduate, credit-bearing courses
• Two 5-week Sessions
• Fast Track Intensives
• French Immersions
www.aup.edu
THE AMERICAN UNIVERSITY OF PARIS
knowledge, perspective, understanding

INCENSE • SHIRTS • BLOUSES • POSTERS • CHOPSTICKS • BOOKS • HAIR STICKS • GLOVES • THE MERCANTILE IS FULL OF FUN, AFFORDABLE GIFTS AND CLOTHES FROM AROUND THE WORLD! • INCENSE • ACTION FIGURES • CANDLES • KISSI STONE • Socks Leather Sole • CARVED FIGURES
The Mercantile
Northampton 140 MAIN St 584-1205
Amherst Carriage Shops 549-1396
Mon-Fri 10-9 Sat 10-6 Sun 12-5

It's been a pleasure to serve you this semester. We look forward to serving you again in the new year.
Thank You!
Good luck on your exams!
DINING SERVICES
U Mass Amherst
Origins Elevated
www.umass.edu/diningservices

Worries about a killer bird flu dominated year's news

By Marilynn Marchione
Associated Press

(AP) - What a difference a year makes ... or not.

We head into 2006 the same way we began 2005: Worried about flu and not enough vaccine.

Last year, the concern was ordinary flu because the United States had only half its usual supply of flu shots. Bird flu creeping across Asia was a vague and distant threat.

This year, bird flu extended its reach, spawning fears that it might mutate into a worldwide super-flu that kills people, not just avians.

Countries scrambled to order an experimental bird flu vaccine and Tamiflu, the lone drug known to work against the germ, but both take achingly long to make and are in short supply. In October, the federal government released a plan to deal with a flu pandemic, relying heavily on low-tech measures like quarantine and travel restrictions.

"Right now the U.S. public should not be worried," because the germ doesn't spread person to person, Drs. William Schaffner and Tom Talbot recently wrote to fellow staffers at Vanderbilt University.

"Until the virus develops this ability, if it ever does, your chances of being infected are virtually zero. Leave worrying about this virus to the infectious disease specialists for now," they advised.

Amid the flu fears there actually was a lot of good news this year. Cancer overtook he art disease as the leading cause of death among Americans 85 and under. Why is that good, you ask? Because deaths from both are falling, it's just that those from heart disease have fallen more dramatically.

Two vaccines proved effective against human papilloma virus, or HPV, the leading cause of cervical cancer, a big killer around the world.

New-generation cancer drugs like Avastin and Herceptin, which more precisely target the disease and leave healthy cells alone, also scored big victories in studies on lung and breast cancer patients respectively, notes the American Society of Clinical Oncology in its first annual report on cancer progress.

Five years ago, these drugs were in the "hope" stage but now are in wide use, said Dr. Roy Herbst, a lung cancer expert at the University of Texas M.D. Anderson Cancer Center.

In the future, "the goal is going to be to combine the targeted therapies and leave the chemotherapy and radiation aside," sparing patients the harsh effects of these older treatments, he said.

Meanwhile, the federal Food and Drug Administration continued to battle allegations that it has been too slow to act against dangerous products, and that political concerns were trumping science.

Despite advisers saying the drug is safe, the FDA has refused to allow over-the-counter sales of Plan B, a "morning after" pill to prevent pregnancy.

A top FDA scientist quit over the dispute, and it held up Lester Crawford's confirmation as FDA commissioner. Two months after winning the job, he abruptly resigned amid questions about ethics and financial reporting. Federal officials are investigating.

An artisan takes a break near the bird cage he is building, in Jakarta, Indonesia. Despite pressure for Indonesia to contain avian flu, it is taking little action.

Other FDA-related developments:

—More bad news about pain killers. Merck's withdrawal of the popular arthritis medication Vioxx from the market in September 2004 was followed in March by Pfizer's withdrawal of Bextra. Both were tied to increased heart risks. Merck lost the first but won the second of many lawsuits alleging it hid information on Vioxx's dangers, and the third ended in a mistrial after a medical journal said Merck failed to report three deaths in one Vioxx study.

—Over-the-counter medications became suspect, too. Warnings were posted on non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs, or NSAIDS, a wide class of pain killers including Motrin, Aleve and Advil. Aspirin wasn't included because studies show that it cuts heart risks rather than increases them.

—Three makers of heart defibrillators issued huge recalls. Guidant Corp. drew criticism for waiting three years to warn doctors and patients about a defect with one model that's been linked to two deaths.

—Silicone-gel breast implants took a step toward returning to market. FDA advisers recommended that one company be allowed to resume selling them but voted against similar plans by another.

—BiDil, the first race-based pill, won approval for blacks with heart failure.

—Natrecor, another heart failure medication, was ordered to carry warnings that it might raise the risk of death.

—Pargluva, a novel Type 2 diabetes drug that had been expected to win government approval, was dealt a blow when a study linked it to higher risk of deaths, heart attacks and strokes.

The biggest concern about drugs for many people remained how to pay for them. As 2005 drew to a close, seniors struggled to make sense of the complex choices that will give them their first prescription drug benefits under Medicare, starting in 2006.

In other medical news:

—The Terry Schiavo case became a referendum on the right to die as the comatose Florida woman's husband battled her parents to remove a feeding tube keeping her alive. She died last spring after her husband prevailed. An autopsy revealed her brain had stopped working years ago.

—French doctors said they had done the world's first partial face transplant, grafting a nose, mouth and chin from a person who recently died onto a 38-year-old woman mauled by a dog. In the United States, the Cleveland Clinic proceeded with plans to do a full face transplant, interviewing about a dozen potential candidates who were severely burned or disfigured and had exhausted normal reconstructive surgery methods.

—Prostate cancer got big attention. Researchers held the first major scientific conference focused on the disease, which is more deadly to men than breast cancer is to women.

—Research mounted on the benefits of vitamin D, a nutrient the body makes from sunshine. A prominent Harvard doctor made it the topic of his keynote lecture at a major cancer conference, and the American Cancer Society has been reviewing its sunscreen guidelines to see whether modest amounts of sunshine can be termed beneficial.

—Smoking rates continued to decline in the United States. Lung cancer awareness increased with the deaths of newsman Peter Jennings and actress Barbara Bel Geddes, and the diagnosis of the disease in Dana Reeves, a non-smoker.

police log

Saugus man arrested for operating with a suspended license

SundayDecember11

Daniel J. Sutherland, 19, of 4 Howard Road in Gloucester was arrested at 1:24 a.m. and charged with operating under the influence of alcohol and failing to use care when backing a vehicle. Police said an officer on patrol observed a car driven by Sutherland back into a parked car and crash into it in lot 49 in Orchard Hill. Sutherland allegedly drove away from the accident before the officer stopped him. He was given a field sobriety test, which he failed, police said.

Officers on patrol reported three cars that were vandalized and had items stolen early Sunday morning. While on routine patrol of yellow lot 11 near Southwest, Officer Kevin Shaw observed glass between two vehicles with an apparent break in at least one of the windows. Upon further inspection, officers found two other cars that had broken windows. In addition, one car had part of a stereo missing, another car had its glove box rummaged through and one car had the face plate of a stereo stolen. Officers claimed to have conducted three checks of the parking lot that night between 10 p.m. Saturday and 7 a.m. Sunday. No arrests were made.

A student filed a report of vandalism at 11:14 a.m. to police. The party claimed her car's driver's side mirror was ripped off. She claimed to believe that the owner of another car, who had parked next to her, had caused the damage. The other party was contacted, but claimed that the damage had been done before arrival. The damage was estimated at $300.

A student filed a report of vandalism on a motor vehicle at 5:20 p.m. to police. The student claimed that his left side mirror had been smashed and bent off sometime between 12:30 a.m. on Saturday and 8:30 a.m. on Sunday. His car was parked in yellow lot 11 near Southwest. The damage was estimated at $250.

SaturdayDecember10

Justin Brunelle, 22, of 82 South Street in Paxton was arrested at 3:15 a.m. and charged with operating under the influence of alcohol and traveling the wrong way on a one-way street. An officer on patrol claimed to have observed Brunelle traveling the wrong way down Infirmary Way in Central. The officer pulled over the car and conducted a field sobriety test on Brunelle, which he reportedly failed.

A student who lives in Prince dormitory in Southwest reported fraudulent activity on her credit card to police at 1:33 p.m. The woman claimed that she received a charge of $450 on her credit card, which she had not made. She contacted the credit card company about the charge, which was made at a K-Mart in Las Vegas, Nevada. The woman said she never lost possession of her card and doesn't know how the purchase was made. Her case has been referred to the detective bureau for follow up.

FridayDecember9

Nicholas Murray, 17, of 6 Nelson Street in Keene, N.H. was arrested at 3:17 a.m. and charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (shod foot) after an incident at Brown dormitory in Sylvan. The reporting party called police after he had allegedly been assaulted by Murray when he asked some residents to turn down the volume of loud music. Upon arrival, officers said the victim had received a severe contusion to his right eye and other minor injuries to his face and arms. An ambulance was called and he was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital for treatment. The victim made a positive identification of Murray, who is not a UMass student and was staying in the dormitory as a guest, police said. His shoes were taken as evidence.

TuesdayDecember6

Matthew D. Boivin, 20, of 16 Winter Street in Saugus was arrested at 1:19 a.m. and charged with operating with a suspended license and operating a motor vehicle without stopping at a stop sign. An officer stopped Boivin while he was driving on Infirmary Way in Central when he allegedly failed to stop at a stop sign.

-Compiled by Dan O'Brien

GRADUATE PROGRAM IN HISTORY
Master of Arts
PROVIDENCE COLLEGE

ATTENTION
HISTORY MAJORS

The Graduate Program in History at Providence College invites you to consider its graduate program leading to an M.A. in American or Modern European History.

Highly regarded for its quality faculty and high program standards - yet competitively affordable - the program offers a wide selection of courses and seminars in American and Modern European History as well as courses in Asian, Medieval, Irish, and Middle Eastern Histroy.

Whether your career focus is on education, law, government, museums, business - or a number of other possibilities - the M.A. in History at Providence College will help you to achieve that goal.

To receive information about our graduate program, please call the History Office at (401) 865-2193 or e-mail me at pomalley@providence.edu.

Dr. Paul F. O'Malley, Director

Veterans travel from battlefield to classroom

WAR from page 1

an American citizen," said Daren.

"I had been out of high school for a year and a half and I had looked at going into the military to find a way to pay for my education at the time," said Gulf War Veteran Roderick Anderson.

Anderson raised importance to a growing proportion of enlistees who're joining in order to make a living and avoid falling into a life of crime.

"Often times peoples' economic ability to actually pay for school on their own was either for you to sell drugs or not go anywhere in your community," Anderson said.

Each offered a unique perspective into the choices they faced in enlisting and the lives they subsequently led.

Eileen Stewart, who works in the Department of Veteran Affairs Office at UMass, summed up the event's initiative. "The purpose of this forum is to focus on issues of our military students, that is people who have served in the active military."

Aspiring UMass student, United States Sergeant and member of the 94th Military Police Unit, Nathan Lusignan, who's gone through one tour already in Operation Iraqi Freedom, shared his insight on the subject.

"It's hard to go back to school when you've had such a dramatic taste of reality." However, due to his military obligations, he'll be attending a Joint Readiness Military Training program that's required by the Army prior to deployment, preventing him from attending the University.

The event ended with a question and answer portion where other UMass student veterans asked questions. One student spoke about the soldier's eagerness to go home after deployment that during demobilization, when asked about health problems endured during service, they'd often answer with nothing simply to go home quicker. That same student, whose friend within the same unit lost his sight, suffered a stroke in a family with a no history of strokes.

Veterans and Service Members Association of UMass, UMass Veterans Affairs Office, the Veterans Education Project, Students Against the War, and the UMass Anti-War Coalition sponsored the forum.

Waiting for you 15min of fame?
WRITE FOR NEWS!
SEE YOUR NAME IN THE PAPER!
e-mail:
news@dailycollegian.com

Late Nite Study Hours @ MERCYhouse - 10pm to 4am—365 N. Pleasant (end of Frat Row)
Thurs/Fri—Dec. 15/16 Free Caffeine, Munchies, & Wireless Int. knowmercy.org

Bush supporters site progress in Iraq

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—In a round of speeches on Iraq, President Bush is combining fresh expressions of steely resolve with sobering acknowledgments of how unexpectedly hard the task has been.

While his detractors say the president has offered no new initiatives, his supporters say the president's two-week speaking blitz is helping to turn public opinion in his favor and putting Democrats on the defensive.

Bush on Wednesday will give the fourth and final in a series of speeches showcasing this week's elections to choose a permanent Iraqi government. He is working to rebuild support for a war that a majority of Americans now say was a mistake.

Ed Goeas, a Republican pollster, credits the speeches with helping to nudge up Bush's overall approval ratings and his numbers on handling Iraq in several recent polls.

"The president needs to continue to reaffirm why we're in Iraq and what this battle is all about, and make sure the Democrats are not the only ones being heard out there," Goeas said.

Other pollsters aren't so sure that Bush can claim much forward momentum from recent events.

"I think that to really move the needle on Iraq, events there on the ground are going to have to change. Fewer casualties, things like that," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center.

Bush discussed upcoming Iraqi elections on Tuesday with a group of GOP senators at the White House. Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also attended.

"It will take weeks and maybe months for the real political process to work," Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., told reporters afterwards. Santorum said Bush is keenly aware "that there's still a lot of confusion out there in the American public about what's happening," but he that the president was "very engaged" in trying to explain his war policy to the public.

Earlier, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said the president was doing a good job of laying out his goals in Iraq and should resist pressure to offer a troop-withdrawal timeline. "The body counts, the deaths, they're painful on both sides," Frist said on CBS' "Early Show." But he said the U.S. has "no choice but to fight" to overcome terrorists in the region.

In Philadelphia on Monday, Bush stood by his decision to invade Iraq in March 2003 even though some 30,000 Iraqis and more than 2,100 American troops have died. He acknowledged the U.S. image overseas is suffering because of Iraq, but likened it to the rocky start for U.S. self-government in the 18th century.

"Knowing what I know today I'd make the decision again," the president said.

In his series of speeches, Bush is working to explain his Iraq policy more clearly.

He began the series on Nov. 30 at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., by focusing on the progress in training Iraqi security forces. Last week, in a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, an independent think tank, Bush talked about rebuilding Iraq's economy.

In Monday's speech at Philadelphia's World Affairs Council, Bush emphasized efforts "to help the Iraqi people build a lasting democracy in the heart of the Middle East."

President Bush speaks to members of the Council on Foriegn Relations in Washington, Dec. 7, 2005.

Feds probe Boston police shootings

BOSTON—Federal investigators are reviewing two fatal shootings by Boston police officers after receiving complaints from victims relatives who said the shootings weren't justified.

The shootings occurred in 2004 and 2001.

Boston Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole confirmed that one of the shootings involved the case of Bert W. Bowen, 40, of the city's Roxbury neighborhood. Bowen was shot three times by police on June 27, 2004, when he fled following a traffic stop and after allegedly pointing a gun at officers.

The second shooting involved Rene Romain, 19, who was shot at the Mattapan MBTA Station on July 14, 2001, after he allegedly threatened police with a knife, O'Toole said.

In both cases, the Suffolk District Attorney's office found that the shootings were justified.

O'Toole called the federal review of the shootings "routine." She said that last summer US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan's office asked Boston police for their files related to the shootings.

"Quite frankly, we welcome the scrutiny," O'Toole told The Boston Globe. "I'm not going to be presumptuous in any way, but I'm confident these investigations were conducted very professionally and thoroughly."

Sullivan declined to comment on the ongoing reviews.

Bowen's father Winston Bowen, 74, said he didn't believe that his son's shooting was justified.

"If he was running away from police, they could have shot him in the leg and that would have been it," he told the Boston Herald.

"There was no reason for the police to kill him."

Romain's mother Carline Seide-Murphy told the Globe that she submitted the complaint to the US Justice Department's civil rights division in 2003. She said Justice Department lawyers asked her for documents and she sent them police reports and medical reports.

One of those reports indicated that the surgeon who operated on her son before he died found the fatal bullet entered from the right buttock, she said. Boston police have said Romain was shot in the front.

"To shoot him like that, in the back, it's wrong," she told the Globe.

An investigation by then-Suffolk District Attorney Ralph C. Martin's office found that the medical report was wrong and that Romain had been shot in the abdomen after threatening police with a knife.

—Associated Press

Veterans travel from battlefield to classroom

STUDENTS from page 1

to set aside time to relax so they don't become overwhelmed, he said.

Studying in groups also can help many students because it keeps them from spending all their studying time alone, he said.

Marliem came to the University after completing two years at a school in Indonesia. He said his experience with U.S. final exams has been easier in some ways.

Indonesian students may have more than one final exam per day because the exams are on the last day of class; whereas at the University, exams are spread out over the course of a week. There is more time to prepare here, he said.

Marliem said he prefers the exams in the United States because they are more objective regarding course concepts learned over the semester, and in Indonesia there were more questions that required critical analysis outside of his knowledge.

Malhotra said his experience with final exams in the United States was much easier than the exams he took in India.

In India, there is only one exam to cover the entire course, he said. In the United States, the course is separated into parts, and there are midterms to make the finals easier.

Romney camp clears official of wrongdoing

BOSTON—The state's chief technology officer was cleared of any wrongdoing or potential conflicts of interest following the Romney administration's review of out-of-state trips he made without written approval.

Romney spokesman Eric Fehrmstrom said Peter Quinn, director of the state's Information Technology, obtained verbal permission for the trips, most of which were sponsored by technology and information companies.

Eric A. Kriss, who was secretary of administration and finance at the time Quinn traveled to the conferences, said he approved the trips and relieved Quinn of the responsibility to fill out the required paperwork.

A 1995 regulation requires state officials to obtain prior approval from their superiors for any business travel they want to make when the expenses are being paid by private individuals or companies.

However, Kriss said he felt the reason the regulation had been put in place — the fiscal crisis of the mid-1990s had cut out all state-funded travel — had expired.

"I knew of every trip Peter was taking, and I approved them all," Kriss told The Boston Globe.

Kriss also said Quinn was in demand at the conferences because of the state's decision to move to an open, proprietary-free format for storing electronic documents.

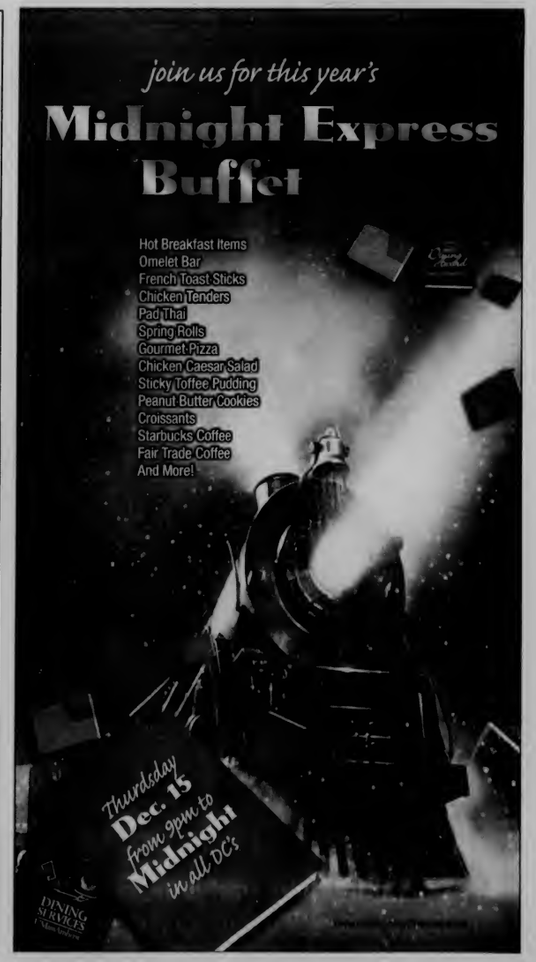
Massachusetts is the first state to take the step, and it is being closely watched by the information technology industry because the switch is seen as a challenge to Microsoft's market-dominating Office software.

"People in other states were anxious to hear about the Massachusetts experience," Kriss said.

Fehrmstrom said Kriss' replacement, Thomas Trimarco, has asked Quinn to fill out the needed paperwork for the trips. Trimarco also is reminding other officials about the law.

"Secretary Trimarco is sending out a memorandum to all state agencies that requirement remains in place and needs to be followed," Fehrmstrom said.

—Associated Press



Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney smiles prior to a recent speech.

The Massachusetts Daily
COLLEGIAN
New England's Largest College Daily

The Staff at the Daily Collegian would like to thank our readers for a great semester.

Happy Holidays!!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." - Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Campus textbook buy-back options not sufficient

Every semester, students complain about not getting full price when they return their textbooks. As each semester passes, more and more professors are realizing that the Textbook Annex may not be the best option. Professors also order books from other local book stores because they understand the financial burden that students endure. Stores in the area include Amicus Albion, Food for Thought, Book Marks, Raven Used Books, Jeffrey Amherst College Store and Valley Books.

The University book store is trying to make their buy-back stations readily available to students who want cash, as they are setting them up at several different locations across campus. With no guarantee of how much each book will be bought back for, students are still looking for other opportunities and choices to sell their books. Luckily there are plenty of other stores in the area, not to mention the many Web sites available at the touch of a keyboard.

The Textbook Annex only promises up to 50 percent for each book sold back to their store. However, "up to" does not mean a definite 50 percent, so who knows how much your books will end up grossing? There are thousands of stories passed down from student to student about the little amounts they have received for their books, even though the sum of purchase was outrageous to begin with.

Even if your books are in mint condition, they might be refused to be bought back if a new edition has come out. Then you are stuck with a book you don't want and limited cash for the holiday season. Amounts of the return may also be reduced if the pages are highlighted too much or suffer other damages.

Even when buying used books the prices aren't always that much better at the University book store. Some students have resorted to selling their books to other students instead of dealing with a store. You may have seen various posters around campus advertising for campusbookswap.com.

According to the Web site, the books are sorted by school. Once you post your books on the Web site, other students interested in purchasing your books will contact you and then you go from there. To buy books you just search through the books listed for your school and then contact the person who currently owns them. "You can search by Title, Author, or ISBN number (this is the number just above the barcode on the book)," explains the Web site. The site is absolutely free and may be the best option, although there are other Web sites to choose from. Students make their own prices for books, so it might be best to make sure you find the lowest price offered for the book you want during your Web site searches.

Students will go to great lengths to get extra cash. Some prefer to hold onto their books no matter how broke they are. The frustration of selling your books is just too much for some, especially during finals. Regardless of the complications, there are always long lines wherever buy-backs are happening.

Whether you choose to sell your books to a store or trade them online, it is safe to say that the Textbook Annex is not the best choice. The reason you are selling your books back in the first place is to receive as much cash back as possible. Risking going back to that store is a gamble. Other stores may require a receipt upon return. It is safe to say that certain Web sites like Campusbookswap.com are your best bet. Just be sure to make note of what you paid for the book in the first place so you know how much of a deal you're getting. Good luck.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board

Students treated poorly

Asif Khan

My grandmother once told me "you should treat others as you would want to be treated yourself." Although it sounds really cliched and obvious, few people follow it. Everyday we treat people not at all like we would want to be treated and this extends into higher levels of authority as well. Would the current administration want their homes to be ransacked and torches flashed on their children's faces at 3 a.m. because the men in their family might be suspected in "aiding" the "insurgents"?

Would it be ok to start attacking Germany and France if the Sept. 11 terrorists were white Europeans and not Arabs? As young adults, are we treated like adults or like children? When it comes to paying off our loans, getting jobs to pay for our bills or making other conscious choices we are told to be mature adults. But there are also times when I see these same young adults being treated like complete children that I start to think is this the way people in their 20s are supposed to be treated and talked to?

The police come to mind when you think of this subject, especially here in Amherst. I have traveled a lot of the world and I have yet to see figures of authority be so rude and difficult with people. This weekend some friends and I were in Amherst Center and saw a guy sprint right by us. He was being chased by a cop who right after passing us by yelled, "I'm going to get you, you faggot!" For a second I did not comprehend it but then I was not really surprised and neither were my friends. These past years at UMass I have heard of so much harassment and disrespect faced by students at the hands of our "oh so overworked" protectors.

> I have traveled a lot of the world and I have yet to see figures of authority be so rude and difficult with people [as the Amherst police have been].

One friend who got arrested for being at a party and not vacating the house (his house) in time was taken to jail for the night and told by the policeman that "they are going to love a pretty boy like him in jail." Another time, at a party I was at myself, here in Amherst, the cops broke in the house, arrested the girls who lived there, including some others and when they were sitting in their jail cell told them to do some push ups while they are in there to lose those "freshmen 15."

This phenomenon of people in positions of authority and control demeaning the people they deal with or discipline is very rampant, especially today as American forces are involved in "war" in two countries. The way many Iraqis and Afghans have been treated by U.S. soldiers is deplorable. We all saw the pictures taken at Abu Ghraib, Iraq of men made to simulate oral sex to each other, stripped and piled up on top of one another and the list goes on. In "Fahrenheit 9/11" there is footage from Iraq where soldiers are kicking around a dead body joking about "Ali Baba still having a hard on." This kind of behavior transcends the individual and becomes incorporated into men and women who work in such positions.

It is hard to imagine anyone kicking around a dead body or demeaning people who have never harmed you unless and until they are removed from the category of "normal" and "human." And demoted into a lower category of people or beings where it is OK to do things to them that you would not otherwise. For cops in Amherst, UMass students are in this category. Whenever you see a gathering of kids, bring out the batons and handcuffs, no need to ask what they are doing or tell them to stop it.

And this is just a UMass thing because I have been at several parties at Mt. Holyoke, Smith and Amherst and I have yet to see any cops patrolling or arresting people over there. Yes, parties at UMass are bigger and have the tendency to get out of control, but we are also a much larger school and the majority of the students here would agree with me that the parties are relatively in control until the cops show up and start treating us like cattle. If the police started to treat us like the young adults we are supposed to be in college and spoke to us in a civil, polite manner and told us what we were doing wrong then I am sure almost all of us will follow directions, because I can safely say that no one wants to spend a night in jail on a Saturday or be chased by someone through snow while being insulted.

Asif Khan is a Collegian columnist.

Teachers, time to start teaching

Becky Martins

There can be no harsher truth than working hard, but failing anyway. Our confidence diminishes. It becomes nearly impossible to learn from this "lesson" when we feel we did all that could be done. But is there really much to be gained from such an experience?

Maybe there does come a point in which our lack of success is warranted. Only this time, it is others' faults that prove detrimental. Throughout our lives, we will constantly be reminded of how outsiders can affect us personally. In the life of a student, this is an all too common reality.

Before my senior year of high school, I had no idea what to expect from college. I assumed the faculty responsible for instructing me would be qualified and able to successfully teach a class. I felt confident that if I put in the time, my grades would reflect my effort. Surely, since I was paying for my education, it had to be an improvement over high school. Little did I know, however, this would not always be the case.

Due to a scheduling conflict during my senior year, I discovered the only way to take pre-calculus was through my school's dual-enrollment program. We had established it with nearby UMass Dartmouth, which allowed juniors and seniors to take college classes for free in return for high school credit. Understanding it was our only option, two friends and I signed up for the twice-weekly course, eager to get a taste of a real college education. Never did we think it would be the hardest grade we had ever worked for.

Over the course of the semester, our entire class struggled. Not only was the material hard to understand, but the professor was barely audible due to a thick accent. When asked a question, he would give the same book-supplied answer as provided in class. He did not seem to realize how unclear he was being in his lessons.

By the final exam, my friends and I had failed each of his three tests, though we had a tutor and had prepared for days for each. Thus, as a last resort, we began skipping high school classes to visit his office hours. During these meetings, the professor still proved to be of little help, but at least he learned our names. By January, when grades were posted, we somehow had managed to receive As as our final averages, but we knew they came only out of sympathy. Without making ourselves known, our hard work would have proved useless and resulted only in failures. By the end of my first college class, I felt the only lesson I learned was when all else fails, suck up.

> Without making ourselves known, our hard work would have proved useless and resulted only in failures. By the end of my first college class, I felt the only lesson I learned was when all else fails, suck up.

Upon beginning my college education at UMass Amherst, I hoped my awful experience on the Dartmouth campus was an isolated incident. To my surprise, however, too often at this school did I witness others, as well as myself, go to class, prepare for exams and get extra help, yet still do poorly. Thus, is it truly fair to blame a student for every low grade he or she may receive? Sure, some people may not try their hardest, and in turn, deserve the grades that reflect their lack of effort. But there are also problems on campuses like UMass' in which professors are not putting in their 100 percent: a problem that ultimately proves debilitating to a student's GPA.

In an article for Indiana University's "ERIC Clearinghouse on Reading, English, and Communication Digest," contributor Roger Sensenbaugh stated that a connection exists between both a professor's communicative and non-communicative behavior in a college classroom and his or her students' success. Without using creative teaching methods, interacting with students or showing a genuine interest in their education, professors are only setting up themselves, and their pupils, to fail.

For how can students possibly learn if we are spoon-fed book material, but then tested on information never taught? How can our papers receive good grades if a professor does not clearly outline grading guidelines to his or her TAs? Sure, many professors have earned higher degrees, such as a PhD and may be experts in their field, but they should not forget, first and foremost, they are still teachers.

Obviously, there are many professors at this school who do their job well. It is also unrealistic for any teacher in a large lecture to have an effect on each person individually. I am just tired of hearing the line "My professor knows what he is talking about; he just can't teach it." If these individuals got more involved in their lessons, made sure their grading was fair and actually took the advice of student evaluations, maybe we would se an overall improvement. Students should not have to settle for a low-grade just because they could not master their professor's test-taking and paper-writing techniques. Just as we prepare for class, professors looking to be effective educators should be doing their homework, too.

Becky Martins is a Collegian columnist.

Getting out of UMass

Duncan Devlin

As the semester winds down, I urge you to take a look around. The snow sits lightly on the trees and grass, class attendance has dwindled to its lowest, finals are approaching and we will be returning home soon. I have only one thing to say on that final subject: Thank God.

We have been trapped together on this campus for over three months, and I am not the only one who is just plain sick of it. Those little breaks during the semester do not give any justice to the true meaning of escape. After any weekend off, the dorm room always awaits your less-than-triumphant return, as friends quickly absorb and forget your wondrous stories. Your roommate will still be sitting there, listening to the same music, reading the same books and playing the same video games. This time, it is the big one: a whole month away from this "community."

> I need to escape from the world of frowning faces too cold to be outside and too bored to stay inside.

Sure, we have created some great friendships, but it is just plain time to go. We all enjoy spending time with the good friends we have met here at UMass, but we see them more in a day than we saw childhood friends in a month. How many times can you hear the same goals, aspirations and Friday night plans before you want to lunge at someone with a number two pencil?

Occasionally, there is actually some learning of interesting stuff going on, but most of that ended in September. By now, we are all getting sick of our professors (with a few notable exceptions), hoping class will get out early and many people are strongly praising the fact that today is the last day of classes. The "weekend" is just a time when homework does not have the constant interruption of classes. As the cold weather settles down on New England, it is impossible to ignore the similarities dorm life shares with the prison system.

We go to class every day, do our work, eat en masse and then retreat to our dwellings with our cellmates, complaining of all the nothings that happened during the day, attempting to find something constructive to do with our free time, go to sleep and wake up the next day to do the same thing over again. It does not take too long for the words "class of 2009" to sound a bit too much like the end of a four-year sentence. You can only pass the same doors with the same once-clever post-it notes so many times before the first pangs of cabin fever begin to set in.

I know that a favorite part of going home for many people will be the food. For a whole month, no one will have to suffer through the smorgous-board of options in a cafeteria that cooks all the food for you, and does not even ask you to do the dishes. Oh, the sweet escape from unlimited soft-serve ice cream, pizza, salad, soup, soda, burgers and french fries will make this winter feel amazing.

Of course, my favorite part of escaping the place this winter will be the people. Everywhere I look: people. Everyone is caught up in his or her own little world, taking no notice of anyone around him or her, making attempts to be noticed, working to ace, pass or fail a course, hoping to get drunk, laid or stoned, talking on cell-phones and looking forward to the next nap, cup of coffee or some other fix. I need to escape from the world of frowning faces too cold to be outside and too bored to stay inside.

On a final note, there is one person that I will miss during the break: my girlfriend. Most anyone in a decent relationship has similar feelings. Two people spend every day together, and then do not see each other for a whole painful month. Here is some simple advice on such a subject: get over it. That person, if he or she truly loves you, will still be there when you get back. If the relationship goes successfully, you will see more than enough of each other in the next 40 years, and you will treasure those memories of a month of freedom.

So, as a parting note: get out. This January is a mini-summer break, and within the next four years, you will dream of such a time to sit back and enjoy yourself. As you depart, watch the campus get smaller in your rear-view mirror or from a bus window, and when those strange feelings that you might miss the place come to mind, floor it.

Duncan Devlin is a Collegian columnist.

The Collegian is hiring columnists for the Spring semester

Come down to the Collegian newsroom in the Evenings to apply!
Ask for Kristen.

Our unintended consequences

Ed Cutting

The Law of Unintended Consequences holds that well-intended people often create a far greater problem that they never even thought of. Asbestos was used for everything from floor tiles to insulation – and now has to be removed (at great expense) because it causes lung cancer. DDT was great, it eliminated Malaria in America – and nearly eliminated the Bald Eagle as well. Reformulated gasoline and public drinking water contaminated with MBTE is a more recent example of an unintended consequence.

Today the people seeking an immediate American pullout of Iraq, like the well-intended people who sought to create a better world with DDT and MBTE, simply fail to understand the unintended consequences that will follow from their actions, unintended consequences which have already been killing people for the past 15 years.

When Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait in 1990, the United States and the United Nations imposed economic sanctions and threatened the use of force. Had this been a credible threat, as Kennedy's was during the Cuban Missile Crisis, it might have been enough to solve the problem. But the vocal minority chanting "No Blood for Oil" made it appear that America was not behind that threat and it was ignored, with war being the only option left.

Had Bill Clinton done what was needed instead of what was popular, he may well have prevented the problems we now face. From the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center to other acts of terrorism throughout the world, his paper tiger response served only to embolden our enemies. America became known as a country that would run away, the American military restrained by political dissent at home.

The first war had ended with a truce; the United States agreed to not invade Bagdad and depose Saddam Hussein as long as he agreed to let the United Nations dispose of his chemical weapons. He didn't do this and proceeded to violate countless United Nations resolutions including some 16 Security Council Resolutions. The United Nations threatened "serious consequences" but having already subverted the "oil-for-food" program for his personal gain, Saddam Hussein wasn't worried about anything the United Nations said.

The French and Germans told him that America wouldn't invade, the American anti-war movement was misunderstood to represent a majority view here and George Bush's threats thus rang hollow. As the result of antiwar efforts, war became the only option.

Libya's Colonel Muammar Gaddafi gave up his nukes when we invaded Iraq because, as he expressed it to the British, he feared that he would be next. Indonesian rebels quickly made peace with the Indonesian government when they saw that we could have an aircraft carrier off their coast in two days. Credible threats of force often are enough, but they must be credible and the unintended consequence of the anti-war movement has been to make our enemies think that we aren't willing to use force.

> Maybe we shouldn't be in Iraq. Maybe George Bush shouldn't be our President – I despised Bill Clinton every much as many now hate Bush and I never really understood why he was bombing Belgrade but it was my flag too and political disputes have to end at the water's edge.

Maybe we shouldn't be in Iraq. Maybe George Bush shouldn't be our President – I despised Bill Clinton every much as many now hate Bush and I never really understood why he was bombing Belgrade but it was my flag too and political disputes have to end at the water's edge. In wartime, it is our duty to support our troops – and then debate the issues later.

If we pull out now, we will have the unintended consequence of a wholesale bloodbath as happened in Cambodia and Vietnam after we fled in '75. Go down to The Boulders and talk to some of the Cambodian refugees who survived Pol Pot's genocide. The Islamo-Fachist butchers of Bagdad will be no less bloodthirsty and we will have the killing fields, part deux.

Like Communism and Nazism, the carcinogenic ideology of Al Qaida has the potential to take root and become an even bigger threat than Hitler and Stalin combined. We can stomp it out over there – and we are doing a fairly good job of it – or we can pull out now with the unintended consequence of an even more bloody battlefield a few years hence. All that calling for a U.S. pullout will accomplish is emboldening the terrorists and create more bloodshed on both sides; the terrorists are killing both Americans and Iraqis in response to our domestic peace protesters.

Victory is the route by which the troops will come home; the sooner we win this war the quicker they can come home.

Ed Cutting is a UMass graduate student

The much-needed new pronoun

Ian Jones

If English is missing one thing, it's a gender neutral third person singular pronoun. It's hard enough to learn the language as it is. How hard could it be just to add one more pronoun?

The first thing that most people say to this is, "Hut what about 'it'?" Sure, that is a neuter third person pronoun, but rather insulting to use when referring to a person. Imagine, if you will, this conversation: "My cousin is coming to town." "When is it getting here?" That would be an appropriate way to talk about someone's dog, but isn't exactly the most flattering way to refer to a human.

Of course, there's also the trick of just using "they," the third person plural pronoun, which is gender neutral. This is not, inherently, a bad solution; there are a lot of cases in which it works very well. Unfortunately, it also leads to number confusion when "they" refers to a single person. It might make sense contextually, but can add implications that the one person being referred to is actually not just one person, for example, "And your friend, what did they say?" It almost sounds like that one time back in high school when your mom accused you of having a party while your parents were away.

So, another popular solution is to use "he or she," or the ever-popular "he/she." The weaknesses of this one should be pretty evident right away. It's clumsy, awkward and it takes up a lot of needless space. It also isn't much of a solution. If anything, its ungainliness highlights the fact that English does not have a good way to talk about a single person of undetermined gender.

It seems like the easiest solution to this, really, is just to come up with a brand new word. My favorite has always been "thon," a contraction of "that one." It actually isn't "brand new" in any sense of the words, though. It was originally proposed in the 1850s, and was in Webster's in 1910. It solves the problem, and aside from that it's pretty fun to say, although it's easy to argue that if it hasn't been accepted in the 150 years since it was first proposed, it probably isn't going to happen.

> ["Thon," a contraction of "that one"] solves the problem, and aside from that it's pretty fun to say, although it's easy to argue that if it hasn't been accepted in the 150 years since it was first proposed, it probably isn't going to happen.

Several other words have also been proposed, and most of them involve fun combinations of letters that don't lend themselves to easy pronunciation "hir," for example. Most of them are also good solutions to the problem, but still come across as clumsy – I'll even admit that "thon" is guilty of this. It also isn't easy to get people to actually use these words. So far, they're really nothing more than academic suggestions.

So why come up with a new word, then? The words we have now have worked for us, and the language obviously isn't lacking enough to make anyone want to adopt a new set of pronouns. Really, the clumsiness of "he/she" isn't a big deal, although it can be annoying to read something that uses it a lot. There just doesn't seem to be a huge need to come up with a new pronoun, right?

I was in a Language and Gender class several semesters back, and this question was one that we addressed toward the end of the course. The problem with he and she does not only come from the sexism of the language, but the problem with a binary model of gender in general. Luckily, "Rent" has come out recently, and provides a fantastic example of this. One of the characters, Angel, is transgender, and in one scene Mark stumbles over which pronoun to use, alternating quickly between "he" and "she."

This was the problem that we came up with in the class, as well. Using "he or she" solves the problem when referring to a person whose gender is not known, but what about a person whose gender defies categorization? It would probably be a bit offensive to refer to a transgender person as "he or she" if you know what person you are talking about.

It's easy enough to say that the system needs some work, but it's near impossible to actually change a language, especially when the language has been naturally resisting that change. If anything, maybe it's our society's concept of gender that needs to change before the language can. But with any luck, there will be a day when I can say "thon" without someone asking me what the hell I'm talking about.

Ian Jones is a Collegian editor

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ABORTION: GET YOUR FACTS STRAIGHT

I'm writing this in response to the Monday, Dec. 12 letter to the editor by Al Dilascia. I'll admit, I was pretty enraged when I first read this letter, and I wanted to respond by writing just as Al did in his/her letter "Abortion is Murder" – with my emotions. I soon realized, however, that the only way to respond effectively to Al's accusations is with facts about the realities of abortion and how it affects the women who choose to undergo the procedure.

Al's right in stating that the medical profession has published a great deal of medical fact on prenatal conditions. Here are some examples: "(Anti-choice activists claim) that the 12-week fetus experiences pain. In reality, the brain and nervous system are still in a very early stage of development. Most brain cells are not developed. Without a cerebral cortex (gray matter covering the brain), pain impulses cannot be received or perceived."

And, according to the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, "...we know of no legitimate scientific information that supports the statement that a fetus experiences pain early in pregnancy. We do know that the cerebelum attains its final configuration in the seventh month and that myleinization (or covering) of the spinal cord and the brain begins between the 20th and 40th weeks of pregnancy. These, as well as other neurological developments, would have to be in place for the fetus to receive pain. To feel pain, a fetus needs neurotransmitted hormones. In animals, these complex chemicals develop in the last third of gestation. We know of no evidence that humans are different."

According to those published medical facts, the fetus feels nothing during first and most second term abortions. Let's look at some more: "In 1965, when abortion was still illegal nationwide except in cases of life endangerment, at least 193 women died from illegal abortions, and illegal abortion accounted for nearly 17 percent of all deaths due to pregnancy and childbirth in that year. In 1973, the risk of dying from an abortion was 3.4 deaths per 100,000 legal abortions. Today, the death rate from abortion at all stages of gestation is 0.6 per 100,000 procedures."

Legalizing abortion saved lives. Why? Because women with unwanted pregnancies are going to terminate them, whether it's legal or not. What does legalizing it do? It means those women won't kill themselves in the process. Are you concerned about late-term abortions? Well, here's another fun fact: "In 1973, only 36 percent of abortions were performed at or before eight weeks of pregnancy. Today, 88 percent of all legal abortions are performed within the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, and 59 percent take place within the first eight weeks of pregnancy. Only 1.4 percent occur after 20 weeks."

Why, what happened in 1973? Oh yeah ... abortion was legalized. Want to prevent late-term abortions? Keep it legal. Women who choose to have abortions are also more likely to use contraception afterwards than women who don't, which prevents against future unwanted pregnancies and the spread of disease.

Well, those are some facts about life and death, something Al seemed very keen on. Here are some facts about how legal abortion affects something else pretty important to me — and Al too, I'm guessing — family values. "A recent study documents the negative effects of unwanted childbearing on both the mother and her family. Women who have had unwanted births sustain lower quality relationships with all of their children, not only the child resulting from an unwanted birth. These lower quality relationships translate into socialization problems for the children, affecting their development, self-esteem, personality, educational and occupational attainment, mental health and marital relations.

Mothers with unwanted births are substantially more depressed and less happy than mothers without unwanted births. Possible mental health consequences of unwanted childbearing also include less shared leisure time with children and more physical punishment, such as spanking. Children of women denied abortion have more genetic malformations than average; have insecure, divorce-fraught childhoods; perform worse at school; have more psychosomatic symptoms; are often registered with welfare officials; and often need psychiatric treatment." Oh, and not surprisingly ... compared to pro-choice states, anti-abortion states spend far less money per child on a range of services such as foster care, education, welfare and the adoption of children who have physical and mental disabilities."

Want to check my facts? All the quoted material is from the web site www.planned-parenthood.com/pp2/portal/media/factsreports.com

Get the facts straight. If you're going to argue against abortion, at least quote someone who supports the use of contraceptives. The opinions of religious leaders do not give you the right to accuse women who have made choices to better the lives of themselves and their families of murder.

Christa Sanders-Fleming
UMass student

ABORTION IS A RIGHT

In response to Al DiLascia's recent letter to the editor, titled "Abortion is Murder," I'd like to make a few simple points.

I honestly cannot get the right wing's "right to life" argument straight. It seems to me that it's filled with more lapses in logic than Ray Romano's standup act. "Right to life," or as I like to call it, anti-right to choose, has been an ardent conservative stance ever since Roe v. Wade was written into the constitution. The grounds of this stance were highlighted in DiLascia's letter.

The main problem with DiLascia's argument, however, is not that it is without support and reason — it has plenty of both. The problem is that the support and reason that it utilizes is, shall we say, a bit of a crackpot line of logic. This is characteristic of all the numerous pro-life mantras: "A child is being killed." "A nation is killing its children." "The killing of a child will never be acceptable." Oh wait, did I say numerous mantras? Make that, one mantra.

There are obvious reasons why this single line of logic does not fly, with the most obvious reason being that term "fetus" is "purposely used to avoid any recognition of human life." Actually, it's something which we often refer to as a medical term — a fetus is not called a child because a fetus is not a child. When you go to the grocery store to buy ingredients to bake a cake, are you buying entire chickens to put into that cake? No, you're buying eggs. Don't let a radical right winger tell you there's no difference between a chicken and an egg. (If you do, you'll end up with one hell of a bizarre cake.)

That's not to say that there is no emotional weight placed on the shoulders of a woman who needs to decide between having an abortion or continuing her pregnancy. Radical conservatives would love for America to think that every woman who steps into an abortion clinic is a cold-blooded murderer. What about those women who are victims of rape? Should they be forced by society to raise the child of their rapist? How about incest victims? Thirteen-year-old girls?

Another favorite of the right wing is the late-term abortion. This is, admittedly, more extreme than conventional, early-term abortions. However, once again, pro-life advocates want to misconstrue the facts — doctors who perform late term abortions do so only when the pregnancy puts the life of the mother or the child at very serious risk. It's not simply a case of a wild, promiscuous woman who gets knocked up and in her third term of pregnancy and then says to herself, "Hey, I think I'm going to kill my partially-developed child now." Though, that's what they'd like you to think.

The overall "right to life" argument seems to be based on one very simple, very straightforward sentiment. That human life is precious and should always be preserved. Fair enough. What blows me away about this, however, is that conservatives can't even stick to that one mind-numbingly simple principle. When it comes to abortion, conservatives say we should save children. Even if women are victims of rape, and even if thousands of children are born into poverty in America everyday — who cares. Save them. But then, when it comes to capital punishment, the right wing is relentless in its executions of convicted murderers. Even if these individuals were wrongly accused, or have clearly been rehabilitated (after all, is jail truly about punishment, or is it about reform?) — who cares, kill them. And the Iraq War? You want to talk about innocent children being killed everyday?

The fact is it's quite typical of radical right wingers to create a line of logic, such as, "life is precious," and to conform to and break away from said logic whenever it is convenient for them. Abortion is not "evil." It is a woman's right. And as for DiLascia's claim that there are attempts underway to take his "God" out of every aspect of American life — is that supposed to be a bad thing? Throughout history, the Catholic Church has brought injustices upon the people of this Earth — from denying obvious scientific truths (i.e. Galileo, Darwin), to the oppression of gays and the sexual abuse of innocent young children.

It's about time for the radical right to wake up and recognize that social change cannot be avoided. Slavery has ended. African Americans can vote. Homosexuals are beginning to gain the right to marry. Women have acquired the right to choose. The Catholic Church is an archaic institution that has become nothing more than a symbol of times gone by. It is no longer socially relevant. After all, it was Pope John Paul II who said, "It is unbecoming for a cardinal to ski badly."

Try as they might, the radical right should have a hard time getting Roe v. Wade overturned. The Constitution (and the modification of it) is supposed to be about protecting the American people and their rights. Roe v. Wade is about protecting the rights of American women. If this is overturned, then anything is possible — why not then take away the rights of African Americans and of women to vote? Haven't we experienced enough social injustice in this country, at the hands of radical conservatives? Let's learn from America's past mistakes and finally turn this country into the land of freedom and equal rights that so many people declare it to be.

Michael Dennis
UMass student

LEGALIZING PROSTITUTION NOT THE ANSWER

I was absolutely appalled to read Ben Gaines' column on Dec. 13 ("Liberty demands prostitution"). It shocks me that any well-educated individual at a progressive and liberal university could support prostitution on any grounds.

Mr Gaines argues that by legalizing prostitution, society will be better-off. He claims that legal prostitution, at "government-run brothels" (can you imagine the Bush version of a brothel?) would somehow magically cure the ills of society. If we make prostitution legal – at safe, controlled, regulated houses – there will be no more dirty prostitution, no more street walkers, no more child prostitutes, no more pimps.

Mr Gaines' vision for the future is a beautiful dream indeed, and utterly flawed.

The reason prostitution is "the oldest profession" is because men have been exploiting women for millennia. In the United States, many social liberals have grandiose fantasies about empowering women and cleaning up the system through regulation and changes in social perception. But that isn't what actually happens. In nations with legalized prostitution, women are exploited by pimps under the protection of the law: after all, prostitution is legal, so these people don't even show up on the radar.

Legalization doesn't solve the biggest problem with prostitution: exploitation. Prostitution in the real world isn't like "Pretty Woman"; it's cruel, oppressive, abusive and unjustifiable.

Instead of fighting for legalized prostitution, we should fight to end it entirely. People shouldn't be pressed by extreme poverty or human trafficking into sex work. We should prosecute pimps and imprison anyone who coerces anybody into prostitution. We should stop dreaming of a world where government-regulated brothels house well-paid, unionized prostitutes for the casual encounter with a friendly and honest John. We should face the truth: there are serious problems caused by prostitution and instead of trying to make them legal, we should eradicate them.

Christopher Caton
UMass student

Think you got skills? Prove it!
Write for Ed/Op!

e-mail editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

By JACK MATHEWS
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

The review of "King Kong" that appeared in the March 7, 1933, edition of Daily Variety called the fantasy-adventure a goofy yarn "about a 50-foot ape who goes for a five-foot blonde."

That pretty much describes Peter Jackson's remake, though Naomi Watts — who takes over for 5-foot-3 Fay Wray as Depression-era actress and ape bait Ann Darrow — stands 5-foot-5.

But where 1933 moviegoers were warned by Variety's critic that they would have to forgive the film's "machine-like movements" and "phony atmosphere," you are advised to buckle your seat belt.

Jackson's Kong — the giant ape, his athletic movements and his lush Skull Island habitat — are as authentic as a heart attack, which is the risk you take in joining him. Watts, thankfully, does not scream as loudly or as often as Wray, but audience members are likely to fill the void.

"What a movie!"

This is how the medium seduced us originally, and this is what it's going to take if it's to fend off its high-tech 21st-century competition.

And a New Zealander is leading the way.

Jackson's "The Lord of the Rings" trilogy captivated audiences worldwide, and "Kong" — using the same combination of live actors, performance-capture and computer animation — keeps the adrenaline flowing.

The $200 million-plus spectacle is funny when it wants to be, exhilarating when it needs to be and a sentimental triumph at the end.

Its emotional power is enabled by the convincing illusion of the ape himself. The face of the 1933 Kong was a static Halloween fright mask. The new one, computer-animated over a live performance by Andy Serkis (who served the same function for Gollum in "Rings"), is that of a living, breathing, thinking, [illegible] love-struck creature.

Kong comes with a history of violence, recorded in the scars that cover his body. As king of the time-warped and brutal Skull Island jungle, Kong has had to fight to earn his iconic status among the island's people, who have a built a massive wall between him and them, and who attempt to appease him with periodic offerings of sacrificial virgins.

It is on one of his pick-up runs to the sacrificial altar that Kong is brought up short by the sight of a writhing white blond. It's Ann Darrow, the fledgling co-star of a wildlife drama being filmed by legendary showman Carl Denham (Jack Black) and recently be-squeezed girlfriend of screenwriter Jack Driscoll (Adrien Brody).

For the next hour and 20 minutes of film time, Kong will fend off [illegible], and trigger-happy humans to keep his prize safe and in his possession. And she — unlike Wray's Darrow — will learn to appreciate having the big guy around when dinosaurs are snapping at her toes.

The sexual tension between Kong and Ann was actually stronger in the '33 version. There's nothing in the new one as bestially unseemly as Kong stripping away Ann's clothing and sniffing the shreds. (Or of him fondling her breasts, as he did to Jessica Lange in the best-forgotten 1976 version.)

But Kong's love is not unrequited, either. Jackson, who wrote the script with his "Rings" collaborators Fran Walsh and Philippa Boyens, has opted for a more traditional beauty-and-the-beast love story, altering Ann's point of view from terrorized lamb to earth mother.

The bond that's formed between her and the ape in the jungle pays off big-time in the climactic scenes in New York, where, after Kong's disastrous Broadway debut as the Eighth Wonder of the World, he takes her and climbs the Empire State Building looking for the safety he had found with her on Skull Island.

It is the corniest, craziest — and possibly most heartbreaking — screen moment of the year.

As spectacular as Kong and the jungle scenes are, the film's greatest physical wonder may be its re-creation of Depression-era Manhattan. Showing Times Square in period dress and in full color, with hundreds of cars on the streets, seems an impossible feat. And the aerial images above the Empire State Building, against the city's earlier, shorter skyline, are breathtaking.

There are minor flaws to note. Though Watts finds a perfect blend of credulity and passion, Brody is completely miscast as Jack Driscoll, and Black's offbeat comic moves are too contemporary for the period. Also, some of the action sequences — and the expanded ensemble of monsters — overreach. But this is, don't forget, a goofy yarn about a super-size ape who falls for a blond — which is to say, anything goes, and everything is movie magic.

WILL THE REAL 'KONG' PLEASE STAND UP?

By HANH NGUYEN
ZAP2IT.COM

LOS ANGELES — When director Peter Jackson was 9 years old, he fashioned a model of King Kong from his mum's fur stole. Three decades later, he's once again recreating the cinematic gorilla, but this time using digital technology for his remake of "King Kong."

The Kiwi filmmaker gave Kong a more realistic makeover, in deference to today's savvy audiences that have benefited from Dian Fossey's work and Animal Planet programming. He's now a silverback gorilla, an adult male of the species, with a distinct patch of hair on his back, large canines, lean muscles, a "beer belly" and a sagittal crest — the elevated ridge along his skull that gives him a Don King-type air.

The folks at New Zealand's Weta Digital and Weta Workshop — the Oscar-winning company that helped create Jackson's "Lord of the Rings" effects and creatures — exercised their moviemaking license on a couple of zoological aspects though.

"Kong had to be iconic. He had to stand up at the Empire State Building to be able to beat his chest, which real gorillas can't do," says senior visual effects supervisor Joe Letteri. "So we built a quadruped gorilla that was as accurate as possible to do everything a real gorilla could do, but we did modify it because he still had to be Kong in the end."

Also, Kong isn't exactly anatomically correct in the reproductive department. This lack is fairly apparent on a 25-foot gorilla on the big screen.

"If you look at a real gorilla, it's always covered with fur anyway," says Letteri. "So to go through all that trouble and cover it with fur, and do all those calculations is pointless."

Besides being a movie star, this version of Kong has a distinct look that sets him apart from his non-showbiz brethren.

"(He has) the atrophied side to his face, snaggletooth, the genetically deformed jaw, the broken elements to his body," explains Richard Taylor, the head of the film's creatures, miniatures and special makeup. "This Kong is branded to this film in a very iconic way so that he isn't any old gorilla. He is definitely our Kong."

The creation of Kong wasn't just left up to digital effects and artists, however. Andy Serkis, the actor who performed Gollum in Jackson's "Rings" trilogy, was brought in to provide Kong's physical movements and expressions, which would be translated to the digital creature via motion capture technology. In keeping with the realistic approach, Serkis studied actual primates in London's Regent's Park Zoo and in Rwanda with the Dian Fossey Gorilla Fund International.

"They stand their ground and they're very rigid. They strut and rise up and they beat their chests with open hands — as opposed to clenched fists, which they did in the original "King Kong" — because they have inflated chest sacs, which when they hoot, open up and it sounds like a drum," recalls Serkis. "They beat their hands 17 times a second, very fast. That can be quite scary, but it's all bluff; it's all display — unless you transgress that, and then you're a fool."

Unlike his performance as Gollum, Serkis had no dialogue to convey Kong's emotions and had to rely on gorilla vocalizations.

"They sing, they chuckle, they have very specific ways of communicating within a group. And just the breath, actually," says the actor.

"The sound is linked to the physicality; the chest expands and contracts. You'd have that breath happening for real and being recorded. It was enhanced of course. It was beefed up and very amazing things are done with the original sound that I made."

For the numerous scenes in which Kong picks up the human female protagonist Ann Darrow, Serkis found himself playing with dolls.

"I had several different Barbie dolls weighted with lead shot," he says. "I also had a slightly more malleable one, sort of a rag doll weighted with lead shot that I could actually push with my fingers and pick up so there's some weight."

When Serkis wasn't providing the motion capture performance he aided Naomi Watts, who portrays Ann, by giving her some one to react to off-camera since her scenes with Kong would later be created in post-production. To get the proper gorilla movement down, he wore a special muscle suit, primate dentures and fake sagittal crest that helped him reach his inner ape.

After nearly two years of being Kong, Serkis has a handle on why the gorilla is a sympathetic, larger-than-life personality.

"He as a character is changed transformed by Ann and years and years and years of this suppressed socialized behavior. Although it's in gorillas' innate desire to connect with other beings, he's just not used to it," says the actor. "Someone once described him and I think it's a quite cool way of looking at him. He's an old, psychotic hobo."

"King Kong" swings into the [illegible] worldwide on Wednesday.

Staying healthy and stress-free during finals

Finals week and the few weeks leading up to it is probably the worst amount of time in any student's life. You realize all at once that you only have a week to read a semester's worth of material in each class and those ten-page papers aren't going to write themselves. And with all that going on, you still have to continue on with your normal routine of eating, socializing with friends and attending those seemingly useless classes. If this sounds like you, welcome to the club — you are not alone during the most stressful event of the semester.

When major and sudden changes occur during any point of time, like during final exam time, many people go through a feeling of stress. Stress can be defined as a person's response to any situation or event that requires adjustment or change. And as predicted from this definition, stress is apparently at its highest during finals.

When talking about stress, many often think of it only in terms of negative terms, but stressors can be positive as well. Dr. Harry Rockland-Miller, director of the UHS Mental Health Division, says, "Stress is actually good, as stress can motivate and direct us towards a goal. It is distress that we have to look out for, which happens when there is too much in demand." So next time you receive a bad grade on an exam or paper, see this stress as a good thing as you will work harder to achieve a higher grade on the next one.

Exam anxiety, especially during final exams, is definitely named the most often in a typical student's life when talking about stressors in college. Much of the time, this is when many students realize that there will not be another chance to redeem themselves in the class. This realization often leads to mental and physical exhaustion after a study overload for these final exams, and this often leads to sickness. But sickness during demanding times like this is actually often caused by stress. In a more biological explanation, stress causes the levels of one of the important antibodies, immunoglobulin A (IgA), in our bodies to decrease. This means that we have fewer antibodies to fight any antigens or viruses that might show up in our body. That would explain why so many people seem to get sick during the midterms and the finals. In fact, two-thirds of doctor visits are stress related and over 750,000 people die each year due to stress related diseases.

But there are some things that you can do to keep the final exam stress to a minimum and keep the sickness away. "The basic rule for stress management during final exams is to not have a big change," says Dr. Rockland-Miller. "What occurs with many people is that they just stop doing what they used to do before." After all, remember that stress is caused when a big change occurs in your life. Some things that Dr. Rockland-Miller suggests is taking a walk to relax, talking over some stress-related issues to friends and getting enough sleep (what he recommends is six to eight hours).

Time management is a key concept when you are feeling stressed out. Before you start out the day, write out what you need to do for that certain day and prioritize when you can. Make sure not to overdo yourself, as the things that you don't do will carry on to the next day, leading to procrastination. The more things you do now, the less amount of work you'll have to do and remember doing later on.

Learning to control the amount of stress in your life will be a good skill in the long run, as stress does not only occur in college, but it's everywhere around you in life. Be sure to eat a balanced diet, which might be extra hard to do during exam times. A quick fix like a burger and soda might be tempting, but in the end all those fat and sugar intakes will cause burnouts and empty calories. Treat yourself right with a lot of low fat protein and colorful vegetables and fruits. Also, be cautious with alcohol and caffeine. They might seem like the best solution to stress, but they will often leave you with even more to stress about when you are exhausted the morning after.

When confronted with stress, just take a big breath and change all those thoughts of "I can't" to "I can." Remember that you can only do so much with your time and that this is the best that you can do. For more tips on stress management or to talk about your personal concerns about stress, contact the UHS Mental Health Division, located at 127 Hills North, at 545-2337, or the Center for Counseling and Academic Development, located at the Berkshire House, at 545-0333.

- Mindy Jimanowan is a Collegian Columnist

He was more than important, he was funny

By JOHN ROGERS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES (AP) — It is one of those indelible images from the late 1960s that remains locked in the minds of those who were there.

It's a comedy album photograph of a nearly naked Richard Pryor, dressed in a loincloth, with bones through his nose and beads around his neck like a stereotypical African bushman from an old "Tarzan movie."

But there is a glare on the comedian's face on 1968's "Richard Pryor" album that seems to say, "I'm here and I'm going to change your thinking about race relations in every way possible."

That's what Pryor, who died Saturday of a heart attack at age 65, did for people all across America in the 1970s, his breakthrough decade and a time when the country was hotly divided not only by the Vietnam War but by the civil rights battles of the 1950s and '60s that preceded it.

He did it by bringing black and white audiences together to laugh as one, at least for the length of a concert or a comedy album, at the madness all around them.

"He was a brilliant and incredibly courageous performer," recalled humorist Paul Krassner, whose magazine "The Realist" once published an essay by the comedian commenting on the disproportionate number of black soldiers that seemed to be fighting the Vietnam War. Pryor headlined it, "Uncle Sam Wants You, Nigger."

It was a word he would use frequently in the 1970s, even using it in the name of his second album as he tried to take the sting out of the epithet by repeating it over and over.

After a visit to Africa in 1980, however, he would renounce it and say he no longer wanted to hear the word, either from his "hip white friends" or his fellow blacks. A subsequent recording was titled "That African-American is Still Crazy," with the offending word crossed out.

Such upfront, no-holds-barred, socially conscious commentary won Pryor the admiration of seemingly every black comic who followed him, an admiration perhaps best summed up by Keenen Ivory Wayans, who once said Pryor demonstrated "you can be black and have a black voice and be successful."

Pryor's comedy also drew equally warm reactions from white comedians, including Bob Newhart, who on Saturday called Pryor "the single most seminal comedic influence in the last 50 years."

Although he was not the first comedian to liberally use the N-word or the F-word or any number of other once-unspoken-in-public words, Pryor seemed to use them to greater comedic effect than anyone else. When he was at his best he was not just funny, he was laugh-out-loud, falling-down, tears-in-your-eyes funny.

Twisting and writhing his body into any number of contortions, Pryor would switch effortlessly from accent to accent as he told stories that made fun of every ethnicity and nationality he'd encountered.

In one of the routines from his classic 1981 performance, "Live on the Sunset Strip," the comedian recalled working for a Mafia-run nightclub that wasn't paying him the money it had promised. Grabbing a gun and doing "my best black shit" he tried to rob the club owner, only to find that his performance, one that he recalled "usually scares" the average white person, provoked only laughter from an Italian-American mobster.

"Do it again, Rich, put the gun up here," he had the mobster telling him before going on to regale Pryor with stories of all the people he'd rubbed out. Like Bill Cosby, Pryor would often draw on such personal experience for his comedy, but his material was far darker.

The life he lived provided him a wellspring of material. Raised in a Peoria, Ill., brothel that was run by his grandmother, he would grow up to be not only the highest paid black entertainer in the country in the 1980s but one of the most troubled as well.

"I was a drug-addicted, paranoid, lonely, sad and frustrated comedian who had gotten too big for his britches," Pryor, who had gone into seclusion in recent years as he battled multiple sclerosis, said in the liner notes to the 2000 album, "And It's Deep Too!"

Among other things, he shot up a car in 1978 while two of his wife's friends were sitting in it. In 1980, he nearly burned himself to death while freebasing cocaine.

He would go on to joke about both incidents, noting of the first that he put down the gun when the police arrived because he knew they would be far more likely to shoot a black man than a car. Returning to the stage after the cocaine incident, he struck a match, waved it in front of his face and said, "What's this? Richard Pryor running down the street." He could also do broader comedy, a talent that was displayed clearly in his best nonconcert films, "Silver Streak" and "Stir Crazy" with Gene Wilder. He even handled the occasional dramatic turn well, and he won an Emmy as a writer for one of Lily Tomlin's TV comedy specials.

But standup, where he was left unbridled by censors, would become his legacy and win him five Grammy Awards for comedy album.

Fellow comedian Steve Martin noted upon Pryor's death: "By expressing his heart, anger and joy, Richard Pryor took comedy to its highest form."

Legendary comedian Richard Pryor passed away on Saturday. Pryor was famous for his edgy, racially-charged and profanity-filled stand-up comedy routines.

The perfect gift for your significant other

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

The holiday season is here. And if things are good with you and your honey, chances are that warm and fuzzy feeling isn't just from your jacket.

The drama ensues: what to get him? What to get her? Don't worry, I've got some ideas for you to get you thinking in the right direction, so nobody asks, "Are you sure you like it?"

For the man in your life, if you pay close attention to him, it's not too hard to figure out what to get him. First rule: figure out what he loves (besides you) and get him something along those lines.

He loves sports? Get him his favorite player's jersey (if he doesn't already have it), some of his favorite team's paraphernalia, Sirius satellite radio so he can listen to all of his favorite games anywhere or tickets. He's a music buff? Get him an accessory for his iPod or noise canceling headphones. He likes to drink? Get him a set of personalized beer glasses and fill them with his favorite candy.

If you haven't been together that long, guys usually appreciate the framed picture of the two of you, because it's not something guys will generally do themselves, and that way, if they get teased about it, they can say, "Dude, my girlfriend gave it to me," and he's off the hook. He likes to grill? Get him a grilling set, with sauces and grilling utensils. He's metrosexual? Get him a set of nice skin care products, or a nice sweater — but beware, especially if he's a better dresser than you. Watches are also nice gifts, but try to personalize it — if he's sporty, get it with a stopwatch. Sheepskin seat covers are a good idea if he's obsessed with his car.

What to get her? Most girls love jewelry. Remember, girls are princesses, and should be treated as such therefore they should have jewelry. Extra points if your get it engraved. She's obsessed with Sex and the City? Get her a cosmopolitan kit, or put one together yourself: Get a set of martini glasses, drink mix, a drink guide, a shaker and pink glass rimming sugar. If you don't give good massages, a gift certificate for a massage is always great. Your girl loves makeup? Get her a gift certificate from Stila or Sephora. She's the sentimental type? Get her the DVD of the movie you two first saw together. You can get her lingerie if you know her size, I would stay away if you're not sure—you buy too big or too small and you're toast. If she loves pictures, get her a new digital camera, or if she already has one get her one of those new printers that hook up to a digital camera.

Not afraid of being cheesy? Get her a silver frame with a picture of you in it. If you want to go all out, organize a weekend away. She's the sporty type? Get her lift tickets, or take the both of you snowboarding or skiing. Oh, and wrapping the present counts.

MP3 players are always a good gift for both sexes. Cologne and perfume are also always good gifts.

Gift no-nos: books (unless specifically asked for or part of another present), stuffed animals, CDs (unless it's part of something else).

Good luck with the gift buying, and remember, it is the thought that counts. Whatever you get, be sure it somehow shows you put a little extra thought into the gift. If you're single, then this is a good time to be glad you don't have to shell out the extra cash for gifts. There's another issue that comes up around the holidays: distance.

If you met your lover at school, then you may be faced with distance over winter break. If you're not too far apart, it won't be bad, but if it's a trip, it can be. Here's how to make it work. Guys, girls think of talking as a way of showing that you care about the person. Although you may be able to go for weeks without talking to a friend, think how mad your girlfriend would be if you did that to her. If girls do this to each other, it threatens the life of the friendship.

If you don't have time to talk for long on the phone because you're busy at night, make sure you're calling her just to say hi and chat really quick, and make sure she knows that you miss her. Girls: try to understand if the guy isn't talking to you as much as you'd like him to. Most guys simply aren't used to talking on the phone because they mainly use the phone to make plans (or to text you, of course). Both of you: split up the trips if you can. It will be a good test of the relationship; it will either make you realize how important the person is to you, or it will show if you've been drifting apart.

Email Hannah @ loversonly@gmail.com

LONG RADIO
Quality Sales, Service, and Installation
Audio
Video
Sattelite Radio
NAV
Remote Starter
Alarms
Radar Detectors
Lazer Detectors
Performace Parts
30 Russell Street Hadley, Ma 01035 413-584-3259

RAIN
Three Clubs / DJs Under One Roof! Party Till 2 a.m!
HOT BODY CONTEST
Every Thursday Night
18+ College Night
HOT BODY FINALS
Male/Female winner will walk away with $500 cash and prizes!!!
Doors open at 9:00pm
WET & WILD FRIDAYS
19 + for Ladies encourage
Doors open at 9:00pm
3 DJ's/Clubs Under One Roof
Party till 2am!
Now Hiring: Bartenders, Waitstaff, Promotions and Security Staff
10 Stearns Square - Springfield, MA 01103 - (413) 827-9000 - www.RainSpringfield.com

Delivery:
413.549.0077
Tel: 413.256.8923
413.256.8924
Fax: 413.253.1173
103 N. Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA
Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
Featuring:
• Vegetarian options
• Lunch Specials
• Sushi Bar
• "Light and Healthy" entrees
~ We Bring China Town to you ~
Semester Special
Bring in this ad and receive 10% off your total
*Cannot be combined with any offers, coupons or OCMP.
visit us at: www.pandaeastamherst.com

CASH FOR BOOKS!*

Get top dollar for your books at the University Store and Textbook Annex!

Enter to win $10,000 AND get 20% off your next purchase!

UMass Amherst
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

efollett.com bookstore network

*Current market value applies.
See store for details.

Hawkins leads UMass

SKIING from page 14

her to do even better," Rouleau said.

As the Minutemen and women move closer to the regular season, defending last year's USCSA Eastern Regionals championship will certainly be on their minds. Last year marked the first season in school history in which both the men and women's teams were regional champs in the same year. Led by the Hawkins siblings, UMass won their host carnival at Berkshire East, where the teams train, and then had several second place finishes en route to winning the ECSC finals

After the regional finals, the teams advanced to the USCSA Nationals, where the men placed 3rd overall. Hawkins led the team by sweeping the slalom and giant slalom events. He was the first American skier to accomplish the feat in over ten years. The women were led by Eliza Hawkins, who had the best finish for the women, placing 10th out of 89 skiers in the slalom. This year the teams will look to improve on last year's mark, and win the USCSA Nationals.

On another note, UMass is taking a one year break from hosting a carnival event during the regular season. For several years, UMass had hosted the UMass Carnival at Berkshire East. This year UConn will be hosting its first event in place of UMass. The UConn carnival will be the first regular season event, and will be held at Cranmore.

UM gets ready for 2005-06 season

By Ben Hodgkins
Collegian Correspondent

The 2005-06 Massachusetts men's track and field team kicks off its season over winter session with two meets. UMass will open on Jan. 1 at the New Hampshire Invitational in Durham, NH and then travel to Roxbury for the Boston Indoor Games on Jan. 27.

UMass finished last year's indoor season in fifth place at the Atlantic 10 Championship, scoring a total of 93 points. They are predicted to finish tied for fifth place with St. Joseph's this season, as voted upon by A-10 coaches.

The Minutemen will have to replace a few key athletes from last year's team, but looks upon its youth to step up and take over.

Sprints

UMass' top returning sprinters are Nathan Barksdale, Corey Draffen and James Godinho. Brandon Phillips and Ryan Logan are the top two 55-meter hurdlers on the team.

Barksdale, who is primarily a 200-meter and 400-meter sprinter, looks to be UMass' top threats in those events. Barksdale had a sixth place finish in last years A-10 Championship in the 400-meter with a time of 51.19 seconds. His best time in the 200-meters last year was 23.14 seconds, good for third on the team behind Corey Draffen.

Draffen is the top 55-meter and 200-meter sprinter returning. He ran a season best 6.72 seconds in the preliminaries at the URI Mega Meet in 2004.

Godinho is the top 500-meter runner for the Minutemen. In 2005 he set a school record in the 500-meter with a time of 1:02.98, which was also good enough to win him the 500-meter event at the New England Championship.

Logan returns to the Minutemen as its top threat in the 55-meter hurdles. He placed seventh at the A-10 Championships last season with a time of 8.08 seconds.

Phillips finished last season with a best time of 8.14 seconds in the 55-meter hurdles at the Reebok Boston Indoor Games. He finished in 10th place at the A-10 Championship with a time of 8.63 seconds.

Mid-Distance

Jon Korhonen, Wes Jones and Matt Clark highlight the returning Minutemen for mid-distance running

Korhonen was superb last year, clocking UMass' best time in the 1500-meter (4:01.05) and mile events (4:08.58). He finished second at the A-10 Championship in the one-mile run with a time of 4:14.15 and took home the New England Championship in the one-mile with a time of 4:08.58. Korhonen held the top four one-mile times for UMass last year.

Wes Jones returns this season after finishing sixth at the A-10 Championship in the 800-meter run with a time of 1:59.04. He was also part of the Minutemen's 'A' relay team that finished first at the A-10 Championships in the 4x800.

Matt Clark holds the fastest returning time for UMass in the 800-meter run, with a time of 1:57.75. He was also the second fastest runner in the 1500-meter with a time of 4:04.66.

Distance

Distance is especially strong for the Minutemen as they return all of their top finishers from a season ago in the 3000-meter and 5000-meter.

Sophomore Sean Calicchio is a thrower for the UMass men's indoor track team and will take part in the New Hampshire Invitational on Jan. 21.

Korhonen ran the fastest time for the Minuteman in the 3000-meter run, with a time of 8:24.06. In the A-10 Championship, Nils Fischer finished sixth (8:46.95) followed by teammate Ryan Corbett with a time of 8:47.79.

UMass' top 5000-meter runner is Andrew McCarron, who placed eighth at the A-10 Championship with a time of 15:12.76. He had the top three finishes for the Minutemen in the 5000-meter on the season.

Other strong runners returning for UMass in distance events are Ryan Corbett, Paul Noone, Matt Klypka and Walker Biner.

Jumps

Godinho and Draffen both return for the Minutemen, and look to have another great season.

Godinho finished with the top three times in the long jump, with a season best 22-feet, 1-inch. He finished fifth at the A-10 Championship in the long jump with a jump of 21-feet, 5.5 inches.

Draffen held the top two spots in the high jump, with a top distance of 6-feet, 3.5-inches. In the A-10 Championship he finished seventh with a distance of 6-feet, 1.25-inches.

Tyler Simpson placed 12th at the A-10 Championship with a high jump of 5-feet, 11.25-inches.

Logan is the only returning athlete with notable experience at the triple jump. He had UMass' seventh best distance of the season with a jump of 42-feet, 9-inches.

Throws

Sean Calicchio and Logan both return for the Minutemen in the shot put event. Last season Calicchio had UMass' top five throws, also placing second at the A-10 Championship with his best throw of the season (51-feet, 6.5-inches).

Logan's best throw of the season was 44-feet, 9-inches, which was good enough for fifth place at the A-10 Championship.

Minutewomen gear up to compete

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

Though its break will end earlier than that of other UMass students, the Massachusetts women's track and field team will finally have time to enjoy the holiday season over the upcoming winter break.

Since its last meet at the Northeastern Invitational on Dec. 3, the team has been limited to four practices, per NCAA rules, which puts a quota on how many workouts a team can have for the year.

UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said that even though the team practices have stopped for now, she will send the girls home on winter break with planned workouts that they are expected to do.

She said that once team practices restart on Jan. 16 it will have only four weeks to train for the Atlantic 10 Conference Championships, which are scheduled for Feb. 18. This makes it crucial for the Minutewomen to religiously follow their workout routine over break.

"If they're not dedicated it's going to hurt the team immensely, when they come back," LaFreniere said.

She also mentioned that the situation will be different for each girl, based on the climate in each one's individual hometown.

"Some may have access to an indoor track, while others may not," she said.

Lafreniere said it will be interesting to see if all the girls do their training, something that will show when team practices recommence, and it is imperative that the Maroon and White stay dedicated, to prepare for the Atlantic 10 Conference Championships.

However, track and field works differently than other sports in terms of how teams qualify for the A-10 Championships.

In sports such as soccer and field hockey, teams get eliminated from further advancement if their team record becomes poor enough. In track and field, on the other hand, all conference teams go to the A-10 Championships every year.

LaFreniere mentioned that she is expecting to see particularly outstanding performances during the rest of the season by a few specific girls.

Sophomore Christina DeRosa is coming off a stellar cross-country season, and started off track with a personal record, recording a time of 17:30 in the 5,000 meters. This qualifies her for the New England Championships, scheduled for Feb. 24 and 25, and the ECAC Championships, which, unlike the A-10 Championships, do require athletes to meet certain requirements.

Pole vaulter Kristin Bakanowski is a major contributor for the UMass women's track team. The sophomore won the A-10 Championships last season.

DeRosa is the only member of the team to qualify for the ECAC Championships, scheduled for March 4 and 5.

Sophomore Kristen Bakanowski, an "outstanding pole-vaulter," according to Lafreniere, and Senior Elisabeth Budd, 500-meter extraordinaire, are also expected to have banner years. They both qualified for the ECAC Championships last year, and LaFreniere suspects them to do it again this season.

However, the New England Championships and the ECAC Championships are a long way off. LaFreniere knows that her team must focus for their meet at Boston University on January 18th, 12 days before school's spring semester begins.

"I think we're entering into a new era for track and field at UMass," said LaFreniere. "It's going to take us a few years, we got a nice baseline with the athletes that we have, but I anticipate over the next few years to become much more competitive against New England powerhouses like Boston University and Boston College and UConn and URI.

CINEMARK
The Best Seat In Town
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
367 Russell St 413-587-4233
Schedule for Wednesday 12/14/05 - Tuesday 12/20/05
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
12/14/05 - 12/16/05
KING KONG (PG) 11:00 12:00 2:50 4:00 6:45 8:00 10:35*
CHRONICLES OF NARNIA (PG) 11:10 11:45 (NO 11:45 ON FRIDAY) 2:15 3:00 6:10 7:15 9:15 10:25*
SYRIANA (R) 11:20 (NO 11:20 SHOWON THURSDAY 12:20) (NOT EAST 4:05 7:10 10:05*
AEON FLUX (PG13) 11:40 2:05 4:30 7:35 9:55*
RENT (PG13) 11:05 4:15 7:25 10:20
PRIDE & PREJUDICE (PG) 11:25 4:10 7:05 10:00
JUST FRIENDS (PG13) 11:50 2:35 5:00 7:40 10:10
TOURS: MINE & OURS (PG) 11:00 1:15 3:30 7:00 9:15
HARRY POTTER & THE GOBLET OF FIRE (PG13) 11:00 3:30 7:00 10:20*
WALK THE LINE (PG13) 12:15 4:15 7:25 10:25
SENIOR SHOW 12/15 SYRIANA @ 9PM
12/16/05 - 12/20/05
THE FAMILY STONE (PG) 12:00 2:30 5:00 7:35 10:05*
KING KONG (PG) 11:00 12:00 2:50 4:00 6:45 8:00 10:35*
CHRONICLES OF NARNIA (PG) 11:10 11:45 2:15 3:00 6:10 7:15 9:15 10:20*
SENIOR SHOW 12/22 THE FAMILY STONE @ 9PM
FRIDAY NIGHT REWIND 1/6 TBA - MIDNIGHT
* NO PASSES NO SUPERSAVERS
Tickets & showtimes available at cinemark.com

Today's lecture: Massive savings.
Save your education discount to save on Apple products.
Check out the latest Apple products at your Apple Authorized Campus Store. For store information visit www.umass.edu/bkstr.com
University Store Campus Center
Students
Apple
UMass Amherst
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

D.P. Dough®
Delivers Calzones
The Pizza Alternative®
256 - 1616
96 North Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01003
Zone out at D.P. Dough!®
Monday - Wednesday 4pm - 2am
Thursday 4pm - 3am
Friday - Saturday 11:30am - 3am
Sunday 11:30 - 2am
Visa, Mastercard & OCMP accepted coupons online @ dpdough.com

Women's clothing, shoes and accessories
downtown Amherst www.zanna.com

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
- a grade dispute?
- teacher, roomate or job concerns?
- billing problems?
- harassment?
- ...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Conference play on tap for UM

M. HOOPS from page 14

el to New York City for the Panasonic Holiday Festival tournament at Madison Square Garden on Dec. 27 and 28. The Minutemen will face St. Peter's in the opening round, and depending on the outcome of that game, they will face either host St. John's or Columbia the following night.

The Minutemen will then have another week off before getting on the Mass Pike and heading east to Chestnut Hill to face Boston College on Jan. 3. The latest installment of the Commonwealth Classic, which began in the 1996-96 season, will pose a challenge for UMass as the Eagles are currently ranked No. 13 in the Associated Press poll.

UMass will look to build momentum during these four out of conference games heading into its first A-10 contest, a Jan. 7 clash with Duquesne (1-5).

Ford has targeted conference play as the point in the schedule that he hopes to have his team clicking. The Minutemen will be put to the test as they will play four road games against A-10 opponents in January.

UMass has struggled away from home this season, going 0-2 on the road and 0-1 at neutral sites. While the neutral site was essentially a home game, as UMass faced the University of Alabama at Birmingham at the MassMutual Center in Springfield, only the Mullins Center has been kind to the Minutemen thus far, as they are 3-0 on their home court.

If the Minutemen take care of business with Siena next week, their perfect home mark will be challenged when they take on Saint Joseph's on Jan. 11. The Hawks (4-2) have played a very difficult schedule, and have registered wins against Kansas and Drexel early on.

After Saint Joseph's, UMass will head to Saint Louis on Jan. 14 to take on the Billikens, a team in its first year in the A-10. Saint Louis (4-3) is expected to be a top team in the A-10 after making the move from Conference USA.

The Minutemen then return home for a mini-home stand, as they host Fordham on Jan. 18 and Temple on Jan. 21. Fordham (2-6) has got off to a slow start, but has lost four of its six games by 10 points or less. The Owls (5-2) feature one of the conference's top players in Mardy Collins. Collins is averaging 14.5 points per game this season.

UMass will end its break on the road, with a Jan. 25 game at Rhode Island (5-2) and a Jan. 29 game at LaSalle. LaSalle (5-0) touts the A-10's leading scorer in Steven Smith at 20.8 points per game.

With so many games to be played over the next month, students will arrive back in Amherst in late January with a much clearer picture of how the Minutemen's season will turn out.

KAREN WINOKUR – COLLEGIAN

Leading the team in scoring through the first six games, junior Rashaun Freeman put up 12 points against Boston University on Monday night.

UMass gets ready for Atlantic 10

W. HOOPS from page 14

Mullins Center. The Flyers are only one of the few teams above the .500 mark in the conference with a 4-2 record. Leading the way for Dayton is senior Cara Wright. Wright leads her team in scoring with 11.8 points per game, and is third in the A-10 in rebounding with nine boards per game.

Duquesne has a 3-4 overall record and is 2-1 at home this season. UMass will have to watch out for senior Aiga Bautre, who leads the team in scoring with 15.4 points per game. Her 15.4 points per game is also eighth in the A-10.

St. Bonaventure is one of the better teams in the conference with a 5-1 record, and will host the Minutewomen in Olean, N.Y. during the break. The Bonnies' leading scorer is senior Stefanie Collins, who is also tied for third in the A-10 in scoring with 17 points per game.

Rhode Island is another team below .500 with a 3-5 record. They will try to improve upon their 2-1 road record against the Minutewomen, but will need their best game from senior Tanya Rhodes. Rhodes is the team's scoring leader and is fifth in the conference with 15.7 points per game.

Charlotte is in its first year in the Atlantic 10, and so far, they have not disappointed, sporting a 5-3 record early on in the season. Leading the way is senior Sakellie Daniels. Daniels leads the team in scoring and is ninth in the conference with 15.4 points per game.

Richmond is not having their best year in 2005-06. The Spiders have got off to a 3-5 start, and will have a tough time beating the Minutewomen at the Mullins Center with a 1-4 record on the road.

George Washington is off to a 3-3 start and is led by senior Jessica Simmonds. Simmonds, who is the team's scoring leader with 10.5 points per game. She also is second in the A-10 in rebounding with 9.7 boards per game.

La Salle has a 3-4 record this season and will give UMass a tough game in January as it is undefeated at home thus far. The Explorers are led by junior Crista Ricketts. Ricketts leads the team in scoring and is tied for third in the conference with 17 points per game.

Temple will pose the toughest challenge for the Minutewomen in the A-10 as they are ranked No. 19 in the Nation. The 6-2 Owls are led by senior Candice Dupree, who is second in the A-10 in scoring with 17.1 points per game. She also leads the conference in rebounding with 9.9 boards per game, and in shot-blocking with 2.38 per game.

KAREN WINOKUR – COLLEGIAN

Patrycja Gulak, a 6-foot-4 senior, has started two contests for the UMass women's basketball team this season and is averaging two points per game. The Minutewomen will begin A-10 play this winter break.

Minutemen face plenty of tests ahead and Colorado College, shares the team lead with five goals and has a team-high nine assists and 14 points.

HOWE from page 14

The senior captain, who struggled a bit when Matt Anderson was lost to injury in December of last season, has members of the Washington Capitals – the NHL team that owns his draft rights – very happy that he stayed for his final year, and they have noticed the progress he has made from last season to this one.

POISED FOR A STRONG SPRING: Anderson, a junior who has suffered two season-ending injuries, has been good for three goals and four assists while playing in all 15 contests so far. As the team becomes more comfortable with the younger players growing accustomed to playing with the veterans, Anderson's numbers could skyrocket.

Perhaps the most offensively talented player in the locker room, Anderson has the ability to score 20 goals in this league. While that probably won't happen before this season is done with, a solid second half could highlight things to come when next year rolls around.

The same can be said about sophomore P.J. Fenton, who has struggled to score just one goal and dish out three assists. He may not live up to his point totals of his rookie season – 13 goals and 12 assists – but if he can show those flashes from a year ago, the Minutemen will be much deeper at an offensive level.

BIGGEST SURPRISES: The recruiting job Don Cahoon's coaching staff has done of late has been amazing, as this year's group has already been able to supercede the what last year's rookie class was able to accomplish. And next year's rookies are supposed to step in and contribute at a similar level.

Obviously, Quirk has done a stellar job in net and was tabbed as November's Hockey East Rookie of the Month for his services between the pipes, but the play of forwards Chris Davis and Cory Quirk shouldn't go unnoticed either.

Both were able to keep up with and, in some cases, out-skate the high-flying Eagles during the home-and-home this past weekend. Quirk has accounted for two goals and two assists while filling in nicely on the team's third line, and Davis' five goals are good enough to share the team lead with Werner. He was also responsible for the game-winning tally against Vermont, when UMass mustered just 11 shots in its 2-1 triumph.

Freshman Topher Bevis has chipped in with five assists so far, but he has been most valuable while playing a solid role on the blue line with captain Marvin Degon. Bevis' stay-at-home style of play mixes well with Degon's skating and shooting abilities, allowing the senior sniper to take a few more chances.

LOOKING AHEAD: Cahoon is optimistic that his team can put together a good second half since the Minutemen have so much young talent to mix with great veteran leadership, but they are what they are right now and that is a five-win team.

Before anything else, they need to improve on the power play, which has been anything but powerful. They are last in Hockey East with just seven power play goals and just a .091 conversion percentage. With three of UMass' losses coming by a single goal and two of more losses coming by a pair of goals (one due to a late empty-netter), the team's record could be much better with more production out of its special teams.

With the amount of mediocrity in the league this year, plus the poor overall play from Lowell, Northeastern and Merrimack, the Minutemen should have enough to qualify for the Hockey East tourney. If they do earn a spot to play spring hockey, they have Quick and senior Gabe Winer, the best one-two goaltending punch in the conference, the most important factor for a team looking to make a tournament run.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at JeffHowe@DailyCollegian.com.

Swimming teams will depend on captains tends to get fired up in practice and in meets, and is one of the hardest workers on the team. Local Amherst inhabitant Greg Chartier, perhaps similar to McDonough, tends to be the quiet one of the group.

SWIMMING from page 14

In the eyes of men's head coach Russ Yarworth, personality is a must in getting this team to win a sixth straight Atlantic 10 title.

"You want to have characters [on your team], definitely," Yarworth said. "You can't train the personality out of your kids. You've got to have personality – that's what creates champions. You've got to have an edge, got to have that simple thing."

With no seniors on the team – all three captains are juniors–big things have been expected out of the captains, especially with no assistant coaches on the men's squad this year. Like the women, the men have received stellar efforts from its large freshman class.

Through the first half of the season, Nate Bromage and Tristan Partridge have proven their worth in the pool with some outstanding times in the butterfly, freestyle and individual medley.

But here comes the twist.

UMass travels to San Juan, Puerto Rico on Jan. 7 for the Sacred Heart Invitational, which may seem like just another meet and a chance to soak up some beautiful water, dip one's toes in crisp sand and work on a tan. But it is here, on the Isle of Enchantment, where the first decisions on who will and who won't be going to February's Atlantic 10 Championships are made.

No doubt, feelings of rejection may come about. And while Yarworth sees the captains playing a part in keeping the team cohesive in light of cutoffs, he also sees a smooth transition.

"I think it's important that the kids who do make it are supportive of the ones that don't make it," Yarworth said. "And with the kids that don't make it, have a good attitude and don't internalize or mope about what's happened to them and not the team. Part of athletics is the good part and the bad part, when you don't make the cut. But you have to take that positively, and it's a good life lesson, because everything doesn't always work out for you."

KAMINS
SPECIALIZING IN HOUSE AND APARTMENT RENTALS
LOOKING FOR A PLACE TO LIVE?
PRESIDENTIAL APTS
COLONIAL VILLAGE APTS
PERRY APTS
177 N. PLEASANT ST
COLLEGE INN APTS
LANTERN COURT APTS
MILL HOLLOW
CRESTVIEW APTS
55 S. PLEASANT ST 253-2515 AMHERST

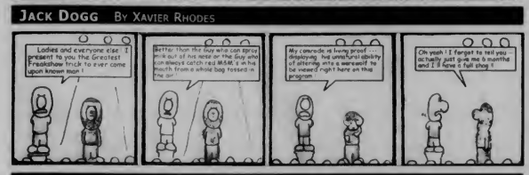
Bookzilla
Never get burned again
Sell back your textbooks through Bookzilla.com! It is a student exchange, so more back for your textbooks. Local and online. Go to www.bookzilla.com!

PARADISE OF INDIA RESTAURANT
Lunch Buffet all you can eat!
Saturday and Sunday only
87 Main St. Amherst, MA, 01002
(413) 256-1067

Bring this ad in for 1/2 off our panini!
Limit 1 per customer
Expires
Rao's Coffee Roasting Company
Killdeg Ave Amherst MA
413 253-9441

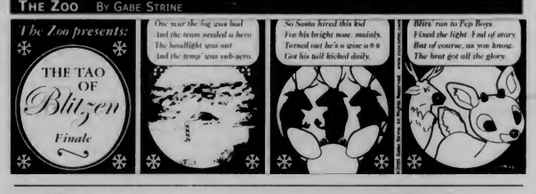
Write for sports
Contact sports @ sports@dailycollegian.com

CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS
Sell us your textbooks, whether purchased here or not.
Receive up to 50% of your purchase price.
JEFFERY AMHERST COLLEGE STORE
253-3870
Located between La Veracruzana and Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in Downtown Amherst



FUNCTIONAL DYSTOPIA By Zeid Rusan

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski



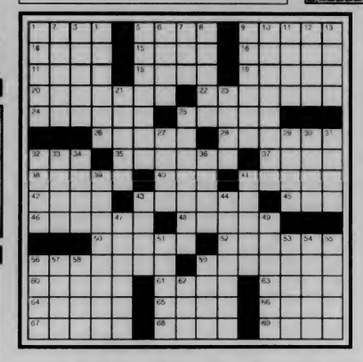
JACK DOGG By Xavier Rhodes

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

THE ZOO By Gabe Strine

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"It's too early. I never eat December snow. I always wait 'til January."



—A Charlie Brown Christmas

ACROSS
1 Computer
5 Burn slightly
9 Bondreader Shaw
14 Agitate
15 Burn
16 Squalid
17 News piece
18 "Born Free" lioness
19 Relative size
20 Bought bread and butter
22 Pronounced indistinctly
24 Harass
25 Take a long look
26 Wintry precipitation
28 Rang out
32 Byrnes or Rouen
35 Lawn tools
37 Duration
38 Computer printer?
40 Exist
41 Eagle's nest
42 Restless desire
43 Perfect goals
45 24-hr. cash source
46 Passed gossip
48 Leaves off the list
50 House toppers
52 Safe and sound
56 Perceptible by touch
59 Dodge model
60 WWII marauder
61 Carol's river
63 Net holders
64 Rounded swelling
65 Nickel or dime
66 ___ vera
67 Burn chaser?
68 Breaks off
69 City on the Aar

DOWN
1 Like fresh lettuce
2 Supple
3 Toast toppers
4 Entices
5 Recessed rank
6 Cargo area
7 Tummy muscles
8 Friars Club function
9 Make certain
10 Duplicate
11 Material flaw
12 Inactive
13 Checked out
21 Martinique volcano
23 Runners measures
25 Music systems
27 Mild expletive
29 Old Modena money
30 Send out
31 Consider
32 Middle Eastern leader
33 Overplay the TLC
34 Air vent
36 Paper quantity
39 Insufficiency
41 Fall bloomer
43 Fable god
44 Tunes in 47 Mill about
49 Kind of beetle
51 Boundary marker
53 Functional
54 Gossip bdbd
55 German city
56 Butter containers
57 Border (on)
58 Nat or Natalie
59 Finished a steal
62 Charged particle

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
DECEMBER SPECIAL!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight: • Cold Duck Complex
Thur: • 5th Pocket
Fri: • Irish Session
Sat: • Turbine
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20–FEB. 18
Do not attempt to use that vending machine. It will steal your money.

pisces FEB. 19–MAR. 20
You might want to reconsider venturing outside today.

aries MAR. 21–APR. 19
That baseball hat could really use a run through the washing machine.

taurus APR. 20–MAY 20
You owe a lot of people money and will soon have no friends.

gemini MAY 21–JUN. 21
Someone will give you a big bear hug today.

cancer JUN. 22–JUL. 22
If you weren't already aware, polar bears and penguins live at opposite poles.

leo JUL. 23–AUG. 22
You will make a very important decision this evening.

virgo AUG. 23–SEPT. 22
You will be doing a lot of last-minute shopping next week.

libra SEPT. 23–OCT. 22
Don't open your top desk drawer. It will only stress you out.

scorpio OCT. 23–NOV. 21
It is very likely that you will catch a cold in the next few days.

sagittarius NOV. 22–DEC. 21
You are obviously not a fan of musicals.

capricorn DEC. 22–JAN. 19
You watch entirely too much of the Game Show Network.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Winfield family. Large open floor plans 2 to 3 Bdrm Apts. Rent starting at $995.00 Call for Winter Special 256-0600

1 BR Near town,campus. Low utility cost $550/ month 413-586-0746

$380/month plus utilities. In Sunderland. Rebecca 302-359-1455

Spring Semester Sublet – Master bedroom in Pufflon Village, $461/ month plus cable/internet and electricity. Looking for a subletter Jan-May. Share apartment with two other roommates, partially furnished. Call 203-915-7679.

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 in to campus.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

PART-TIME POSITIONS Ideal for students or 2nd job $8.00 Hr. 20+ hrs/wk; Conduct surveys over the phone Hadley location NO SALES! Night & wknd shifts; PVTA accessible. RSW Recruiting Office 1-888-423-5381 or email: dhayes@retail-solutions.us

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Temping can Lead to Permanent Jobs! It's a matter of timing and being in the right place at the right time. Many employers are considering temporary workers for current openings in this area. It all depends on your attitude, flexibility, and work performance. We are seeking people who want to work right away and can fill in for short term, long term, and temp to perm positions! Clients use companies like Staffing Now to find skilled office and accounting people. Positions range between $8-12/hr. Call 413-529-7100 or www.staffing-now.com

EMPLOYMENT

Local Jobs for Winter Break $9.50 – 17 hr Evenings Sundays flexible Lots of hours available Near Campus & Downtown AmherstJobs@hotmail.com

Instructors/Performers P-T for fun after-school programs, parties and more. Experience managing groups of children. Love of kids, availability some afternoons. Theatrical experience helpful. Car required. (413) 584-7243

FOR SALE

Moving Boxes Best Prices Campus Center Concourse 12/12 – 12/14

FURNITURE FOR SALE

Bedroom / Study Set Must Sell! 413-222-5707

HOUSE FOR RENT

For January, 2-3 Bedroom house. Walking distance to Northampton Center, close to bus. 1,000 + utilities, no pets. Skibiski Realtor 586-1827

For January or February 3-4 Bedroom house, Northampton $1300+ utilities 774-218-9653

ROOM FOR RENT

One Bedroom Close to campus 2 Girls looking for Roommate. 400 plus utilities 973-580-6713 Jan – Aug.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Consider adoption. Free confidential counseling to help you make fully informed decisions for your baby and you. Choose your baby's parents, meet and stay in touch. Stable, loving two parent families waiting to adopt. Call 24/7 Brightside 1-877-777-7774 License # 1465107

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

TRAVEL

Alternative Spring Break Birmingham Cherokee, Mississippi Gulf Coast, NYC, 2 credits, umass.asb@gmail.com Apply Now.

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Happy Holidays and Good Luck with Finals!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 2005

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

No break for UMass

BY DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For most students on this campus, winter break entails a month of doing as little as possible while resting between semesters. Things will are slightly different for the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

While the Minutemen will put the books down for a month, they will certainly not be getting much rest during the break. After a 10-day layoff for finals week, UMass (3-3) returns to action next Thursday night to host Siena and will play 11 games over the break.

UMass ended the first semester with a strong showing on Monday night, downing Boston University 64-45 at the Mullins Center. With such a long layoff after the game, senior Jeff Viggiano felt it was important for UMass to play well against BU.

"It was important for us to play well and get a big win like that with such a big break coming up, because if guys struggled it would be on their minds throughout the break," Viggiano said.

The 10-day break between games is the second extended break the Minutemen have had already this season, and Viggiano said he is ready for an increase in games over break.

"[The layoff] is frustrating because games are fun," Viggiano said. "Practice is hard. We practice a lot, and when you get out on the floor it's just fun to play against different people in front of the crowd."

When the Minutemen take the court against Siena, it will be only their fourth game in a month, giving coach Travis Ford extra time to implement his system and work with the team.

"We need these next 12 days to get better, to learn our offense better and to learn to play defense for an extended amount of time," Ford said. "We have a long way to go."

KAREN WINGFIELD/COLLEGIAN

Junior Brandon Thomas is second on the UMass basketball team in scoring, averaging 10.3 points per game. The Minutemen will return to action on Dec. 23 when they take on Siena College at the Mullins Center.

One of the biggest bonuses for UMass about the first semester ending is that sophomore Dante Milligan becomes eligible. The 6-foot-9 forward, who has been sitting since transferring from Pittsburgh last January, will immediately bolster UMass' depth, as the team currently suits up only eight scholarship players.

Following the Siena game, UMass will play three games before beginning Atlantic 10 play.

The Maroon and White trav-

See M. HOOPS on page 12

Minutemen get their midseason evaluations

Jeff Howe

All things considered, it could have been a lot worse.

After stumbling hard out of the gate to lose seven of its first eight games, the Massachusetts hockey team (5-10-0 3-7-0 Hockey East) put together the best string of games the program has seen in two years by winning four of its next five contests – all in different ways and three of the four wins coming over nationally ranked opponents – to salvage the first half of its season.

With 10 tallies already in the loss column, the Minutemen are going to be hard pressed to receive an at-large bid in the NCAA Tournament, but with the way that the rest of the teams in Hockey East have struggled to play consistent hockey thus far, a very solid spring could definitely propel them into the top-half of the league standings, giving them a better chance to put together another late conference tourney run.

The Maroon and White have 19 games left on the plate once its 19-day winter break comes to a rest, and nine of those matchups (two in the UConn Holiday Classic, three against Lowell, two against Merrimack and two against Northeastern) are games that an upper-echelon team should win.

Out of the other 10 remaining contests, four of them (UNH, Boston College and Vermont twice) are at the Mullins Center, while the last six (UNH, Boston University twice, Providence and Maine twice) will be played outside of the Pioneer Valley.

In order to make such a leap in the standings and possibly get some national recognition, UMass needs to steal a few of those. Remember that the Minutemen only compiled a 13-23-2 record last year, so they'll need to win a minimal of nine games over the latter portion of the schedule to at least progress record-wise.

Things are looking good around the turn of the New Year, though. On Dec. 29, the Maroon and White play the opening round game in the UConn Classic against Bowling Green and, depending on the outcome of the other first-round game, will draw either UConn or Army in the championship or consolation round the following day.

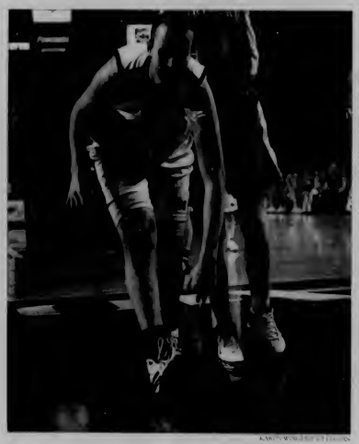
And on Jan. 6, UMass starts an eight-day stretch in which it plays a home-and-home with Merrimack and then heads to Lowell to take on the River Hawks. An optimistic sweep of these five games will land the Minutemen with a 10-10-0 overall record and a 6-7-0 league mark with 14 Hockey East slugfests remaining over the last two months of the regular season.

Here is a breakdown of some other noteworthy subjects during the team's midseason layoff:

BIGGEST WIN: You could make a case that all five were very important, even the Clarkson game because freshman goalie Jon Quick made 27 saves to earn his first win in his first collegiate start, but without the 4-2 victory over No. 14 BU on Nov. 12, UMass' six-game slide could have very easily turned into a 10-game freefall with the competition coming in following the Terriers.

When Stephen Werner added the empty-netter with 22 seconds left in the third period to seal the upset, everyone at the Mullins Center could see the weight that was lifted of the team's shoulders, and they played with a level of confidence throughout the remainder of the first half that wasn't there during the losing streak.

Plus, in 2003-04, it was a 2-1 January win over the Parker Pound that set the Mass Attack off before its postseason run in late March.



TOUGHEST LOSS: The Minutemen shouldn't have lost their home game to Providence or their road contest at Northeastern, but the late collapse during their home opener against Holy Cross was the initial leg of the six-game downfall.

Holding onto a 2-1 lead, UMass gave up a pair of Crusader goals in the final 3:35 to drop its toughest decision of the fall semester, starting a four-week stretch without a single victory.

FIRST-HALF MVP: Stephen Werner, who everyone considers to be the best athlete on the team, has also become the top playmaker. He set up the game-winning goals against Vermont

See HOWE on page 12

UM looks to turn around season

KAREN WINGFIELD/COLLEGIAN

The UMass women's basketball team will not take the hardwood again until Dec. 30. Senior Patrycja Gulak has six blocks and seven steals on the season.

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Every year at this time, college students take a few weeks off from classes for their annual winter break. After Saturday's 81-76 loss to Syracuse, the Massachusetts women's basketball team began a break of its own.

The Minutewomen (2-7) entered the first of their 20-day layoff on Sunday, and UMass coach Marnie Dacko knows that the timing could not be better.

"I think it's coming at a good time," Dacko said. "I certainly would have liked to have had it a while ago and have some space in between our games, but that's the luck of scheduling, so it comes at a good time."

The Minutewomen play 11 games over the winter break, with nine of them being crucial Atlantic 10 conference matchups. They will be back in action on Dec. 30 and 31 in the Atlanta Marriott Northwest Holiday Invitational. The tournament hosted by Georgia Tech. will mark the final two non-conference games this year for UMass.

The Maroon and White will open up 2006 with its first A-10 conference game on Jan. 3 against Dayton at the Mullins Center. That game will be the first of 16-consecutive A-10 games, eight of which will be held in Amherst.

While she believes the first 11 non-conference games do hold some importance, Dacko understands that A-10 play is where it really counts.

"That's what we're working for," Dacko said. "Fortunately we have two seasons, and the A-10 is what our focus is on. We are going to do whatever it takes [over the break] to get out and be prepared for that. We're going to work on some pressing, we're going to work on ball movement and we're going to work on rebounding and shooting and re-dedicating ourselves to the game."

The Minutewomen will hope to get back on track and put an end to a four-game losing streak as they take on nine conference foes while school is out for winter break.

Let's take a look at the A-10 competition they will face while we are home for the holidays.

UMass will begin its A-10 play when it hosts Dayton at the

See W. HOOPS on page 12

Captains will keep swim teams steady

BY BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One is quiet. One is organized. The other is loud and talkative. Combined, the three of them guide a team full of young and old, humble and outspoken, tall and small alike, overseeing a team that must stay together as a unit.

Meet Aimee Bourassa, Corey Tawcyznski and Kaitlyn McDonough, the tri-captains of this season's Massachusetts women's swimmers.

While the three maintain different personalities, they share one thing in common: the need to lead.

"I think when you're a freshman you learn from the upperclassmen," Tawcyznski, the organized one, said. "You watch them in the pool and in training, and feel you need to do what they needed to do, because they've been doing this [college swimming] longer and are more experienced at it."

That might explain the early success of freshmen Karen Upperco and Christa Narus, who have both got off to stellar starts through the first half of the season.

Narus, who specializes in the freestyle and butterfly events, and Upperco, a diver, are both tops in their fields within the team.

Sure, they're talented, but it's a whole new type of swimming at the college level, and the new recruits ought to be made comfortable.

Which explains the motive behind the big sister-little sister system, instituted to let them know they can talk to their big sister whenever they have a question or concern.

"I think that's really important to let them [the young ones] know that we do care about how they're doing in general, not just swimming-wise but as people," Bourassa, the loud one, said. "Because it is scary experience coming here, and all of a sudden you're with 40 people, men and women, that are just sort of there. They're you're teammates, but at the same time you want them to be your friend."

As for the early success of some of the freshman, Bourassa points out that it acts as encouragement to swim harder.

"These girls are awesome, and in a way they motivate us," Bourassa said. "You're in your senior year, been doing the same thing for so long, so to have a freshman come in there and push you around a bit, it makes you realize that you're not done yet – there's still a little bit left in you."

The personalities, as it turns out, seem to rub off on one another.

Tawcyznski claims her off-campus roommate – Bourassa – picked up some of her organizational skills from being around her.

For the men, the storyline of different yet converging – not clashing – personalities carries over.

There's Pennsylvania native Mike Herald, who underwent open-heart surgery at the age of 15 and, being in the School of Management, is widely considered the "CEO" of the team. Jake Hogue, hailing from Colorado,

See SWIMMING on page 12

Snow starts up skiing season

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Since most winter sports are played indoors, their "winter" season really begins in late fall. Unfortunately, the Massachusetts ski team does not have that luxury. As everyone knows, you need a true winter element – snow – to hold a ski race. Therefore, while other winter teams are well into their respective seasons, the skiers are still waiting.

The first official race of the 2006 season takes place Jan. 13 to 14 at the UConn Carnival at Cranmore. Starting with that weekend, the team will race every weekend through January and February. After that, the USCSA and NCAA nationals will take place in March.

Each race is a two-day event, with a different style of race on each day. On one day, the skiers from each school will compete in the slalom. The next day will be the giant slalom.

"In the slalom, it's very technical, the turns are very tight, and the speeds are the slowest," first-year coach Justin Rouleau said. "The next event we do is the giant slalom, which is always held on separate days. That's the faster of the two racers."

College racers do not compete in downhill or super-G races that you may see during the Olympics or other ski races.

There is a total of five slalom and five giant slalom events through the regular season, followed by the Eastern College Ski Conference regional finals.

The Minutemen and women also have several preseason races before the regular season begins, the first of which took place last weekend at Stratton Mountain in Vermont. The race was an open one, with teams from both the ECSC — the conference UMass is a member of — as well as the EISA, which is considered to be a level above. The results were promising for the rest of the season, as both the men and women performed well.

The men, led by junior Rush Hawkins, did well for their first race of the season. Sophomore skier Jason Small placed the highest, finishing third after two heats. In the second heat, Small placed second.

Hawkins had the best single heat of the day, winning his first heat by 1.5 seconds. However, he was disqualified after missing a gate in his second heat. Nonetheless, Rouleau was encouraged by Hawkins' performance in the first heat.

"It may not seem like a lot, but 1.5 seconds in a 30 second race is pretty significant," Rouleau said. "That's basically a 40 meter distance between [Hawkins] and the guy in second place."

The women's team is led by Eliza Hawkins, the younger sister of Rush. Rouleau was equally excited about the Minutewomen. Seniors Lisbet Rauh and Caitln Doughty were the top finishers on the day, placing higher than Hawkins.

"It's great to see them do so well. I'm sure Eliza isn't too happy about it, but it will just motivate

See SKIING on page 12

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

SPRING BACK TO SCHOOL ISSUE

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 67

Still no word

UMass journalism graduate held captive in Iraq

BY DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Nearly four weeks after being kidnapped in Iraq, the whereabouts of journalist and University of Massachusetts graduate Jill Carroll are still unknown. But investigators may be closer to finding her.

United States authorities released five of the eight female Iraqi prisoners being held by the government on Thursday. Carroll's captors demanded that the prisoners be released or the journalist would be killed.

The U.S., which holds a policy of not negotiating with terrorists, claimed the release of the prisoners had nothing to do with Carroll's abduction.

In other recent developments, an Italian newspaper reported last Tuesday that three suspects had been arrested in connection with Carroll's disappearance.

"An interior ministry statement said the arrests were made during a raid by the security forces in the Adel neighborhood where Carroll was seized," the Adnkronos International newspaper reported.

Carroll, 28, was working as a freelance journalist in Baghdad for the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor when gunmen ambushed her car on Jan. 7, killing her translator, 32-year-old Allan Enwiyah. She was on her way to interview a Sunni Arab official in a notoriously dangerous section of the city.

Enwiyah's body was found later that day in the same neighborhood where the ambush occurred. He was shot twice in the head, according to law enforcement officials contacted by the CSM.

Carroll was kidnapped 300 yards away from the office of Adnan al-Dulaimi, the politician she intended to interview. Al-Dulaimi never showed up, and as Carroll and two other men began to leave, their car was stopped.

"It was very obvious this [kidnapping] was by design," Carroll's driver, who withheld his name, told the CSM. "The whole operation took no more than a quarter of a minute. It

Former UMass student Jill Carroll appears in a video released to the media by her kidnappers.

See CARROLL on page A12

UMass grad dies fighting in Iraq

BY JOHN FENUCCIO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Amherst is saddened by the death of one of its own students serving in Operation Iraqi Freedom.

Staff Sgt. Ayman A. Taha, 31, was killed on Dec. 30 in Balad, Iraq while preparing a munitions cache for demolition when the cache detonated and exploded, according to the Pentagon. Taha was a member of the 3rd Battalion, 5th Special Forces Group based in Fort Campbell, Ky.

Taha is the University's first combat death since the military began campaigns in Afghanistan in late 2001 and Iraq in 2003.

In a prepared statement, Chancellor John Lombardi said, "We received the news of Ayman Taha's tragic death in Iraq with great sadness. While large international events produce a wide range of opinion, the loss of one of our own unites us in sorrow."

Taha, who was originally from Sudan, received his bachelor's degree in economics at the University of California at Berkley. He then studied at UMass, where he earned his master's degree in economics in 2002. With the exception of writing his thesis, Taha was near completion of his PhD in economics at the University.

"We offer our condolences and support to Ayman Taha's family and friends," Lombardi said.

Taha was a man well liked by all who met him. He spoke multiple languages, including English, Arabic, Spanish and Portuguese. He entered the Army in 2002 and attended basic infantry training and the Basic Airborne Course at Fort Benning, Ga.

He then trained at Fort Bragg, N.C. in 2003, where he completed the Special Forces Engineer Sergeant's Course, effectively earning his Green Beret.

"The Alumni Association extends its deepest condolences to the Taha family. His dedication to his beliefs and helping others give us all pause for thought," said Cristina Geso, executive director of the Alumni Association, in a statement.

Ayman A. Taha

Some believe Taha's life forever changed in 2000 when he was involved in a fatal car accident, killing UMass student Lisa Mantia of North Reading.

The original charge of vehicular homicide was dropped. However, the accident left a lasting affect on Taha, according to his family members in published reports.

Taha's decision to enter the military was a surprise to his father, according to reports in the Washington Post. After learning of Ayman's desire for a break from his schooling three years ago, Abdel-Rahman learned of his son's decision to enter the military, where he'd become a member of the elite Special Forces unit.

In a website dedicated to Taha's legacy, countless posts can be found praising the man Taha was, and describing him as an inspiring role model.

"We met Ayman only briefly about 10 years ago when he coached my son in a soccer tournament. He treated the boys with respect and was every bit the role model Muhammed has been over the last 10 years for our son, Luke.

See TAHA on page A12

All-freshmen living

More dorms to house freshmen only

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In continuation of the University of Massachusetts' Freshman Living and Learning program, administrators have created plans that would have every freshman student living in all-freshmen housing on campus by 2008.

The University currently has three all-freshmen dormitories: Pierpont, Moore and Melville, all in Southwest Residential Area. In fall 2006, Van Meter and Butterfield dormitories in Central Residential Area and Thoreau in Southwest will also become freshmen residential halls.

In 2007, five more dorms will become all-freshmen: Dickinson and Webster in Orchard Hill Residential Area and Emerson, James and Kennedy in Southwest. In 2008, three more will be added to that list: Cance and John Adams in Southwest and Wheeler in Central.

The University started creating all-freshmen dormitories two years ago as part of its new Epoch (new beginnings) program. Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano created the program as a response to complaints he received from incoming students who felt "lost" walking into the large university.

"This is all focused on creating the right environment for student academic success," said Gargano. "It's easier to provide targeted programs to freshmen students."

Epoch aims to help freshmen in their transition from high school to college by making the students comfortable with the University and its surrounding area through activities and programs. The programs attempt to promote leadership skills and community involvement and assist with academic, career and life planning issues by offering social and recreational programs.

According to the Epoch Web site, "By fostering a sense of connection and pride with the university community, Epoch empowers students to take ownership for their academic and personal development."

In addition to resident assistants and a director, the Epoch dorms have undergraduate peer mentors, offer workshops and provide academic advising.

"A big focus on Epoch halls is their academic transition," said Dawn M. Thompson, director of residence life. "Research shows students who are living in learning communities typically experience a better transition to college."

Freshmen and sophomores are required to live on campus. Once freshmen year ends, the students living in all-freshmen dorms must apply for other housing on campus.

Students currently living

See DORMS on page A12

Ayman Taha sits down for some food in this photo. Taha, a UMass graduate student, was killed fighting in Iraq.

Student remembered after shocking death

BY MEGAN DALEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Almost four months have passed since the sudden death of University of Massachusetts student Sharon Kelley. Despite the fact that the media coverage of her passing has subsided, those who knew her still remember her as a person with a bright future.

"She was such an amazing friend, person and roommate... It's hard to come to grips that she is never coming back," said former roommate Megan Fredrickson, a 21-year-old hospitality and tourism management major from Brainerd, Minn. "I know that she lives through the pictures she's in, the people she touched, and the memories she created. She is forever in my heart and I think about her everyday."

On Oct. 16, 2005 at 2:15 a.m., people walking down East Pleasant Street saw Kelley, 20, a Woburn resident, laying on the side of the road and suffering from convulsions. One passer-by phoned for help and medical technicians arrived quickly. However, Kelley was pronounced dead at Cooley Dickinson Hospital soon after. She was just over a week shy of her 21st birthday.

Medical examiners are still trying to determine a cause of death.

Caitlin O'Donoghue, a pre-English major who attended Arlington Catholic High School with Kelley, said that though she and Kelley were not close friends, "The thing I'll always remember about her is that she was always nice to me... She was considerate, funny, and most importantly a genuinely sweet girl. I always liked her."

Fredrickson said she remembers Kelly as being very family-oriented. "Not a day went by that she didn't talk about her mom, sister, cousins, grandparents, and aunt and uncle. She was very close to them."

Kelley was also a hardworking student, who was, according to Fredrickson, "ecstatic when she found out she made the Dean's List... I think she had a good balance between studying and socializing."

Fredrickson's sister, Katie, 19, also says she has only fond memories of Kelley. "I remember the tiniest little things she said to me. She was such a great friend to everyone around her and if she had plans she always invited my sister and I to go with. She was very welcoming and friendly 24/7. She was always so full of energy... We all got along really well and developed an inseparable relationship."

Sharon Kelley, left, poses with friend and roommate Megan Fredrickson last semester. Kelley unexpectedly died in October.

See KELLEY on page A9

Sudden death shakes Hampshire students

BY DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Several students who reside at the Prescott House at Hampshire College woke up on the morning of Dec. 16, 2005 to find police cars, yellow caution tape and authorities wheeling a body bag outside their dormitory.

The sight initially sent shock waves through the campus. Nobody knew what had happened.

"The campus didn't really tell us anything," said a Prescott resident who asked not to be named. "I just saw police and this caution tape around my building and didn't know what happened."

Worried students turned to the DailyJolt.com, a Web site with message boards for college students. Inside Hampshire's section of the Web site, over 35 messages were posted between Dec. 16 and Dec. 18 about the incident. Most of the messages were from students asking others what had happened.

Later that afternoon, Hampshire College Dean Michael D. Lord released a campus-wide email, which read, in part, "It is my sad duty to inform students, faculty and staff of the death of Hampshire student Samantha Sandler. Samantha's family has been notified, and I know that you join me in extending our deepest sympathy. We have no details to share at this time, but will make appropriate information available as we are able."

Sandler, 23, from Bloomfield, Conn., was found in her bed unresponsive by her boyfriend on the morning of Dec. 16, according to her roommate, Mike Bushnell, a second-year student.

No official cause of death will be released until a medical examiner concludes an investigation.

Sandler was described by Bushnell as "open-minded" and having a "wild" personality.

"I think most of us are silent... but still reflecting," he said of Sandler's death.

See DEATH on page A12

ARTS & LIVING

ROLLING STONES PLAY BOSTON
The Stones bring down the house with some classic hits.
PAGE B1

EDITORIAL/OPINION

JILL CARROLL IN OUR HEARTS
The Collegian reflects on a former employee and a model journalist.
PAGE A10

WEATHER

TUESDAY Snow, H37°, L24°
WEDNESDAY M. Cloudy, H37°, L24°
THURSDAY Snow, H38°, L28°

SPORTS

LASME STANDING STRONG
Junior Stephane Lasme has been living up to expectations this season.
PAGE C1

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Eric Athas
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Katie Huston
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Ian Jones
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Kristen LaCasse
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Hosse
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCES Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Morgan-Ann Rousseau
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Mari Bellucci
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Rob Greenfield
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS FALL AND SPRING SEMESTERS. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ASSABET LEAF, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AWARDED FIRST PLACE BY NEWSPAPER FOR ADVERTISEMENTS AND INFORMATION. CALL WITH QUESTIONS 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

On staff today

NIGHT EDITORS
Michael Busack, Katie Huston
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Nicholas Belanger
COPY EDITORS
Katie Huston, Eric Athas
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nicholas Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Sarah Belanger, Lauren Egavian

UMass student acquitted of Halloween stabbing

By Michael A. Busack
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Following a brief jury deliberation, a University of Massachusetts student was acquitted of charges stemming from a stabbing that occurred at an Amherst Halloween party in the fall of 2004.

Andrew Avault, 22, of Arlington pleaded innocent to charges of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (a knife) in the trial at Hampshire Superior Court. His attorney, David Hoose of the firm of Katz, Sasson, Hoose and Turnbull, said that Avault was defending himself from an attack, and acted only in an attempt to protect himself.

After just over an hour of consideration, a jury delivered a not guilty verdict, acquitting Avault of any charges.

"I believe that the jury in this case did the right thing, and we are obviously very happy with the results," said Hoose in an interview with the Daily Collegian following the verdict. "They seemed to have little difficulty coming to the decision they did, seeing it only took them about an hour to come up with a decision."

According to Assistant Northwestern District Attorney Frank Flannery, Avault and Manuel Sarkis attended a Halloween party at 17 Alpine Commons in Amherst on Oct. 31, 2004. Sarkis was walking outside of the residence when Avault allegedly threw an egg at him.

The two began to fight, exchanging blows and eventually fighting on the ground with Sarkis on top of Avault. Flannery said Sarkis pinned Avault to the ground and was punching him. It was at this time that Avault began stabbing Sarkis with a small pen knife.

Flannery said Sarkis, who was wearing a "Jason"-style hockey mask made famous by the "Friday the 13th" movies, was stabbed 11 times in the torso. When Sarkis stood up, and friends could see that he was covered in blood, friends of Sarkis continued to beat Avault.

Sarkis was transported to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield where he was treated and released.

Avault was also injured in the altercation, and was treated at and released from Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

"It is pretty clear that Mr. Sarkis was the aggressor here throughout the entire situation, and that Mr. Avault didn't use any force until he was flat on the ground and getting pummeled by Mr. Sarkis while his friends watched," said Hoose. "Mr. Sarkis did not act out in any way as an aggressor."

In his final arguments in the case, Hoose said that Avault was "bullied" and had no option but to defend himself after being pinned to the ground. He compared the size of the two men, and the amount of friends they had in support.

"We thought that a not guilty verdict was the only fair decision," Hoose said.

Sarkis could not be reached for comment by press time.

U. Michigan ends contract with Coke

ANN ARBOR (AP) — The University of Michigan has decided to stop selling Coca-Cola products on its three campuses, effective Jan. 1.

The school's announcement comes six months after the Coca-Cola Co. said it was willing to examine its labor and business practices in India and Colombia to keep its University of Michigan contracts, worth about $1.4 million.

In June, the university said it would renew contracts with Coke beyond 2005 only on a conditional basis until the company performed an independent audit and put a corrective plan in place.

Coca-Cola has for years faced questions about its labor practices abroad, and college students have levied some of the most vocal complaints.

Michigan, which has more than 50,000 students on its three campuses, is among at least nine schools that have stopped selling Coke products citing issues in Colombia as a reason, The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported Friday.

The university will suspend purchase of Coca-Cola products, affecting vending machines, residence halls, cafeterias and campus restaurants.

Earlier this year, representatives from several universities formed a commission to investigate allegations in Colombia and the company agreed to a third-party investigation. But Coke doesn't want findings admissible as evidence in a related lawsuit against Coca-Cola bottlers.

Michigan had set a Dec. 31 deadline for the parties to agree to terms regarding an investigation. The university and the company say they will continue to negotiate.

"The University of Michigan is an important school, and I respect the way they worked with us on this issue," Coca-Cola spokeswoman Kari Bjorhus told The Detroit News. "These are complicated issues. We are continuing to try hard to work with the university to address concerns and assure them about our business practices."

Michigan's decision was prompted by a complaint last year by Students Organizing for Labor and Economic Equality.

The student group accused Coca-Cola of draining the water table in India, causing farmers' crops to go dry; distributing bottling plant sludge containing contaminants to Indian farmers as fertilizer; selling products that contain pesticides in India; and conspiring with paramilitary groups in Colombia to harass and harm union members.

The company has repeatedly denied allegations of environmental and human rights abuses.

Coca-Cola also has reported progress in addressing environmental concerns.

—Associated Press

UMass murder trial delayed at request of prosecutors

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

The trial of a man charged with killing a University of Massachusetts student over a year ago has been continued to March at the request of the prosecution in the case.

Bryan R. Johnston, 24, of Westfield, shot and killed UMass student David E. Sullivan, then 22, on Dec. 7, 2004, police say.

Johnston faces charges of murder, armed burglary, possession of a large-capacity firearm and use of a firearm in the commission of a felony.

According to investigators, Johnston, who was attending Westfield State College at the time of the shooting, called Sullivan to hang out. After Sullivan refused, police believe that Johnston drove to Sullivan's apartment, where he entered unannounced at 12:20 a.m. and shot Sullivan six times in his bedroom.

Stephen Kubicki, Sullivan's roommate and a UMass student who was home when the shooting occurred, called 911. Upon their arrival minutes later, police found Sullivan lying in a pool of blood. He was pronounced dead at the scene.

The two men, childhood friends, grew up together in the Berkshires. They graduated together from Waconah Regional High School in Dalton in 2000.

The trial, originally scheduled for January, has been continued to March 20 at the prosecution's request because of a delay in the defense's provision of discovery materials to the state. The materials, including the results of psychiatric examinations, were needed for Dr. Michael Welner, the Commonwealth expert who will examine Johnston, to proceed.

Additionally, a key witness, Gareth Mello, is currently serving in the U.S. military in Iraq. Shortly after the shooting, Johnston called Mello to drive him home from the parking lot of the Aqua Vitae restaurant in Hadley after being detained for a short time in a police car. The two men worked together as security guards in Baystate Medical Center in Springfield.

According to Northwestern District Attorney Renee Steese, Mello's testimony could be crucial to both sides. Steese told Hampshire Superior Court Judge Mary-Lou Rup that she had contacted the military about having Mello sent home so he could be present at the trial.

Johnston has admitted to shooting Sullivan several times. His lawyer, Alexander Z. Nappan, is expected to argue that Johnston is not criminally responsible. Nappan claims Johnston was addicted to steroids and going through withdrawal at the time of the killing.

David E. Sullivan

Bryan R. Johnston

Career Fairs

02.15.06 PERMANENT JOBS

Campus-Wide Career Fair 2006
February 15, 2006
10am-3pm
Campus Center Auditorium

Life Sciences Career Fair 2006
February 15, 2006
10am-3pm
Campus Center Lower Level

ALANA Job Fair 2006
February 15, 2006
5pm-7pm
Campus Center Auditorium

INTERNSHIPS 02.16.06

Summer, Co-op and Internship Opportunities 2006
February 16, 2006
10am-3pm
Campus Center Auditorium

CAREER FAIRS

CareerServices
www.umass.edu/careers

He's a genius

Christian Burns just transfered to UMass. And, he's only 14.

By Dan Tebk
Collegian Staff

What were you doing when you were 14? Chances are you were in the eighth grade and too busy worrying about going to high school to even think about college.

For one University of Massachusetts Amherst student, however, things could not be more different.

Christian Burns, 14, is a junior biology major at UMass. He transferred into the University at the start of last semester after completing two years at Tunxis Community College in Connecticut.

After graduating, Christian plans to get his DVM/PhD. He hopes to become a wildlife zoologist.

"I took animal science last semester and I really enjoyed that," said Christian. He also enjoyed the hours he used to spend working on the Hadley horse farm.

His parents, Debora Stevens-Burns and Richard Burns, noticed that Christian was of above-average intelligence at a young age. He was walking when he was only eight months old and began recognizing words not long after.

"One thing just quickly led to another," said Debora, "and before we knew it [Christian] was reading...fully at 16 to 18 months."

Christian would eventually move from school to school, constantly ahead of his peers intellectually. After spending several years in an elementary and middle school for gifted students, Christian, at age 11, began attending Tunxis.

Along with taking classes at UMass, Christian is a member of the University's fencing team, the New Britain Chess Club, and the Boy Scouts, along with several other youth groups. In addition to all of those — as well as doing regular activities that any 14-year-old would do, like watch TV, play computer games and talk on the phone with friends — Christian is a member of Mensa, a society for people whose IQs are in the top 2 percent of the population.

As a member of Mensa, Christian attends regional meeting from time to time, and was even asked to give a lecture at one such meeting. Due to his young age and interest in zoology, Mensa asked him to present a talk on the owl, which is often used as the unofficial Mensa logo.

His parents did not seem worried about the possible effects on Christian's social well-being.

"I feel that it is to his benefit, because we've been struggling with his intellectual level," said Debora. "As far as the social, we've kind of overkilled that. I was so worried about the social problems...so I overdid it."

Before entering college Christian also worked on developing a topical ointment to treat superficial necrolytic dermatitis (SND), which is a wound that opens on animals that are put under extreme physical stress. He also spent a summer writing a book of wild-life haikus.

Because Christian is not old enough to live on his own, his mother brings him to campus every day and sees him off. Sometimes they meet for lunch later in the day. Once Christian is done with classes, fencing practice and exams, mother and son head home.

Only a very few people are aware of Christian's uniqueness in the classroom, but he does not seem bothered either way. He is quite content moonlighting as a college student five days a week, but still getting to remain a 14-year-old for the rest of the time.

Christian Burns, 14, sits at the UMass Visitor Center this month. Burns is persuing a bachelor's degree at the University, with hopes to become a zoologist.

SGA calls for tuition 'fee-freeze' at UMass

By Matt Bellveau
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts has drafted two motions that, if accepted, would have a dramatic effect on the admission and tuition policies of the school.

The SGA, led by student trustee Valerie Louis, is working with the Graduate Student Senate, the Graduate Employee Organization, and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy to present two motions to the Board of Trustees during their meeting in February.

One motion, hoping to put a stop to the increasing tuition fees, calls for mandatory fee-freezes at all five campuses. The proposed freeze would prevent the Board of Trustees from raising mandatory undergraduate student fees for the 2006-07 academic year.

The motion was sparked by a report conducted by the Undergraduate Student Charges Fact Sheet which found that the cost of mandatory fees for an in-state undergraduate to attend UMass has increased nearly 100 percent within the last five years.

SGA leaders were also angered by last year's fee increase, which came after Board of Trustees spokesman Robert Connolly told the Associated Press that he was confident that students wouldn't have to pay for more funding gaps.

"We feel comfortable that we can run the ship with this amount of fee revenue," Connolly told the AP.

According to a recent USA Today survey, UMass Amherst is the fifth most expensive of the country's 67 public flagship schools. Without room and board, the average UMass student pays $9,278.

A Boston Globe report printed in December 2005 found that the percentage of UMass students drawn from the lowest income categories recorded on financial aid documents had been reduced by half over the last five years.

The "fee-freeze" motion will be presented at the Feb. 9 BOT Administration and Finance subcommittee meeting at 8 a.m.

SGA members are also concerned with building a student body that more adequately represents the population of youths graduating from Massachusetts's high schools in racial and socially economic terms.

SGA leaders have pointed to statistics showing that certain segments of the population, particularly African-Americans and Latinos and Latinas, are underrepresented at the UMass flagship campus.

According to statistics compiled by the Department of Education, African-Americans and Latinos make up 7.3 percent of the entering class at UMass, although they made up over 17 percent of the 12th grade population in Massachusetts in the 2004-05 academic year.

"We feel these motions have particularly strong appeal to legislators and community leaders in underrepresented districts across the state and these leaders can bring strong pressure upon the Board," said Mishy Lieblum, SGA Secretary of Public Policy and Relations.

The "better representation" motion will be presented at the Feb. 14 Student Affairs subcommittee meeting at 1:30 p.m.

If either or both motions are approved, they will be forwarded to the main Trustees meeting to be held on Feb. 15.

Both meetings will be held on the UMass/Dartmouth campus.

"We are working hard to bring students to these meetings to voice their

See SGA on page A9

INTERESTED IN ADVERTISTING IN THE COLLEGIAN?
PICTURE YOUR AD HERE!!!
CONTACT OUR AD DEPARTMENT
545-3500

Local man charged in Bridgewater murder

BROCKTON (AP) — The second of two Bridgewater State College students pleaded innocent to a murder charge in the stabbing death of a 27-year-old alumnus at a bar near campus.

Wearing a cast over two fingers nearly severed in a knife fight, James Bing, 19, of Easton, was ordered held without bail by Judge Richard Savignano. Ben Dreyer, 19, of Northampton, was arraigned Monday and also ordered held without bail.

Both are charged with killing Jody Martyniak, 27, of Raynham, following a fight last week at Bar Place Saloon. Bing and Dreyer are due back in court on Feb. 27.

Prosecutors said the fight began inside the bar over a comment Martyniak made about Dreyer's girlfriend and that it spilled outside. Martyniak suffered seven stab wounds to the chest and head, prosecutors said, including one that penetrated his heart.

Dreyer and Bing are both freshmen at Bridgewater State College. Martyniak, a communications major, graduated from the school in 2002.

Bing was a high school basketball star at Oliver Ames High School in Easton, where he was named the league's most valuable player.

He was arrested Friday afternoon at a Boston hospital where he'd gone for treatment of hand injuries. Dreyer was arrested later Friday at his home.

Riding in an ambulance at the same time that Martyniak's body was being taken to Brockton Hospital in another, Bing told police that he hurt his hand fending off a knife attack. Prosecutor Dan Hourihan said two of Bing's fingers were nearly severed.

—Associated Press

to Your Award Winning Dining Services!

JANUARY / FEBRUARY

Su	Mo	Tu	We	Th	Fr	Sa
29	30	31	1	2	3	4
5	6	7	8	9	10	11
12	13	14	15	16	17	18
19	20	21	22	23	24	25
26	27	28

Sunday, Jan 29
Free meals for family at Lunch and Dinner
Free UMass bottled Water at Lunch and Dinner

Monday, Jan 30
Free candy bar or granola bar at Dinner

Tuesday, Jan 31
Chinese New Year Celebration (Year of the Dog)
Win Lucky Money

Wednesday, Feb 1
Brioche Breakfast

Thursday, Feb 2
Get your coupon for Bluewall Cookies

Friday, Feb 3
Get your coupon for $1 off a purchase of $5 or more at any campus C-Store at the cashier

Saturday, Feb 4
Jazz Brunch in all DC's

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
YCMP
www.umass.edu/diningservices

CELEBRATE THE YEAR OF THE DOG

CHINESE NEW YEAR

Be Part of the Excitement and Activities!

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31, 2006
5-8 PM ALL DC'S

Authentic Dragon Dancers

Lucky Money
100 random customers will receive Lucky Money (a coupon worth $8.00) in each DC

恭禧發財

Menu Featuring
Hot & Sour Soup
Peking Duck
Suckling Pig
Sesame Chicken
Szechwan Beef & Broccoli
Stir Fry Mixed Vegetables / Tofu
Longevity Noodles
Jasmine Rice
Fortune Cookie
Almond Cookies
Almond Jelly
Fresh Clementines
Green Tea

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
YCMP
www.umass.edu/diningservices

Suspects jailed for brutal UMass assaults

By Katie Huston and Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Three of five men who were involved in brutally assaulting a group of University of Massachusetts students after a Red Sox World Series game in October 2004 received jail sentences last month.

Roger R. Menard, 20, 46 Eddy St., Ware, received 3 ½ years in prison and four years of probation after he pleaded guilty to two counts of assault and battery with bodily injury, one count assault and battery, and one count disorderly conduct for severely beating three UMass students.

Jason A. Cancel, 21, of 24 Cummings Road, Ware, and Eric M. Koziol, 23, of 34 Cummings Road, Ware, received 2 ½-year suspended prison sentences and four years of probation for their involvement in the fight. Both men pleaded guilty to one count of assault and battery and one count of disorderly conduct. They pleaded not guilty to two counts of assault and battery with bodily injury, and the charges were dropped.

In October, Timothy R. Lamora, 20, of 61 Glendale Circle, Chicopee, pleaded guilty to the same charges as Menard and received three years in prison and five years probation.

The last of the five men involved, Ryan Sinclair, of Ware, has a plea hearing scheduled for Feb. 3.

On Oct. 25, 2004, Sinclair, Lamora and Menard consumed alcohol and headed to UMass with a camcorder to see if riots were taking place, said Assistant District Attorney Michael A. Cahillane.

UMass students Brett J. Blanciforti, Donald Murphy and Brian Kelley encountered the three men outside of Washington dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area as they returned from getting food at Chicago's Pizzaria. Lamora, Menard and Sinclair taunted the students, then jumped them and beat them severely, according to prosecutors.

At least one of the suspects filmed the assaults with the camcorder.

Cancel and Koziol were coming to UMass to visit their girlfriends and are not believed to have consumed alcohol. They happened upon the fight and got involved, according to Cahillane.

The three students were sent to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield with head injuries. Blanciforti, who was attacked by Menard, was found unconscious in a pool of blood and had to have 12 plates inserted into his face.

"I broke pretty much everything in my face," Blanciforti said while testifying in court. "They said it was like a puzzle putting it back together."

He was unable to open his eyes for a week, and his vision was impaired due to light sensitivity.

Kelley had two teeth knocked out and his jaw broken, requiring him to get a bone transplant. Murphy was also injured, suffering bruising and damage on the side of his face.

After the fight, Lamora, Sinclair and Menard "were hyped," according to court documents. They went to a party at the Townehouse Apartments in Amherst, where they showed the video to acquaintances and bragged about the fight.

Congress examines high textbook prices

By Matt Billeyeau
Collegian Staff

As students return to their respective colleges, the majority will unwillingly throw hundreds of dollars towards purchasing the necessary textbooks for their classes. This harsh reality hits nearly every student at universities from California to Massachusetts, and produces the same question: Why are textbook prices so high?

Congress has joined the search for that very answer.

Recent reports of escalating textbook prices and instances in which publishers sell U.S. textbooks in other countries at lower prices have heightened congressional concern and raised questions about textbook pricing practices.

These concerns recently led Congress to assemble the Government Accountability Office to determine the change in textbook prices and the factors that may have contributed to changes in textbook prices.

The results, which were originally released by the GAO in August 2005, found that the average student spends nearly $900 on textbooks and supplies, or 26 percent of tuition and fees, per year at typical public four-year colleges.

Increasing at an average of 6 percent per year, textbook prices nearly tripled from December 1986 to December 2004, while tuition and fees increased by 240 percent and overall inflation was 72 percent.

At two-year colleges, which are cheaper but more likely to attract low-income students, the textbook and supply bill amounts to 72 percent of tuition and fees.

Jenniler Jabaily, left, rings up books for Lindsay Lesser, a UMass senior, who got an early start purchasing textbooks for the spring semester.

Researchers contend that the main reason for the hike in textbook prices can be attributed to the increase in costs associated with the "bundling" of new features, such as Web sites and other instructional supplements. Other factors that affect pricing include production costs, availability of used books, and the demand for textbooks.

Wholesalers, retailers, and some public interest groups, who were interviewed by researchers, agreed that there has been a proliferation of supplements in recent years, and they have expressed concern about the increasing practice of selling supplements and textbooks bundled together in a package.

Some publishers acknowledged that there has been resistance to the practice of bundling, and were cited as saying that they are now more carefully considering when bundling may be appropriate.

"While the practice is designed to provide students with greater value, we understand that students must perceive that value for a bundle to sell," said one unnamed publisher.

Publishers say they are also beginning to understand that as students may be sensitive to high prices, they must strike a balance between quality and price.

For example, one publisher provided an example of a bundle that did not sell well because the number of components increased the price beyond what students were willing to pay. While the publisher knew that the textbook and the individual components would retail separately for much more, students perceived the price as too high.

Another prevalent complaint sounded by most students is the constant "revisions" that publishers place

See TEXTBOOKS on page A12

New developments in search for missing UMass student

Missing UMass student Maura Murray poses for a photo just months before she disappeared after a car accident in Feb. 2004.

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

Almost two years after her disappearance, University of Massachusetts Amherst students can still see flyers posted around town, the word "Missing" printed above Maura Murray's now-familiar face.

Her story remains at a grisly stand-still as her family voices disappointment with New Hampshire authorities.

The 21-year-old nursing student disappeared on Feb. 9, 2004 after leaving her dorm room in Kennedy Hall at UMass and heading through New Hampshire Maura's parents suspected foul play from the beginning, yet many investigators still say Maura ran away or took her own life.

Prior to her disappearance Maura withdrew $280 from an ATM and e-mailed her professors to tell them she was going home for the week because of a death in the family although there had been no death.

Around 7 p.m. that evening, she crashed her car into a snow bank on Route 112 in New Hampshire several miles from the Vermont border. Police say a witness offered help but Maura refused and told the witness not to call police. The witness also told officers that she seemed to be intoxicated, but uninjured. When emergency workers arrived, Maura had vanished and most of her belongings were left behind in the car.

Police said they see no evidence of foul play after searching the scene of Maura's minor car accident on Route 112 in Haverhill, N.H. However Maura's parents feel that investigators should take a fresh look in efforts to recover their daughter. The Murray family feels police do not take seriously the possibility that Maura may have been abducted.

Maura's father, Fred Murray, met with Gov. John Lynch earlier this year to ask for his help in getting records of the investigation. Since then Murray has sued Lynch, state police and other law enforcement agencies in the hope of obtaining information from the investigation, such as accident reports, an inventory of items taken from her car, a copy of her computer hard drive, and a surveillance tape from a liquor store where she made a purchase.

The lawsuit claims that Murray was denied this information because the records are confidential, and their release would constitute an invasion of privacy. A scheduled hearing on Murray's request took place on Jan. 18 at Grafton County Superior Court.

Police have said that they talk with Murray on a regular basis when new leads appear. However, Murray says that he hasn't gotten any feedback from the governmental investi-

See MURRAY on page A12

Looking For Something To Do?
Atkins Farms Has Something For Everyone!

A unique country market nestled in one of the oldest apple orchards in New England. Atkins is just a short drive south from UMass on Route 116. You'll enjoy a unique shopping experience where old time service is an everyday treat. Sample some of New England's favorite foods or pick up a country gift as a keepsake.

Farm Fresh Produce
Country Bakery
Deli & Lunches
Take-Out Food
Specialty Foods
Homemade Fudge

Fresh Meat & Seafood
Ice Cream Shop
Sushi Bar
Full Service Florist
Fruit & Gift Baskets
Gift Department

Attention Parents!! Ask about our Student Special Care Packages
A great idea for parents far away from their busy, hard working, and hungry college student.

Birthday Cakes
Flowers, Balloons
Snack Paks
Get Well Paks
Mix & Match Paks
& many more!

Call for our brochure
(413) 253-9528 or
1-800-594-9537
Local Deliveries
Monday-Saturday

ATKINS FARMS
Country Market
Corner of Route 116 & Bay Road
South Amherst, MA 01002
(413) 253-9528 * www.atkinsfarms.com

Facebook: stalker's guide, or networking tool?

By Nicole Leeth
Collegian Staff

Stephanie Horton was sitting on the University of Massachusetts' Campus Center steps with a friend last spring when they were approached by a male student they didn't know.

The man asked them their names and tried chatting with them. Horton, a senior journalism major, told him her name was Steph. The women thought it was just a random guy trying to talk to them, and he left shortly after.

Later on that day, Horton checked her account on Facebook.com, the popular online social network for college students. The male student had flooded her account: he asked to be her friend, sent her messages, and "poked" her (a way to get someone's attention).

"I didn't give him my last name," Horton said. "Which means he searched Facebook for all girls named Stephanie, and found my picture." There are 120 Stephanies on Facebook at UMass.

Facebook has grown in popularity since UMass joined over a year ago. It has helped old friends keep in touch and new friendships form through common interests. But many students have experienced a downside: loss of privacy, obsession and outright stalking.

Horton closed her account because she felt like she was being stalked. She didn't like the idea of strangers seeing her information. She was annoyed by the experience, and above all, "creeped out."

Many Facebook users have dealt with privacy issues, and not just from fellow college students. A student's information on Facebook can also be seen by administrators and faculty with a school email address. Facebook accounts are essentially public documents, and in the past year, colleges across the country have used it to investigate campus crimes.

KEEPING IN TOUCH

Many students started out using Facebook as a way to meet people and talk to friends.

Ashley Peter, a freshman journalism major from New Jersey, joined Facebook over the summer. She mainly uses it to keep in touch with high school friends who attend other schools.

"I love looking at pictures," she said. "I'm obsessed with looking at people's photo albums now."

Peter said if she has a paper to write, or is bored, she goes on to distract herself, which usually lasts a couple of hours.

Jessica Kornbluh, a senior food science major, joined Facebook last October when her friends finally "peer pressured her into it." She goes online to see if she has any friend requests and to see if her sister "poked" her.

"It's how my sister and I communicate," she said. "She's in Boston, and it's a way I can talk to her every day and joke around with her on it."

OBSESSION

The concept of meeting new people and keeping in touch with friends is innocent enough. But some students admit that it can put you under a sort of spell, like Peter, who said it's easy to sit there for hours just looking at people's profiles and pictures.

Matt Reid, a junior nursing major, is one of the rare cases who refuse to join Facebook.

"I've seen all my friends get obsessed with it," he said.

"I'm scared I would be just like them, if not worse. I'd want to add everyone I know. I'd be on there for hours on end instead of doing my work."

Reid said his friend uses his ex-girlfriend's password to her account to erase wall posts and hide pokes from other guys.

"It's just bad news," he said.

"You Might've Seen me on Facebook but Shorty, You Don't Know Me"—a Group on Facebook

On Facebook, "friends" can range from someone you've known for years to a person you met in a drunken stupor the night before.

"Half the people I'm friends with on Facebook I don't even talk to in real life," said Kornbluh. "It's basically just a popularity contest."

Some students don't take Facebook

While studying at the UMass campus library, Lindsay Lesser, a UMass senior, says she's looked at the Facebook website before. She doesn't use it, but says that most of her friends have an account with the website.

DAN O'BRIEN/COLLEGIAN

too seriously, indicated by their Facebook picture. Some put up a picture of an actor, a model, or a cartoon. Others choose the vanity route, finding an attractive picture.

Horton said at one point she had put up a picture that she thought looked nice, but admitted that her shirt was a little revealing. She got inundated with pokes and messages commenting lewdly on her picture.

"It's a desperate people's network!" she exclaimed. "People can be really disgusting."

It is up to students how much personal information they want to post, and they may face unintended consequences or unwelcome feedback, even from "friends."

PRIVACY

Many students are unaware of the public nature of Facebook and the fact that administrators can join. Several legal cases have developed in the past year regarding student information posted on the website.

In October, a Fisher College sophomore was expelled for posting a statement about a police officer he thought should be fired, according to the Boston Globe. When administrators saw it,

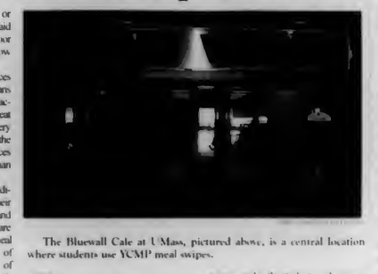
See FACEBOOK on page A9

Students cry foul over meal plan woes

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Overpriced meal plans and a lack of options for freshman and sophomores have led students at the University of Massachusetts to have mixed feelings about their college meal plans.

Recently, one of these students, Gabriel Mardoc, a senior music major, wrote a letter to Chancellor John Lombardi detailing some issues in the meal plan system that he felt were unfair.



In his letter, Mardoc complained that students lose money each semester, since the meal swipes they do not use are lost and will not carry over to the next semester.

Mardoc was also concerned that students who purchase Your Campus Meal Plan (YCMP), an alternative to the residential meal plan open to UMass upperclassmen and commuters, only receive $6.15 for each swipe they use at places other than the dining commons, such as the Blue Wall, though they pay at least $7.64 for each swipe overall.

"I'm not much of an activist or anything like that," Mardoc has said regarding the letter, "I'm just a poor college student that doesn't like to throw my money away."

According to the Dining Services Web site, "The prices of the meal plans take into account the missed-meal factor (the average student does not eat a certain percentage of meals every semester). If the students did eat all the meals on their meal plans, the prices of the meal plans would be higher than what they are currently."

Other students have voiced additional concerns they have with their meal plans, particularly freshmen and sophomores who live on campus are required to purchase a residential meal plan and are not given the option of YCMP, which has the advantage of being able to be used at student businesses. The residential meal plan offers a limited number of flex swipes, which can be used at locations other than the dining commons, and none of these swipes can be used at student-run businesses.

The Bluewall Cafe at UMass, pictured above, is a central location where students use YCMP meal swipes.

According to Ken Toong, Director of Food Services at UMass, flex swipes for residential meal plans cannot be used at student businesses because, "Financially, this would be a huge burden for dining services. If the residential plan exchange

See YCMP on page A7

Amherst man begs for mercy in court

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A stunning scene unfolded at a Northampton courthouse on Dec. 20, 2005 when an Amherst man, who was being sentenced to a psychiatric hospital, dropped to his knees and begged a judge for his freedom.

"Your honor, have mercy on me. Have mercy. I'm tired of being incarcerated like an animal," Ali N. El-Ghorfi, 23, told Hampshire Superior Court Judge Mary-Lou Rup, the Daily Hampshire Gazette reported.

El-Ghorfi made the statement after Rup found him incompetent to stand trial on several charges, including attempted murder. She sentenced him to six months at Bridgewater State Hospital.

El-Ghorfi had to be surrounded by guards and escorted out of the courtroom when he made the statements, the newspaper reported.

He faced charges of attempted murder, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, assault and battery on a police officer and resisting arrest.

Police say El-Ghorfi tried to strangle a man he did not know inside Rao's coffee shop in downtown Amherst on March 4, 2004. Rao's is a shop popular with local college students.

According to police, El-Ghorfi said he got upset when he saw a man of Turkish descent speaking to someone who wasn't Arab. At that point, El-Ghorfi allegedly used a belt to strangle the white man.

Customers intervened and used the belt to tie El-Ghorfi's legs together until police arrived.

In court, a forensic psychologist testified that El-Ghorfi is delusional and suffers from schizophrenia, the

See EL-GHORFI on page A7

USA TODAY
Collegiate Readership Program

Other Participating Publications:
The Boston Globe
The New York Times
Visit www.usatodaycollege.com for more information and a complete list of participating campuses.

THE BOLTWOOD PROJECT™
(36 years of service—and counting!)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2006 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for meetings •Feb. 6th (Mon) •Feb. 8th (Wed)
Feb. 7th (Tues) meeting will be held in room 168C of the Campus Center
•Assignment notification ONLY: Thurs. Feb. 9th in Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pickup the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

Graduating Seniors

Did you know that the UMASS Yearbook is the oldest yearbook in New England?
Even better, it is the third oldest in the country.
Rather than imagining how wonderful being a part of this momentous history would be like, act now and
Get your picture taken for the yearbook

Senior sitting portraits for spring semester begin
February 6 - February 10
Campus Center rm 176-174

INDEX
UMass yearbook

For more details on setting up an appointment and information on other available dates in April, visit our site at www.umass.edu/rso/index
Still have questions? Contact us by E-mail or phone index@stuaf.umass.edu
phone: (413) 545-0848

UMass Lowell prof stabbed in home by student

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — A college student upset about a failing grade followed his professor for more than 20 miles from campus to her Cambridge home, where he allegedly stabbed her, police said.

Mary Elizabeth Hooker, 54, an assistant professor of clinical lab sciences at the University of Massachusetts-Lowell, was hospitalized Thursday night, Dec. 22, 2005, with a stab wound to her neck.

Mary Elizabeth Hooker

Nikhil Dhar, 22, of Lowell, pleaded innocent on Friday, Dec. 23, 2005 in Cambridge District Court to charges of armed assault with intent to murder and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon. He was held without bail pending a hearing Wednesday.

Hooker told police that Dhar wanted to talk about "not obtaining a passing grade in her class," Cambridge police officer Edward Frammartino wrote in his report.

Hooker offered to meet him at a coffee shop to talk, but Dhar "became very irate and abusive towards her," Frammartino wrote. Dhar dragged her out of the house, hit her and slashed her neck, according to the police report.

Police recovered a knife at the scene.

Neighbors called police after they heard screaming and saw Hooker struggling with a man in her front yard. Neighbor Carlos Madden, 21, chased and caught Dhar nearby, cornering him until police arrived.

UMass-Lowell spokeswoman Patti McCafferty said Hooker was in intensive care at a Boston hospital. "The feeling from hospital officials was that she was going to pull through and be OK," she said.

Dhar's attorney, Stephen Hrones, said it's a "complicated situation."

"There's two sides to every story," he said.

Cambridge police officer Thomas Maldonado, who arrested Dhar, wrote in his report that Dhar told him that "he went to his professor's house to talk with her about his grade." Dhar allegedly said this was his "only chance" to talk because the semester was ending.

Dhar allegedly told the officer that he followed Hooker home, staying a few cars behind her so she wouldn't notice, according to the report.

Dhar denied bringing a knife to the door.

"Mr. Dhar said she came out with a knife," Maldonado wrote. "He said 'She must have thought I was a burglar.'"

Hrones said his client is from Calcutta, India, and is in the U.S. on a student visa. His mother is a middle school teacher in New York and his father is a research scientist in India, but he has relatives in Massachusetts, Hrones said.

"He's a quiet kid who has lots of friends and absolutely no history of violence," he said.

Robert Nicolosi, Hooker's colleague in the Department of Clinical Laboratory and Nutritional Sciences at UMass-Lowell described her as a dedicated teacher who would lend students money for lunch.

"She went the extra nine yards when it came to her students," he said. "It's just amazing to me that something like this could happen to someone like her."

—Associated Press

Nikhil Dhar hides his face in court in December. He's accused of stabbing his UMass Lowell professor in her Cambridge home.

NEWS in brief

MAN STABBED AT SOUTHPOINT APTS.

AMHERST — Police are still investigating how a 24-year-old Springfield man was stabbed outside Southpoint Apartments on Saturday, Dec. 31, 2005.

The man, whose name has not been released, was treated at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield for his injuries.

"The [stab] wounds appeared to be superficial," said Det. Lt. Ronald Young of the Amherst police, who said the victim was cut in the side.

Police said the man and his girlfriend were walking back to her apartment on East Hadley Road around 5 a.m. when several individuals allegedly began to harass them. Young said the woman ran inside the apartment while her boyfriend got involved in a confrontation with the group.

No arrests have been made.

PIZZA DRIVER ROBBED AT SOUTHPOINT

AMHERST — A pizza delivery driver was robbed by a knife-wielding robber in the Southpoint apartment complex on Wednesday, Dec. 28, 2005.

More than $250 was stolen in the robbery, which occurred at 12:36 a.m. Police did not release the driver's name or the name of his employer.

The incident is still under investigation. No arrests have been made.

TWO PISTOL-WHIPPED IN MELEE

AMHERST — Two men were injured after being struck by a man with a handgun during a fight outside the Townehouse apartments in the early morning hours of Sunday, Dec. 18, 2005.

Police responded to the residence at 1:34 a.m. on a report of a fight involving over 20 people. One of the victims, a 19-year-old South Hadley man, was treated and released from Cooley Dickinson Hospital. The other victim, a 21-year-old man who lives at the Townehouses, refused medical treatment.

The fight reportedly began after several unwanted people, including the suspect, tried to crash the party thrown by the 21-year-old victim.

No arrests have been made in the case.

MAN JAILED AFTER HOBART ACCIDENT

NORTHAMPTON — A Lynnfield man was sentenced in Hampshire Superior Court to 2 ½ years in prison on Jan. 10 after he was caught with cocaine during a traffic accident on Hobart Lane in Amherst last spring.

Louis D. Navarro Jr., 20, pleaded guilty to possession of a class B drug (cocaine) with the intent to distribute it, driving while under the influence of alcohol and being a minor in possession of alcohol.

Police say Navarro backed into another car on Hobart Lane on April 10, 2005. When police arrived, they administered field sobriety tests on Navarro, some of which he allegedly failed. Police later found a total of 29 grams of cocaine on Navarro and in his car.

In addition to jail time, Navarro must serve two years probation once he is released. A trafficking conviction would have carried a mandatory three years in prison, but prosecutors reduced the charges due to his light criminal record.

We believe everyone's more successful in a flexible environment.

We want you to succeed. That's why we've created an environment that's conducive to personal and professional growth and success. At Ernst & Young we're offering an opportunity to learn from some of the best talent in the industry. So visit us on campus, or on the Web at ey.com/us/careers. Whatever's best for you. We're flexible.

Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services

ERNST & YOUNG

Quality In Everything We Do

©2006 Ernst & Young LLP

WELCOME BACK UMASS

Fire destroys apartment

Maintenance workers examine the damage from a fire that destroyed apartment 167A in the Boulders complex on Wednesday, Jan. 18. Ernesto Ayala, 36, was critically injured. Donations are requested from the American Red Cross at 125 State St., Northampton, MA 01060.

Battling Wal-Mart:
Hadley residents continue to fight

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

HADLEY — The fight that many town residents are waging against the proposed Wal-Mart "SuperCenter" is continuing.

In December, residents petitioned the Hadley Conservation Commission to block work on the SuperCenter, claiming that Wal-Mart developers had not provided adequate information about the impact the construction would have on nearby wetlands and wildlife.

David Elvin, the resident who formally submitted the petition, said that more information about endangered species on the property is necessary, and that it must be made sure that the Wal-Mart construction is not in violation of the Wetlands Protection Act.

The Wal-Mart developers have already identified and acknowledged two rare species on the land on which they wish to build, the Eastern spadefoot toad and the spotted turtle.

However, the Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development, one of several groups that has been protesting the SuperCenter since its proposal, say that "adequate rare species survey were not completed by their consultants prior to filing with the Conservation Commission. The Massachusetts Natural Heritage and Endangered Species Program has required additional surveys for these species."

On Jan. 10, the Hadley Conservation Commission ruled in favor of the 46 petitioners, declaring large plots of land for the proposed construction to be regulated wetland areas. The Wal-Mart developers did not include the fact that these areas were wetlands when they filed their Notice of Intent.

According to the Hadley Neighbors, "Under Massachusetts law, wetlands that will be altered due to construction must be "replicated," or reconstructed, elsewhere on the property. Yet the Wal-Mart Notice of Intent shows no replication plans for any wetlands now on mall property."

Despite the ruling, Commission Chairwoman Andrea Dawson still doubts the Commission's ability to halt construction of the SuperCenter. Zoning controls by the Hadley Planning Board would be the only legal way to stop the new Wal-Mart from being built.

However, now that the Commission's ruling has been made, the Wal-Mart development team will be brought before the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection. If the Hadley Commission's ruling is allowed to stand, the developers will be required to make a replication area for any wetlands they displace while building.

Many groups have joined the protest since it was announced that the local Wal-Mart planned to move across the street from its current location and expand into a 212,000 square-foot SuperCenter with a 13-acre parking lot. The Hadley neighbors were quickly joined by members of "Stop Sprawlmart" and members of local workers' unions who disagree with the business ethics of Wal-Mart stores.

Andy Morris-Friedman, founder of the No Way Wal-Mart Web site, believes it is important for those against the SuperCenter to stay on course in their fight. At a meeting held last year for those opposed to Wal-Mart, he said that it was important to focus on things that town residents could do to block the approval of plans for the new Wal-Mart. Although Wal-Mart's work ethic may be of concern, he said, it is also important to work against Wal-Mart in the areas that can affect the outcome of its proposed construction.

According to William Dwyer a member of the Hadley Planning Board, the only thing that his board can rule against Wal-Mart for is zoning violations. For that reason, the Board has requested that residents who attend meetings regarding the Wal-Mart SuperCenter voice only their concerns about zoning by-laws and keep their protests of unfair working conditions for another forum.

Another Planning Board meeting on the Wal-Mart issue was scheduled for Jan. 17, but was postponed and has not yet been rescheduled.

Man put in hospital

EL-GHORFI from page A5

Gazette reported. El-Ghorfi has been hospitalized for psychiatric reasons about 12 times in the past 10 years.

Court documents indicate that El-Ghorfi's erratic behavior has continued since the March 2004 incident. On Aug. 22, 2005, State Police were called to his mother's Shutesbury home when she claimed to fear for her family's safety after El-Ghorfi was acting bizarre.

El-Ghorfi, who had recently been released from a Greenfield psychiatric center, allegedly began threatening his younger sister, Miriam El-Ghorfi, and his mother, Cecelia Shea.

State Trooper Geraldine Hernandez, who was responding officer to the El-Ghorfi home on Aug. 22, said in her report: "[Shea] described that [Ali El-Ghorfi] was acting paranoid, pacing around the house ranting and raving. [She] related that around 10 to 10:30 p.m., 'something set Ali off' and Ali went up to his 15-year-old sister Miriam, who was sitting in a chair in the living room. Mrs. Shea said that she witnessed Ali stand over Miriam and repeatedly swing one of his arms in close proximity to Miriam's face and body as though he was repeatedly punching her. Mrs. Shea described that Ali was 'out of control.'"

In another incident that night, Shea told police El-Ghorfi cornered her in the kitchen.

The report states: "[Shea] indicated that Ali took [a] dagger and pretended to repeatedly stab her with it. Mrs. Shea acknowledged she was in fear of her safety and for her daughter's."

During an earlier alleged incident, Ali El-Ghorfi went into Miriam El-Ghorfi's workplace and told her that their "mother was the devil and that he wanted to kill her slowly."

El-Ghorfi is formerly a resident of 1001 North Pleasant Street, Apt. 10.

Judge Rup told the court she she was convinced El-Ghorfi is a danger to himself and others, is mentally ill and would not be a proper subject for prison, the Gazette reported.

New town manager coming to Amherst

By Miki Sasces
Collegian Staff

Amherst will select a new town manager this spring, replacing one of the town's most powerful public offices, which has been held for the past 23 years by the same person, and appointing only the fourth person to hold the position since its inception.

Unelected, the town manager is appointed for a period of at least five years and is accountable to the Select Board under the Amherst Town Government Act.

Reaffirmed in 2001, that act describes the manager as "the chief administrative and fiscal officer of all town agencies, other than the schools and the library," and empowers the manager with a broad array of budgetary and fiscal powers.

Indeed, it would not be completely inaccurate to describe the town manager as a mayor-like position, but with one crucial difference: the manager only executes policy, leaving policy-making to the other, more representative branches of Amherst town government.

"The town manager is responsible for all the administrative needs of the town," said Morris Singer, a UMass undergraduate and a member of Town Meeting, which is separate from and significantly larger than the five-member Select Board. "The select board sets overall policy and the town manager is responsible for making the town run."

This distinction was made again by Larry Shaffer, one of the three finalists for town manager who answered questions at a public forum on Jan. 20. Shaffer, a 30-year veteran of local government who has held various positions in towns in New York State, New Hampshire and Connecticut, answered a question on the relationship between manager and board by emphasizing tions. We would have to significantly increase the price of the meal plans to cover this reduction in revenue."

See MANAGER on page A9

Students discuss issues with UMass meal plan pricing options

YCMP from page A5

Still, many students say they wish the meal plans were optional. Students with special diets, such as vegans, and those who are simply picky eaters say they don't think the dining commons fulfills their dietary needs and would prefer to have YCMP swipes or to do their own cooking.

Although many students take issue with some aspects of the school's meal plan, many others say that their meal plans are well-suited to their needs. Sophomore Nick McKenzie, an undeclared major, says that he has never had any problems with his plan.

McKenzie has the deluxe residential meal plan, which has an unlimited amount of meal swipes with 10 flex swipes and 15 guest meals. Although McKenzie, as a sophomore, is required to sign up for a residential meal plan, he says he would purchase one even if the YCMP option was open to him.

"The way I figure it," he said, "I'm eating 10 times as much food as I would if I were at home, so that's a bargain."

Ellen Cunningham, an English premajor who, as a commuter, uses the smallest meal plan, says that she understands students' frustrations with being required to have a residential meal plan for their freshman and sophomore years but that the requirement is in place to "try to make sure that college kids, probably away from their parents for the first time, a) actually eat and b) have choices of what to eat."

As for Markle, he has spoken with Young since he composed his letter and said, "Ken Young seemed like he was interested in fixing the problems ... He told me that he would look into at least changing the overpriced Blue Wall passes for this coming semester."

Staff writer Katie Huston contributed to this report.

Mill Valley
E·S·T·A·T·E·S

Now... The lifestyle you've been waiting for...
Two, three, and four bedroom apartments in Amherst

Amenities Include:
- Minutes to campus
- On PVTA Bus Route
- On Site Day Care Center
- Victory Gardens
- Tennis Courts
- Basketball Courts
- Laundry Room
- Heat & Hot Water Included
- Wall to Wall Carpet

Reduced Move in Costs, Call Now
253-7377
Now Leasing for Fall

See us at apartments.com, rentnet.com, and apt-4-rent.com
Contact us at millvalleyestates@winnco.com
420 Riverglade Drive, Amherst
Just off Rt. 9. Take West St. (Rt. 116s) to East Hadley Rd. Take First Left onto Riverglade Drive.

We Offer:
- Washer/Dryer Hookups
- Air Conditioning
- Fully Applianced Kitchens. dishwashers, disposals
- Intercom (Entry) System
- Professional On Site Management
- 24 hour maintenance
- Courtesy patrol

GET INVOLVED IN HEALTH EDUCATION!

SEEKING VOLUNTEERS!

Call 577-5181 for more information on any of these programs.

ALANA HEALTH OUTREACH AND EDUCATION

ALANA Health Outreach and Education supports students of color in accessing health care at University Health Services, raises awareness about health issues and concerns impacting ALANA communities, promotes healthy lifestyles, and provides advocacy, education and referral services.

THE WOMEN'S HEALTH PROJECT

Be part of a group that educates students at UMass and in the surrounding communities on issues affecting women! The Women's Health Project conducts workshops on contraception, Orgasm Week, all while having a great time! Independent study credits are available. Meetings are Thursdays 6 p.m., in University Health Services Room 302, beginning February 2.

FRESH & SOBER

Fresh & Sober is an anonymous support program for UMass students recovering or seeking recovery from alcohol and/or other drugs. Students questioning their alcohol and/or drug use who would like a non-judgmental person to talk with, those seeking information about recovery and Alcoholics Anonymous, and those already in AA who can offer their experience, strength and hope to others are encouraged to call 577-5188. All calls, conversations and inquiries are confidential.

PEER HEALTH EDUCATION

In a six-credit, year-long class (Com Hlth 213/214), students train to become campus Peer Health Educators and lead workshops such as Sex Pictionary, Drug Jeopardy, Getting More than Lucky, and Understanding Eating Disorders. The class can be used for culture, health and science certificates. Register on Spire.

THE STUDENT HEALTH ADVISORY BOARD (SHAB)

Make a difference in your health care! SHAB participates in the planning, financing, implementation and evaluation of student health programs at University Health Services. Come to our first meeting of the spring semester, Wednesday, February 8 at 4:30. Call to find out meeting location.

NOT READY FOR BEDTIME PLAYERS

The Not Ready for Bedtime Players student theater troupe performs on campus Wednesday evenings throughout the academic year, as well as special performances. Lively and entertaining skits address sex, masturbation, coming out, relationship violence and much more. Check out the UMass Amherst events page website for our schedule.

HEALTH REACH INTERNATIONAL (HRI)

HRI helps international students, scholars and their families stay well through health-related information, workshops and collaborations with other organizations.

VOICES AGAINST VIOLENCE

Work with the UMass community to address violence, with a particular focus on men's violence against women. Voices Against Violence empowers bystanders to confront abusive/violent peers. Peer educators wanted!

UMassAmherst

University Health Services • Health Education Division

150 Infirmary Way (third floor) • 577-5181

www.umass.edu/uhs

Police use Facebook information against students in court

FACEBOOK from page A5

they charged the Student Government Association president with breaking the Code of Conduct and its Computer Policy. He was "conspiring against a police officer," Fisher College officials said in a statement. On page 16 of the school's Code of Conduct, it says that on the campus computer network no material can be displayed that is "offensive."

At Penn State in October, police investigated a football game against Ohio State University where students illegally rushed the field. They identified and prosecuted fans by using names of people who joined the Facebook group "I Rushed the Field at the OSU game (and lived!)."

Consequences could just as easily hit close to home. If there was a party at UMass with underage drinking or vandalism, and party goers later on posted pictures and added a group about it on Facebook, police could potentially use that information to identify a student as one of the perpetrators.

Kornbluh was surprised to learn this.

"I didn't know they could do that," she said. "I thought only kids could see it, or would want to."

Students fearful of prosecution due to Facebook should be assured that UMass hasn't taken this route to investigate crimes – yet. Also, a certain amount of discretion can be achieved. Facebook has added a "Privacy" link that allows members to set controls on what information they want seen by whom.

For example, users can check off "allow only my friends/friends of friends to see my profile." They can set controls on certain aspects, such as saying only direct friends can see their phone number. Users can also block an individual member from seeing any of their information, or even from knowing they have an account.

However, many members are not aware of this feature, or choose not to use it.

BOTTOM LINE

Whether Facebook is what it declares to be on its website: "an online social network connecting people through schools," or a breeding ground for stalkers, it has definitely exploded in popularity. Now, about 85 percent of students in schools with Facebook are members, spokesman Chris Hughes told the Chicago Sun Times.

The age group that now attends college has grown up with computers, AOL Instant Messenger was a way to communicate as far back as middle school. Now, making a new friend is as easy as a click of the mouse.

"I definitely think it adds to college social life," said Peter. "It's just an addition to AIM and the phone and talking to people."

But Horton feels that it's not an addition, it's a replacement.

"We already have AIM, e-mail, and online journals," said Horton exasperatedly. "Why do we need another online way to talk to people?"

To some, Facebook can be both positive and disturbing.

"I've definitely had my creepy moments with Facebook," said Kornbluh, remembering when a kid she didn't know knocked on her door wanting to talk to her after only seeing her on Facebook.

"But it's not necessarily negative either," she said. "You just have to be careful what information you put on there."

FACEBOOK FOR DUMMIES

HISTORY The online social network was founded by Harvard undergrads in February 2004. Now, over 2,000 schools across the country participate, 75 from Massachusetts alone.

THE PROFILE

- Can include your name, picture, address, Instant Messenger screen name, point of view, relationship status, interests, and more.
- Anyone with a college-administered email (.edu address including faculty and alumni) can join. They can see your profile if from the same school or if you are friends with the person.
- A password is required for entry.

FEATURES

- THE WALL records past comments on a "wall" that everyone can see.
- GROUPS form through common interests, can join or create. UMass groups range from "Sex and the City Lovers" to "The Captain Morgan Fan Club."
- FRIEND REQUESTS you can request someone to be your friend, they confirm or deny, and your friend count is displayed in your profile.
- POKES not clearly defined on the site, but a way to get someone's attention. "You have been poked by..."
- ALBUMS a new feature, allowing you to create albums and "tag" photos, which means you name someone in the picture and it creates a link to the person's profile.
- FRIEND DETAIL REQUESTS an explanation of how you are friends with someone, i.e. through work, family, high school, etc.

facebook POLL:

Do you have a Facebook account?

a) yes

b) no

Vote online at dailycollegian.com.

SGA and tuition

SGA from page A3

support for the motions, and will be providing transportation and possibly lodging," said Liebham.

If neither, or only one, motion is passed, SGA leaders said they will campaign on the motions throughout the spring semester and will re-present the motions to the Board at the spring meetings.

SGA President Pavel Payano is optimistic that the bills will have a positive effect, even if they are not passed.

"Our team has spoken to every trustee member, and if they vote against the motion, they will have to state their reasons why," said Payano. "We have already received a lot of press concerning the motion. At least people are talking about it, know and are aware of the problem."

In his first semester as acting President, Payano was pleased with the progress of the SGA.

"It's a lot better than before," said Payano. "Coming from a SGA where nothing really was done, a SGA filled with lots of talk and no action, it's great. We're getting stuff done, and people are noticing. Instead of asking me 'What do you guys do?' they're saying 'You're doing a good job.'"

Forums held for manager seat

MANAGER from page A7

the thick wall between the administrative and policy-making branches of local government.

The forum was the first of three in which the public would be able to provide input into the selection process, which has now come down to the final three hopefuls. Besides Shaffer, the contenders are John Musante, who holds 21 years of experience in local government and who has worked as the finance director and treasurer in Amherst since September, and Richard White, who also holds considerable experience in local government and has served in Lexington, Bedford, and Winchester in various capacities.

After brief opening remarks from each of the candidates, all of whom emphasized their extensive records of experience, the floor was opened to questions from an audience comprised almost entirely of elderly town residents. More a collegial panel discussion than a debate, the candidates often found themselves in agreement with their purported competitors. In sharp contrast with electoral contests at higher levels of government, where personal attacks can sometimes seem the norm, each candidate used his allotted time to speak only of himself and how he would serve Amherst if selected town manager.

Due to the timing of the forum – a Friday evening, and during the intersession break at that – no students were present at the event, and UMass itself received little acknowledgment.

A slight exception was to be found in Musante, who opened by recalling his first year at UMass, in 1980, living in Orchard Hill Residential Area at a time when the town had no running water due to a "dry spell." Later on, he also briefly incorporated the University into his answer to a question posed by an audience member on affordable housing, describing it as a policy area where local government and UMass had a "shared interest" due to the large numbers of students and university employees who live off campus.

While the packed Town Hall meeting room stayed filled until the forum's conclusion, two hours after it began at 7:30, a small handful of attendees began filing out at around 9 o'clock. Those who stayed until the end were treated to a glimpse of the first Amherst Town Manager, who was pointed out by the moderator and honored with a standing ovation, to which the man smiled, waving to the crowd.

THE COLLEGIAN

YOUR DAILY SOURCE FOR NEWS.

Kelley remembered as bright student

KELLEY from page A1

Sharon Kelley

Since Kelley's death, many friends have left notes of remembrance in an online guestbook set up by the Lynch-Cantillon Funeral Home. Joyce Cunniff, wrote, "We first met Sharon when she was nine and she was a member of my softball team... She was a spunky little girl and I loved that. Throughout the years, whenever I ran into her, she always greeted me with that beautiful smile of hers and a warm hello."

Even passing acquaintances were affected by Kelley's death and stopped to write their remembrances of her. However, it was her zeal in life that they wrote about. O'Ine McCabe, the mother of one of Kelley's friends, recalled that Kelley was always a "happy and friendly" person.

Fredrickson also remembered Kelley's friendly persona. "Sharon was very outgoing, upbeat, and positive. She had a sarcastic sense of humor that always had me laughing," she said.

According to her obituary, Sharon was "a gifted athlete; she was involved in a wide range of sports, from cheerleading and playing basketball at St. Charles School to skiing at Loon Mountain, sailing with her grandfather, swimming with the Boys and Girls Club swim team, skating and playing soccer."

Kelley was a pre-nursing major, set to graduate in 2007. Prior to coming to the UMass, she attended St. Charles Parochial School and Arlington Catholic High School.

The Area's Best Fitness & Health Club

UltimateFitness THE HEALTH AND FITNESS CENTER

Located in the Stop & Shop Plaza on Route 9

For more information call 253-7571

SEMESTER SPECIAL $175

FREE UNLIMITED TANNING!

First 100 to Join

Full Aerobics Program Included with Membership:
-Cardio Kickboxing
-Yoga, Pilates
-And Many More

•Nutritional Consultation •Tanning
•Sauna
•Juice Bar & Supplements
•Personal Training

Over 20 pieces of cardio including...

• Treadmills
• Bikes
• Crosstrainers
• Free weight and circuit traning equipment

NO ENROLLMENT FEE!

Now offering Aerobics only memberships

ROADHOUSE C•A•F•E

"WHERE BAY ROAD MEETS ROUTE 9"

A Healthy Place to Eat!

Mention this ad and receive $1.00 off a breakfast special!

OPEN - Monday-Friday 6 to noon Sat.-Sun. 7 to 2 p.m.

BELCHERTOWN, MA • 323-6175

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

SPRING BACK TO SCHOOL

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Collegian remembers Carroll and hopes for her safe return

There are three cabinets that stand at the entrance of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian newsroom. They are home to the archives of past newspapers put out by the Collegian and represent the vast numbers of reporters and columnists who have once, at one or many instances during this newspaper's existence, contributed to the life that is the Daily Collegian.

Look through the archives that hold the newspapers from the late 1990's and you will find numerous articles written by Jill Carroll – the 1999 UMass graduate who was kidnapped by masked men on Jan. 7 while reporting for the Christian Science Monitor in Baghdad.

Jill worked for the Collegian during her time at UMass, and it is truly difficult to put into words how humbling of an experience it is to everyone on the Collegian's staff to even mention the fact that Jill Carroll once graced the front page of this newspaper, day in and day out. It was a time before Jill moved on to tackling more pressing world issues with the Monitor and other professional, distinguished publications, a time when she was a student on this campus.

Simply put, when Jill worked at the Collegian, it was clear that she was on the hunt for the truth. Whether it was the Student Government Association, squabbles between local establishments or the opinions of Amherst residents on pressing issues, she went out and found what needed to be reported on.

When looking at the character of Jill as a reporter, it comes as no surprise that she was in Iraq to reveal the pure truth and to echo the voices of the people there.

In the world of journalism, through the overabundance of media outlets that cross the eyes of the public every second of every day, it is said that objectivity, fairness and the truth are all qualities that classify a good journalist.

Very few can actually act on those guidelines and have something to show for it, and there is no doubt that Jill is one of those who has done so throughout her career.

It is Jill's ability to report in that manner that everyone here at the Collegian strives to achieve, and it is her character that one can only hope to someday mirror.

As the entire world pleads with the kidnappers to release Jill, it has become much more than obvious that those kidnappers chose to abduct the wrong reporter. Jill represents the utter truth, and when she is released, the truth will be revealed in a fashion in which it is rarely put out. It will be real, unscripted and honest.

It will be revealed the Jill Carroll way. And within the tall, tan-colored archive cabinets at the Collegian newsroom are the works of a young Jill Carroll seeking the truth throughout her college career – an act which she has always done. An act that she was fearless in doing.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board admires the strength and fortitude that the Carroll family has shown through this time and sends our deepest sympathy to everyone and anyone related to this matter. We are looking forward to Jill's safe return.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Making torturous decisions

Greg Collins

Sen. John McCain's recently proposed anti-torture amendment highlights important issues to reflect on when discussing how to obtain crucial information to deter terrorist attacks. The ability of the federal government to accurately predict the location, urgency and ferocity of potential attacks allows American citizens to live free of pressing danger and apprehension. Refusing to consider whether the U.S. should use harsh interrogative techniques to obtain this vital information fails to take into account the threat of terrorists and the potential life-saving benefits that would come as a result from employing such security measures.

McCain's experience as a former prisoner of war offers a compelling perspective on the torture debate. One can only sympathize with McCain when he remembers the cruel and degrading treatment American prisoners of war experienced in Vietnam. This treatment exposed the utter depravity of McCain and his fellow soldiers' captors and the horrific consequences of military combat.

However, one needs to consider whether many of these American prisoners subject to inhumane treatment represented the same threats of individually carrying out terrorist attacks or harboring terrorists as the detainees held in U.S. custody do today. One crucial issue to contemplate is what legal duty America owes to unlawful combatants committing acts or cooperating in the commission of acts that are horrific to people of all religions who cherish the lives of innocent human beings. In evaluating this duty, it should be at the forefront of our thoughts that foiling murderous plots directed towards people of all faiths and ethnicities is a difficult yet noble undertaking.

McCain's views must be respected, but so should the perspectives of family members of the Sept. 11 victims, as well as the relatives of dead Kurds subject to Saddam's intentional gassing and the oppressed Shi'ites living under the former Ba'athist regime. It is hard to be absolutely certain that they would disregard particular interrogative tactics based on the proposition that it would demean their personal values or that torture "might not" get relevant information out of enemies.

The success rate of torture tactics leading to meaningful information is controversial. The Wall Street Journal reported that such interrogative techniques caused Khalid Sheikh Mohammed to reveal clandestine information which allowed U.S. security forces to foil another Al-Qaeda terrorist plot. The point here is that there should be flexible limits as to how U.S. officials obtain classified information from enemies. As opposed to torturing domestic criminals, a tactic intended to lead to a confession, the foremost purpose of torturing enemies with terrorist connections is to obtain information that could reveal the target, time, and means by which a terrorist attack is carried out.

> But those who are interrogated under intense conditions are not Muslims rounded up from the streets randomly. Torture is only used on people who already have strong connections to terrorist organizations and cells.

McCain holds legitimate concerns about using torture on a detainee who may not hold any important information. But those who are interrogated under intense conditions are not Muslims rounded up from the streets randomly. Torture is only used on people who already have strong connections to terrorist organizations and cells.

There has always been a genuine concern over sacrificing American values in any situation dealing with foreign enemies. But let's say that U.S. officials are detaining a terrorist who they are almost certain holds vital information that would lead to the revealing of a terrorist threat that could potentially kill thousands of lives. Would any one of these officials, as well as any clear-minded American citizen, conceivably refuse to use harsh interrogative techniques because they were worried about diminishing American "values?"

The Bush administration has done a poor job articulating the necessity of obtaining key information through the use of whatever interrogative methods are necessary in the eyes of those whose job it is to extract this information, such as military personnel and experienced interrogators. It has clearly expressed the threat of Islamic extremists to the American public, but the administration has not sufficiently revealed the looming threat that refusing to use necessary techniques imposes on the security of American citizens. The White House has also been hesitant to denounce the moral fallacy that certain interrogative methods compromise America's values.

Opponents of American intervention in foreign lands claim that the U.S. has no right to impose its morality on other people. How, then, can proponents of the anti-torture amendment logically proclaim a similar moral high ground when saying that torture compromises American values?

Perhaps the greatest holiday gift the federal government can provide for all U.S. citizens is the assurance that it will pursue with absolutely no hesitation individuals who intentionally target innocent civilians and who hold vital information pertaining to the security of America and the rest of the world. This is not compromising American ideals; it's reinforcing them. This is not diminishing the spirit of right-minded armies. It is upholding the very principles of humanity.

Greg Collins is a Collegian columnist.

Some reflections of Mexico

World Perspectives

Wesley Miller

The night before I was to return to the United States, I invited some friends over for a bottle of wine on my rooftop.

The temperature, at a frigid 50 degrees, was jacket weather. We did our best to reminisce, but it was clear nobody had rehearsed properly for the occasion.

It was just like any night in Guadalajara, people laughing and enjoying a drink without any regard to the concept of time. But as it grew later, I started to realize that in just a few hours it would all be over. The goodbyes were painful and the return was even more so.

Around the third month of my stay, I was starting to feel strangely content. I no longer felt compelled to criticize or reject the things around me. In short, I was starting to enjoy myself, starting to let go of the things that cemented me inside my own identity. More and more every day I was learning from the culture and slowly becoming a Latin American.

The stereotypes about Latin Americans, or more specifically Mexicans, are numerous. Some are true and others are egregiously false. Are Mexicans lazy?

Comparatively, the answer is yes, and that's an idea that takes some getting used to. Eventually, what I came to realize was that there is nothing wrong with a more leisured pace of life.

In fact, I found it strangely enjoyable. I began to relax my shoulders, assess things differently and consider what's important in life. But that's only one example.

The gas trucks in Mexico are about the most annoying things on the face of this planet. As they roll through the streets they blare loud sirens followed by "Zeta Gas." The whole thing ascends like one jagged noise up your spine. When I first arrived in Mexico it would drive me out of my skull.

On Sunday mornings I would stuff my ears full of toilet paper and wrap my head in a pillow in hopes they wouldn't wake me up. As time went on however, I began to develop a sense of humor towards the gas trucks. I would find myself laughing and singing along as if it were a good jingle. I woke up this Sunday morning to dead silence.

> The gas trucks in Mexico are about the most annoying things on the face of this planet. As they roll through the streets they blare loud sirens followed by "Zeta Gas." The whole thing ascends like one jagged noise up your spine. When I first arrived in Mexico it would drive me out of my skull.

I suppose what I'm going to miss about Mexico the most is the people. The problem with our perception of Latin America is we look too much at the government and economy (just as Latin Americans make the same mistake looking back at us).

Cultures are composed of people and their traditions. Latin Americans are highly friendly, formal and family-oriented.

One of the biggest problems I had living in Mexico was understanding the difficulty Mexicans have in saying "no" to your face. Though I found it initially offensive to be lied to, I came to understand that it wasn't intended as an insult; they just wanted to be nice to me. In a way I really appreciated it.

As I sat down in my seat on the airplane I thought back to who I was and who I am now. I needed a change and had experienced it. I knew it was going to be cold in Massachusetts. I knew it was going to be difficult trying to adjust to my old life again. I knew the pace of life was going to be fast and that people were going to be more private. I know this because it's the way I used to view reality. But people are different everywhere you go.

My best memory of Mexico is the procession of the Virgin of Zapopan. I left my house at nine in the morning and walked down to Avenida Camacho to watch the celebration. Two and a half million people showed up in Guadalajara that day from all over Mexico to watch that procession. I can remember feeling a deep, unironic sense of awe at their devotion to Catholicism, like I had wandered into some ancient world. I walked out into the street and began marching with a group of Aztec dancers. I must have looked awfully funny, but I didn't really care. More strangely, I don't think they did either.

Wesley Miller is a World Perspectives columnist who was in Mexico.

Winter break is too long

Jon Brandt

Anytime over break when someone would ask me when I'm going back to school and I would give my response, there would be an almost shocked reply. To follow up, I would agree and say our winter break is far too long. Having to watch most of my friends go back to school and sit around doing nothing for the next two weeks is an arduous task, considering by the third week in January I'm well rested and ready to get back into the swing of things.

This is a problem that happens every year. Whether it has to do with the fact that the administration is trying to pay as little as possible for heat in the coldest months or not, I don't know, but what I do know is that the winter break at UMass is far too long.

After working hard during the fall semester, most students want nothing more than a nice long break to relax and recuperate. After all the late nights, partying and general strains of college life, every student deserves a long rest. But how long do we really need?

By the third week of vacation most people have gotten their sleep cycles back and can function again. We've seen all of our friends and family and done whatever we might have wanted to do. The fourth week would be the icing on the cake to just get as much sleep as you want and do whatever else you might have in mind. However, sitting around for as long as we do is counterproductive and only hurts us as students. By the end of break I couldn't even think clearly, and when I tried to write it was like I was five years old again. Sitting around for this long puts you in such a funk that when you get back to school your brain is mush and you can't really do anything for at least a week.

> I'm sure everyone would appreciate a week off towards the end of the semester so they could come back well rested to finish it out, and it would take time off of our winter break. This really is not that crazy of a demand, and some schools, including UConn, do this already.

There are other ways the administration could delegate the time off. Instead of just having three days off for Thanksgiving break we could actually have the whole week off. I'm sure everyone would appreciate a week off towards the end of the semester so they could come back well rested to finish it out, and it could take time off of our winter break. This really is not that crazy of a demand, and some schools, including UConn, do this already.

Believe me, I am not complaining about having time off and being away from school. I work hard just like anyone else, and when Christmas time rolled around I was in desperate need of a break. But it gets to a point when enough is enough, and in order to not waste away you need to be doing something. Even having a job over the break doesn't make up for the time that we are wasting as students. By having a break this long we wind up getting out in late May, as opposed to most other schools that get out in early or mid-May. Wouldn't you much rather have more time off in the spring than in the winter? Not just that, but no one wants to be sitting around in hot classrooms or dorms when it's boiling outside. Classrooms with no air conditioning and dorms with only small fans create an unpleasant atmosphere which no one enjoys.

By the middle of January, all anyone really wants to do is get back to school so they can get back to work, see their friends again, and as I'm sure most people would agree, begin partying again. I come from a small town with nothing in it besides a couple of restaurants and a crumby movie theater. For me, there is nothing to do around my hometown, and while there is admittedly not much else to do around Amherst, there are always parties and shows going on for our entertainment. I'm sure a lot of people live in a small town like mine with not much to do, especially after most or all of your friends have already left.

The bottom line is that we have the power to determine our own futures. If we dislike something going on with the school, we can complain to our elected peers in the Senate or use other means to get the attention of the administration. Instead of listening to everyone continually complaining about how long the break is and how bored everyone is, we should actually do something about it. It might not be much just to get the issue brought up, but our voices will be heard and those in power will react. But it takes more than just one person writing an article. It takes an effort on part of all those interested in change, including you.

Jon Brandt is a Collegian columnist.

Write letters to the editor.
The whole university wants to hear what you have to say! Send letters to:
editorial@dailycollegian.com

D.C. residents need specific rights

Gilad Skolnick

It's a good thing that the citizens of Washington, D.C. are being punished — they probably deserve it. After all that they've done to us, finally we are getting our revenge.

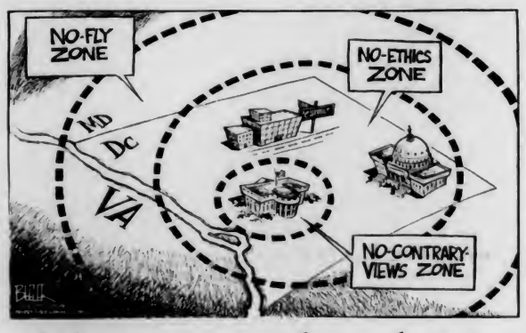
I'm not exactly sure what they have done, but it must have been something severe, for the penalties we are levying on them are great indeed. Perhaps it is because they are a rowdy bunch; every time I hear in the news that there is some big protest going on, whether it is something about abortion or that war we're having, it's always in their city. Maybe if they were mellower, like Bostonians, they wouldn't be punished so gravely.

Thankfully, they can't vote for any of their country's representatives or senators. Why should they get to vote just for living in the capital of a country that tries to spread democracy across the world? Why should our government actually let the residents that live where the leaders of the greatest democracy work and live have democratic representation? That would be outrageous.

> Thankfully they can't vote for any of their country's representatives or senators. Why should they get to vote just for living in the capital of a country that tries to spread democracy across the world?

We actually did have an entire war which led to our independence regarding that whole issue of "no taxation without representation." Now the residents of DC have on their license plates the ironic statement "taxation with no representation," but I say let them secede from the union, we don't need them.

It surprisingly took until 1960 for Congress to come up with the 23rd Amendment allowing these people to actually be able to vote for their president and vice president. Even worse, it wasn't until 1974 that they were actually able to choose their own mayor and city council rather than have the U.S. government do it, according to devotes.org. Yet for a few years, starting in 1995, Congress temporarily stripped the mayor of much of his authority.



For centuries our government has poked its intrusive hand into Washington, D.C.'s city politics and interfered with its residents' ability to elect someone to represent either their district or their nation, and probably for good reason. Some radical hippies like Sen. Lieberman have introduced acts into Congress to give the district some congressional representation, but this has failed. Despite their population, which is larger than Wyoming, thankfully we have not surrendered to their ridiculous demands to have the rights of other American citizens.

This is not to mention that the capital of one of the wealthiest countries in the world, Washington, D.C., is a city plagued with poverty. How ironic that the land of opportunity provides so little opportunity for the citizens of its capital. Perhaps in between the hundreds of millions of dollars spent on pork barrel projects, some could be spent fixing our capital — or at least on some Windex to clean our congressmen's windows so that they can see better who they are neglecting.

Washington, D.C. does not have a state with industry from which to gain revenue, and is limited in its ability to promote much industry as it does not have much land. Its main land owners are universities and the federal government, which it can't tax. Most of the wealthy live outside the city and commute, while its citizens must foot the bill for police overtime and for such things as street cleaning for their frequent festivals and parades.

I actually don't think the residents of D.C. deserve any of this, but looking at the facts it almost seems like our government is trying to punish them for something that they have done. A capital is a symbol of a nation; it is where a nation displays its pride, its greatness. France has Paris, Japan has Tokyo, Massachusetts has Boston, Burkina Faso has Ouagadougou, and the U.S. has a city denied the American concepts of democracy and opportunity that make America so great. It has as a capital a city which is in financial trouble, plagued by a high crime rate and many other terrible problems, and our country's leaders are literally turning their backs to it. I say 216 years is enough. I wish to no longer be ashamed of my nation's capital.

Gilad Skolnick is a Collegian columnist.

A home away from home

John Gruenenfelder

I could get used to these long winter breaks. Having transferred from a university in the western half of the country, it is rather new to me. Of course, ending the semester, flying across the country and enjoying Christmas morning with my family in the span of 24 hours was not quite as pleasant.

As first semesters go, this was quite good. I took interesting classes and got acquainted with an interesting campus. I met new people from class, and over lunch we discussed the lackluster state of campus dining. I learned to deal with the frequent rain, though having moved here from a desert, I was perhaps happier with it than most students. And I also learned just how tiring it is to ride a bicycle up the hills on campus.

Without actively trying, the campus community also did its best to make me feel at home. UMass has construction projects scattered across the campus, some taking far longer than initially planned. And I've even witnessed a few gaping holes dug for no apparent reason. My old school had these in spades.

One of the more amusing stories on campus last semester was the revelation by the ABC television show "Primetime" that UMass is a hotbed of criminal activity. Had I not actually been here, I may have found this troubling and, to be sure, the multiple stabbings didn't help matters. But the fact is that I was here, and I've seen Amherst for myself. People here wouldn't know a crime wave if it robbed them blind, and that's a good thing. This is a sleepy college town.

Contrast that with my previous school in Tucson. There was far more actual crime and yet I never once felt unsafe walking on that campus. Believe me, UMass has a long way to go to even reach that point. I'm a student, though, and I'm already here. I pity the public relations people who have to make some attempt at cleaning up that mess.

> Unless you happen to be a transfer student, as I am. I get to wade neck deep through the administrative maze trying to sort out my credit situation. It is in this regard that SPIRE tries to help a little too much and refuses to let you register if it doesn't think you meet the requirements.

But that's old news . . . now begins the new semester. More classes, more homework, and more bad food at the student union. This semester I will be taking advantage of the Five College program by enrolling in an astronomy class at Mt. Holyoke. When I first arrived here I was surprised that such a program even existed, but I was even more surprised by how few students seemed to take advantage of the program.

College should be about broadening your horizons, and this program gives students ample opportunity to do just that. Granted, it's a long way from a semester abroad, but a little variety can go a long way towards making a semester more interesting. Every institution has a different way of teaching. They have different bureaucratic mazes too, but fortunately students at UMass can register for these classes in the same manner we do for local classes.

Unless you happen to be a transfer student, as I am, I get to wade neck deep through the administrative maze trying to sort out my credit situation. It is in this regard that SPIRE tries to help a little too much and refuses to let you register if it doesn't think you meet the requirements. The UMass administration also seems to be less than fond of students who make heavy use of the add/drop forms, an action I will have needed two semesters running. That's not going to change, though, until the machine overlords controlling SPIRE see fit to accept my credits.

Administrative hurdles aside, my first semester at UMass has been resoundingly positive and the next is shaping up to be even more so. In a perfect world the food might get better, too, but I'll settle for a good spring semester. A crime wave to liven things up wouldn't hurt either.

John Gruenenfelder is a Collegian columnist.

Higher education free for all

Jeff Napolitano

The growing debate about educational access is not going anywhere. Tuition and fees are skyrocketing, need-based financial aid is disappearing, and both working-class and middle-class students are increasingly being shut out of higher education or forced to accumulate massive loan debt with every semester.

This crisis in educational access is garnering increased attention across the state of Massachusetts. A cover story in the Boston Globe Magazine read, "A year at UMass-Amherst now costs $15,795. Whatever happened to the affordable state school?" The Daily Hampshire Gazette ran a series noting the importance of higher education as New England confronts the challenges of the twenty first century.

Regardless of the long overdue acknowledgement of the declining accessibility of a college education, recent responses to this crisis have been sickening. The state chancellor of higher education has proposed eliminating need-based grants for middle class students and transferring that aid to working-class students. Of course working-class students need more aid, but student aid should be increased across the board.

Yet there is a timely and realistic political solution to the crisis in access: make public higher education free. In 2001, tuition and fees for all students enrolled in two- and four-year degree-granting public institutions cost 32 billion dollars, less than 3 percent of the federal budget that year. It is time to demand that the federal government foot the bill for all those who meet admissions criteria at public colleges and universities.

Mishy Leiblum is a leading activist in the Free Higher Education movement on the UMass Amherst campus. In a phone interview, she said, "Our very own Chancellor Lombardi's response to the issue of accessibility and affordability has been nauseating. His philosophy is precisely that the University do nothing in response to the declining affordability of this school. His sentiment is if you can't afford to come to UMass, then 'see ya.'"

The Free Higher Education campaign is an emerging movement that has a presence in nine states across the country. Educators, legislators and students agree that declining state funds have eroded resources for public higher education and caused a huge inflation in student fees. Yet rather than throw up our hands and call for our universities to be weaned from public funding altogether (as our own Chancellor has done), the time has come to demand new and more stable sources of public funding.

> Educators, legislators and students agree that declining state funds have eroded resources for public higher education and caused a huge inflation in student fees.

The Free Higher Education campaign calls for increased federal support for higher education for a reason. According to Leiblum, the crisis in public higher education cannot be alleviated state-by-state. States have to balance their budgets annually, regardless of long-term cycles of expansion and recession. Thus in times of recession, discretionary items — such as funding for higher education — are the first to be cut. On the other hand, the federal government has far more expansive and flexible funds: they can borrow funds against their ability to print more money.

By calling for federal funding for tuition and fees, the Free Higher Education campaign offers a new and exciting vision of what higher education can become. Yet this campaign is not without models. The much-heralded G.I. Bill provided free higher education for over 8 million veterans returning from World War II. A congressional subcommittee estimated that the G.I. Bill returned $6.90 in increased income and productivity for every $1.00 invested in the program.

Similarly, in the 1970s, the City University of New York (CUNY) system provided free tuition for all residents of New York City. A recent follow-up study of 2000 women who participated in this experiment shows that higher education compensates for childhood disadvantage and that mass education has not been accompanied by a decline in degree value, but rather that "on a national scale, greater access to higher education has been accompanied by growth in the earnings premium for a college degree."

However, due to shifting budgetary priorities within the state of New York, CUNY was forced to charge tuition. With federal support for such a program, all public higher education institutions across the U.S. could be free for all, and the advantages realized by those who benefited from the CUNY experiment and the G.I. Bill could be shared by all.

Everyone agrees that education is a good thing. Economists note that a college education leads to strong economic return; political scientists note that there is a positive correlation between education and civic participation, and we would not be here at UMass if we did not see some social, political, economic or cultural value in a post-secondary education.

Yet without increased public funds, non-ivy league public institutes of higher education will become corporate-controlled and, increasingly, machines of degree and research to the exclusion of all else. The ideal of universities as sites of critical exchange will become a mockery, and access to the information needed to navigate an increasingly information-based world will be entirely contingent on one's wealth.

If, alongside our Chancellor, our response to the current crisis in educational affordability remains a violent one of inaction, we will watch as UMass's accessibility and excellence evaporate before us. Instead, it is time we demand a G.I. Bill for everyone.

Jeff Napolitano is a Collegian columnist.

New Year's optimistic resolutions

Debbie Friedman

There is no denying that we live in a cutthroat, capitalistic world that at times shows very little compassion. Poverty, racism and competition are just a few ills plaguing the world, and sometimes it's enough to make a cynic out of everyone.

However, there is one time a year that shows that deep down, behind our masks of pessimism, we are all optimists.

Every New Year's Eve, it never fails to amaze me when I see this country huddled around television screens to watch a giant silver ball drop and listen to bad pop stars lip-sync cheesy songs. Champagne bottles are broken out, hugs are given to sometimes complete strangers and this odd feeling of elation hangs like static in the air to celebrate the passing of time.

Of course, all this celebration is not for the literal passing of time, but the theoretical meaning of a new year and a clean slate. I assume ancient Greeks came up with the idea that a new year meant a new you, as well as the whole idea of resolutions, because they seem to be at the origin of just about everything.

No matter where the tradition of New Year's resolutions came from, though, it sure is a ritual that we have all clung to.

It makes me wonder why the idea of a new year and the resolutions made in its honor are so provocative to us. Why do we put so much weight and hope into this one eve, while the other 364 nights passing by are rarely recognized at all? And what would the world be like if we never celebrated the New Year and life was just one long block of time with no annual cycle and chance to start over?

> It means that while at times things like the trouble in the Middle East seem hopeless, they are not. It means the cure to cancer might be discovered tomorrow. It means people can change for the better and dead end streets could open up.

One year goes by in the blink of an eye, yet within this string of hours that become days and weeks and months all forming a year, so much happens to us. From the people we meet and the relationships that start or end, to the tragedy we endure and the goals we accomplish.

All the seemingly insignificant thoughts and moments that occur every day build up to make memories and mold us into who we are now.

By the time we have our birthdays, go through the seasons and get through the holidays we really need to be refreshed. The number changing from '05 to '06 means very little, but the idea that a new January is starting all over and the months are recycling does a lot to the mind. The cliche quotes about an ending being a new beginning are corny but true.

So as we start over, we resolve. Now whether you resolve to lose ten pounds, get straight A's or achieve world peace, all resolutions are rooted in the same ideals, ideals that seek to fix what we feel is not up to par in our individual lives.

I do not know anyone who sees the New Year as a bad thing or resolves to do worse in life or aspire to be something negative. I can't quite imagine someone resolving to get addicted to drugs or lose their job.

And the people who welcome the New Year with a fear that this year might bring something terrible instead of hoping for the best are certainly the minority. In short, the New Year shines light on a dull and exhausted population.

Although we do live in a cynical world, I find it hopeful that all humans at their core must have at least a shred of optimism. This is a significant finding because it means all humans, even the most broken down people, have hope, which is essential to keeping the world turning and the people in this world getting out of bed every morning.

It means that while at times things like the trouble in the Middle East seem hopeless, they are not. It means the cure to cancer might be discovered tomorrow. It means people can change for the better and dead-end streets could open up.

While in life we have to learn that not everything is possible, something in us always has faith that things will work themselves out for the better. We also learn how to pull out wisdom and strength from the most painful moments in life.

These characteristics are built into every single one of us, despite how deeply hidden they may be in some. And they are characteristics that need to be embraced and remembered after you turn off the depressing evening news or have a bad day.

If only everyone's New Year's resolution was to listen to their optimistic cores more often and ignore the loud-voiced cynic inside, the world just might become a better place.

Debbie Friedman is a Collegian columnist.

THE COLLEGIAN IS LOOKING FOR COLUMNISTS.

COME DOWN TO THE COLLEGIAN NEWSROOM TO APPLY
LOCATED IN THE CAMPUS CENTER BASEMENT

High textbook prices an issue for Congress, UMass SGA

TEXTBOOKS from page A4

on certain texts.

A used book in its third year of circulation may cost $65. But when publishers revise or add certain chapters to a text, it becomes a new edition and can be sold upwards of $100.

Industry representatives and some public interest groups also suggested that publishers are revising textbooks more frequently, and some expressed concerns about the financial impact revisions have on students.

Retailers explained that when they learn of a pending new edition, typically several months in advance of the release date, the buyback value drops rapidly to zero.

The GAO's concern is that more frequent revisions limit the opportunity students have to reduce their costs by purchasing used textbooks and selling their textbooks back to bookstores at the end of the term. While publishers generally agreed that the revision cycle for many books is 3 to 4 years, compared with the 4-to-5 year cycles that were the standard 10 to 20 years ago, they said revisions were necessary to keep the materials current for faculty and to recoup their investments.

Publishers claimed the revision cycle is mainly driven by instructors who want the most current material and may seek products from competitors if publishers are unable to meet the demand.

Publishers cited a recent poll of 1,029 college professors commissioned by the Association of American Publishers that found that 80 percent of those polled think it is important that the material in the textbook be as current as possible.

The GAO also examined the long-term cost implications for students that may result from publishers providing lower-cost alternatives to the traditional textbook. Among these alternatives are loose-leaf textbooks that are designed to be placed in a binder and electronic textbooks that are available for purchase online.

While these options may save students money initially, wholesalers and retailers are concerned about the long-term cost implications for students. For example, students may initially pay less for a loose-leaf textbook than they would for a textbook that is bound, but wholesalers and retailers said students would be unable to sell a loose-leaf book back because it is not possible to determine whether all the pages are intact.

Another alternative, proposed by the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts, is the "Textbook Rental" program.

Working together with a committee of students, faculty and administrators, the SGA drafted a proposal for a pilot rental program. However, according to the SGA, Follett, the parent company that bought out the Textbook Annex nearly five years ago, agreed to deliver little savings for students while locking participating faculty into the same textbook for six years.

"In addition, students would be charged 50 percent of the cover price of the rentals each semester, which would result in a profit of approximately 300 percent for Follett over those six semesters," said SGA leaders in a statement released to the Daily Collegian.

"We encourage students to buy their textbooks from the local stores in downtown Amherst. We also encourage students to buy their textbooks directly from other UMass students using online trading sites like zoomassbooks.com," the statement said.

"By encouraging students to shop elsewhere, we ultimately would like to build enough leverage to sit back down with Follett representatives and negotiate a textbook rental system that would truly improve textbook affordability. But this won't happen this semester."

Textbooks line the shelves of the W.E.B. DuBois Library at UMass.

TIAN-SHIEN CURTIS/COLLEGIAN

Murray family presses for new information

MURRAY from page A4

gators in several months. This leads the family to wonder if the investigation into Maura's disappearance is ongoing.

The idea that Maura could still be in danger is the most compelling reason for disclosing the information because it could aid in locating her, according to the suit.

Though investigators might write off this notion because it is based on a "gut feeling," Murray insists that he knew his daughter too well to believe that she would go missing on her own accord. He believes it more likely that she was the victim of foul play.

Skepticism of the New Hampshire authorities' fortitude in finding their daughter has led the family to take the investigation under their wings as best they can. Along with continually searching the wooded area where Murray disappeared, Fred Murray has gone in search of clues in the area's local bars, hoping to overhear any information that could lead him in the right direction.

Additionally, licensed private detectives took on the case, thanks to the Molly Bish Foundation, which has partnered with the Licensed Private Detectives Association of Massachusetts. Since last year, the program has offered free investigative services to the unsolved cases of missing women, some of which date back to 1984.

The new private investigations intend to re-examine the angles of Maura's case, and re-interview everyone involved.

There is also new publicity being focused on Maura's disappearance, which might lead to a greater public outreach and efforts to help her safe recovery. ABC newsmagazine "20/20" will feature Maura's case next month.

A Web site being maintained for Maura at www.mauramurray.com says that a $40,000 reward is being offered for any information that might help Maura's safe return.

Maura had transferred to UMass from the U.S. Military Academy after spending three semesters at West Point. She was on the roster of the UMass women's track and field team and worked in a local art gallery. Friends and family described her as a quiet woman who didn't mingle much with classmates.

Maura Murray has been missing since Feb. 2004.

Deceased student had drug charges

DEATH from page A1

Bushnell says that while coping with Sandler's death is difficult, her passing inspired him and his friends — many of whom are writers and musicians — to turn their grief into something positive.

"Her passing is a release of energy we can harness and turn into [something creative]," he said.

Sandler's name was found in the Northampton District Court log from last summer when she faced charges related to possession of a class B substance (cocaine) and obtaining a hypodermic needle without a license. She was found guilty of the charges and her case was continued without a finding for one year. Sandler was ordered to continue counseling and pay fines.

Since the email was distributed, few details have been released by Amherst police or Hampshire surrounding the death.

Several messages from students on the Daily Jolt message board complained that Hampshire is usually not forthcoming with information to its students.

"I don't trust the college to tell us jack [expletive]. Remember how they didn't tell us about that assault in Greenwich?" one anonymous student posted, referring to an Oct. 6, 2005 incident at the Greenwich dormitory on campus.

In that case, a 23-year-old man from New Jersey entered the room of his ex-boyfriend while he was asleep. He allegedly strangled the victim with a nylon cord and hit him in the head with a flashlight. The suspect, Salvador Perez, has since pleaded innocent to a number of charges, including kidnapping causing serious bodily injury.

University of Massachusetts officials responded in a similar way as Hampshire officials did after one of its students, Sharon Kelley, 20, of Woburn, suddenly died on Oct. 15, 2005. Three days later, Associate Vice Chancellor Jo-Anne Vanin released an all-campus email, informing students of the death. Authorities are still awaiting a medical examiner's report.

More freshmen dorms slated for fall '06

DORMS from page A1

in areas designated for Epoch expansion will be required to change residence halls or move off of campus to accommodate for the incoming students in the fall.

Residents of Van Meter were alerted to the expansion by a letter from Assistant Director of Housing Services David C. Vaillancourt on Nov. 28. The letter stated that "all eligible Van Meter residents seeking on-campus housing for fall 2006 will be required to choose a new residence hall."

Some UMass students who lived in Van Meter and will be forced to find new housing in the fall are upset over the changes and feel that an all-freshman dorm could create an unhealthy environment for students.

"I am really upset that it is becoming all-freshmen because I think that Van Meter was one of the most age-diverse dorms on campus," said Alicia Fischweiser, who lives in Van Meter.

"I used to live in Coolidge on an all-freshmen floor when I was in the Isenberg School Residential Academic Program. I noticed that there was constantly drinking and smoking. I think the initial freedom of college for a lot of these people led them to drink constantly," she said. "I think this is a huge mistake and it will ruin the atmosphere of Central."

UMass student Pat Fitzmaurice felt that living in an all-freshman dorm made his first year more difficult.

"Living in an all-freshman dorm myself, I moved after first semester. It just made it harder to adjust, because there aren't any upperclassmen around to show how people should act," said Fitzmaurice.

Pavel Payano, President of the Student Government Association, voiced his opposition against the changes, claiming that he has yet to see any numbers that prove programs like Epoch and ISRAP lower policy violations.

"I've spoken to Residents Assistants that claim that there are more policy violations in all-freshman dorms then others," said Payano.

"I don't mind programs like Epoch," said Payano. "But I do mind making them mandatory for every freshman. We should let the students choose."

Criticism aside, the Epoch program has had a positive effect on a number of students.

"Knowing that everyone was a freshman made it easier for me to interact with people," said Moore resident Dennis Blandini. "It's easier when everyone's on the same page."

Payano plans to hold forums for students to voice their opinions on all-freshman dorms and to hear from students who have already been a part of the Epoch program.

Arab media call for Carroll's release was very highly organized. It was a setup, a perfect ambush."

CARROLL from page A1

Various news organizations, including the Associated Press, did not report Carroll's kidnapping for nearly two days after the incident occurred. The AP honored the "black out" after government agencies said reporting the story might hurt the chances of finding her alive.

No one knew Carroll's status until Jan. 17, when her captors released a 20-second videotape to the Al-Jazeera news network. There is no audio on the tape, but she is seen speaking to the camera. The tape also shows three of her captors standing over her, wearing masks and holding machine guns. She appears tired and pale in the video.

A message with the video sent to Al-Jazeera said the U.S. had 72 hours to release eight female prisoners in Iraq or Carroll would be killed. That deadline has come and gone with no word on Carroll's well-being, even with the release of the five prisoners Thursday.

Since the video was aired, a group calling itself "Brigades of Vengeance," claimed responsibility for Carroll's abduction, according to CNN.

MEDIA, POLITICIANS SPEAK OUT

Several Arab leaders and media outlets have called for Carroll's release. Many media outlets mention her commitment to telling the true story of Iraqis to Americans, a story which is often overlooked by mainstream media.

"We... appeal to the kidnappers of the American journalist Jill Carroll to release her," the Muslim Brotherhood said in a statement. "Jill... and her colleagues have come to Iraq to report the events to the world, reminding everyone of the hardships faced by the Iraqi people under occupation."

"She put her life at risk by struggling to convey the voices of Iraqis to American public opinion, which was showered with wrong information about the developments in Iraq," said Ayman Al-Safadi, editor of the Jordanian newspaper Al-Ghad, Al-Jazeera reported.

Local politicians have also called for Carroll's release. U.S. Congressman Stephen Lynch, a Democrat from South Boston, traveled to Baghdad Jan. 22 to meet with Sunni Arab members of Iraq's parliament to push for her release.

The next day, in a phone interview with the AP, Lynch reported that Carroll has the support of Iraqis.

"It's got everyone's attention," said Lynch of Carroll's kidnapping. "I think that's because of the work she was doing. She built a reputation with these people and I think they're responding to that."

UMASS COMMENDS CARROLL FOR HER WORK

Carroll graduated from UMass Amherst in 1999 with a bachelor's degree in journalism. She was the news editor of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian from 1998 to 1999.

Karen List, a journalism professor at UMass who used to teach Carroll, says Jill was a fun person to be around. "Jill is... full of energy and tremendous enthusiasm for everything she does. She laughs a lot and has a great sense of humor."

List says Carroll always wanted to work as a foreign correspondent. "Jill didn't 'ultimately' want to become a foreign correspondent. She wanted to be a foreign correspondent now.

"She told me this on the first day of the first class she ever had with me. I tried to tell her that these were positions that you worked up to after years of zoning board meetings. I didn't know at the time she wasn't listening to me," List said.

Shortly after graduating from UMass, Carroll briefly worked for the Wall Street Journal, before being laid off. A short time later, she moved to Jordan and worked for the Jordan Times. While living there, she became fluent in Arabic and immersed herself in Middle Eastern culture.

"What impresses me about Jill's work there is that she did not 'cover' Iraq from her hotel or from an armored car. She covered Iraq from the street, talking to average people and trying to give them a voice," said List.

Carroll's former employer, the Jordan Times, printed an editorial Jan. 15, which said Jill's kidnappers chose a "wrong target."

"The kidnappers who abducted her could not have chosen a more wrong target. True, Jill is a U.S. citizen. But she is more critical of U.S. policies towards the Middle East than many Arabs," the editorial said.

Joe Quinlan, an adjunct journalism professor at UMass, and Assistant District Attorney for Franklin and Hampshire counties, has fond memories of Carroll and fellow journalism student Casey Kane.

"[Jill] was in a group that really stood out," Quinlan said. "They were really into reporting and were hustling."

Kane, the Editor-in-Chief of the Daily Collegian from 1998 to 1999, died of leukemia in 2004. Quinlan says the two were good friends and "extremely dedicated" to the newspaper, often prioritizing writing news articles above doing homework.

Matthew Despres, a 2003 UMass graduate, worked at the Daily Collegian with Carroll and Kane as a sports writer. He described Carroll as the "absolute heart of the newsroom" and "a natural leader."

"She always cast a critical eye on her own work and work ethic — always working and wanting to be better," Despres said. "There is no doubt she inspired, in both significant and subtle ways, everyone at that paper to be better at their own job."

Despres is still shocked by the news of her abduction.

"There is no way to process news like this," he said. "I'm praying for her, her family, and friends."

Since the beginning of the U.S. occupation in Iraq, more than 70 Iraqi and foreign journalists have been abducted in Iraq, according to Reuters.

Carroll's parents spoke on CNN as recently as Jan. 22, pleading for the release of their daughter.

"Jill started to tell your story, so please, let her finish it," said Jim Carroll, Jill's father. "Through the media, if necessary, advise her family and me of how we might initiate a dialogue that will lead to her release."

Jill Carroll, a former Collegian editor and freelance journalist, pictured above, was abducted while working in Baghdad, Iraq.

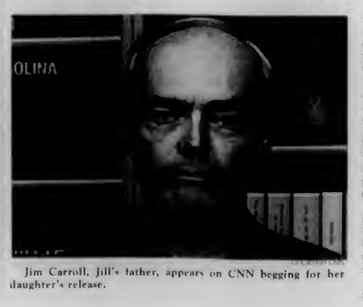
UMass student dies fighting in Iraq war

Ayman Taha, a UMass graduate student, pictured above, served the nation fighting in Iraq. He died in combat Dec. 30, 2005.

TAHA from page A1

I was struck by his quiet demeanor and confidence. I feel proud to have met such a fine young man and American hero...Ayman will never be forgotten," said Matthew Sassano of Orinda, Calif.

Taha was a devout Muslim who strongly believed in the message of Islam, which focuses on believing in God and performing good deeds.



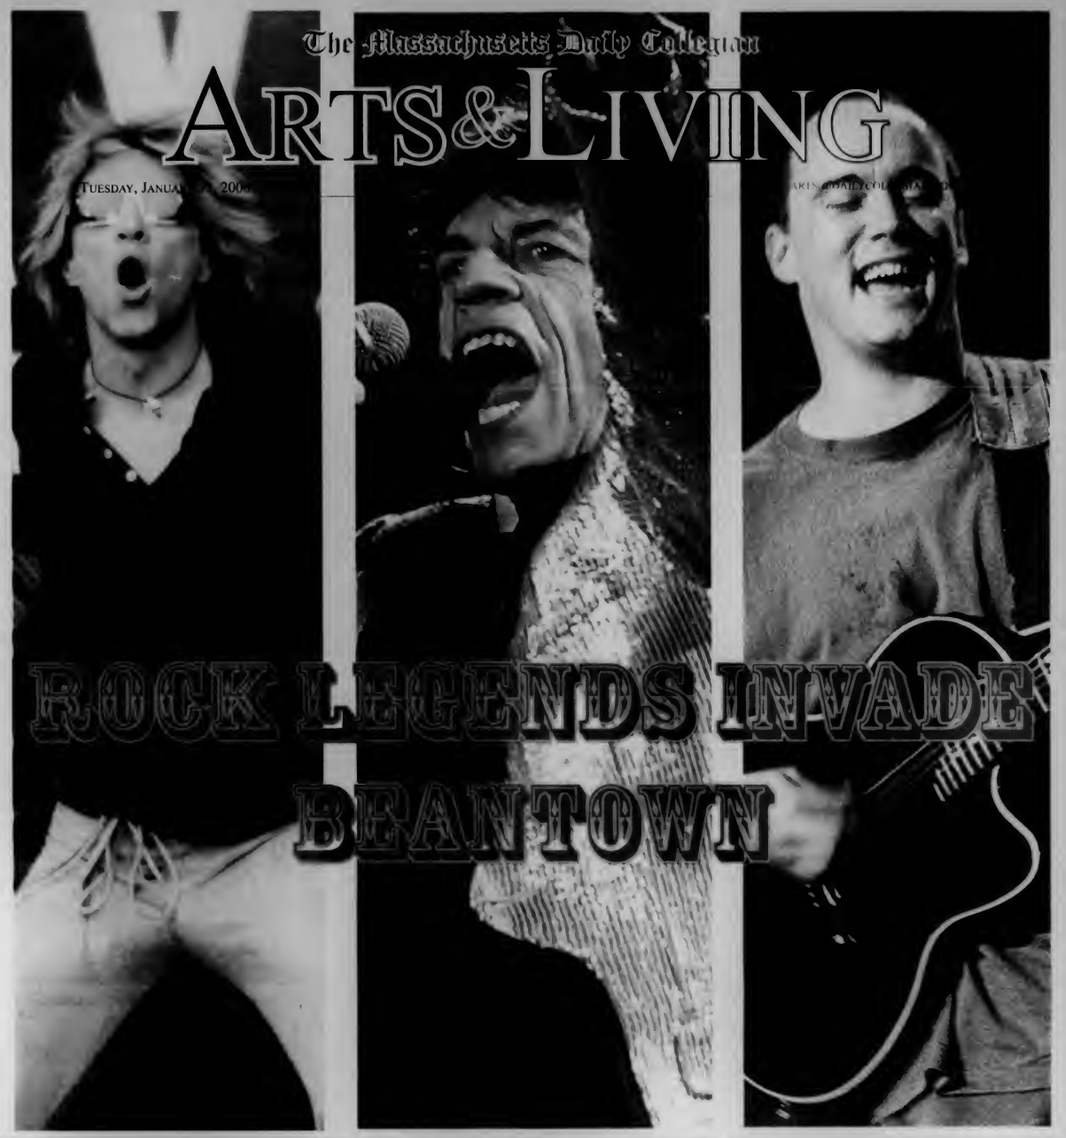
"He strongly agreed that what they were doing is good and that they were helping people in the Middle East," Ayman's father told the Washington Post.

Taha entered the Army under the 18X program, which allows choice individuals to enroll in the Special Forces Training because of preexisting skills.

While serving, Taha received several awards, including the National Defense Service Medal, the NCO Professional Development Ribbon with Numeral Two Device, the Global War on Terrorism Service Medal, the Parachutist Badge and the Special Forces Tab.

Posthumously, he has been awarded the Bronze Star Medal, a Purple Heart, The Meritorious Service Medal, the Iraqi Campaign Medal and the Combat Infantryman Badge, according to the United States Army Special Operation Command News Service.

Taha is survived by his wife Geraldine and his daughter Sommer of Clarksville, Tenn.; his parents, Abdel-Rahman and Amal Taha of Vienna, Va.; and his sisters, Rahah and Lubna, also of Clarksville, Tenn.



Jim Carroll, Jill's father, appears on CNN begging for her daughter's release.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, JANUARY [illegible], 2006 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ROCK LEGENDS INVADE BEANTOWN

Bon Jovi

By Morgan-ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Some music knows how to shine only momentarily in the rolling spotlight of pop culture. But when Bon Jovi made pop meet metal in the early 1980s, his band's classic style of hard rock learned to last as long as his good looks.

Bon Jovi's music hooks the pop crowd with its clean, catchy tunes, but gives just enough grit to grab hold of those metalheads. Upbeat and badass sans swears, Mötely Crüe could never pull it off (good choice, Heather Locklear).

One year older than my mother, Jon Bon still manages to bring a blush to her cheeks and a flush to my own when he graces the stage in perfectly (painful-not-to-reach-up-and-grope) painted on denim. The Jersey-born frontman stopped off at Boston's TD BankNorth Garden (formerly known as the Fleet Center) Dec. 10 as part of his band's "Have a Nice Day" world tour.

When you have the time of your life at a concert — with your parents — you know that the musician in question must be, eternally, an icon. I learned this first hand as my parents led my boyfriend and me through a packed arena dappled with fans of all ages, but mostly one gender: female.

When the lights dropped, the crowd went wild. Screaming women, hands on their husbands' shoulders, jumped up and down in search of Jon Bongiovi Jr., whose band appeared onstage without the leading man.

Within moments, the first notes of "Last Man Standing" resonated, and Jon's volce rose along with his image, which stood on a platform in the back of the audience. Jon bravely trekked through the crowd toward his hand on the main stage, and rocked into a high-powered set of "You Give Love a Bad Name," a song that set the energetic tone for the rest of the night.

The band rocked through hits like, "Complicated," "Born to Be My Baby," then a personal favorite, "Runaway." Bon Jovi jammed out some Petty with a cover of "I Won't Back Down." The band varied from the classics and the new hits to keep the dynamic crowd pleased. We enjoyed the latest songs like "It's My Life" and "Have a Nice Day," though I must say the real madness came alive when the foursome rocked their old stuff — the tunes we all love, like "Bad Medicine" and "Livin' on a Prayer." Jon and Richie Sambora shared vocals in an acoustic set of "I'll Be There for You." J.B.J made many fans happy that night by venturing into the crowd again for an acoustic set of "Blaze of Glory."

After about two hours of jumping, jamming and rocking the band took a bow and retreated backstage, only to reappear for an encore of eight songs that had just as much energy as the rest of their show. The band even rang in the holidays with a spirited version of "Run, Run Rudolph." Finally, they wrapped it up with a soothing set of "Wanted Dead or Alive," which ended with an exhausted Jon throwing his microphone to the ground with a satisfied grin. Then, Jon Bon Jovi and his band took a much deserved bow. For a quartet of middle-aged men, I'd say the band has maintained their rockin' vigor with a bang. And my mother would agree.

The Rolling Stones

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — For those who are superstitious, Friday the 13th is a day of bad luck. But for Rolling Stones fans, it was long awaited.

Over 13,000 people — old and young — packed the T.D. Banknorth Garden on Jan. 13 to see Mick Jagger (lead vocals), Keith Richards (lead guitar), Ronnie Wood (guitar, bass) and Charlie Watts (drums) bring the house down during the second leg of their "Bigger Bang" world tour.

With little notice from fans, who were mostly chatting in excitement, the lighting grew dark just before the set began. Suddenly, a few guitar chords began to play, resulting in a thunderous applause. The light then shined on Jagger as the band opened with its hit "Jumpin' Jack Flash."

At the end of the song, in the midst of the excitement, Jagger asked, "Do you remember when we played at Fenway Park?" The fans roared. However, the arena got even louder when the singer asked, "How many of you saw us at Fenway?"

With ticket prices between $230 and $800 for the show, the Stones still managed to nearly sell out in Boston.

The fans at the concert cheered the most when the Stones played their old hits, which included "Let's Spend the Night Together," "Honky Tonk Woman," "Sympathy for the Devil," "Brown Sugar" and "You Can't Always Get What You Want." It was during the performance of "It's Only Rock 'N Roll" when a psychedelic version of Wood appeared on the large visual monitor behind the stage.

Fans that didn't get seats near the main stage weren't disappointed with the show. In addition to the large monitor, the center stage was extended out into the audience at one point, which allowed fans sitting farther back on the floor to enjoy the show just feet away from the Stones. Everyone rushed the area, in mostly failed attempts to get the attention of the band members. Middle-aged wives ripped away from the arms of their husbands to throw themselves at Jagger and Richards. Many people started jumping up and down with excitement and the beat of the music. Almost everyone took out their camera phones to get a fuzzy snapshot of the band up close.

The concert was great way for the Rolling Stones to showcase their latest CD, "A Bigger Bang," to an audience that was largely familiar with the Stone's older hits. Richards took over lead vocals for the song "This Place is Empty," more of a heartbreaker when compared to the other songs. The band also played "Rain Fall Down" and "Oh No, Not You Again" off their latest album.

It was halfway through the set when Jagger announced, "We're performing during halftime at the Super Bowl," before saying he thinks the New England Patriots would make it into the game this year.

The Stones started to wind down the show with a somewhat-tweaked version of "You Can't Always Get What You Want," which included the powerful soulful backup singing by vocalists Bernard Fowler, Lisa Fischer and Blondie Chaplin. The band finally departed after performing "(I Can't Get No) Satisfaction," even though the crowd would have watched the band all night long if allowed.

Despite the wide range in age among the Rolling Stones' fans, just about everyone looked more than happy with the performance. There was never a dull moment as the band showed Boston they still know how to rock.

Friday the 13th certainly wasn't an unlucky day for Stones fans.

The Dave Matthews Band

By Joe Pisciotta

[illegible] Dave's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

David Copperfield makes Mullins Center more magical

By Monica Gehrman
Collegian Staff

David Copperfield has been mystifying audiences for years with his magical illusions. In addition to his live shows, Copperfield has been on numerous television networks, bringing magic into the lives of millions.

On Monday, Feb. 6, he will bring his acclaimed act to the University's very own Mullins Center with two performances, one at 5:30 p.m. and one at 8:30 p.m.

Renowned worldwide as an artist who has raised his art form, as well as many others, to new heights, lately it seems that Copperfield has performed nearly impossible tasks. For example, he made the Statue of Liberty disappear. In one show he even walked through the Great Wall of China.

During a live television special he made thirteen audience members stand together holding hands with a curtain raised. Once the curtain fell, the audience members had disappeared.

However, it hasn't always been this way. Born Sept. 16, 1956, David Kotkin started out as a young kid growing up in New Jersey. He first got interested in magic when his grandfather showed him a card trick. According to Copperfield's official website, he has been taking on these types of tricks and performing for his family since the age of 12.

He went on to be the youngest person ever to be admitted into the Society of American Magicians. Within a few years, still in his teens, he was teaching a class at New York University.

Over the years Copperfield helped to pave the way for fellow magicians and illusionists like David Blaine and Criss Angel, who has his own show, "Mindfreak," on Vh1.

In 1983, Copperfield was executing an onstage illusion in which he weightlessly flew with a lady from the audience in his arms. His flight illusion was considered by experts and historians of magic to be the greatest illusion ever performed on stage.

In the past decade Copperfield is said to have grossed about $1 billion and has reached over 20 million people around the world. He is currently the only magician to have a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

Copperfield holds the Broadway record for his show "Dreams and Nightmares," which sold more tickets and grossed more money per week than "The Lion King," "Cats," "Phantom of the Opera" and "Chicago" even during their highest selling weeks.

In 2000, Copperfield was named a living legend by the U.S. Library of Congress. Copperfield also has worldwide appeal, which is proven by the fact that he has appeared on stamps in four different countries.

Copperfield started a rehabilitative program called Project Magic. This program helps strengthen dexterity and motor use in disabled patients by using simple sleight of hand magic. Project Magic has been implemented in over 1,000 hospitals and over 30 countries throughout the world.

Even with time off, Copperfield has been constantly working on new illusions and now has a new show that he is performing around the world called "An Intimate Evening of Grand Illusion." This show has been said to bring dreams to reality using state-of-the-art wizardry.

Copperfield is and has always been a man of entertainment. He dabbles in the world of magic and illusions. He does the impossible and has constantly evolved over the years. This show will do nothing but impress and shock its viewers, and Copperfield will try to make his audiences believe in the unbelievable.

Tickets to Copperfield's upcoming performance can be purchased at the Mullins Center or online at Ticketmaster. Remember to be prepared for the unexpected.

David Copperfield
Mullins Center
Feb. 6
$55
$50
$45

Legendary magician David Copperfield will appear, with his illusions, at the Mullins Center on Feb. 6.

Comedy 'king' D.L. Hughley brings laughs to the FAC

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Last semester, comedian Mo Rocca came to campus and performed at the Curry Hicks Cage as part of Welcome Back Week. But this semester, someone bigger and better is in store to perform. One of the "Original Kings of Comedy," D.L. Hughley, will be performing on Feb. 4 at the Fine Arts Center at 10 p.m.

Hughley's style of comedy is much different than Rocca's. While Rocca has more of a political style, Hughley's comedy tends to reminisce on childhood and parenting style. This approach has gained Hughley much success in his career.

Hughley's childhood is often the main focus of his comedy routines. But by no means is it funny in the biographical sense, it's actually more or less tragic. He grew up in South Central Los Angeles in a gang-filled community. His father was an airplane mechanic and his mother was a homemaker. In his teenage years, Hughley was expelled from school. Hughley was also in a gang called the Bloods. But after the shooting of his cousin, Hughley gave up the gang life and made one of the best decisions of his life.

He decided to apply himself in life by going out, getting his General Equivalency Diploma and becoming a telemarketer for the Los Angeles Times. While working for the Times, he met his future wife, LaDonna, who motivated Hughley to try a career as a comedian. this was his best decision.

After being a comic for a relatively short time, Hughley was picked to appear on HBO's "Def Jam Comedy Hour." From the success of his appearance on HBO, Hughley was selected to be the first host of BET's "Comic View" in 1992. Seven years later, he went on to tour with Cedric the Entertainer, Steve Harvey and Bernie Mac, which became one of the most successful touring acts of the year.

Director Spike Lee documented two days of the tour and later turned the footage into the movie "The Original Kings of Comedy." Lee's concert movie was released in 2000 and went on to make over $50 million at the box office. It can still be seen numerous times a month on Comedy Central, rivaling the less humorous "Blue Collar Comedy Tour."

In 1998, Hughley became a household name after he was allotted his own television show on ABC, simply titled "The Hughleys." This show was based on Hughley and a fictional wife raising a family. The show was a hit, first on ABC for two years, and then later when it was picked up by UPN for another two years. The show can still be seen in syndication on various networks all across America.

Throughout the run of his television shows, Hughley continued performing stand up. Hughley has made two HBO specials with his material. He has also released CDs and DVDs of his stand up act, both are critically acclaimed national best sellers.

Hughley has also been in numerous movies. Lately he has been in the sequel to "Inspector Gadget" as well as the third "Scary Movie." In 2006 he will be seen in "Doubting Thomas" and heard in "The Adventures of Brer Rabbit" as the voice of Brer Rabbit.

Between the television specials, his movie career and selling out venues across the country for performing stand up, D.L. Hughley is definitely one of the most popular acts to come to campus in a very long time. Tickets for the University of Massachusetts students are on sale now for only $10 with a valid UMass ID. Tickets for the Five College Students go on Feb. 1 and will cost $15. The general public can also buy tickets for $20.

D.L Hughley
Fine Arts Center
Feb. 4
$10
$15
$20

Comedian D.L. Hughley is performing at the Fine Arts Center as part of the welcome back celebration.

SLEEPY HOLLOW BED CO., INC.
MATTRESSES • FUTONS • BEDS • ETC.
www.Sleepyhollowbed.com

STUDENT SPECIALS
1991 UMass alumni owner operated
Amy Farber
VOTED 1
★ BEST OF THE VALLEY ★ READERS POLL 2005 ★ ADVOCATE POLL 2004 ★ ADVOCATE POLL 2003 ★ MATTRESS STORE
Futon Mattresses
Symbol MISMATCH MATTRESS
From $99.00
From $169.00
Sealy
Fast Free local delivery
Futon Frames
From $175.00
Platform Beds
From $199.00
Student Friendly Specials
Look for our brochure in the campus center next to the information booth

Did You Know
Sleepy Hollow's owner is responsible for creating the category "Best Mattress Store" in the Valley Advocate Reader Poll in 2003 and has won the title #1 every year.
The Sleepy Hollow original logo only had 1 star and 1 moon. The Daily Collegian staff can take credit for adding more stars, moons, & planets to this now familiar local design.
Sleepy Hollow has requested to bid for the mattress contract associated with the new dorms at UMass expected to open this fall.

How Do I Get There
From Northampton: Take Rt. 9 Eastbound
1. Go PAST the Hampshire Mall
2. At Amherst College continue straight
3. We are 1.7 mile from the purple bridge on the left to the Spirit Haus
328 College St. Amherst (413) 253-BEDS(2337)
Monday-Thursday 10-6, Friday 10-7, Saturday 10-6 Sunday 12-4

CAMP DanBee
Summer Camp counselor on campus interviews for premier girls camp in the Berkshires Positions available for talented, energetic, and fun loving students as counselors in all Team Sports, all individual sports such as Tennis & Golf, Waterfront & Pool Activities, and Special Activities including Art, Dance, Theater, Gymnastics, Newspaper, Rocketry, Radio and more. GREAT SALARIES, room, board and travel.
Camp Dates: June 17th - August 12th.
Apply On-Line Now!
www.campdanbee.com
For further information: 1-800-392-3752, Ginger@campdanbee.com
Interviews will be on campus Thursday, February 16th, 2006, at the "Summer, Co-op and Internship Fair" in the Campus Center Auditorium, from 10am-3pm.

Shopping for a Health Club?
Do your homework first!
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS CLUB
Has it ALL for you!
JOIN FOR THE "WINTER SPECIAL"
15 wks $209
$377 couple $188
www.Hampfit.com
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
WHAT DO YOU GET?
Full Sized Indoor Pool • Aqua Aerobics
Cybex Nautilus Circuit • Cybex Free Weights
Full Court Basketball • Volleyball • Indoor Tennis
Cardio • Saunas • Indoor Cycling
Jacuzzi • Yoga/Pilates • Aerobics/Step/Bosu
COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL WITH JERRY MONDAY & THURSDAY 6-8 PM
NO INITIATION FEE OR LONG-TERM CONTRACT NECESSARY
90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill) Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10PM MON-FRI • 8AM-9PM SAT & SUN

Making it work is all about compromise

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

There comes a time in every relationship when your partner's quirks, which were originally cute and endearing, become annoying and just seem to clash unendingly with how you, yourself, want things to be between the two of you.

For example: Over winter break, I know a lot of you probably dealt with some kind of distance between you and your love interest. This highlights one of the biggest differences between girls and guys: phone etiquette. Most girls talk the same way on the phone that they would in person. Most guys talk on the phone as a way to make plans, say "How are you?" and, unfortunately for us phone-loving girls, not much else. It's very common for girls to become annoyed that the guy they like doesn't call them, doesn't call enough or doesn't talk for long enough. But have you ever stopped to think about just whose quirk (for lack of a better word) this is? If the girl didn't value talking on the phone as much, it wouldn't be a problem. The problem lies with both parties.

Which is a perfect segue to my next point: both you and your lover have to be willing to sacrifice, also known as compromise, in order to make things work. Guys, would it really kill you to talk on the phone a little longer once in a while? Or even just to listen to your girl talk? Though you may not realize it, girls are usually just looking for you to listen to them. And girls, would it kill you to try to understand that maybe your guy really doesn't like talking on the phone? Consider cutting him some slack.

Compromise isn't just about giving up what you value in order to make someone else happy. It's a two-person effort at making the relationship more pleasurable for both of you. And in today's society, which no longer says a woman's place is in the home, most guys and girls will find that having a motto of "my way or the highway" doesn't get anyone too far. This isn't to say that everyone wants a relationship where equality is valued. Some girls are happy submitting to their guy; likewise, some guys are happy being what others call "whipped" for their girl — but for most of us, learning to compromise is a huge step for maintaining a happy relationship.

However, compromise only works when two people value and accept one another's differences. This can be difficult. It's the difference between someone saying, "We have nothing in common" and saying, "She/he brings so much to our relationship." Some people will be happier finding someone who has got almost the exact same interests as themselves. Some people will want their ideal partner to have some things in common as well as their own interests to add to the relationship. That's why it's important to know who you are before you commit to a relationship. Otherwise, how can you know what you want in a girlfriend or boyfriend?

With both personal sacrifice and compromise, it can be tempting to complain. It's nice if a guy says he'll watch one of your favorite girly chick flicks with you. It's not nice if a guy says he'll do that, and complains the whole time, "These movies are so predictable." "I can't believe I'm watching a chick flick." And afterwards, the girl doesn't like to hear you complain to your buddies about how you had to watch a chick flick.

You know why? Because if you really hate it that much, and we're going to have to deal with you complaining about it, then we don't want you watching it with us. In our minds, we wanted you to watch because we wanted to watch something we love with a person we love. Also, if a guy can keep his mouth shut, then we're much more likely to watch "Star Wars" and "Scarface" with you. And guys? If we ask how you liked it, all you have to do is get a half-smile on your face, and say, "I mm, it wasn't my favorite" and we'll know that you hated it. But we'll be happier with you because we know you suffered through it for us, and were manly enough not to complain. And when your girl is happier, you'll be happier — in bed.

It's no newsflash that every now and then, making relationships work is hard. Question yourself: How willing are you to accept another person into your life? How willing are you to alter your single lifestyle in order to make room for what might make another person happy? Life is much more exciting, interesting and fulfilling when you choose to let another person into your heart. But it also means considering the other person's preferences and individuality instead of just your own, and learning how to balance that with time for yourself — that way, you'll still get to enjoy the things you like to do that maybe your partner doesn't.

GOT QUESTIONS FOR HANNAH? EMAIL LOVERSONLY@GMAIL.COM

'Glory Road' fails to showcase strengths

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

Every filmmaking disaster can be a learning experience for Hollywood. Future films can benefit from examples of what not to do. "Glory Road," the newest disaster from Walt Disney Pictures, like all bad films, can serve as a wake up call for all future sports movies.

There's nothing wrong with the basic story of "Glory Road." It's about an unknown coach who takes an unknown team, full of headstrong, rebellious players, to the NCAA Championship. The reason why it is interesting to us is because it takes place in 1965 and seven of the players are black. It's an original story idea, because there have been few films made about race relations in college basketball.

"Glory Road"
Directed by James Gartner
Josh Lucas
Derek Luke
John Voight
Walt Disney
Rated PG
106 mins.
Grade C-

Josh Lucas stars as basketball coach Don Haskins in James Gartner's "Glory Road," a film that explores the issue of race relations in college sports during the 1960s.

Don Haskins, played by Josh Lucas, is the new coach. His origins are somewhat dubious. In the first scene of the film Haskins is standing on the sidelines yelling, "You guys are playing like girls!" Then we see that the people he's yelling at are part of an all-girls high school basketball team. Once he's hired to coach the Texas Midwestern Miners, a college basketball team, he recruits seven black players. How he feels about the challenge of coaching college basketball straight out of the high school playpen is never discussed. How he feels about the racist world of 1965 is never discussed. Don Haskins glides through this film like Superman with a halo around his head. He doesn't show us one ounce of humanity. The players are no different. They win game after game, losing only once the entire season. "Glory Road" feels like one accomplishment after another, one high after another. When they get to the championship they are pitted against Kentucky, coached by Jon Voight.

Voight's performance, although he's hardly in the film, is outstanding. The other notable star in the film is Derek Luke, whom you may remember as the kid from "Antwone Fisher," overacting with enough self-confidence to make us roll our eyes.

The basic flaw of "Glory Road," that feeds all the other problems, is that it is rated PG. Therefore, all the race relations are watered down. Half of the film passes before we even see a racial epithet. Only then are we finally reminded this film takes place in 1965. If the filmmakers won't deal with the race conflict, what will they entertain us with? The answer: imitations of good sports movies. Like Gene Hackman in "Hoosiers," Don Haskins stresses fundamentals at practice. Like "Coach Carter," he cares about the player's grades. Similar to "Friday Night Lights," one player has an ailment that prohibits him from playing. "I'll die if I don't play," he says. But unlike the aforementioned films, none of these conflicts are brought to fruition. They are sprinkled on top of the racial conflict until the pith of what we are interested in tasting becomes tasteless.

The third act of the film, the last half-hour, is fairly decent. When Haskins says he's only going to play the seven black players at the final game, it's a fantastic plot point. It renews our faith in the film. The final game holds our attention and feels different than the predictable slop that we've been shaking our heads at for an hour and a half. It makes blatantly clear what a true tragedy the filmmaking of "Glory Road" is. It's a film that doesn't have the guts to grab us by the shirt collar and say, "This is what the race conflict in college sports was like in 1965." Instead, we see right through the film to the timid screenwriter who shied away from conflict in exchange for something freeze dried and packaged according to Hollywood standards.

If you're going to see "Glory Road" for great basketball action, be aware that in a film with dozens of shots, there are only one or two interesting plays. "Glory Road" insults us with its lack of originality and its predictability. We learn from it that a film can't just have glitz. It needs to showcase its strengths, tell the story that interests us and then, finally, have some guts.

LONG RADIO
Quality Sales, Service, and Installation
Audio Video
'05 models must go!
Only through February
First come first serve!
Audio
Video
Satellite Radio
NAV
Remote Starter
Alarms
Radar Detectors
Lazer Detectors
Performace Parts
30 Russell Street Hadley, Ma 01035 413-584-3259

All The Ingredients for...
A GREAT SCHOOL YEAR
SUPER STOP & SHOP
•Full Service Pharmacy
•Dunkin Donuts
•Film Developing
•BOAR'S Head Deli Meats
•Floral Shop
•Back to School Supplies
•Natural Foods
•Vitamins
•Fresh Bake Shop
•Party Platters
Use Your Stop & Shop Card for Check Cashing and Savings!
OPEN 24 HOURS
ROUTE 9, HADLEY
253-3227

The DV Den
320 College Street
Amherst, MA
413.253.3383
DVDEN.TV
The Valley's first and only DVD Rental store!
Can't find that movie for class? We probably have it!
Featuring:
•The Criterion Collection
•Foreign and eclectic films
•Adult films
New DVD repair service
Bring in this ad and rent any DVD for $1.00
One Per Customer Expires 3/19/06
DVDEN.TV

BRMC gears up for Pearl Street

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

When the Black Rebel Motorcycle Club released its first, self-titled album in April 2001, musicians everywhere stopped and stood still. This was music — music that you hear about in movies, music that you dream about in dreams. It must be a fluke, an illusion to ears. These illusions, known as "cambiata illusions" in the scientific world, catch many music listeners off guard but are very much present. The illusions are around when we consider how everyone fell under the spell of bands such as Limp Bizkit or the Black Eyed Peas...(groan). People threw the album to the side and said to themselves, "Nah, this is too good to be in existence. Music like this simply does not happen." And so life went on.

Until 2003. This was the year that the Black Rebel Motorcycle Club (BRMC) released album number two, "Take Them On, On Your Own." Ears across the world were hearing things that simply could not be. People remembered the poignant name of the band they cast aside years before.

This was not a stroke of luck — maybe naming a band after Marlon Brando's motorcycle gang in "The Wild One" wasn't a risk after all. Heavy guitar chords, deafening bass lines, catchy drum beats and lyrics that went along perfectly with the band's name. It was cool and smooth, but rocking and with a kick at the same time. Then why did it sound so different?

The answer to this question lies with the album itself (obviously). American teenage youth had been floating around for years, desperately grasping for something concrete to hold onto. They were a lost troupe, a clan of thousands itching for something loud and growing and black and BANG. Kablamo! Robert Been and Peter Hayes, friends from a San Francisco high school, met up with drummer Nick Jago in 1998. Originally called the "Elements," the trio was solid from the start. They were young, willing and off to a great start.

BRMC
Pearl Street
Noho
Feb. 15
$15
$18

Songs such as "Stop," "Six-Barrel Shotgun" and "Rise or Fall" pull together to make the album absolute. Watching this band and hearing what they produce is almost like looking into what a 13-year-old boy dreams of at night — besides Jenna Jameson, at least. The music is dark and mysterious, but this all pales in comparison to the category of cool that the BRMC seems to have almost tied a rope over and yanked.

For the next two years, boys and girls alike waited for the group's new release in 2005. Bands only skyrocket once in a while, and thousands across the nation waited in anticipation.

"How big would they get?"

"How could you possibly beat out that last album?"

Reviews after the release in August 2005 had a dim outlook. Sure, the BRMC were back, but they quieted down and traded the harsh electric instruments for old acoustic guitars. In 2005, the band turned acoustic.

The story is all too similar — band grows, band rocks, band sees a bright future, band grabs hold of acoustic instruments and band's popularity peters out.

Not that this is solely the case with BRMC. Many faithful fans still hold dear to the new "HOWL" album and claim it as gold. To these followers, a stern dose of reality is needed.

Many rumors floated around as to what caused the band to turn quiet. Some people thought the band feared they were going to be targeted as following the same musical styles of the Strokes. Others thought that the band was relaying a change they thought was important in all bands: a progression from electric to acoustic is as important as the change from youth to maturity.

To more level-headed people, the answer is simpler. The band was looking for a change. They discovered the fruits behind the image of a cool rock band, and were satisfied. Now, they looked for other rocks to be uprooted. Acoustic rocks.

The band sets its sights for Pearl Street on Feb. 15th. Of course, they will be playing songs from their whole selection. It would be un-BRMC if they didn't. All should attend.

Black Rebel Motorcycle Club, named after Marlon Brando's motorcycle gang in "The Wild One," have traded in their electric guitars for acoustics, but will still put on a rocking show at Pearl Street.

Your Mom comes to NoHo

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Some bands just never seem to stop working; they just keep touring, writing new songs, recording them and touring again. An example of one these bands is Say Hi To Your Mom, who returns to Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall for the second time in six months on Feb. 2.

But unlike their last visit to Northampton, this time the band will be performing all new material. Say Hi To Your Mom spent the month of December in Lake Bancroft, working on a new album to follow up last year's "Ferocious Mopes."

Say Hi to Your Mom
Iron Horse
Noho
Feb. 2
$10
$13

This release will be the band's third album in three years, a feat unmatched by almost any other band in existence. On top of that, the band releases all of their music on their own record label, Euphobia Records. If touring endlessly and making new albums annually isn't enough, having their own record company makes the band have to work extra hard to get their music heard.

According to the band members, the new album currently has ten songs and allegedly sounds different than the rest of Say Hi To Your Mom's back catalogue.

"The record may or may not be a concept album, a loose concept at least. It also may or may not be about vampires. It probably will actually, but not creepy goth vampires, just people like you and me who happen to get their nourishment from drinking human blood," said Eric Elbogen, the leader and brain trust of Say Hi To Your Mom on the band's Web site in December.

As of press time, the album has no title. Elbogen has reported that the original name for the album has been thrown out due to the discovery that another band already used the name for one of their albums.

With this new album, more tours will follow; the band will get a chance to revive their push for the mainstream. MTV showcased the band once; they could do it again. Newspapers all across the country are writing features on them, and they are even starting to gain some radio airplay. Nevertheless, the threat of mainstream success means little to Elbogen.

Maybe it means something deep down, but Elbogen's sarcastic sense of humor will never show it. "I'm hoping this 4th Say Hi record will be action-packed with more gooey hooks than ever before because I would be heartbroken if a song didn't make it on 'The O.C.' before it gets cancelled. That's what happened with 'Buffy,' and I'm still losing sleep over it," Elbogen said.

Originality and sarcasm have always been important aspects of Say Hi To Your Mom. Their live show will continue on this theme, with Elbogen packing his best sarcasm and songs and bringing the music to the masses. No comments have been made as to whether Elbogen and company will perform any of the band's new material, but one can only speculate that they will, since they toured the old material to death.

Also playing that night is the band Calla. Calla is less sarcastic and robotic sounding than Say Hi more dramatic situations. Say, for example, a sadist severing the Achilles' tendons of his victim and then amusing himself by letting his victim attempt an escape — which, in Eli Roth's "Hostel," is one of the less grisly torture scenes.

American youths Josh and Paxton, together with their Icelandic friend Oli, backpack through Europe in search of places where illicit substances aren't illicit and the local women are embodiments of the uninhibited foreign chick stereotype. When Amsterdam doesn't satisfy their appetite for women, they take a tip from an oddball stranger and visit a shady Slovakian village, where a plethora of nubile ladies were said to be ripe for the plucking. But the hostel where the collegiate fellows are staying is soon revealed to be a front for a very insidious operation indeed, and the backpackers soon pay dearly for their misogyny and avarice.

Eli Roth first made a name for himself with "Cabin Fever," an immensely clever and playful spin on (and homage to) eighties-era gore-terror flicks. But, while the likes of Craven influenced Roth's first feature, "Hostel" is clearly derived from modern did-we-really-need-to-see-that horror, the champion of the genre being the Japanese director of "Audition" and "Ichi the Killer," Takashi Miike — who has both a cameo appearance and a "special thanks" credit in the film. Also on the list of notable filmmakers guiding a promising rookie in his craft is none other than executive producer Quentin Tarantino, who developed the script with Roth and was rewarded with an easily-identifiable in-joke.

"Hostel"
Directed by Eli Roth
Jay Hernandez
Derek Richardson
Lions Gate Films
Rated R
C

"Hostel" has many of the same qualities as "Cabin Fever." It uses the audience's knowledge of its subject matter to its own advantage, tugging the viewer along giddily from scene to scene. Its protagonists converse in a manner that simultaneously endears us to them and repulses us with their grotesque personalities. But Roth is clearly more adept at making movies like "Cabin Fever." His sense of humor tends to clash with rather than complement "Hostel's" morbid tone, and since the students are all obviously destined to be victims from the beginning, there is a lessened element of suspense.

The explanation for the torture is left under wraps until the end of the film's second act, and is revealed in a sickeningly memorable monologue. The incentive of the torturers reflects upon the sins of the tourists, their seemingly insatiable lust not unlike their enemies'. The motivation for the villains also parallels the tastes of horror movie audiences. The filmmakers and viewers of "Hostel" seem to realize the same troubling prospect. It's getting more and more difficult for a horror film to shock its audience, to shake the foundations of a viewer's sensibilities.

Like bacteria quickly developing immunity to increasingly powerful antibiotics, audiences are becoming bored with traditional scare tactics at an alarming rate and filmmakers must struggle to create even more depraved films. If a scene depicting a teenager being forced to humiliate herself metamorphosed into "Hostel's" optic nerve scene in only 34 years, how much longer does the shock horror film have before it runs out of taboos to break?

Fans of "Cabin Fever" would do well to see "Hostel." enjoy its respectable amount of good qualities and hope that Eli Roth returns to movies better suited to him sooner rather than later. And any horror movie buff, provided she can stomach the movie, might want to see it because of its possible claim to fame as an indicator of its genre's mortality.

(Below) Three young men contemplate the prospects of the two women behind them before being mercilessly tortured in a small Slovakian village (above) in Eli Roth's gruesome thriller, "Hostel."

Excellent 'Broken Flowers' released on mediocre DVD

Don Johnston (Bill Murray), the aging ladies' man in Jim Jarmusch's "Broken Flowers," sits to reflect on past loves.

By Michael Deehan
Collegian Staff

Continuing his recent trend of fine leading performances, Bill Murray once again captures the melancholy and longing of middle age in his portrayal of Don Johnston in Jim Jarmusch's "Broken Flowers." Murray's aging Lothario receives an unsigned letter from a former flame telling him that he has a son. At the behest of his nosy neighbor, Winston (the hilarious Jeffrey Wright), Don begins a journey across the country to seek out his old girlfriends and discover which one is the mother of his child. The bizarre expedition leads to several awkward encounters with women of every stature than the juvenile Don.

The film is filled with small parts played to big laughs by talented stars: Sharon Stone, Julie Delpy, Frances Conroy, Jessica Lange, and Tilda Swanton play woman from Don's past, some happy and some not so thrilled to see him. The women's roles are barely more than cameos to bounce off of Murray's dour, aging playboy, but each one is unique and lends the film an episodic feel. Murray consistently shows he has what it takes to give a spectacular performance while retaining his trademark humor.

The film's soundtrack, a collection of smooth and moody atmospheric pieces from the Greenhornes, Holly Golightly, Mulatu Astatke, Marvin Gaye and others, sets all the right tones to fit Murray's tart but hopeful performance.

The bonus features aren't very in-depth, with only a trailer, a short interview with the director, an extended version of one of the more annoying jokes in the movie and a collage of outtakes and on-set hijinks. The collage piece is the only feature worth noting, as it shows what it must be like to work on a film set with Bill Murray's constant one-liners. The interview with Jarmusch explains very little of his directorial philosophy, but succeeds in showing how much of an extraordinary creep Jarmusch can be.

A director's commentary, something that would normally be welcomed on a DVD like this, may have been left off due to Jarmusch's intention to make the film as open to interpretation as possible, or just because he's far to strange a personality for mainstream audiences to deal with. A commentary track by Murray would have been a nice inclusion, but unfortunately we're left with little more than a barebones disc.

"Broken Flowers" is a great example of a visionary director's quirky script brought to life by a cast of extraordinary actors and brought to the small screen in a mediocre DVD.

DMB celebrates Christmas in Boston

From DAVE on page 1B

to the crowd's delight. As the guys were coming back on stage, a few fans in the front row had thrown a Santa hat and a pair of giant plastic sunglasses on stage. What concert around the holidays would be complete without some sort of traditional song? The band didn't disappoint, and they performed a wonderful version of "The Christmas Song," complete with Dave dressed in the Santa hat and giant glasses. As an absolute last hurrah for the evening, the band played one of their signature tunes, "Ants Marching," and they brought the house down. The band sent their fans off into the night humming both old and new songs, and knowing that they were given an early Christmas, Hanukkah/Kwanzaa present with the opportunity to experience a unique concert.

There are a couple major events on the band's horizons, most notably a Caribbean Cruise getaway to the Bahamas in early February. Fans lucky enough to get tickets will be treated to three full days of music, including a special "secret" concert from DMB on the island of Nassau. There are also rumblings of a new studio album in the works, and the possible release of a new acoustic album from Dave and Tim Reynolds. Whatever the outcome is, fans will undoubtedly wait with bated breath for what the band does next, but rest assured they'll be back later this year for yet another round of sensational summer concerts. It's not officially summer until the Dave Matthews Band hits the road. You can bet I'll be there, and hopefully you will be, too.

Dave Matthews works the strings of his acoustic guitar, to the delight of his legion of loyal fans.

Save $$ on Textbooks at the Jeffery Amherst College Store

All These Courses and More at Discounted Prices:

Astronomy	101-2	The Solar System
Astronomy	114	Stars & Galaxies
Biology	101	Introductory to Biology
Biology	102	Intro to Animal Biology
Biology	285	Cell & Molecular Biology
Chemistry	101	General Chemistry
Chemistry	110	General Chemistry
Chemistry	262	Organic Chemistry-non majors
Chemistry	111	General Chemistry I
Chemistry	112	General Chemistry II
Chemistry	261	Organic Chemistry
CMP Science	105	Computer Literacy
ECE	232	Hardware Organization & Design
Economics	104 A-F	Intro to Macroeconomics
Economics	709	Political Economy II
Exer Science	100	Intro to Exercise Science
FOMGT	304	Information for Tech Finance
FOMGT	320	Investments
Geo Sciences	102	The Human Landscape
Geo Sciences	103	Intro Oceanography
HRTA	240	Hotel Operations
Italian	120	Elementary Italian II
Math	113	Math-Elem Teachers I
Math	121	Linear Methods & Probability
MICBIO	310	General Microbiology
Nutrition	130	Nutrition for a healthy lifestyle
Physics	100	Conceptual Physics
Physics	120	Big Bang to Black Hole
Physics	132	Intro to Physics II
POLISCI	111	Comparative Politics
POLISCI	121-B	World Politics
Psychology	305	Educational Psychology
Psychology	320	Learn & Think
Psychology	380	Abnormal Psychology
Psychology	100 sec 1-3	Intro to Psychology
Psychology	335	Behavioral Neuroendocrinology
Spanish	110	Spanish
Spanish	120	Spanish
Spanish	240	Intermediate Spanish II
Spanish	246	Intensive Intermediate Spanish
Statistics	111	Elementary Statistics
W&FCONSV	261	Wildlife Conservation

Jeffery Amherst College Store
26 South Prospect Street, Amherst 253-3870
(behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in downtown Am-

WELCOME BACK STUDENTS!

Live a little.

COME IN DURING THE MONTH OF FEBRUARY FOR BACK TO SCHOOL DRINK SPECIALS!

426 Russell street Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
413.253.4008
Open: Sun -Thurs: 11am -11pm
Fri - Sat: 11am - 12pm

FEATURING:
GIFT CARDS
PARTY PLATTERS
CHILI'S TO GO
GRILLED ENTREES
BIG MOUTH BURGERS
GUILTLESS GRILL AND MANY
OTHER TRADEMARK FAVORITES!

WELCOME BACK STUDENTS

PLEASE PARK SMART

The University community appreciates your parking cooperation.

* Valid UMass parking permits are required in all parking lots Monday through Friday between the hours of 7 am and 5 pm. Parking is prohibited at any time in tow zones, handicapped spaces, vendor spaces, state vehicle spaces, reserved spaces and lots which require 24-hour permits.

*Vehicles with valid UMass parking permits may park in any unrestricted or non-reserved space starting at 4 pm, instead of 5 pm until Daylight Savings Time begins on March 31, 2006.

*Parking meters are enforced for payment Monday through Friday between the hours of 9 am and 5 pm.

Parking Snow Policy - for information regarding UMass Snow Policy please visit http://parking.umass.edu/regulations/snowpolicy.htm

Please visit Parking Services' website at http://parking.umass.edu for further parking information.

BookZilla
Never get burned again

Why overpay for your TEXTBOOKS this semester?

BookZilla is local, cheap, and convenient.

Just go to www.bookzilla.com to create an account and start saving!

Results you can feel...

For neck pain & headaches!

Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractic Physician
Participating provider for HMO's student insurance, Blue Cross, GIC, car insurance & most others.

www.AmherstFamilyChiro.com

Amherst Family Chiropractic
Center for Natural Health

228 Triangle St. • Amherst 549-1368

'Underworld' barely evolves

By Ian Jones
Collegian Staff

"Underworld: Evolution," the second installment of the vampire vs. werewolf action series, picks up where the first one left off, filling the audience in on some ancient history (literally) and replaying the events of the first film in a shaky flashback. This is good news for people who haven't seen the first one but, for some reason, are seeing this one. It isn't really necessary to know what happened in the first movie to understand this one, but it doesn't hurt.

"Underworld: Evolution"
Directed By Len Wiseman
Kate Beckinsale
Scott Speedman
Sony Pictures
Rated R
C-

The audience is then reintroduced to the sexy, leather-clad vampire Selene (Kate Beckinsale) and her half-vampire, half-werewolf — or, rather, half-lycan — love interest, Michael (Scott Speedman). They are seeking refuge in one of the many vampire-safe houses (it's not really so much a house as a cave stocked with blood and automatic weapons), since Selene had killed Viktor, the leader of the vampires, in the end of the previous film, and assumes, correctly, that the other vampires will not be pleased about this. Desperate, Selene leaves Michael in the safe house and decides to seek out the next vampire in line for leadership, Marcus (Tony Curran). All of this goes on for about three minutes.

At that point, it becomes apparent that Marcus is actually evil and bent on releasing his uncontrollable, monstrous, werewolf brother William from his hidden prison so that, together, they can take over the world. With this in mind, Selene decides that, perhaps, her first plan was not entirely wise. Fortunately, though, she is no longer being chased by the other vampires.

She goes back to find Michael, and discovers that he has already caused quite a commotion doing exactly what she told him not to do, which provides the film with its third (or fourth, if you count the flashback) opportunity for a gory fight scene. Not bad, considering how few scenes have gone by.

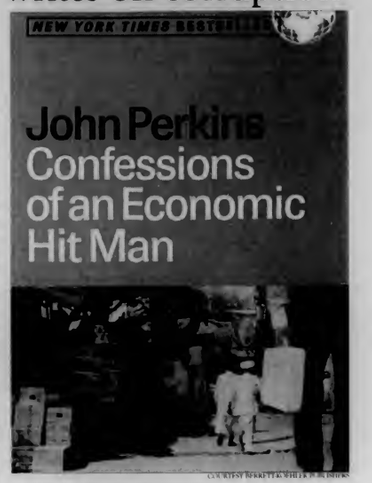
The rest of the film is much the same. There's sex, violence and plenty of blood. Considering the type of film this is, those are all positive points, really. The numerous plot twists, unfortunately, do little to distract the viewer from how predictable the overall plot is, but are usually entertaining anyway.

At several points, the action stops to give the audience more details about the history of the vampires and werewolves, but after the first scene, none of this is particularly enlightening. Distinguished British actor Sir Derek Jacobi plays a role in giving the audience a glimpse into this history as the ancient Corvinus, Michael's ancestor and the father of both Marcus and William. His character doesn't offer a great deal of surprising information, but his performance is one of the film's best.

The end of the movie contains a plot twist that should leave audiences groaning — possibly groaning twice. The obvious plot twist, though, is overshadowed by the predictable, but satisfyingly gory climax, and, as in the first "Underworld," Selene leaves the audience with the assurance that the story isn't over yet, and that if all goes according to plan, we haven't seen the last of the "Underworld" franchise.

In all fairness, "Underworld: Evolution" will definitely appeal to the fans of the first film. And, as the sequel to an action movie about vampires and werewolves, it actually isn't bad. If you hated the first film, there's no point in seeing this one, because it's pretty much the same thing, but if you're looking for entertainment without having to think too hard, there are worse ways to spend an hour and a half.

Selene (Kate Beckinsale) wields an automatic weapon in Len Wiseman's "Underworld:Evolution."



'Hit Man' writes on corruption

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

Yowza, Yowza. Check it. John Perkins wrote a book last year. From the comfort of his warm house, with plenty of family around. The non-fiction novel paints a picture so full of greed, it's as if he loaded all the corruption of Washington into a cannon and aimed it at every reader's brain. Then, after a second to write the epilogue and introduction, he lit the fuse to fire. Ka-Blamo!

Political thrillers aren't exactly at the top of the college student's reading list. And rightfully so. They are drab, boring and cliché. Anyone could pull that garbage off. Let us get past this awful mountain of words and get to the point of these books: power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely. Ho, ho. We get it. Now let's move on.

John Perkins knew this is how the college mind works. He also knew that as Americans, we know little on how the rest of the world is run, who holds the keys for what and how this great country of ours is built. He was a simple-minded college student, eager to learn about money and power in the 1960s. He didn't fly with the Woodstock crowd, didn't take many drugs and doesn't have a lot of acid flashbacks to show for it. What he does have is one giant mountain of corruption and money that he sits on top of at his age. And as he climbed this mountain of crime and deceit, he kept notes.

Courtesy Robert Fleischer/Plume Books

John Perkin's "Confessions of an Economic Hit Man" tells a story of corruption and greed in the U.S. government's foreign policy.

He was raised innocently enough, by suburban/urban parents. He had a couple of girlfriends. And he met powerful people at Middlebury College. These ties led Perkins to the heart of the economic machine that fuels America, and what he found was not pretty. In exchange for his silence, Perkins was hushed up with money and power. He was given the job of an Economic Hitman.

The term is supposedly legitimate, something used by government officials themselves. What Perkins was asked to do, quite simply, is jump from third-world country to third-world country and propose numbers, percents, on how much the area could profit the U.S. government. The country in question was told that they would be profiting greatly, and they did — for the first ten or so years. Then the debt would start, and never end. The goal was to have every country indebted to American soil for trillions upon trillions of dollars. Yessir, Mr. Jones, trillions — where, did you say, can we pick up the good karma points? And Mr. Perkins did not just dabble around the world for a couple years. He had this profession, this career, for three decades. Comforting.

"Confessions of an Economic Hit Man"
John Perkins
Plume

Perkins paints a picture so black and horrific, it is almost unreal. Questions of doubt are undoubtedly cleared up when the author uses the real names of officials that proposed his job. Lying, greed, global robbery. And with every lie, John Perkins climbs the economic ladder. He is promoted. From Indonesia to Panama, across the world and back, he does his job with an eerie speed. Africa, Asia, the Middle East, Latin America. Not one country was safe, it seems.

In between descriptions of what he was doing, he paints a very important but brief history of the area he was about to steal from. Perkins does his homework about each region.

But what turned the man over? Why did he stop? After the events of Sept. 11th, John looked at his daughter, and for the first time in his life, he was terrified. How can the world he helped create be so dreadful? He quit, and had to put an end to what he had created, to sweep up this mess.

"Confessions of an Economic Hit Man" is a triumph, but it is something that should be enjoyed at a length — do not try to rush and finish it. Take your time. This is history and nonfiction. Take days and think this all through. At points, you may find yourself thinking along the same lines that Perkins did: believing that countries and people were little more than names and figures. Perkins almost drives the same point home in more than one spot. Since he is doing roughly the same thing to different regions, it can get a bit dull. Okay.

This important book should not go unread. It is a New York Times Bestseller. And it has been translated to about twenty different languages. No reason not to try, eh?

NOTES FROM THE BURSAR

—If you do not want to wait in line to pick up a refund check, sign up for Excess Express and have your refund deposited directly into your bank account. It's easy to do, log on to SPIRE and enter your bank information. Check out our website at www.umass.edu/bursar for more details on Excess Express —Methods of payment - Did you know that you can pay your bursar bill on line? If you would like additional information about alternative methods of payment, go to www.afford.com or call 1-888-216-4258.

—Who is receiving your Bursar bill? If you want to avoid the bursar bills being sent to your dorm and want all of your Bursar bills to be sent to your permanent address, log into SPIRE, (http://spire.umass.edu), navigate to the Personal Portfolio options and simply add a new address and select bill as the address type.

—Are you waiving the student Health Insurance? If you are an entering student for Spring 2006, and wish to waive your Student Health Insurance Plan, visit http://spire.umass.edu for a link to the On-Line Waiver Process. Should you experience any problems with the on-line waiver, contact Health Services at (413) 577-5192. If you are a returning student and did not waive the plan in Fall 2005, you may NOT waive it for Spring 2006. Student Health insurance needs to be waived each year. Keep the confirmation that you will receive from Health Services for your records.

—Don't forget, you have access to your bill at all times through SPIRE. It is your responsibility to monitor your bill and to pay close attention to any messages that you may receive on SPIRE. If you have any questions regarding your Bursar bill, please contact our office at 413- 545-2368. Our Teller office hours are Monday through Friday 9:00am-4:00pm and our Customer Service Center is open Monday through Friday 9:00am-5:00pm.

Have a great semester!
Bursar Staff

Despite the love, Allen's latest scores the 'Match Point'

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

Woody Allen's newest film is gaining critical acclaim as one of his best in years. No doubt Allen has stirred up something peculiar, even for him, but in doing so stumbled on yet another story of human complications that has left audiences contemplating the struggle between morality and destiny.

Perhaps it is Allen's notorious reputation for delivering intelligent, existential humor through sex, infidelity and irony that brings viewers to the cinema, but in "Match Point" it is the unlikely twists and curious outcome that leaves them astonishingly satisfied.

The film begins as what you would, but really wouldn't, expect from Woody Allen. We have a couple of couples and the inevitable triangle of temptation, set against a posh London backdrop. The chemistry between the characters obviously lacks the familiar awkwardness we've warmed up to in films like "Manhattan," "Annie Hall," "Mighty Aphrodite" and even "Anything Else."

"Match Point"
Directed By Woody Allen
Alexander Armstrong
Emily Mortimer
Dreamworks
Rated R
B

After Chris (Jonathan Rhys-Meyers), a former tennis pro, meets a wealthy new friend, Tom (Matthew Goode), he starts to like Tom's sister Chloe (Emily Mortimer), and really enjoys the ins of the family's rich lifestyle. But after Chris meets Tom's sexy fiancée Nola (played by Scarlett Johansson) he becomes infatuated with her. Infidelity soon finds its way into the story, and the ball bounces between each lover's court as games of lust often do. Morality, selfishness, temptation and luck propel Chris's life in a shaky new direction that culminates in a unique twist of intrigue.

The film is graced by impressive performances by Rhys-Meyers, Goode and Mortimer, but Johansson delivers the most passionate act of all. Ah yes, Scarlett. No wonder her face suits perfectly the character she plays, a seductive, out-of-work actress who manages to captivate the sexual intrigue of almost every male character in the film, not to mention every man in the theater. Although she played her part well, the performance doesn't compare to her 2003 role in "Lost in Translation." Johansson is flawlessly beautiful in "Match Point." At first, the captivating curves of her face, above all her lips, would have done just as well depicting the sensuality of Nola's character without any words. But as time goes on, Nola's aura transforms from aloof to a desperation that is trickled with distinct human grit.

Viewers might see similarities between "Match Point" and Allen's 2004 film "Melinda and Melinda" — one being that HE'S NOT IN IT, which may contribute to another: it isn't candidly funny. But beyond lacking the neurotic ramblings of an eternally middle-aged comedic genius, the film centers more firmly on a purpose. Not just an analysis of love, who's right, who's wrong, and the unanswerable question, "Well... (adjusts black rimmed, Coke-bottle glasses) why, really?" but more so takes a rather startling look at the magnitude that chance plays in life. The peculiar outcome in "Match Point," along with the circumstances leading up to it, examines destiny as an everpresent force hovering over our own menial choices.

Before "Melinda and Melinda" clearly confronted the question, "What is the essence of life: tragedy? Or comedy?" most of Allen's earlier films insinuate that he's swaying more towards comedy. Now we are left to contemplate a shift from humor to a reality that is harshly tragic. "Match Point" makes it obvious now more than ever that Woody Allen has contributed a plethora to modern pseudo-philosophical thought.

The film earned four Golden Globe nominations, including Best Picture, Best Supporting Actress, Best Director and Best Screenplay.

Jonathan Rhys-Meyers cozies up to costar Scarlett Johansson over a game of ping-pong in "Match Point."

July's first film pleases 'Me and You and Everyone We Know'

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

First-time filmmaker Miranda July wrote and directed this independent dramatic comedy that focuses around people's awkward attempts to make connections with one another in contemporary life. Isolation, loneliness and romance are elements in this 2005 film which are crafted into a perfectly peculiar depiction of real life.

July plays Christine Jesperson, an artist and Eldercab driver who uses her artistic projects as a way to escape from, and admit to, her trivial reality. Christine falls in love with John Hawkes, a newly single shoe salesman (played by Richard Swersey). Despite an indefinable connection, John is distracted by his new living arrangement and outlook on life, and therefore is reluctant to embrace Christine's companionship. John's two young sons, Peter and Robby, adjust to the new dirty-floored apartment by engaging in sexual affairs on the internet.

The story cleverly connects people through the social networks that typically link people to each other (neighbors of someone who has sons that know the girls who seduce a co-worker of the man with the sons; that type of thing). But in doing so, July's script distinguishes each character's struggle for a deeper personal union. Some of the most brilliantly placed characters are the ones least exposed to us. In the film, these characters correspond to the people we sort of know, but only circumstantially. You wonder what these people you see occasionally and once-in-a-while do in their private time — the girl next door, a prospective employer, possibly an internet lover.

One such example is John's co-worker Andrew (Brad William Henke), who reveals his lust for two neighborhood teenage girls, Heather and Rebecca. Andrew posts dirty messages on his living room window after the pair teases him with a seductive "girl-on-girl" kiss. But when the girls eventually decide to knock on his door for a little (how do the French call it? Ménage à trois?) action, Andrew leaps to the floor in fear and hides beneath the window until they leave.

Heather and Rebecca similarly reveal their innocence when they run like children from Andrew's doorway after days of feeling sexually empowered by an adult interest in their jail-bait sexuality. The actions of this grown man, so similar to those of two school girls, illuminate the flaws of wanting what you typically shouldn't have — a well-done motif in July's script.

Each character in the film seeks togetherness with someone else. They yearn for a feeling of connected identity which they can hold onto and feel satisfied.

"Me and You and Everyone We Know" is similar to the dramatic-comedy "Secretary," Steven Shainberg's 2002 indie-sensation about a woman who engages in a sadomasochistic relationship with her new boss. Despite two entirely different storylines, "Me and You and Everyone We Know" takes the same stark glance at the secret pleasures that get us through life's mundane routines. Taken out of context, the characters' actions are absurd and even taboo, but since the filmmaker eases us into their daily simplicities, we see those identities make them who they are, and what we are — human, and not completely sure how to act accordingly.

"Me and You and Everyone We Know" won several acclaimed awards last year. The Cannes Film Festival handed over the Prix Regards Jeune Award for Best Feature Film, along with its Young Critics Award for Best Feature. The film won two Independent Spirit Awards for Best Feature and Best First Screenplay.

Other honors include recognition from the Sundance Film Festival (Best Dramatic Film) for its "originality in vision," the Stockholm Film Festival (Best Directional Debut), the San Francisco International Film Festival (Best Narrative Feature) and the Philadelphia Film Festival (Best First Time Director).

Miranda July looking doe-eyed and lonely in her award winning film, "Me and You and Everyone We Know."

Looking for Housing?
Now is the time to apply for Summer & Fall of 2006!

For all your housing needs give us a call...

Excellent location...1/2 Mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments
1, 2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses

All rents include
heat, hot water, and cooking gas

NEW PUFFTON VILLAGE

www.pufftonvillage.com
For more information call:
413.549.0145
8 am to 4:30 pm Monday - Friday

Sutherland says that '24' can and should go on without him

By Ed Bark
The Dallas Morning News

PASADENA, Calif. — It's not all grim and bear it on the set of "24."

The tightly wound, real-time drama in its fifth season on Fox requires a steely, on-camera approach by star Kiefer Sutherland and company. Otherwise, the workplace can be pretty loose.

"In between shots, if there's a chance to mess with somebody, you might want to take the opportunity," says Carlos Bernard, whose agent Tony Almeida was nearly blown to bits in this year's opening hour.

Bernard, "24's" resident practical joker, pulled a classic last season. But it's Sutherland who fills in the details during a recent press conference with TV critics.

"It was one of the best scenes we've ever been a part of," he said. "Bernard had two police officers arrest Mia Kirshner (who guest-starred as Mandy) for allegedly smoking marijuana outside her dressing room. And as they went to take her away, Carlos got in a fight with the officers about what he thought they should be doing in protecting the city. And the director tried to separate Carlos from the police, and he really did lose it. And we filmed it all."

"Producers are on the phone going, 'We're in big trouble,'" Bernard added. "'Is there anything else we can shoot? Parked cars? Anything?'"

Sutherland's dogged Jack Bauer has returned to the business of saving the world after faking his own death in the Season Four finale. Ratings have been better than ever, as is the show. The first 15 minutes of the ongoing season shockingly served up the killings of former president David Palmer (Dennis Haysbert) and Tony's wife, Michelle (Reiko Aylesworth).

"It is intense," Sutherland said. "And we have found a lot of ways to try and break that up. We sometimes take scenes and try and make a musical out of them."

Meanwhile, the show's writers and producers are reconciled to making it up as they go along. There's no "bible" plotting out "24's" innumerable corkscrew twists.

"We're lucky, at the beginning of the year, if we know where it starts," co-producer Howard Gordon said. "It really has become more and more of an improvisation. I think that's part of what gives the show its energy. We paint ourselves into corners and blast our way out of those corners."

"The reason the audience doesn't see the twists coming is because we don't either," co-producer Evan Katz said.

Sutherland, whose amazingly resilient character has resorted to torture, been tortured himself and lost loved ones, says that "24" could and probably should go on without him at some point.

"Like 'Law & Order,' I think the idea is fantastic," he said. "The real star of the show is the time format, and that has added another aspect to the genre of the thriller. One thing we're all discovering is that every season has impacted another, and (Jack) is allowed to carry with him what he has suffered the year before...I'm committed to the show as long as I feel that we're moving forward, and as long as an audience will allow me to do it."

He's also bullish on the idea of a "24" feature film, which has been in the talking stages for several years.

"I think there's an audience out there for that," Sutherland said. "The characters could be different. They could be completely unrelated, and I think that would still be effective. It's something that I would be very eager to do, and it requires a lot of other people to feel the same way."

Yeah, but "do you think you could keep people in the theater for the whole day?" a critic rejoined.

Kiefer Sutherland, star of Fox's hit "24" says that, at some point, the show must go on without him.

"There are some real-time aspects that are certainly presenting challenges," Sutherland conceded with a smile.

In the interim, maybe a collection of mess-around "24" outtakes could find their way onto a DVD. New footage is being compiled every week.

"We've done a lot of stuff that's been very funny," Sutherland said. "There was a moment in Season Four where I'm climbing up the side of the Chinese consulate, and my gun falls out of my pocket and goes off and shoots me in the (rear)."

"Anytime we get to kind of poke fun at ourselves and have a laugh, yeah, we take it."

Soderbergh adopts experimental approach to movie making

By Terry Lawson
The News Record (U. Cincinnati)

CINCINNATI — Adventurous moviegoers willing to take a chance on a low-budget, digitally shot film can see Steven Soderbergh's new film "Bubble" in theaters, then pick it up on DVD less than a week later.

Magnolia Video will make the DVD available in Landmark theaters on Friday and through regular DVD retailers Jan. 31.

"The ideal for me, I suppose, is that you see the film in the theater. You like it. And on your way out, you stop at the concession stand and buy it on DVD," Soderbergh said. "But if that doesn't happen, I'll be pleased if people just see the DVD or watch it on TV. Any film is marginally more enjoyable on a big screen."

"I'm a filmmaker that likes to experiment," Soderbergh said. "So I see this as an opportunity to explore some territory, both artistically and with the system."

The HDnet Films business plan doesn't sit well with some theater owners, however. Knowing the DVD will be available in only a few months, they argue, causes people to skip the theater experience.

"I'd argue [audiences] are skipping the experience anyway," Soderbergh said in response. "We're not saying all movies should be released in different formats simultaneously, but the truth is, technology has taken away a lot of the control over that."

This experimental release is in keeping with the whole spirit of experimentation surrounding "Bubble."

Filmed in 18 days in Parkersburg, W.Va., and Belpre, Ohio, "Bubble" tells the story of Kyle (Dustin James Ashley), a shy young man who works on a plastic doll factory in Ohio.

His friendship with fellow employee Martha (Debbie Doebereiner) is threatened when a pretty single mother, Rose (Misty Dawn Wilkins), gets hired at the plant.

Bubble screened to a mixed reaction at last fall's Toronto International Film Festival, with some viewers likening it to European slice-of-life films and others dismissing it as a dull indulgence. Soderbergh said it played "pretty much as I expected, but it's the film I wanted to make. In fact, I think it's better than the film I had imagined.

"It only cost about a million and half [dollars] total, so it doesn't have to make a lot of money," he said. "It's all about price, really, and for me, freedom to do what I want."

Soderbergh said the same principle applied to the two acclaimed films his own company produced last year with George Clooney, "Good Night, and Good Luck." and "Syriana."

"We're able to do the things we want with Warner Bros. because we make them for a price they can live with. And it's the same thing we're doing with the film we're doing together now, 'The Good German.' If we do this right, it will have the aesthetic of 1945 Hollywood. So we decided it had to be done in black and white," Soderbergh said.

"Of course, Warner's didn't want to do it in black and white, but we said, look, if we can make it for this amount, can you live with it then? And then they said OK, because the risk becomes smaller for them.

"They don't like the risk. We do. So we have to find new ways of making the movies we want to make," he said.

"Doing something like 'Bubble' isn't going to kill the movie industry, but it just might get people to look at things in different ways. I always thought that was what movies were supposed to do."

Steven Soderbergh's newest film, "Bubble," will be released on DVD only days after its theatrical premiere.

Welcome Back Students

from the Campus Center Hotel

The smart choice for family and friends

Value

Location

Comfort

New, improved rooms coming in 2007!

- 116 Air-conditioned Guest Rooms
- Complimentary Continental Breakfast
- Dataport Access in Every Room
- Cable TV/HBO
- Gym/Pool Facilities Available Nearby
- Walking Distance to Mullin's Center, Fine Arts Center & Downtown Amherst
- Coming Soon: High-Speed Internet Access!

One Campus Center Way, Amherst, MA 01003

For Reservations and Information:
Telephone: 413.549.6000 • Fax: 413.545.1210 • Email: reservations@mail.aux.umass.edu

UMass alum Corddry serves up news with a side of humor

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

UMass students love their daily dose of "The Daily Show's" innuendo-laden humor and on-the-money observations made famous by Jon Stewart, Stephen Colbert and Lewis Black. But we can't forget the infrequent comedic talents that sporadically grace the pace of the show's slyly stilted "news stories."

It's no wonder that the Comedy Central showcase has such a large UMass following, considering one such correspondent is Rob Corddry, a UMass Amherst alumnus. Originally from Weymouth, Mass., the 34-year-old Corddry graduated from UMass Amherst in 1993 before pursuing a career in show business. At UMass, Corddry briefly considered majoring in journalism because of his desire to write, but decided on an English major instead.

Ever since childhood, Corddry has had a natural ability to make people laugh and enjoyed entertaining others with his dramatic personality. His skill in comedy and performance led Corddry to take drama classes and star in university productions like "Romeo and Juliet," "Reckless" and "Torch Song Trilogy."

The combination of studies suited him perfectly in hindsight, now that he dishes out investigative drama with a side of journalism as the senior political analyst of "The Daily Show."

The humorous show is battered with criticism due to its practice of "biased and skewed news coverage." Regardless, "The Daily Show's" staff keeps their cool (and a clean conscience) by defending their coverage with one solid alibi.

"The [Daily] show is a satire, which gives us freedom to do anything we want," said Corddry in an interview with The Black Table. "'Satire' is the magic word that wipes away any culpability. The media is jealous of this freedom and therefore wants to thrust upon us the journalistic integrity that they lack."

How can anyone justly say that Corddry's feature report of a teenager's tremendously oversized head is skewed? He even does a follow-up story, making for in-depth coverage. Viewers continue to find these "soft news" type stories appealing (insensitive and funny, too).

The real controversy arises when "The Daily Show" covers stories that deal with national headline news. Last year, Corddry covered the Democratic National Convention in Boston.

The concern is that many young people are getting all their current event information from "The Daily Show." Many people feel that the show should acknowledge its responsibility to provide a clear and serious depiction of the news. Thankfully, anyone coy enough to pick up on the show's jokes knows enough about politics — enough about anything — to understand that they are not getting the objective news. Merely flipping to Comedy Central diminishes any real consideration that the show should be taken seriously.

Corddry's career stretches beyond the blue-tie monotone sarcasm of "The Daily Show." He had his feature film debut in the hilarious 2003 movie "Old School." Then, in 2004, Corddry starred in the film "Blackballed: The Bobby Dukes Story," where he played the leading man, Bobby Duke, paintball's first superstar. The actor also gives regular performances on NBC's "Late Night with Conan O'Brien."

Rob has spent much of his career in New York, where he previously performed in a two year stint with N.Y. sketch comedy group "Third Rail Comedy" and co-founded "Naked Babies," an acclaimed four-man sketch group.

Corddry's voice douses the airwaves across the nation with numerous radio ads. He has starred in television commercials for the Cartoon Network, Labatts Beer, Wendy's and 1-800-Call-ATT (for which he was featured in Entertainment Weekly's "Worst of" issue alongside Carrot Top for "The Worst Commercial of 2001").

Corddry also appeared on Comedy Central's "Tripp Citizens Brigade," known for its "seriously fed up sketch comedy" (that ran from 1998-2000).

It's been quite a run already for the talking-while-we're-laughing-head that graces the glow of our 11 p.m. "Daily Show" dose. Last year, the UMass campus was graced with a stand-up visit from co-star Lewis Black, and hopefully sometime soon, we can look forward to a visit from our bald-alum-chum Corddry, too.

UMass alum Rob Corddry shows off his stylish suit on the set of Comedy Central's "Daily Show."

'Constant Gardener' DVD disappoints viewers with lack of extras

Ralph Fiennes tries to unravel the mystery of Rachel Weisz's death in "The Constant Gardener."

By Michael Deehan
Collegian Staff

"The Constant Gardener," director Fernando Meirelles' adaptation of the novel by John le Carré, was released last year to overwhelming critical praise. The film's DVD, released Jan. 10th, captures the story's thrilling twists and turns as well as the beautiful Kenyan setting.

The outstanding performances of the leads make this movie one of the best of this past year. Oscar nominee Ralph Fiennes stars as a British diplomat searching for answers after his activist wife is mysteriously murdered. Rachel Weisz gives an exceptional turn as Fiennes' wife, her complex performance throughout the film's many flashbacks giving nuanced clues to her strange demise. Weisz won a Golden Globe award earlier this month for this role and is expected to have a strong shot at the Best Supporting Actress award at the upcoming Oscars.

Coming off of the phenomenal "Cidade de Deus" ("City of God"), director Fernando Meirelles made his English language debut with "Gardener." Aside from a few short documentaries about the behind the scenes filmmaking process, the disc doesn't reveal much of Meirelles' intentions with the movie. The lack of a director's commentary to accompany such a complex film hurts the DVD's overall presentation.

The extra features offered by the disc include three short documentaries focusing on various parts of the filming. The best of these shorts is "Embracing Africa." Filming in Kenya," a look at how the film's cast and crew interacted with its native Kenyan hosts. The actors interviewed, including Weisz and Fiennes, seem exceptionally moved by the plight of the poor Africans. The filmmakers treated the Kenyans' dire poverty with compassion and grace, which underscores their involvement as the true victims in the film's plot.

Another enjoyable surprise was the inclusion of the "Haruma" Play in Kibera" extra. This feature shows a lengthy extended version of a scene in which a play is performed in front of an audience of African villagers. The entirety of the play is shown on the DVD in subtitled Swahili.

"The Constant Gardener" is a fantastic movie with a somewhat lacking DVD release. The widescreen presentation and 5.1 Dolby surround sound are up to industry standards, but the lack of extras (not even a trailer) and the missed opportunity for a fascinating commentary track leaves the DVD experience wanting.

The MacBook Pro

Featuring Intel Core Duo Processor's

4x Faster than the PowerBook G4

8x the Graphics Bandwidth

Built-in iSight Camera

15.4" WideScreen

iLife '06 Installed

(Wishes Do Come True)

It's New...

It's Here...

It's Discounted for Education!

Authorized Campus Store

University of Massachusetts UNIVERSITY STORE Amherst Campus Center • Phone: (413)545-2619 computer@aux.umass.edu

Winter movie report card

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

Every year beginning in mid-November the Christmas rush begins and a spill of great movies overtakes theaters. It is the annual race for the Oscars — an opportunity for all the major studios to push their greatest films into theaters right before the year ends. It starts around mid-November and it ends around mid-January, the year's best films peeking their way into theaters right around the time of Christmas break. Adults are vacationing from work, kids are off from school and Academy voters are just starting to take notice. These movies arrive just in time for everyone to see them and just in time for The Daily Collegian to miss them. So here is our chance to revisit the Christmas Rush that accounts for some of the best and worst movies of the year.

"King Kong" C+

The original "King Kong" (1933) was a 90-minute thrill ride that revolutionized special effects and monster movies. This new "King Kong" clocks in at 3 hours and 10 minutes and, though not nearly as brilliant, is thrilling in its own way. Peter Jackson has created yet another marvelous special effects masterwork in this new massive "Kong," created with intricate special effects and the acting expressions and movement of Andy Serkis, the actor that brought life to Jackson's Gollum. "Kong" is exhilarating, with spectacular action sequences pitting Kong against dinosaurs, flesh eating bats and endless gunfire. The movie barely stops to catch its breath throwing its human characters into pits filled with giant man-eating insects and still making room for moving scenes between Kong and his blond captive Naomi Watts. The two must become friends in time for Kong's famous showdown atop the Empire State Building, which Jackson builds to epic portions. Jackson's "King Kong" is wonderfully exciting and visually magnificent.

"Brokeback Mountain" B

"Brokeback Mountain" tells the story of two cowboys who get a job herding sheep in 1960s Wyoming. One night in a violent awakening they have sex and realize their attraction for each other. They swear to let what happened on the mountain stay on the mountain. Both go off, marry and have kids only to reunite and realize they are in love with one another. The tragedy of this beautiful love story is that they live in a society that forbids such behavior, and both the men and their wives face shrouded futures. It leads, as it must, to the movie's most devastating conclusion for controversy of showing two homosexuals in love, the film has been mocked because our society is apparently still not ready to accept that homosexuals exist as human beings and that they too fall in love. In comedic television sitcoms homosexuality can be funny, but when confronted seriously it is here: people have cringed. This movie is something pathetic about our culture. It also sends the kind of controversial message that will win this film the Academy award for Best Picture of the Year.

"The Family Stone" C

"The Family Stone" is a watchable comedy about a businesswoman (Sarah Jessica Parker) who accompanies her boyfriend (Dermot Mulroney) on his childhood home to meet his family, the Stones. Needless to say, their personalities clash in a series of painful misunderstandings and awkward fights that bring out the kind of uncomfortable comic moments that made us all fall in love with "Meet the Parents" movies. The Family Stone isn't quite in that league, but it provides a wonderfully spiteful chance to see Diane (Rachel McAdams) and a second girl between the two Stone brothers (Dermot Mulroney and Luke Wilson), who fall in love with the wrong two girls and then fight for them, and it celebrates the family eccentricities that can drive any guest nuts (I wasn't driven the family there) "The Family Stone" creates wonderful comic moments from acute body capacity, colorful characters, and Craig Robinson's Kind of sweet.

"The Producers" C

Let's give credit where credit is due. "The Producers" was originally a 1968 film written and directed by Mel Brooks and starring Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder. It remains to this day one of the greatest comedies ever made. Sure, Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick performed it for Broadway popularity and did it really well but they don't deserve to be mentioned in the same sentence as Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder, who were and are still untouchable. Still, here is a pleasant and harmless remake most of the 1968 film than the more recent musical. It has delightful songs and dance numbers and great chemistry between Lane and Broderick. There are a few funny supporting roles by Uma Thurman and Will Ferrell, but that brilliant Mel Brooks script carries the film all by itself — congrats for Hitler" is not as shocking now as it was in 1968, but it still gets great laughs from the audience reactions.

"Fun with Dick and Jane" D

"Fun with Dick and Jane" returns Jim Carrey to all his slapstick glory in a story that could have worked, but drifts into dangerously controversial territory and doesn't. Jim Carrey plays Dick Harper, a hardworking executive at a major corporation called GlobalTech. He is unexpectedly promoted after all his years of hard work only to discover that the CEO (Alec Baldwin) has sold all the stock shares, liquidated the company and escaped with 350 million dollars. This skates uncomfortably close to the Enron story and leads to his downfall into poverty with his wife Jane as they lose everything. They decide to reclaim their life by converting to a life of crime. These scenes work as they go on a rampage of crime and robbery that make for great situational comedy and even greater slapstick. But the story finds itself drifting back into awkward themes as Dick and Jane devise a plot to steal from the CEO that ruined their lives. The end attempts to make some sort of grand statement about the whole Enron scandal without really understanding it, and a comedy like this shouldn't even attempt to comment on such serious subject matter. "Fun with Dick and Jane" is a light comedy that sinks when it ventures into dark waters it has no business entering.

"Casanova" D

Can you imagine a movie version of the infamous "Casanova" that is rated PG-13? A movie about the most accomplished womanizer in the history of literature, a man who strove for a different female companion every night, starring Heath Ledger, Sienna Miller and many more of the most beautiful people in Hollywood — and the movie is without a single sex scene or a frame of nudity. For shame. Casanova (Heath Ledger) seeks, this time, the courtship of Francesca Bruni (Sienna Miller). He is, as usual, chased by the law, jumping from windows, running on rooftops and sleeping with nuns, but this time he seeks as his woman a feminist and poses as her fiance, whom she's yet to meet to win her consideration. He also poses as the writer she admires to distract the officer (Jeremy Irons) sent to capture him. In a magnificent ball, which gives us the only entertaining image in the movie, all his identities are discovered and he juggles two different women that think they hold his engagement. The end scenes, however, leave us with cheesy sword fights, cliche reunion and the greatest travesty of all a scene where Casanova declares that he has fallen in love. Casanova in love? Are they serious? Casanova married? This is an unforgivable portrayal that fails to capture the true character that was Casanova.

"Munich" B

"Munich" is Steven Spielberg's second great film this great (was "Schindler's List"). It opens with the footage of the 1972 Munich Olympics, where 11 Israeli athletes were slaughtered by a Palestinian terrorist group named Black September. Spielberg then follows Golda Meir's response as Golda Meir organizes a five man task force to travel into Europe and murder the 11 Palestinian men responsible for the Munich massacre. One of the characters notes, "It just got a whole lot more expensive to kill Jews." Spielberg has made an excellent suspense-thriller that chronicles every assassination and watches with breathless anticipation to see whether this Israeli assassination team can pull it off. But Spielberg also discourages Israel's response in the end, claiming they stooped to the level of the terrorists. All of the men come to question what they are doing and the leader abandons the mission halfway through. In the most heart-wrenching scene in the film, one of the team members challenges Avner (Eric Bana), the team leader, "We're supposed to be righteous, we don't do bad because they do bad, we keep our morals. That's good, that's Jewish. I lose that, that's everything, that's my soul." But what Spielberg also understands is that Israel couldn't afford to do nothing while terrorists murdered innocent Jews. He offers no answer, and maybe it's because in all its flaws the Israeli response was the only response they could afford to give. At one point, the main character observes sadly, "Whatever we do, you know this to be true, there's no peace at the end of this." This is a sad but honest masterpiece that is as exciting as it is politically controversial.

"Rumor Has It..." D

"Rumor Has It..." is an annoying comedy that pulls its plot details from the 1967 classic "The Graduate" and tries to manipulate that story into a comedic formula picture. In this new version, the daughter of Mrs. Robinson — who runs away with Dustin Hoffman at the end of the original, actually ends up going back to the man she was originally set to wed, marries him, has kids with him, lives a happy life and then dies young, leaving her daughter to wonder why she doesn't resemble or relate to her father or her sister. Her daughter, Sarah (Jennifer Aniston), seeks out the man that Dustin Hoffman was based on, Beau Burroughs (Kevin Costner), to find out if he is actually her father, since he was with her mother first. Before long, she finds herself seduced by Beau Burroughs, who seduced her mother and was seduced by her grandmother. Not only is she now falling for someone who slept with her mother and her grandmother, but she may also be sleeping with her own father. There are lots of gross questions like that, as well as a typical fiance (Mark Ruffalo). Sarah actually loves who walks in at the wrong moment — when she is kissing Beau — and leaves her at the last minute so that she can race home to win back his love. This is an underwhelming comedy with too many questions and connected romances for its own good and a very recycled love story that could've come straight from Screenwriting 101. Shirley MacLaine as the Mrs. Robinson character is the film's one redeeming quality, but it's still not enough.

"The Matador" C

This is Pierce Brosnan's bold departure from the James Bond genre and into the post-Bond acting world. Here he plays a hitman who befriends a salesman played by Greg Kinnear. They spend a weekend together when Brosnan is trying to kill his final target and Kinnear is trying to close the biggest deal of his career. They hit it off, and Kinnear is simultaneously terrified and excited to learn of the nature of his new friend's work, but their relationship ends badly and they separate until six months later, when Brosnan arrives on Kinnear's doorstep looking for a place to hide. He never killed that target he was assigned to eliminate, and now his bosses are after him. Kinnear shelters him from the mob and this sets the stage for some great comic scenarios in which Kinnear finds himself helping the psychologically troubled assassin to finish the jobs and make good with his bosses. These two actors work well together, and Pierce Brosnan shows a surprising talent for comedy. His hitman character thrives in a comedy that probably wouldn't have been as funny with someone else in the role.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

SPRING BACK TO SCHOOL

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Lasme makes the leap

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

From the day he took over as the head coach of the Massachusetts men's basketball team last March, Travis Ford had been singing the praises of junior Stephane Lasme. Ford immediately recognized that the 6-foot-8 forward was an extremely hard worker who had made great improvements in each of his first two seasons at UMass.

Early this season, Lasme backed up everything Ford had been saying in the preseason and then some. In the first three games of the year, Lasme racked up an eye-popping 20 blocked shots, the highest total in the country at that point.

While Ford had to be pleased with the play early on, he still believed Lasme was capable of more. Following the hot start, Lasme turned in three lackluster performances, averaging just 5.0 points, 5.3 rebounds and 2.6 blocks, and the Minutemen were an unimpressive 3-3.

Sensing that Lasme had not been playing as hard as he was capable of, Ford decided to challenge him in front of the entire team. In a team meeting the night before UMass was to take on St. Peter's in the first round of the Paramonic Holiday Tournament at Madison Square Garden, Ford took Lasme to task for what he considered unacceptable performances from a player of Lasme's ability.

Clearly, the message got through, as Lasme went out the following night and displayed just how dominant he could be. Displaying an aggressiveness that had been lacking at the offensive end, Lasme attempted a career-high 14 shots, converting eight.

Lasme scored the first eight points of the game for UMass en route to career-highs in points (21) and rebounds (14), while adding eight blocks, a total one fewer than his career-best he recorded earlier this year at Davidson.

Following the 66-49 UMass win, Ford praised Lasme for responding to the challenge posed by the coaching staff and reinforced his belief that Lasme had the potential to be an outstanding all-around player.

"Since the day I've met him, he's always underestimated how good he was," Ford says. "We've talked to him about not just being a role player, but being a dominant player. From Day 1, he's someone I've really believed in."

Ford went on to predict that Lasme could someday find himself playing in the NBA if he continued to

See LASME on page C14

Junior forward Stephane Lasme has been a shot-blocking machine this season for UMass, ranking among the top shot-blockers in the NCAA all year. Lasme recorded a career-high nine blocks at Davidson on Nov. 22.

Anderson provides hockey highlights

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

(Eds. Note: Due to this issue's press deadline, only the UMass hockey games through Jan. 21 could be covered. Check out tomorrow's sports section for full coverage of last weekend's games against UMass Lowell and Boston University.)

Since starting 1-7-0 overall and 0-5-0 in Hockey East, the Massachusetts hockey team has done a lot of work to dig itself out of the huge hole it created during the season's first month.

Heading into the weekend against Lowell and BU, the Minutemen had a 9-13-0 overall mark and a 6-9-0 record in conference play. They were 4-3-0 over winter break, a mildly successful record despite a couple difficult losses — to Bowling Green in the opening round of the UConn Hockey Classic and then to Lowell, which halted a three-game winning streak — because of the team's huge overtime upset at the Whittemore Center on Jan. 21.

UMass tri-captain Matt Anderson, who was carried off the ice after breaking his right ankle during his last game at the Whitt on Dec. 9, 2004, scored a pair of goals and added an assist to help UMass knock off the Wildcats for the first time since the conference semifinals on March 19, 2004. It was also UMass's first win in Durham since March 2, 2001.

But Anderson's box score alone doesn't do justice to his performance on the ice that night. His breakaway goal in the first period gave the Minutemen a 2-1 lead, and his assist came in the third period with time winding down on a five-minute major after Josh Cocco was whistled for hitting from behind with intent to injure. Anderson's crisp pass from the right point to Chris Capraro in the slot gave Capraro a great look at the net, and his shot beat Kevin Regan to put UMass back on top at 3-2.

Then, with 15 seconds remaining in bonus hockey, Stephen Werner took control of the puck in the UMass zone and made one final push down the ice. He drew the UNH defense to the right to free up some space for Anderson in the high slot. Werner found him with a clean pass, and Anderson's slap shot hit the back of the net to give the Maroon and White a huge 4-3 victory with just 3.4 ticks left on the scoreboard.

"We all knew it, but we don't really like talking about it too much," Werner said about Anderson's return to the building where his season ended last year. "I think everybody, even the freshmen, knew that he was injured in this building his last time here. We were all conscious of it, and that was certainly one of our motivations for getting a win tonight."

"It's always great to get a little bit of redemption, not against the UNH players, but for myself," Anderson said. "It's a really satisfying feeling."

Here is how the rest of the games over break shook out:

UConn Hockey Classic

Bowling Green 3, UMass 2

UMass 2, Army 1

The Minutemen outshot eventual tourney champion Bowling Green 42-17 and had twice as many scoring chances, but couldn't solve Falcon goalie Jon Horrell, who made 40 saves. UMass also had a tough time containing Bowling Green's top line of Alex Foster, Jonathan Matsumoto and Mike Falk, as they combined to chip in for two goals and four assists.

In the tournament's consolation game, the Minutemen got a Cory Quirk goal to start things off in the second, and Mark Matheson lit the lamp for the first time this season to break a 1-1 tie with under eight minutes to play in the game to secure a Maroon and White victory.

"The Army game was just a difficult game to play," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It was a consolation game with just flies in the building. I don't

See HOCKEY on page C3

UMass finishes break strong

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

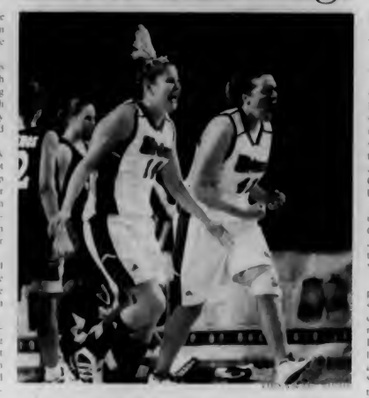
Eds. Note: Massachusetts played two games between today and the date this issue went to press. UMass faced LaSalle on the road on Jan. 27 and traveled to Temple on Jan. 29. Check out tomorrow's Collegian for a recap of these two games.

Something had to give for the Massachusetts women's basketball team heading into winter break. The Minutewomen were about to play in nine contests, against teams that had a combined 68-53 record, including a contest against 11-1 Georgia Tech on Dec. 31, 9-3 Dayton on Jan. 4 and No. 25 George Washington on Jan. 22.

Going into the break with a 2-7 record and looking at a four-game losing streak, the December/January schedule was a daunting one to say the least.

Although the Minutewomen came out of those nine contests with a 3-6 record, and struggled in the early going, it was in the latter end of that nine-game span that UMass came alive with significant victories over Richmond and George Washington.

With two important wins over the break, UMass coach Marnie Dacko looks to use that momentum to finish the season unlike the way the Minutewomen began it.



"I'm a positive person," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "Through perseverance we've been staying with this team and working through some kinks. We're maturing each day and with that we've got to learn and grow."

UMass kicked off the break on Dec. 30 at the Atlanta Marriot Northwest Invitational Championship with a 70-60 first round win over Brown. Pam Rosario and Tamara Tatham, two of the sophomore standouts for UMass, led the Minutewomen with 16 points each, while senior guard Katie Nelson totaled eight.

The win, which was the third of the season for UMass, would be the last one the Minutewomen would see for 19 days, as the team endured a six-game losing streak.

The Marion and White were ousted from the Invitational the following day on New Year's Eve when host Georgia Tech — a team that had an 11-1 record at the time — outscored the Minutewomen 57-43 in the cham-

See W. HOOPS on page C5

Sophomore guard Pam Rosario (#14) and sophomore forward Kate Mills had plenty to celebrate after the Minutewomen's upset of GW on Jan. 22.

UM ski teams start season on high note

By Jhoan Rau
Collegian Staff

Picking up where they left off last season, brother-sister duo Rush and Eliza Hawkins led the Massachusetts ski team to impressive performances in the first two events of the carnival season. Both the men's and women's teams competed in the UConn Carnival at Cranmore and the Plymouth State Carnival at Waterville during the winter break.

The skiers next carnival is broken up over two weekends. The Brown Carnival slalom will take place Jan. 28 at Wachusett, and the giant slalom will take place the following week at UConn in New Hampshire.

The UConn Carnival, which took place Jan. 13 and 14, held only a giant slalom event, as the slalom was cancelled due to rain. However, once the racing was underway, the Hawkins siblings swept the field. Eliza Hawkins finished first overall after two runs with a time of 1:44.35. Caitlin Doughty and Shelleghie Collins rounded out the top three who qualify for the total team time, with marks of 1:46.58 and 1:46.80 respectively. With a ninth-place finish, Doughty earned her first career Top 10 finish.

The Minutewomen finished behind Brown and Boston College. However, the margin of victory between the first and third place finishers was a mere .6 seconds, leaving the runners-up just .2 seconds from victory.

The men placed second on the day to Colby-Sawyer, who won by a margin of three seconds. Plymouth State finished third, just .09 seconds behind the Minutemen.

Rush Hawkins and Jason Small of UMass finished one and two in the event after two runs, with each winning one run. Skiing on two badly bruised shins, Hawkins won the event outright by .01 seconds over Small.

"The night before the race I was at the hospital with Rush, deciding if he was going to race at all," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said. "He showed a lot of grit to even perform that day, let alone win the race outright."

"The second run was the worst," Hawkins said of skiing with two injured legs. "The slope was really rutty, so the vibrations made [my shins] feel even worse."

Pat Bochant, Alec Zahoratko and James Green rounded out the top five finishers for UMass. The men finished with a combined time of 358.51 from their top five, while the women's top three finished in 227.72.

With the men and women finishing in second and third respectively, UMass was the only school competing to have both its men's and women's teams finish in the top three, a feat not lost on Rouleau.

"It's certainly a great accomplishment, and say something about our program here [at UMass]," Rouleau said.

The following weekend, the

See SKIING on page C10

Uncommon path to the pool

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Look around long enough at a Massachusetts swim meet, and you're likely to see a tall, dark-haired kid with a goatee jumping up and down the sidelines. You realize quickly that it doesn't take much for this kid from the South Shore to get into it.

He's got his headphones blaring, usually Nine Inch Nails or The Offspring.

He's hitting himself in the face.

He's amped.

UMass men's head coach Russ Yarworth calls it "a football mentality."

* * *

From the Berkshires to the Cape, high school sports fans across the state of Massachusetts are all too familiar with the aura of Xaverian Brothers High School.

Since its foundation in 1963, the all-male private Catholic high school in Westwood has been an institute renowned for its rigorous college preparatory program.

Years ago, the school got bands such as Blue Oyster Cult and J. Geils Band to play at a high school dance, and Jay Leno even did a stand-up show a year before taking over the Tonight Show in 1992.

Athletically, the Hawks are on the top shelf. Dana Barros once called Xaverian High's gym his home court before moving on to Boston College and the Boston Celtics, and its baseball team churns out Division I prospects on a yearly basis.

But where things really take off is with its true money maker — the Hawks' football program. Yearly one of the top 20 teams in the state, it is constantly in Division I Super Bowl contention with the likes of Brockton, Everett, BC High and its arch-rival, St. John's Prep. Its top players routinely go on to star at Division I-A schools.

In recent years, alumni have included former Miami Dolphin Rob Konrad and former New York Giant Greg Comella. Arguably its most famous gridiron alumni, Matt Hasselbeck, is about to play in his first Super Bowl on Feb. 5.

Despite its prowess in football, basketball and baseball, one thing Xaverian is not known for is its swimming — which explains A.J. Vozella's late start in the sport.

At a school where its top players have been recruited from all around eastern Massachusetts, the Weymouth native simply joined the powerhouse football team out of mere fun. As he says, it was just something to do to be with his friends, and the amount of playing time he got reflected that.

"I was a linebacker," Vozella

But where things really take off is with its true money maker — the Hawks' football program. Yearly one of the top 20 teams in the state, it is constantly in Division I Super Bowl contention with the likes of Brockton, Everett, BC High and its arch-rival, St. John's Prep. Its top players routinely go on to star at Division I-A schools.

See VOZELLA on page C8

Sophomore A.J. Vozella has been a standout in the pool for UMass after beginning his swimming career at Xaverian Brothers High School in Westwood, a school renowned for its powerhouse athletic programs.

Sports Index

Men's Basketball	C14, C2, C4
Hockey	C3, C12
Women's Basketball	C4, C5, C7
Swimming	C8, C9
Skiing	C10
Track	C10, C11, C12

Minutemen sharp early in Atlantic 10 play

By Ryan Gilbertelli
Collegian Staff

In the six-week winter break that University of Massachusetts students have enjoyed during this imperfectly warm winter, the Massachusetts men's basketball team has been hard at work and wreaking havoc in Atlantic 10 play. The Minutemen, with their impressive 4-1 A-10 record, are second only to No. 14 George Washington in the conference.

The Minutemen's most recent victim — its most gut-wrenching, at least — was a 74-69 triumph at the Mullins Center on Sat. this season. It was John Chaney's Temple, which sat in its patented zone defense while senior Jeff Viggiano and sophomore Lawrence Carrier torched the Owls from three-point land with a combined eight 3-pointers.

The UMass-Temple matchup was nationally televised, and by the end of the contest the commentators were singing praises of the Minutemen. They predicted that with the additions of Luke Bonner and Lateme Brower next season, UMass could feasibly win an A-10 championship in 2007.

Lord only knows what the future will hold, but for the present get this: for the first time since 1998-99, when the Minutemen went 16-0 in the A-10, George Washington and Xavier. However, all that continues, game-by-game, the Minutemen have only one loss which came crucially on a buzzer beater at Saint Louis, and have proved to be a force in Travis Ford's first year at the helm.

Stephane-tastic

If defense wins ballgames, and most of the time it does, then junior Stephane Lasme is coach's favorite. The Gabon, Africa native is averaging a Herculean 4.5 blocks per game, with 9.6 points and 6.5 rebounds a night. He has a monstrous 68 blocks through the Temple game, which puts him first in the A-10 and third in the nation in total blocks. His 68 rejections are more than nine A-10 teams have for total blocks. It seems that Lasme has found his niche in the new system, and has been a pleasant surprise on the defensive end for Ford and the Minutemen. Because of Lasme's presence in the paint, UMass is leading the A-10 in blocks and is second in the nation for average blocks with 8.5 a night, second only to Connecticut.

Lasme has scored double figures in five of the last seven games and his scoring average this season, 10.7 ppg, is over double his career scoring average of 4.7. Lasme had eight blocked shots in the Dec. 27 victory over St. Peters at Madison Square Garden, the rest of the Minutemen added eight more blocks to raise their total to 16 for the game, the second-most in UMass history for a single game. After his performance in the Paradiso Holiday Festival on Dec. 27-28, where he had 21 points, 14 rebounds and eight blocks in the UMass win against St. Peters, Lasme was named to the All-Tournament team, he was named A-10 Player of the Week on Jan. 1 and I-Mass Athlete of the Week in the same stretch.

Ford and the captains make it happen

UMass coach Travis Ford named captains for the 2006 squad on Jan. 16, calling on Viggiano, Rashaun Freeman and Lasme to lead the team for the rest of the season. Ford said that after a demoralizing loss to the Boston College Eagles on Jan. 3, Viggiano, Freeman and Lasme rose to the challenge and got UMass back on the right track. ... The Minutemen do not have a home loss this season, going 7-0 at the Mullins Center so far. Only two other teams in the A-10 are undefeated at home: George Washington and Xavier. ... UMass has never had a losing record at the Mullins Center since it moved into the arena in 1992. The Minutemen were 12-5 last season at the Mullins Center; the 12 wins were the most home wins the Minutemen have had since moving into their new home.

Basketball life-r

Ford said in the preseason that junior James Life was the team's best shooter. Now, 15 games into the season, Life is shooting just over 30 percent from downtown and has turned in several performances displaying his outside touch. Against Boston University he hit six threes en route to a game-high 20 points; on Jan. 7 he received his first start and hit three shots from behind the arc against Duquesne in a route of the lowly Dukes; he leads the team with 24 threes on the season.

Everybody loves Rashaun

Over the winter break, on the team's trip to Madison Square Garden, Freeman became the 37th player in UMass men's basketball history to record 1,000 points. He reached the milestone on Dec. 27 against St. Peters with a layup at the 8:42 mark in the first half. ... In over 70 career games, Freeman has scored in double digits 56 times and has scored 20 or more points 16 times. ... Before the Fordham matchup, Freeman had 1,076 points, putting him 29th on the all-time list, just five points behind Jack Foley with 1,081.

He is also fourth all-time on the field goal percentage list — his 54.2 percent clip ranks him behind UMass alum and Boston College head coach Al Skinner, who sported a 55.7 shooting percentage during his playing days at UMass in the early 1970s. ... Freeman's 15.5 scoring average leads the Minutemen this season and ranks ninth in the A-10. ... Viggiano, the only senior, contributes a more all-around game. He is in the top four on the UMass team in nearly every statistical category, 22 blocked shots (second), 2.5 assists per game (second), 4.3 rebounds per game (fourth), 11 steals (tied for third), 8.8 points per game (third).

Run of the Mulligan

On Dec. 23, redshirt sophomore Dante Mulligan made his debut in the UMass lineup and gave Ford another scholarship player to work with. A couple of weeks later, on Jan. 11 in a 81-point win over St. Joseph's, Mulligan made his first splash of the season with an 11-point performance, going 5-for-5 from the field. He is averaging 5.6 points and 5.6 rebounds per game so far this year, and the Pittsburgh transfer has added some needed size to Ford's front court. ... The Minutemen began the A-10 season with two wins for the first time since the 2000-01 campaign when they beat George Washington and Xavier. UMass had lost four straight A-10 openers before starting with a 68-58 win over St. Joe's this season.

Shipping out

On Nov. 25, 2005 junior Art Bowers announced his intention to transfer to another school for more playing time. Bowers had Drexel, where former UMass coach Bruiser Flint now resides, in his sights, but eligibility issues have plagued the former Minuteman. He has not found a new school yet. Bowers was an A-10 All-Rookie selection in his first season at UMass. ... Junior Maurice Maxwell was suspended indefinitely because he did not meet the UMass athletic department's academic requirements. It is not certain whether he will be allowed to return. ... Sophomore Lawrence Carrier made a career best five 3-pointers against Temple in the nationally televised contest. Carrier's shooting touch arrived at an appropriate time, when threes were necessary to defeat Temple's match-up zone. He went 5-for-7 from beyond the arc against the Owls, and it was two more 3-pointers than he made up to that point, going 3-for-15 in the first 14 games of the season.

Come on up for the 'Rising'

ESPN's Andy Katz recently named UMass one of his 'Rising Teams' on his 'Weekly Watch.' Katz on UMass after the Temple win: "The Minutemen held Temple to 34 points for their fourth win in the last five games. And, better yet, UMass is tied with Rhode Island and Xavier in the loss column, one behind undefeated GW." ... Freshman Chris Lowe received his second A-10 Rookie of the Week honors after Ford gave him the first start of his career against Fordham on Jan. 18. Lowe started the next game against Temple as well, and in his first two career starts he averaged 8.5 points and 8.0 assists. He played an exhausting 39 minutes in each game and, despite some occasional over-dribbling, gave Ford some confidence in his first-year point guard.

Senior forward Jeff Viggiano slams home a dunk while being fouled by Temple's Mark Tyndale in a 60-34 blowout win for UMass on Jan. 21. Viggiano led the Minutemen with 17 points in the victory.

Junior center Rashaun Freeman is one of three captains on the UMass basketball team, along with Jeff Viggiano and Stephane Lasme.

THE BIGGEST BACK TO SCHOOL POSTER SALE
1000's of Choices
Where:
STUDENT UNION BALLROOM
When:
Mon. Jan. 30 thru Fri. Feb. 3
Time:
9 A.M. - 4:30 P.M.
Sponsor:
WMUA 91.1
Incredible Selection
CHECK OUT OUR GREAT POSTERS AND PRICES!!
MOST IMAGES
ONLY $6, $7 AND $8

BERTUCCI'S
brick oven ristorante
Italian... A word that warms your soul and stirs your appetite.
Bertucci's is Italian.
51 East Pleasant Street, Amherst, MA · (413) 549-1900
Featuring a Full Bar & Local Brews · Dine In - Carry Out - Delivery
Visit www.bertuccis.com for our menu & other locations.

GETS THE ADRENALINE GOING.
YOURS AND WHOEVER READS ABOUT IT ON YOUR RESUME.
AN ARMY OF ONE.
ENROLL IN ARMY ROTC
BECOME AN ARMY OFFICER

Davis' speed an asset for UMass

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Look quickly or you'll miss him. All you see zooming by is a blur of maroon and white. At first it is hard to distinguish which Massachusetts player's skates are responsible for leaving smoke in his tracks, but if you take a closer look you may be able to distinguish the number "11" on the sweater of one of the brightest young players on the Minutemen.

That number 11 belongs to freshman winger Chris Davis. The rookie from Simsbury, Conn. is making a first impression that is impressing a lot of people in Amherst.

At first glance, it isn't hard to picture Davis as one of the smaller guys out on the ice. He is listed at 5-foot-10 and 190 pounds, but that seems to be a stretch. He himself will be the first to admit that he isn't the biggest guy on the ice, but he doesn't have to be. Size is of little factor in the way Davis plays hockey.

The freshman relies mainly on his legs to be successful out there. He is what you would call a speedster. With a grandfather who led Major League Baseball in stolen bases for five consecutive years, from 1939 until 1943, how could he not be?

In 11 seasons with the Washington Senators and Cleveland Indians, George Case racked up 349 stolen bases, including 61 in 1943 alone. With that kind of pedigree, Davis was bound to possess the wheels he shows off game-in and game-out.

"I'd like to credit my speed to my grandfather. But he was also a quiet player. He didn't talk much. He just went out there on the field and did his own thing," Davis says.

In one particular matchup between the Minutemen and Boston College earlier this season, the younger Davis was outskating many of the older, more experienced Eagles, who are part of one of the best hockey programs in all of Division I and a perennial contender in Hockey East. In that game, the freshman consistently beat the Eagles to loose pucks and constantly put space between himself and his defenders.

The young speedster says his legs aren't the only thing he's received from his grandfather. Davis also has the quiet demeanor that his grandfather took pride in. While his teammates are locking the soccer ball around getting themselves pumped up for a game, the freshman is quietly listening to music — usually techno — at his locker.

"I pretty much try to stay quiet before the game, not bouncing around," he says. "I just sit and mind my own business and listen to some music."

For the better part of this season, Davis has been playing on the top line for UMass alongside team captain Steven Werner and junior Chris Caprario. Despite some recent line changes that Cahoon has instituted, Davis was able to gather as much knowledge from his prior linemates as he could.

"[It] was a good start playing with the captain right away on the top line. I've learned a lot so far," Davis says. "Especially how to finish, at practice watching Stephen Werner; how he has the confidence to score every time he has the puck."

Learning from one of the premier scorers in I-Mass history has done wonders for the first-year winger. In his first season at the Division I collegiate level, Davis has consistently been at the top of the list for the Maroon and White in just about every offensive category. Through Jan. 21, his six goals and six assists were good for fourth on the team in points (12), behind only team captains Werner (18), Marvin Degon (17) and Matt Anderson (14).

"I've been pretty lucky getting scoring chances, and I'd like to credit that to playing with Stephen Werner a lot. He gets the puck on my stick a lot," Davis says. "I've been lucky to be able to finish off some big goals for us here."

Speed turned out to be one of the decisive factors that brought Davis to play for Don Cahoon in Amherst. The Mullins Center ice sheet is 200 feet by 95 feet, among the biggest in the conference. The bigger surface gives Davis more room to get his legs going and blow by would-be defenders.

"I like the big, Olympic-size rink," Davis says. "It definitely helps with my speed."

Playing in front of the hometown fans has not only helped with Davis' speed, it's boosted his statistics as well. Of his six goals and six assists this season, four of each have come at the Mullins Center.

Cahoon and his staff went after Davis early in his junior year at Avon. At first, there wasn't much interest in the kid from Simsbury, so he held off and waited to decide which school he wanted to attend.

"I talked a little bit to [former I-Mass assistant coach Mark] Dennehy, back then. I wasn't really sure what school I wanted, but the good thing was I waited and looked at a lot of different schools," Davis says.

UConn, Providence and Holy Cross were among the other schools Davis was interested in. However, the more he saw the UMass, the more he could see himself playing on the Mullins Center ice, and he is certain he made the right move.

"I saw them once my junior year, but then I got to see them a couple more times my senior year," he says. "I also knew a couple of players on the team, so I'm really happy with my decision."

Davis played high school hockey for one of the best prep school teams in New England at Avon Old Farms, where he enjoyed a lot of success on the ice. During his junior and senior seasons, the team went a combined 52-3 while taking home two New England Prep School Championships. He was surrounded by loads of talented players including current teammate Jon Quick, who was selected in the third round of the NHL Draft by the Los Angeles Kings.

"We had 10 guys go Division I from our team and Quick is on the team here. That definitely helped as far as getting ready for playing at this level," says Davis of his team at Avon. "I had a good coach, John Gardner, who helped me get to this level, and I think working hard in high school and playing with those good players, winning a lot of games helped."

He says it was Gardner's tell-you-how-it-is attitude that helped him on the ice to the tune of 47 career goals and 101 assists, but he insists scoring is not the main name of his game.

"I've really seen myself as a top scorer but more as role player. With my speed, I've gotten a lot of chances at the net, getting close in on the net, beating defensemen wide and getting breakaways. Davis says. "I like to call myself sort of a gritty player. I use my speed to get in there in the corners, but also I like to show a little bit of grit, get in there and throw the body around a little bit. I'm not the biggest guy out there, but I still like to throw a couple of hits."

You almost have to remind yourself that this is still just Davis' freshman season, and he has three more years to mature and grow his game even more, a thought that should strike fear in the minds of all the teams he faces.

He says eventually he would like to shape his game into one that mirrors Pavel Bure, the former NHL sniper who also relied on his speed for success. The best thing a I-Mass fan can do is just sit back and enjoy the show in the coming years.

UMass freshman forward Chris Davis has proven to be one of the bright young players on the 2005-06 team. His speed has provided to be a huge asset for the Minutemen since they play on one of the biggest ice sheets in all of Hockey East.

UM up and down on ice

HOCKEY from page C1

think either team wanted to be there, but we battled them and gutted it out. [Army] played well and made it difficult for us, but we found a way to win."

UMass 5, Merrimack 1
UMass 4, Merrimack 1

With the weekend sweep, UMass also swept the season series with the Warriors by a combined score of 13-3. The Minutemen picked up three quick goals in the first 14 minutes of the game off the sticks of Marvin Degon, Anderson and Captaro, and MC was never able to get back in the game, despite out-playing UM through much of the final two periods.

Cahoon challenged his squad to play a much better game the following night when the series shifted to North Andover, and they rose to the occasion, scoring the final four goals of the game after Matt Johnson kicked off the scoring with a power-play goal just 5:33 into the contest.

"We were after the kids and got on the kids about the way they played the night before," Cahoon said. "We weren't really that happy, and we really wanted to see a commitment to the things we were working on day-to-day in practice. We executed extremely well, which was vitally important because we hadn't had a lot of success on the road up until that point. We really totally controlled the game. It was a great effort. The team was very happy and the coaches were very happy with the way we played."

Lowell 6, I-Mass 2

The Minutemen really missed a chance to gain solid control of seventh place in Hockey East by laying a dud at the Tsongas Arena on Friday the 13th. The River Hawks got big nights from Jason Lefchuck (2-1 — 3) and Danny O'Brien (1-2 — 3), while the team's struggling defense picked it up in front of Peter Vetri, who made 28 saves to put an end to the Minutemen's second three game losing streak of the season.

"Lowell got off to a bad start [to the season] and was trying to salvage something and came ready to play," Cahoon said. "We thought. 'Now, we've figured it out.' We went to Merrimack and played the way we needed to play and did the things we were supposed to do so automatically that was going to fall into place the next time out. We've arrived."

"Whether you call it satisfied, I don't think that was quite it, or just thanking that we're all set now. We're OK and safe and ready to go. We're going to be as good as we need to be. We were out-competed in Lowell and took ourselves out of the game in the first period, and we never got ourselves back and going. We really had to do some soul searching."

UNH 3, I-Mass 1
I-Mass 4, UNH 3 (OT)

Gabe Winer had a great weekend stopping 48 of 50 shots in the loss on Friday night and then 37 of 40 during the win over the No. 9 Wildcats.

With the score knotted at 1 in the third period at the Mullins, Brett Hemingway came up big yet again for UNH, as he scored the game-winner with just more than five minutes left to play before Lowell closed the book with an empty-netter in the final minute.

The Leader in Clinical Social Work Education
SMITH COLLEGE
School for Social Work
Offers 27 month Master and doctoral programs beginning each June
Intensive on-campus course instruction
Field Internships around the country
Continuing Education Programs for the Post-Masters Clinician
• 6 and 12 hour summer seminars
• Post Graduate Certificates in • Children and Adolescents
  • End of Life Care
  • Advanced Clinical Supervision
SMITH COLLEGE School for Social Work
Call or email for more information
Office of Admission, Smith College School of Social Work
Northampton, Massachusetts 01063
Tel: 413 585-7960 • E-mail: sswadmit@smith.edu
www.smith.edu/ssw

Welcome Back Students!
Delivery:
413.549.0077
Telephone:
413.256.8923
413.256.8924
Fax:
413.253.1173
Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
Featuring:
* Vegetarian Options
* Lunch Specials
* Sushi Bar
* "Light and Healthy" entrees
- We Bring China Town to You~
Monday - Thursday: 11:30am - 10:00pm
Friday & Saturday: 11:00am - 11:00pm
Sunday: 12:00pm - 10:00pm
Visit us at: www.pandaeastamherst.com
103 North Pleasant Street Amherst, MA

Come live by the Cliff Side...
CLIFF SIDE APARTMENTS
UTILITIES INCLUDED
Heat, Hot Water & Electricity!
*Small 1 Bedroom $710.00 per mo: Great for 1 person!
*Large 1 Bedroom: $775.00 per mo: Comfortable for two!
*2 Bedroom: $860.00 per mo: Easily split the cost with a roommate!
*3 Bedroom: $1340.00 per mo: Reserve this floor plan now for the fall!!!
• Discounted Security Deposit
• Minutes From UMASS and Interstate 91
• Studio, 1, 2 and 3 Bedroom floor plans available
• 28 Acres of wooded hiking and biking trails
• Pool, Tennis, Volleyball & basketball recreation areas
• BBQ and Picnic Areas
• Free Public Transportation
• Your Indoor Cat Welcome!
!!!!! CALL FOR A TOUR TODAY !!!!!
248 Amherst Road, Rt 116 • Sunderland, MA 01375
413.665.3958
cliffsideapts@northland.com
Prices valid until May 31, 2006. Deposits For Fall Move Ins Now will hold price.

GW tops the Atlantic 10

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

At this point in the season, with most Atlantic 10 teams five or six games into their respective schedules, fans of the Massachusetts men's basketball team probably would not have picked the Minutemen to be in the thick of things. But here they are, 4-1 in conference play, tied with Rhode Island for second place and one game behind first place George Washington. Granted, the Minutemen's schedule will get progressively harder in the ensuing months, with games against heralded GW, Rhode Island and Xavier.

While there have not been any memorable moments in conference play so far (probably because the best teams haven't matched up yet), the A-10 has separated itself into several groups. The first is the frontrunners, which consists of five teams which have shown considerable success in the first stretch of conference play. The second is the middle of the pack — four teams within striking distance that can do some damage but have not established themselves as legitimate threats. And then there are the down-and-out teams, whose only purpose might be to spoil a contender's chances somewhere down the line but will most likely be the A-10 punching bags for the next couple of months.

Frontrunners

1. George Washington (14-1, 4-0 A-10)

The Colonials are clearly the team to beat in the A-10. GW has gone 14-1 overall and 4-0 in conference play to this point. Its only loss was on the road against a tough Atlantic Coast Conference opponent in North Carolina State, and it has handily beaten four A-10 teams — Temple, Saint Louis, Charlotte and Saint Joseph's. But this is what separates GW from the competition: five players are averaging double figures in points, four of them are starters — Mike Hall (12.1 ppg), Danilo Pinnock (15.4 ppg), Carl Elliott (11.4 ppg), and Pops Mensah-Bonsu (10.8 ppg) — and one of them comes off the bench — Maureece Rice (12.6 ppg), who has not started a game this season. They are averaging over 80 points a game while allowing only 65.2, the largest margin of victory in A-10 play by far. On any given night, GW has five different players that can step up and hurt another team; it is a direct tribute to the teams' selflessness and will make them that much more of a threat come tournament time.

2 Massachusetts (9-6, 4-1 A-10)

After the 26-point demolition of the Temple Owls at the Mullins Center, many people (including Andy Katz of ESPN) gave the Minutemen a second look. They have just one loss in five games of conference play (to Saint Louis on a fadeaway jumper at the buzzer), and have played well, taking advantage of the weak starting schedule. Three of the four wins came against A-10 bottom feeders Duquesne, St. Joseph's and Fordham. Temple, however, is always a tough opponent because it slows the pace, is extremely patient on the offensive end and makes its opponent play ugly basketball. And that is why UMass got some attention for its convincing win over the Owls, a game that Ford surely had his team overly prepared for. UMass will be tested with trips to Rhode Island on Jan. 25 and to George Washington on Feb. 15, when fans will find out how serious the Minutemen are about contending for a conference title this season.

3. Rhode Island (10-6, 4-1 A-10)

URI began the season the same way UMass did, with inconsistent play early and some puzzling losses, followed by dominant play over weaker conference opponents and a tough loss to an evenly matched team. The one loss was to Charlotte by eight points on the road, and the four victories against St. Bonaventure, La Salle, Richmond and Fordham. There were some question marks early with losses to Utah, Houston, Ohio and Wagner, but after the initial loss against Charlotte in its A-10 opener, the Rams reeled off four straight victories. Rhode Island should not be a threat to win the division, but could be a tough opponent late in the season and could give some teams a scare in the A-10 Tournament.

4. Xavier (12-3, 3-1 A-10)

Xavier had a seven-game winning streak before Saint Louis snapped it on Jan. 22, and its only two losses before then were against a Top 5 Illinois team and a perennial NCAA tournament team in Creighton. The loss to Saint Louis was surprising, because Xavier should prove to be the biggest challenge to GW for A-10 supremacy. The Musketeers allow less than 60 points a game defensively and score over 73, and has a 14.3 point margin of victory over its opponents; they are shooting just under 50 percent from the field and just under 40 percent from three-point land. The impressive statistics don't make for a certain winner, but Xavier was able to take care of a borderline team like Rhode Island (88-80 at home) and should be able to beat Massachusetts without much trouble. Then again, not many people thought Saint Louis had a shot against them.

5. Charlotte (11-7, 4-2 A-10)

With seven losses on the young season, consistent play might be an issue for this team, which has already dropped conference games to George Washington and Xavier by double digits. Playing GW and Xavier has proven to be the test for the lesser teams to see how they measure up against the best competition. Charlotte didn't put up much of a fight when confronted by the two powerhouses, but it should be interesting when it matches up with Rhode Island and Massachusetts, two teams in similar standing.

6. Fordham (8-10, 3-2 A-10)/Richmond (10-8, 3-2 A-10)/Temple (9-7, 3-3 A-10)/Saint Louis (9-8, 3-2 A-10)

All of these teams have three wins in the A-10, and most of them are against teams like Dayton, St. Bonaventure and Duquesne that are hopelessly buried at the bottom of the conference. The only team in this group that has a chance to move to the top of the conference is Saint Louis. The Billikens, in two of their three conference wins, have taken down UMass and Xavier; and they took GW to overtime before losing by five. The Billikens also took on Gonzaga earlier this season, which has since climbed to a No. 7 ranking in the nation, and fell to the Zags by only three points. Saint Louis could prove to be the sleeper in the A-10 conference this season, and if the better teams look past the Billikens they might end up with an unexpected loss.

7. La Salle (10-6, 2-4 A-10)/ Saint Joseph's (7-8, 2-4 A-10)/ Dayton (9-10, 1-4 A-10)/ Duquesne (2-14, 0-5 A-10)/ St. Bonaventure (6-10, 0-5 A-10)

Bottom feeders, punching bags, whatever you want to call them, these teams are just plain mediocre. The rest of the season for these teams will consist of the occasional win mixed in with a whole lot of 20-point losses. La Salle's claim to fame is Steven Smith, a prolific scorer who is averaging 19.2 points per game this season which leads the conference. La Salle, in particular, was doing well with its out-of-conference schedule because it booked easy teams, but the A-10 proved to be too much to handle for La Salle and the rest of these cellar teams. It has been a sharp turn-around for Dayton and Saint Joseph's; not that long ago Dayton was always hovering around the Top 25 and Saint Joseph's was going to the Elite Eight with Delonte West and Jameer Nelson.

Minutewomen look to get back into A-10 race

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

If Thursday, Jan. 19 was the first time you witnessed the Massachusetts women's basketball team in action this season, you would think that they were at the top of the Atlantic 10 Conference standings. However, as any avid fan of the Minutewomen (5-13, 2-5 A-10) knows, that is certainly not the case.

UMass won its first A-10 Conference game of the season that Thursday night by defeating Richmond (7-11, 2-4 A-10) 81-67 at the Mullins Center. The win put an end to a six-game losing streak, giving the Maroon and White a glimmer of hope for the rest of the season.

The Minutewomen lost five consecutive conference matchups heading into their battle with the Spiders on Jan. 19, and coach Marnie Dacko knew how important it was to end their drought.

"It's huge," Dacko said after the win over Richmond. "Right now, any win is huge, and this is a good one against a good team. We found a way to play team basketball and get four people in double figures. It was a breakout game for Katie [Nelson], and for all of us, putting it together. We did it by not turning the ball over, and making some extra passes and making free throws when we needed to."

The Minutewomen's 81 points were the most they have scored all season, thanks to the lights-out shooting of Nelson. The senior guard had 18 points and seven assists on the night, and was 4-for-5 from 3-point range.

As one of the leaders on the Minutewomen squad, Nelson realizes that the win over Richmond is a big one.

"We needed a boost for a while now," Nelson said. "We've obviously been on a losing streak, and our season overall hasn't been as we hoped it would be, but this was a big game. We knew Richmond was going to come in and want to win the game, but we were ready today and we hustled to every ball, and won most of the battles. We're just happy to get the win."

The Minutewomen can point to a number of reasons as to why they were victorious over Richmond, but there was no bigger factor than shooting 61 percent from the field. Four UMass players finished the game with double figures — an unlikely feat for a team that, going into the game, was last place in the A-10 in offensive scoring.

Sophomore Pam Rosanio believes her team can continue to be successful if they spread the points around more often.

"It's a lot easier when everyone's scoring and everyone's contributing," Rosanio said. "It doesn't matter if someone has single digits or whatever, as long as everybody has input in the game and we're putting the ball in the basket."

Rosanio finished with a game-high 22 points, and could not have been happier after her team's first A-10 victory.

"It's so good," Rosanio said with a look of relief. "It's huge. It's so good I don't know what to say. I'm just excited that we finally got one."

Sophomore Kate Mills and junior Tamara Tatham were also among the UMass players finishing the game with double-digit scoring. Mills had 14 points to go along with her game-high three blocks, while Tatham ended the night with 12 points and six rebounds.

Flying under the radar in the Minutewomen's first victory since Dec. 30 was the outstanding play of freshman guard Stefanie Gerardot. The Indiana native played 18 minutes off the bench and scored seven points on the night.

The Minutewomen's lack of confidence was piling up throughout their tough road in the month of January, but after their win over Richmond, the players and coaches seemed to have more poise than ever before.

There was a renewed sense of confidence running through the hallways of the UMass locker room that night, carrying over to the next day at practice in the Cage.

In fact, Rosanio was so confident after the win that she made one of the most optimistic comments of all time. Perhaps in a call-out to her teammates, Rosanio made everything but a guarantee about a postseason appearance.

"We're going to the A-10 tournament," Rosanio said. "We have to. I don't want to guarantee it, but I want to go there so bad. I want to go back there, so we are going to do anything we can to get back there. This win will give us some confidence, hopefully, and help us keep going."

It was that confidence that the Minutewomen had lacked in the previous A-10 games. But after a long-awaited win, UMass players and coaches seem ready to make a run at the playoffs, and will try to use this win as a turning point in their season that is far from over.

While one win seems to have gotten everyone's hopes up, Dacko will not overlook her next opponent to make early travel plans for the A-10 Tournament in Philadelphia in March.

"I'm just looking one game at a time right now," Dacko said. "We're going to continue to take one game at a time and see where it falls. So, that's how far ahead I'm looking."

NOW LEASING

We make coming home the best part of your day!

SUGARLOAF ESTATES
28 River Road Sunderland
665-3856
www.sugarloafestates.com

Aspen Chase & Alpine Commons
APARTMENT HOMES
133 Belchertown Road, Rt. 9, Amherst
256-0741
www.aspenchaseapartments.com
www.alpinecommons.com

- Deluxe 2 bedroom apartment homes
- FREE Cable & High Speed Internet
- Basketball, Volleyball & Refreshing Pool *
- Washer/Dryers in selected styles
- Pet Friendly Community
- On-Site Storage Facilities*
- Free On-Site parking
- Minutes from UMASS on FREE Bus line
- Spacious 1, 2, 3 & 4 bedroom apartment homes
- FREE Cable, High Speed Internet & Phone
- Patio or Balcony in selected styles
- On-Site Laundry Facilities
- Pet Friendly Community
- Off Street Parking
- On the PVTA Bus line
- Minutes from UMASS & the Center of Amherst

*Available to all the residents of our beautiful communities.

Mention this ad & pay no application fee! Call for details today!!

Gerardot stepping up

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Whenever a team is struggling to get wins, somebody must step up and help that team get over the hump. Somebody has to bring their game to a higher level. For the Massachusetts women's basketball team, that player has been freshman Stefanie Gerardot.

In UMass's back-to-back wins over Richmond and No. 25 George Washington, Gerardot has been nothing short of spectacular coming off the bench and helping her team get back on the winning track.

Each of those Atlantic 10 matchups were labeled as the "turning point" for a UMass season that has been full of frustration. And if the freshman guard from Indiana can continue to come off the bench and hit big shots, there will always be a place for her on the hardwood.

"She's proven herself the last two games," sophomore Kate Mills said after the 55-53 win over George Washington. "She deserves to be on that court, and she's doing a great job. We definitely respect and have confidence in her."

Gerardot turned in two consecutive career games in UMass's first two A-10 wins. She posted seven points and four rebounds in 18 minutes of play against Richmond on Jan. 19. She then she tallied a career-high eight points while playing 25 minutes the following Sunday afternoon, helping the Minutewomen knock off the No. 25 team in the nation.

There's no question that Gerardot's presence was felt in the win over Richmond, especially when her first basket of the game led to a momentum-changing free throw. Gerardot hit a jumper off the glass as she was fouled, sending her to the line to shoot one. The free throw gave the Minutewomen a 32-31 edge, and they held the lead for the rest of the game.

Sophomore Pam Rosanio was quick to compliment her teammate's performance.

"She definitely came in and stepped up big time," Rosanio said. "She's a natural shooter. We work after practice everyday together on our shots and on our foul shots, so I'm glad that she was able to come in and produce."

Gerardot's performance against Richmond earned her another opportunity to come off the bench against George Washington three days later. The Indiana native was oblivious to any big-game pressure as she went 3-for-6 from the field and drained both of her crucial 3-point attempts late in the game.

"I'm just glad we won," Gerardot said after the win over George Washington. "It's two in a row. We beat a great team, and it just proves what we're capable of doing. We just have to continue."

She does not seem to be phased by the pressure that could overwhelm a freshman in crucial situations. Instead, Gerardot is comfortable coming off the bench and taking the big shot. And why not? She has proven she can hit it.

"We need her to keep shooting," Rosanio said. "We have confidence in her because her shot is amazing."

While she may only be a freshman, Gerardot's teammates seem to have fallen in love with her game. The team gains confidence in her every time she steps onto the court. But it is her supporting cast that helps her block out any possible nerves.

"I like playing with my teammates," Gerardot said. "My teammates make me feel confident, and I feel good on the floor. I enjoy playing with them."

While we should not expect the young shooter to carry the team from here on out, coach Marnie Dacko believes that her minutes will begin to increase.

"She's a gamer," Dacko said. "She's just getting her feet wet. She knows where the basket is, and we're just trying to get her to play more and more defense. But we put her in and we didn't miss a beat. She knows how to score, so you're going to see more of her."

Minutewomen making strides

W. HOOPS from page C1

pionship game.

The following Wednesday UMass opened up the most crucial part of its season — the Atlantic 10 Conference games, with all of the remaining 16 contests against A-10 foes.

Opening up the A-10 portion of its schedule with a close 57-51 loss to Dayton on Jan. 4, UMass would continue to knock on the door of a conference win over the next two weeks.

Including the Dayton game, the Minutewomen dropped their first five A-10 contests by an average of 7.6 points per game, including nail-biting losses to Duquesne (46-44 on Jan. 6), St. Bonaventure (68-62 on Jan. 8) and Rhode Island (63-54 on Jan. 13).

After Charlotte (10-5 at the time) beat UMass 71-61 on Jan. 15, the Minutewomen returned to Amherst holding a 3-13 overall record and an 0-5 conference record and were looking for something — anything.

The Minutewomen put themselves on the A-10 board and shattered their losing streak, beginning with a 67-51 win over Richmond on Jan. 19 at the Mullins Center. Rosanio turned in her usual solid performance, scoring 22 points, while Nelson hit 4-of-5 from the perimeter en route to posting 18 points and three steals.

Whether it was pure game momentum or a buildup of confidence, UMass did not flinch the following Sunday when it took the hardwood at the Mullins Center against No. 25 GW. Throwing their own record out the window and looking past the Colonials' 10-7 record, the Minutewomen shocked GW when sophomore Kate Mills hit two free throws with 10 seconds remaining in regulation to take the upset, 55-53.

"Playing very well against Richmond and continuing on against GW and our execution, it shows that we're getting better," Dacko said.

Sophomore guard Aleha Tatham and UMass finished the intersession strong, beating Richmond and George Washington to close the break.

Gritty effort from Rosanio leads UMass

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

It was Jan. 13 and the Massachusetts women's basketball team had just dropped a dogfight to Rhode Island 63-54 at the Mullins Center. UMass coach Marnie Dacko had already given her postgame talk to her team, most of the Minutewomen had already departed from the locker room and the Rams were already getting on their bus to return to the Ocean State.

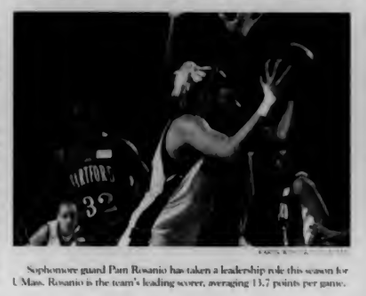
Sophomore Pam Rosanio, however, had to remain in the locker room as the team trainer examined her face.

Throughout the afternoon's contest, Rosanio did not shy away from her opposition and in the process was shoved, elbowed and simply knocked around by various Rams. Penetrating into the paint, Rosanio put her body on the line and paid the price during UMass's 12th loss of the season.

"I got elbowed right in the same cheek three times," Rosanio said. "It was a physical game."

When Rosanio emerged from the team's locker room following the contest, gripping a softball-sized bag of ice against the right side of her face, she had just put out a gutsy performance and had a black and blue shiner to show for it.

Along with the battle-wounds, Rosanio had also put up a team-high 24 points and grabbed nine rebounds, while keeping her squad neck-to-neck with the Rams the entire afternoon before faltering.



"Pam is tough as nails," Dacko said. "She's a gamer, she always brings her play to the game and to practice and is just maturing as a player."

On a team that has eight freshman and sophomores and only four juniors and seniors, Rosanio, along with the rest of the sophomores, has been forced into leadership roles during the early portion of her collegiate careers. Her fearless performance against URI was an example of her ability to step up to the level that Dacko expects her to be at.

"[Rosanio is] doing a great job," Dacko said. "She's always asked to play one of the best offensive contributors on our opponents."

Although a team's sophomores rarely are considered the leaders, Dacko has slated Rosanio and teammates as the go-to girls.

"Our leaders are our underclassmen," Dacko said. "We have four leaders this year [Tamara Tatham, Alisha Tatham, Kate Mills and Rosanio] those are our youngsters and they are the leaders."

Sophomore guard Pam Rosanio has taken a leadership role this season for UMass. Rosanio is the team's leading scorer, averaging 13.7 points per game.

Less than one week after her physical bout against URI, Rosanio's efforts sprung the Minutewomen free from a six-game losing skid and gave her team its first Atlantic 10 win — and she did it in true Rosanio fashion.

Facing a Richmond squad which had double the number of wins that the Maroon and White had going into the contest, Rosanio put up 22 points A few days later on Jan. 22, Rosanio came through again for UMass, but this time against then No. 25 George Washington.

Scoring a team-high 17 points and hitting two out of four three-pointers against GW, Rosanio led the Minutewomen to their first win over a ranked team since 1999.

Because of her performances against the Spiders and the Colonials, Rosanio was named the Dinn Brothers/UMass Co-Athlete of the Week aside men's basketball forward Jeff Viggiano on Jan. 24.

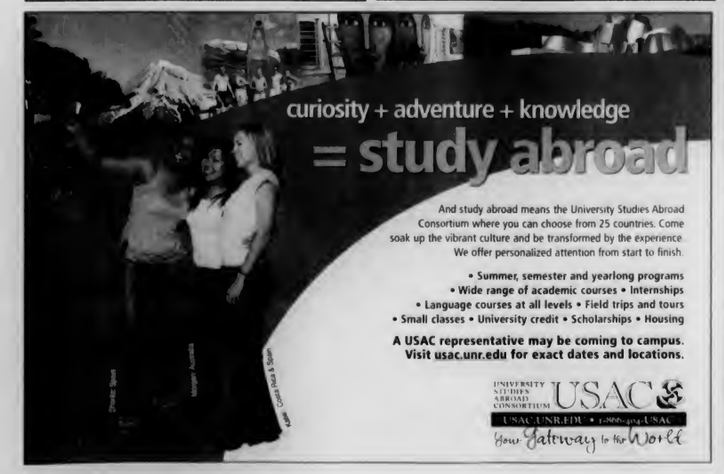
have a spring break you'll remember

London
R/T air & 7 nights at St. Christopher's Village
from $701*

Sydney
R/T air & 7 nights at The Original Backpackers
from $1660*

Acapulco
R/T air & 7 nights at Romare Palace
from $1020*

great packages right here



*Prices subject to change and availability. All taxes and fees included in prices. Acapulco price does not include transfers and port taxes. All flights out of Boston. CST #1017160-40

STA TRAVEL
www.statravel.com
(413) 256.1261

UMASS Campus Recreation
STILL TIME TO ENTER:
Basketball (M/W/C)....A.S.A.P.
GET THOSE FORMS IN BY:
Wallyball (M/W/C)...2/6
Sports Trivia (M/W)...2/8
More Info: 215 Boyden, 5-2693
On the Web: http://www.umass.edu/umim
LATE ENTRANTS SHOULD CHECK FOR EXTENSIONS IN BOYDEN 215

UMASS Campus Recreation
Paid Officials Needed for Basketball:
Basketball - Jan. 31 @ 6 p.m. (Boyden 249)
Feb. 1 @ 7 p.m. (Boyden 249)
Feb. 2 @ 7 p.m. (Totman Gym)
Feb. 3 @ 6 p.m. (Totman Gym)
(Please call the office for clinic attendance requirements)
Still Time to Enter: Basketball
More Info: 215 Boyden, 5-2693
On the Web: http://www.umass.edu/umim

VACATIONING SPRING BREAK?
PLANNING A SEMESTER ABROAD?
NEED A PASSPORT?
AMHERST TOWN CLERK'S OFFICE PROCESSES PASSPORTS
MONDAY THRU FRIDAY 8 AM TO 3 PM
FOR MORE INFO: 259-3035
WE'RE ACROSS FROM NEWBURY COMICS

USED BOOKS = BIG SAVINGS

Save up to 25% over the cost of new.

UMASS AMHERST
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

proudly part of the
efollett.com bookstore network

Save your receipts for a 5% rebate!

LOW PRICE GUARANTEE

Your first choice to buy textbooks for less... and sell them back for more.

GUARANTEED BUYBACK
If I'm on the book you get the cash.
50% of purchase price at buyback.
Available on select titles only

UM nets win over GW

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team used its momentum to execute a stunning upset on Jan. 22 at the Mullins Center. The Minutewomen (5-13, 2-5 A-10) knocked off No. 25 George Washington by a score of 55-53 in a last-second thriller.

Sophomore Kate Mills scored nine of UMass's final 12 points, including a pair of game-winning free throws with 10 seconds left, to give the Colonials their first Atlantic 10 loss of the season. Mills tallied her third double-double of the year, finishing the game with 13 points and 11 rebounds.

The Minutewomen have been carrying a certain swagger since their rejuvenating win over Richmond last week, and coach Marnie Dacko believes it is well-deserved.

"I just feel good for my kids," Dacko said after the win. "We've been on them. We've been telling them to believe. They've got to continue to believe. The definition of keeping the faith is 'belief without proof.' And we're starting to prove it. The work and effort is starting to pay off."

The Minutewomen got on the board first and never trailed until Colonials sophomore guard Kimberly Beck hit a 3-point field goal to give George Washington its first lead of the game with 32 seconds remaining in the first half. Beck then hit another 3-pointer at the buzzer to give the Colonials a 25-19 lead going into halftime. It would turn out to be George Washington's largest lead of the game.

Sophomore Pam Rosanio led the way for the Minutewomen in the second half, scoring ten consecutive UMass points to help her team go on a 13-4 run. Topping off the early second half run was freshman Stefanie Gerardot, who came off the bench and buried a huge 3-pointer to give the Maroon and White a 32-29 lead.

Frustration began to set in for the Minutewomen, as some calls from the officials began to go against them, letting George Washington quietly take back the lead. Both teams went back and forth for the remainder of the half, with the Colonials maintaining the lead up until Mills began her late-game domination.

Rosanio cut the lead to within one as she buried a deep three from the top of the arc with 1:56 remaining in the game. Her confident stare at the hoop as she gathered to shoot spoke for itself.

"I just wanted to win the game so bad," Rosanio said. "I was going to do whatever it takes. I know my 3-point shot hasn't been that good the whole season, but it came in handy today."

Mills then hit a layup and stuck a free throw with 1:28 left in regulation to give the Minutewomen a 51-50 lead. Mills was able to get another basket down low just 20 seconds later to give UMass a three-point advantage.

George Washington proved why they were nationally ranked when Beck pulled up and nailed a 3-pointer after forcing a turnover with 42 seconds to play in the game.

A missed opportunity by junior Tamara Tatham turned into an offensive rebound and a trip to the line for Mills, who would have a chance to put the game away. Mills rose to the occasion and hit two free throws to give the Minutewomen a 55-53 lead with 10 seconds remaining.

Some may have been nervous while shooting free throws with the game on the line, but Mills never had any doubt that she would sink them both.

"We've been practicing free throws after practice every day," Mills said. "So, I knew I was going to be able to make them. And I just had confidence, and my teammates had confidence in me. So, I knew I could put them in."

George Washington had a final chance, but an airball by Beck meant only one thing: A pset City.

It was UMass's ability to never give up, even when George Washington continued to hit big shots to try and put the game away. It was their confidence and determination that helped the Minutewomen overcome many early-season struggles and defeat a nationally ranked opponent.

And for all of the UMass players and coaches, success can be attributed to only one thing: confidence.

"We all have confidence in each other," Mills said. "Everybody has just been gelling together. Everybody is firing on all cylinders now."

Freshman guard Stefanie Gerardot scored eight points off the bench in the Minutewomen's dramatic 55-53 upset of George Washington.

Nelson endures struggles, hopes team has turned corner

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

When redshirt senior Katie Nelson walked off the court after defeating Simon Fraser 69-58 in the first exhibition game of the season, she never would have imagined that, over two months later, the Massachusetts women's basketball team would be struggling so badly.

Throughout the first half of the season, things did not go well for the Minutewomen — up until Jan. 19. That was the night that the senior point guard from Maryland decided to take the game into her own hands.

Nelson did not want to look at a sixth straight loss next to her team in the Atlantic 10 standings. She knew that she had to take it upon herself to have a big night against a Richmond team that was also desperate for a win.

And she did just that, knocking down four of her five 3-point attempts and finishing the night with a season-high 18 points. Nelson also dished out seven assists and grabbed four rebounds in an attempt to get UMass its first conference win.

"I think sometimes we don't come ready to play," Nelson said after the game. "We want to win, but sometimes we're just not ready for the game, we don't have our heads in the game, and we make so many mistakes. I think we were just ready for tonight. Everybody played where they were supposed to be. It was just nice to put it together. We were a little sick of losing."

Nelson was coming off of a tough outing in a 71-61 loss to Charlotte, where she had only two points and was 0-for-3 from behind the arc. While she will be the first to say that she hasn't had the greatest season, Nelson knew she still had that scoring touch — she just had to regroup.

"I didn't feel anything different," Nelson said. "I didn't start off the season as good as I wanted to. My shooting percentage isn't very good this year. As the games piled on, I got a little more anxious every game. I wanted to start hitting my threes, and there just comes a point when I just had to relax, and I think tonight was that night where I didn't come in with any huge expectations about my shooting.

"I just wanted to play well and help my teammates score. Get my assists and try to get my rebounds. I just took my time, and my shots fell tonight, so it felt pretty good. Hopefully I can keep it up."

Irony that Nelson's play on the court that night was inspiring is an understatement. That win gave the Minutewomen a load of confidence. Some could say it has been the turning point of their underachieving season.

When asked if advancing to the A-10 tournament was a realistic goal, Nelson did not hesitate to answer.

"Definitely," Nelson said. "Hopefully we can come out for the rest of the season and get the wins we're definitely supposed to get and just work extra hard. And we'll be in it."

The Minutewomen were in desperate need of someone to step up, and coach Marnie Dacko believes that it is better late than never.

"She deserves it," Dacko said after the win over Richmond. "When you look at her stat line, she plays close to 32 minutes a game. She's an outstanding practice player. She had some opportunities, she got some good looks, and it's the confidence hopefully that's going to get her moving."

Senior guard Katie Nelson struggled early this season but has picked up her play lately. Nelson's 18 points were instrumental in an 81-67 win over Richmond

Write for sports
E-mail sports@dailycollegian.com
Cover UMass athletics for New England's largest college daily newspaper!

Dance Stuff
Starting a dance class?
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs
220 N. Pleasant Street
253.5201

OPEN TUESDAY, VALENTINE'S DAY 4PM-10PM
Goten
OF JAPAN STEAKHOUSE
FAMOUS FOR CAPTIVATING CUISINE PREPARED AT YOUR TABLE
RT. 116, SUNDERLAND 413-665-3628

LONE WOLF
61 Main St. Downtown Amherst
No one deserves to be "Lone"ly on Valentine's Day
Serving Valentines Day Dinner Saturday February 11th and open on Valentine's Day night 5:30pm - 9:30pm
Call for reservations (413) 256-4643
Breakfast hours: Mon - Fri 7-2 Sat - Sun 7-2:30
Lunch served Mon - Fri 11-2 only

UMASS STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
Helping students protect their rights for over 30 years.
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation & Counseling for UMASS Students
Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
Student & Worker Rights, Family & Criminal Law
Call 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center
Visit our website:
www.umass.edu/rso/slso
slso@stuaf.umass.edu

FUN, FUN, FUN!
BARTEND
BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL
Student Discount!
1-800-357-3210 218 Memorial Ave, West Springfield, MA
www.bostonbartender.com

Photos available at www.eaglecrestmanagement.com
Need a house or condo for the 2005-2006 school year?
Call or stop by today 256-3442
Eagle Crest
Property Management
73 Main St. Amherst, 01002

Summer 2006 in Paris
A multitude of undergraduate, credit-bearing courses
• Two 5-week Sessions
• Fast Track Intensives
• French Immersions
www.aup.edu
THE AMERICAN UNIVERSITY OF PARIS
knowledge, perspective, understanding

2X Tuesday
Buy Any Large Pizza...
Get One FREE Delivered!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911

Swim team stays strong

By Joey Witte
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's swimming and dive team took advantage of winter break, as they looked great going into the last few meets before the Atlantic 10 Championships.

The Minutewomen swam their way to a first-place finish out of four teams at the Rhode Island Invitational that took place Jan. 13-14. UMass dominated A-10 opponents with 935 points. La Salle, the host of the event, finished second with 807 points, followed by George Washington (703) and La Salle (555).

Junior Liz Lovejoy led the Maroon and White, placing first in the 200-yard fly (2:08.84) and the 100-yard free (53.77). Both times were personal bests for the Minutewomen. Lovejoy was also on the 200-yard free relay and 400-yard free relay squads, which both took first place.

Lovejoy's efforts, which showed career-bests in the 100-yard free and 200-yard fly (fourth best in UMass history), earned her UMass Dinn Peters Athlete of the Week.

After Lovejoy, junior Nicole LeBarge and senior Kelly Hoffrage took the second and third spots in the 100-yard freestyle event. UMass also finished strong in the 200-yard IM, taking the second, third and fourth spots with sophomore Camilla Denty, Hoffrage and freshman Jackie Carter.

The Minutewomen dominated the boards as they finished first, second and third in both the one-meter and three-meter events. On the one-meter board it was Mary Jenkins, Karen Upperco and Sarah Horstmann. On the high board they finished with Upperco, Horstmann and Jenkins taking the top three spots.

The Maroon and White were not as fortunate against Boston College, as they lost 179-121 at Chestnut Hill on Jan. 21.

The Minutewomen took only two individual swimming events from the Eagles. Lovejoy won the 200-yard butterfly, and freshman Taryn Prout won the 500-yard freestyle event.

Upperco earned a victory in both diving board events, with scores of 239.85 on the one-meter and 286.13 on the three-meter.

After traveling to Chestnut Hill Saturday, the Minutewomen went on the road Sunday to face Central Connecticut. UMass didn't fare well for the second straight day, as they lost 174-126.

The Maroon and White only won three events, two of those were won by Upperco on both the one-meter and three-meter events. The other first-place showing for the Minutewomen was in the 50-yard freestyle event, swum by LeBarge.

The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team also competed in the Rhode Island Invitational, where they found that this year's A-10 Championships are definitely not going to be a breeze.

The Minutemen battled and went into the last event with an 824-820 advantage over La Salle, but La Salle took first and fourth in the 400-yard relay while UMass finished second and sixth, losing 890-884. George Washington finished third (607) and URI fourth with 593 points.

Evan Swisher was on the squad that took second in the 400-yard relay, but led two relay squads to first-place finishes in both the 400-yard medley relay and the 200-yard medley relay. Swisher also grabbed two individual first-place finishes in the 200-yard and 100-yard backstroke events.

Amherst native Greg Chartier placed first in the 200-yard IM in 1:58.24. Chartier was also on the second-place relay team that tried to keep UMass's lead in the last event.

Tristan Partridge, with his time of 9:57.24, finished second in the 1000-yard freestyle event, which was the fastest time for the Maroon and White all season in the event. Diver Reuben Rappe earned second-place showings in both the one-meter and three-meter events.

The Minutemen earned a 181-119 victory over Boston College on the road. They started off with Swisher, Nate Bromage, Mike Cordes and Gordon Leonard winning the 200-yard medley relay and never looked back.

Swisher again won both the 100-yard and 200-yard backstroke events. Kevin Cabriales also won two individual events, taking the 100-yard butterfly and the 50-yard freestyle.

UMass placed first, second and third in the 200-yard breaststroke with Jake Hogue, John Weaver and Mike Silvia. Rappe dominated both the low-board and high-board events with scores of 316.73 and 319.05, respectively.

Junior Mike Herald and the UMass men's swim team have fared well early this season. The Minutemen look to win their sixth straight Atlantic 10 Championship.

Injury leads to success

VOZELLA from page C1

says. "I really didn't play much, and when I say that, I mean I didn't get to play at all. I was buried in the depth chart. I wasn't exactly the biggest kid out there."

As it turns out, he wasn't exactly the healthiest kid out there either. One day during his freshman year of football, he began noticing pains in his lower back. Often limping wherever he went, he didn't think much of it and would often try to run it off. Asked if there was any specific event that triggered the back pain, Vozella said it was just something that had built up over time.

The pain eventually went away once the season ended, but when two-a-days came around during the summer heading into his sophomore year, the pain came on again — this time, unbearably.

"Once training camp came around, [the pain] came back again," he says. "It was a lot harder this time, and I just stopped right there."

Vozella went from the football field to the chiropractor's office, where he learned that his L3 vertebra was misaligned. It is one of the heavier discs in the lower back, and because of the weight it supports and the extension and flexion it allows, this caused some excruciating pain.

After undergoing surgery, doctors had him swim in the pool, a common rehabilitation process for people with paralysis or severe injuries, as it helps to rebuild some of the wear and tear caused by running.

It was during this time, in 2002, that peers discovered something about Vozella — this kid could move in the water.

A.J. found a new sport, all right. But this time, he actually got to play.

When he first started swimming for the Hawks in December of his sophomore year, he was far from the best on the team. In his first run in the 100 freestyle, he recorded a measly time of 1:06. Vozella vastly improved from there, though, and by the end of the year he was down to 53 seconds — quite a big jump in the pool — and had qualified for the state meet.

From there, it only stemmed further. By the time he finished his career at Xaverian, he had qualified for States three times, was named a two-time Catholic Conference All-Star and Conference co-MVP senior year, Team MVP twice, won the state championship in his bread-and-butter event — the 100-free — was named a captain, and was recognized as a Boston Globe and Boston Herald All-Scholastic.

He also shaved five more seconds off his 100-free time, down to 48 — a time he says he struggled to bring down when he arrived at UMass as a freshman.

* * *

Vozella was recruited by Yarworth, who saw potential and was impressed with his work ethic enough to offer him a spot on the team.

A.J. himself is not too familiar with how the recruiting process went, citing that his father did most of the communicating, but when he arrived on the Amherst campus in the fall of 2004, he came as a non-scholarship athlete. Like football, Vozella started out at the bottom of the depth chart.

Also like football, Vozella didn't know if he wanted to continue through it. Oh, he was fine physically — it's just that the rigors of being a student and an athlete caught up with him real fast.

"It was real hard work, and a real rough transition," he says. "Last September, I almost considered quitting swimming because I was just getting killed in practice. I had a hard time juggling school and swimming in a program that's so much better than what I was used to. It was hard to adapt."

But rather than quit, Vozella stuck it out after talking extensively to his parents and friends. Then, one of Yarworth's more intense training cycles came roughly three or four weeks before Thanksgiving, and Vozella worked hard through those weeks and finally started to see the fruits of his labor.

"I started doing him a lot of good, as he rose quickly through the ranks.

As the 2004-05 season progressed, his 100-free time continued to improve, making another big drop from 48.1 seconds down to a career-best 45.9. That 45.9 came at the right time at the Atlantic 10 Championships in Olean, N.Y., to win the 100-free. The time is also the eighth best in school history. He also recorded a 1:41.51 time in the 200-free, tops for the team and 10th best all time.

Yarworth likes Vozella's mental toughness in addition to his physical abilities.

"He's a very tough worker," Yarworth says. "Mentally, he's tough, despite what he might tell you. He's got a good feel for the water."

Vozella, now on scholarship, has yet to reach that 45.9 time again so far this season, tinkering around the 46-mark, but if the men's and women's method of training has taught us anything, it's that the Minutemen and Women — in true New York Yankees fashion — are playing for playoffs. Every meet heretofore is a dry run for A-10's.

Save a case of pneumonia that sidelined him for a few weeks in December, Vozella has held up on a physical level for the most part, and is easily one of the backbones of the Minutemen — a rallying point, if you will.

And whether or not he'll admit it to you, all evidence seems to trace back to that football mentality he picked up along the way.

"There was a whole lot of pressure on him [coming in]. We were asking him to do a whole lot more," Yarworth says. "I don't know where we'd be without him. He's a go-to guy that the team rallies around."

A-10 rivals posing challenge to UM

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

It was an unusual situation for the Massachusetts swimmers to be in several weeks ago at the Rhode Island Invitational. One team made huge strides while the other's grip slipped in the waning moments.

The grip that slipped, surprisingly, was that of the men's team over the likes of its Atlantic 10 competitors at URI. Normally when you're a five-time defending A-10 champ, and the pre-season favorite to repeat for an unprecedented sixth, you roll over these kinds of things.

The women, meanwhile, were off to great strides, beating out host URI, George Washington and LaSalle en route to a first-place victory at the day-long invitational. Women's coach Bob Newcomb always talks about moving up the ladder, and this has got to be a confidence-booster for the Minutewomen, who will be looking to snatch victories away from Richmond at the A-10's in February.

The Minutemen, however, have this going for them: they've been sick as dogs. Unlike their meet at Brown back in early December, when bad air circulation was the main cause for everyone getting so sick, the flu was just starting to go through the team and take its toll on everyone. Some got nasal and sinus infections. One swimmer, A.J. Vozella, came down with the pneumonia.

In the last meet of the day, LaSalle was able to get a faster time than the Minutemen in the 400-meter relay, the day's final event, and sneak by to take first place overall for the invitational.

Some of the players are still feeling it. When contacted via phone on Jan. 23, Vozella said he had just returned from the captains' house on nearby Philips Street, where teammates were "puking their brains out."

But like most of these regular season meets, this was a dry run. You can bet your last dollar the Minutemen will be rested and ready to go come the A-10 Championships in February, and will still be the favorite.

See A10 or page C9

'Golden' Prout defies the odds

By Joey Witte
Collegian Staff

When one walks on campus you notice things. You notice the tall library, you notice the pond, and you notice that you see same faces, but what you don't notice is that you're walking with an Olympic gold medalist.

This Olympian is a freshman political science major by the name of Michael Prout Jr. He took a semester off last year to compete in the 2004 Paralympics in Athens, Greece, where he won gold in the 400-meter freestyle event and bronze in the 100-meter freestyle race.

"I've been swimming since I was six on club teams. People on other paralympic teams told me that I should try out," Prout says.

Good thing he listened. While on the U.S. Paralympic team, Prout did not learn about Athens until trial meets in April of 2004. After one of those meets, the team was chosen that would be traveling to Athens. There were 44 spots open (16 males and 28 females) and Prout was one of the chosen ones.

"It was a relief. I didn't have to worry if I was on the team or not anymore," Prout says.

When winning the gold in the 400-meter freestyle event, he also set the Paralympic record by 2 seconds and missed the world record by .2. Prout also has two more world records (800-meter freestyle and 1,500-meter freestyle) and owns five American records (200M free, 400M free, 800M free, 1,500M free and 200M butterfly).

All records are in a Paralympic swim class where there are 15 different classes. 13 of them competitive. S1 through S10 classes are for physical disabilities, S1 class belonging to quadriplegics. S11 through S13 contain varying degrees of blindness. Prout belongs to the S9 class where most of the athletes are leg or arm amputees.

Little Mikey, as he is sometimes called by his fellow Minutemen because he is the smallest on the swim team and also because there are three other Mikes on the team, has a shorter right arm, three fingers on his right hand, and a shorter right leg. He has had quite an impressive life, but the real story lies in the fact that he was almost not born.

Mikey's mom, Patricia Prout, went to the doctor thinking that she was miscarrying again as she had a few months earlier. The doctor thought that she would miscarry within 24 hours and she went back the next week.

"[The doctor] said that I was smaller inside and thought that the baby had died," Patricia says. "We had an ultrasound and Michael had a heartbeat. I cried my eyes out."

Patricia's uterus shrank so quickly that it caused amniotic bands, which pinched off Michael's right side of his body. The twin died while Michael survived the battle.

"I always say Michael was a miracle," Patricia says.

Michael became a patient of Shriners Hospital at eight weeks old, where he's had most of his surgeries. In kindergarten he had hip surgery. He was in a full Spica cast, which started under his arms and went down to his left knee and his right ankle. His family placed a pillow on a little four-wheel cart and sent him to school. He had hardware removed from that hip six months later and played soccer with a walker.

After his first hip surgery the had another in November of 2004 at the age of five, his doctor suggested that he start swimming as rehab.

Again, good thing he listened. Michael would also later have surgery that lengthened his leg around three more inches when he was 13 years old. He said he did it for the possibility of having a better quality of life.

"Before his leg was lengthened he wore a lift on his shoe. He hated that lift," Patricia says. "His fourth-grade teacher had polio so she wore a lift also. They were buddies and I think it helped that she had that lift.

"Michael's surgeries were hard on him. He is a tough kid [and] he can take a lot of pain. His leg lengthening was by far the toughest on everybody. It's like a torture; you turn screws on the leg four times a day to stretch it. It doesn't hurt when you do it, but about a half hour later it would kill."

Patricia admits that she waited to get involved in the Paralympics because she didn't want Mike to think he was different than anybody, and because he was raised to feel that he was like everyone else.

"We started to talk about it at 16. We were involved because as the bigger the boys got into swimming, the harder it was for Michael to compete. He was too great a swimmer to not be at the top," Patricia says.

Little Mikey had his first international meet at 16, when he competed in the World Disability Championships in Mar Del Plata, Argentina. He didn't win any medals. According to Patricia, he was really upset, and when they went to Athens he swore that he would win a medal.

Not only is Mike a good listener, he's also a man of his word.

Patricia cried as she saw her oldest child receive an Olympic gold medal.

"The medal stand was amazing. I still get tears in my eyes when I think about it," Patricia says. "We are very proud of Michael and our other two children. They have all worked hard and earned everything they have. Michael has had to work harder to show people that he can do the same thing as everyone else."

Mikey's little sister Taryn, who is also a freshman, swims for the Minutewomen. They are very close and have been swimming on the same teams, along with their 15-year-old brother Cullivan, their whole lives.

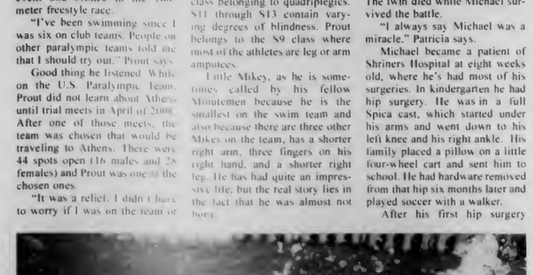
Before the Paralympics in Athens, Mike, in his sophomore year of high school, was named the Phillips 66 Swimmer of the Meet at the National Disability Championships in Seattle where he won gold medals in all six events that he competed in. He then went to Canada in July of 2003, where he got reacquainted with the medal stand as he won three golds and two silvers.

Prout also competed in Portland, Maine this past July, where he did better than he expected; he won three events and broke his own Pan-American record in the 100-meter freestyle event.

Now Little Mikey, who has won a good share of events in his day, in his first semester of eligibility, is swimming for the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team which has five consecutive Atlantic 10 Championships and eight out of the last 10. Mikey was unaware of the Minutemen's winning tradition until he arrived here.

When comparing UMass to other schools, Prout saw UMass as being a good fit and he also liked UMass coach Russ Yarworth.

"I liked his personality. It seemed like the practices would be challenging, which I like," Mikey says. "I like Russ overall, he's a good coach and a good guy."



"He's an inspiration to the team. He's got the heart of a lion," Yarworth says. "There's not enough I can say about him, the kids rally around him."

As for the season, Little Mikey feels that his team is really strong and has a lot of potential of doing well.

"I don't want to jinx it, but we have a really good chance," Prout says.

There is nothing better for a Minuteman than to have a gold medal placed around his neck, but what about the swimming future for "Mr. Gold"?

Well, Mikey hopes to make another Paralympic appearance in Beijing in 2008, and he feels that with Yarworth's training he can do really well there.

UMass swimmer Mike Prout shaved 13 seconds off of his personalbest time in the 1,000meter during Saturday's home meet with Fordham. After stroking with the leader throughout the race, he finished in second place.

UM faces challengers

A10 from page C8

That's not to say they won't have some competition, however.

LaSalle Explorers

Fluke or not, beating out UMass is always going to be a momentum-builder, and you can expect the men to extend their three-meet win streak a few more notches now that they know they can hang with the big boys.

LaSalle seems to trust heavily in its stud junior freestyler, Sean Connors-McBride, to get the job done. In the week of Jan. 23 he picked up the A-10 Co-Performer of the Week honors, after he pulled off a trifecta, winning the 100, 500 and 1000-meter free events in separate meets. That comes as no surprise to anyone that's watched him this year, and if he continues his dominance the Explorers have that puncher's chance.

St. Bonaventure Bonnies

Go ahead, ask any A-10 athlete in any sport about Olean, N.Y. Ask them about the trek, about the desert-edness, more importantly, ask them about the aura of St. Bonaventure.

Rumor has it that this year's squad is being played, be it basketball or intramural tetherball, there's just something about that Franciscan institution that almost always gives it an edge with disregard to whatever talent they've got.

The same can be said about its swimming team — although the talent is blatantly obvious. Chris Ekimoff looks to be their featured swimmer after racking up A-10 Performer of the Week honors in January. Earlier in the season, in a manhandling of Canisius, the junior set a school record in the 1,650 free. Is there a pattern developing here?

The Bonnies were predicted to finish second, but the A-10's are down the road in Buffalo. Could the mysterious aura of SBU pull them over the top?

THE HARP
413-548-6900
163 Sunderland Rd.
N. Amherst

The Top Ten Reasons to go to The Harp

1. No one will pick a fight with you...or your boyfriend.
2. Where red-headed sluts and sugar daddies come together.
3. Giant Deck & Pavilion: at our bar, if you're outside it's cuz' you WANNA be.
4. The best live bands & NEVER a cover charge.
5. Super draft beer selection/great specials.
6. Our kitchen is bitchin' (Open 7 days a week til' midnight!)
7. Trivia Night! Trivia Night! Trivia Night! (Every Tuesday!)
8. Use our FREE Wireless internet: Homework munchies & beer, what could be better? (OCMP accepted)
9. The place to chill, talk, and NEVER wait in line.
10. Visit the hottest staff at the coolest bar.

* By Liz and Becky, disclaimer by Management.

"Come Party Like You're Irish!"

www.theharp.net

Back Forward Stop Refresh Home AutoFill Print Mail
Address: @www.SunraiseInc.com

Screen Printed Tee
*Exp. 2.31.06

$5*

Your Design or Logo!

*White T's ONLY
small-XLarge
24 minimum • 1Standard Color • 1 side • Screen $20

Apparel Unlimited
SCREEN PRINTERS
322 Russell Street
Hadley, MA 01035

322 Russell St.
Hadley, MA 01035
413-586-7133
www.SunraiseInc.com

Project 2050

February 24
Nomad: The River
by Yin Mei Dance
Co-presented with
Asian Arts & Culture program.
8 pm, Bowker Auditorium

NEW WORLD THEATER
SPRING 2006

SUHEIR HAMMAD

April 7-9
INTERSECTION IV:
RE/GENERATIONS
Our biennial conference and festival will investigate new directions in multicultural performing arts and activism in response to the political conditions of our time. Festival highlights include keynote speakers SUHEIR HAMMAD and CURTIS MUHAMMAD and these performances:
Friday, April 7- Project 2050. On The Frontlines: Sex, War and Lies
Saturday, April 8 - Junebug Productions' Trying to Find My Way Back Home with William O'Neal.

Call 413-545-2511 for show tickets. For information, call NWT at 545-1972

Skin Care
Pioneer Valley Dermatology
www.pioneervalleyderm.com

Prepare for Spring Break NOW!

- Electrology
- Microdermabrasion
- Laser Hair Removal
- Glycolic Peels & Beta - Lift Peels
- All Procedures Available For Men and Women of All Skin Tones & Types

Shelly Damon, R.E.

Call for a Consultation & Book your Appointment Today!
413.549.7400

Richard Wyatt, M.D., Ph.D.
29 B Cottage St.
Amherst (just Bernies!)

Dr. Wyatt is available during laser procedures

Welcome Back Students
From The Amherst Brewing Company

Great Food
Nice People
Award Winning Beer

Join us for Jazz Mondays and Mt. Snow Promo Wednesdays
Mt. Snow Promo only in Feb/March 2006

Upstairs Lounge & Game Room: Pool, Ping Pong, Foosball, Darts & Big Screen TV

24 North Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA 01002
www.amherstbrewing.com

Get more information about our menu and calendar of events at amherstbrewing.com.

Design By IntangibleInc.com

No carnival for UM

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

For the first time in over three decades, the Massachusetts ski team will not be playing host to an event during this year's carnival season. A tradition started by former head coach Bill MacConnell, UMass has held the UMass Carnival during each season dating back to MacConnell's first years as the ski coach.

Last year was MacConnell's last, and it was not until early September that a replacement was found in UMass alum Justin Rouleau. Because of this, some feel, it would have been too difficult to try to host the event again in a year of transition.

"We were really disappointed that we wouldn't be hosting [the UMass Carnival] this year," Associate Athletic Director Jaime Seguin said.

"We didn't want to try to hold the event without being 100 percent organized and ready."

By the time Rouleau officially became part of UMass skiing, the annual coaches' meeting, where the schedule is created for the upcoming season, had already taken place.

"I was hired around Labor Day weekend [of last year]," Rouleau said. "So the team suffered some what from a lack of leadership during the summer since they were without a head coach."

In place of the UMass Carnival, Connecticut held the UConn Carnival Jan. 13-14 at Cranmore in New Hampshire.

Another reason for the year off is the reluctance of Berkshire East Ski Resort to host the event without the commitment of a head coach to organize it. Host to the carnival annually, leaders at the resort were not willing to wait until a replacement coach was found to commit a full weekend to the university.

"I think Berkshire East wanted to wait until Coach Rouleau was more grounded and used to the [coaching] environment before they hosted another event for us," Seguin said.

Everyone involved with the ski team expects this will be no more than a one-year hiatus from hosting an event.

"This is the first year that we've had a full-time head coach," Seguin said. "So I expect to hold the event again next year."

"It's one of my goals to bring a carnival back [to UMass] next year," Rouleau said.

The change did not affect the skiers that weekend, as both the men's and women's teams placed in the top three in the event. With the men finishing second and the women placing third, UMass was the only school at the carnival to place in the top three with both teams.

Hawkins duo leads UMass

SKIING from page C1

Minutemen and Minutewomen traveled to Waterville for the Plymouth State Carnival, slalom and giant slalom. On Saturday, the Maroon and White competed in the slalom event.

For the men, Small blew away the competition, winning the event by nearly four seconds and sweeping both runs.

"The snow conditions weren't quite ideal for racing on Saturday and while everyone else took it easy, he took full advantage and drove home an awesome win for himself," Hawkins said of his teammate. "He really stepped it up."

Hawkins fell during his second run and did not finish the race.

The Minutemen finished in third behind host Plymouth State and Colby-Sawyer. For the women, Eliza Hawkins was the top finisher, coming in fourth place. However, the team placed second overall on the day behind Boston College, with Brown placing third.

On Sunday, the giant slalom played out much like the UConn Carnival giant slalom. For the men, Hawkins and Small placed first and second, splitting the two runs with a victory each.

"The second day I was upset about falling in the slalom [the day before] so I wanted a big win," Hawkins said.

Despite having the top two skiers on the day, UMass finished fourth, behind Colby-Sawyer, Boston College, and Plymouth State.

"We're doing great in our top two spots [out of five]," Rouleau said, "but we're getting beat in the third, fourth, and fifth spots, where teams like Colby-Sawyer have a lot of depth." The Minutemen finished just .95 seconds behind Plymouth State.

Junior Rush Hawkins had a strong winter break, posting wins in events at the UConn Carnival and in the Plymouth State Carnival. The Minutemen are currently third in the overall team standings.

For the women's team, Eliza Hawkins once again won the giant slalom, and the women finished second to Boston College by .69 seconds. Brown again finished third overall.

After three carnivals, UMass is the only school to have both the men's and women's teams in the top three in the overall standings. The men are currently third in the standings behind Colby-Sawyer and Plymouth State.

They trail the leader, Colby-Sawyer, by four points, and Plymouth State by just one. The women are now second overall, trailing Boston College by two points.

Tough break for track team

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's cross-country team's winter break ended a little earlier than that of most students when they reported back to campus on Jan. 15 to resume their practices in preparation for meets on Jan. 18 and 20.

The Boston University Women's Meet was what Jan. 18 had in store for the Minutewomen. It proved challenging for the team, which came in fourth out of four teams.

Sophomore Kristen Bakanowski was a huge factor in the women's success. She finished first in the pole vault event, clearing a height of 11 feet, 6.5 inches, and placed fourth in the 55-meter dash with a time of 7.59.

However, the Maroon and White turned in a team effort with other stellar performances by Elisabeth Budd, Kendra Leighton, Christina DeRosa and Marissa Callahan.

Budd turned in a time of 26.76 in the 200-meter dash, good enough for fourth place, and also finished second in the 400-meter dash in 59.68.

Leighton also competed in the 400-meter dash, finishing third with a time of 7.48.

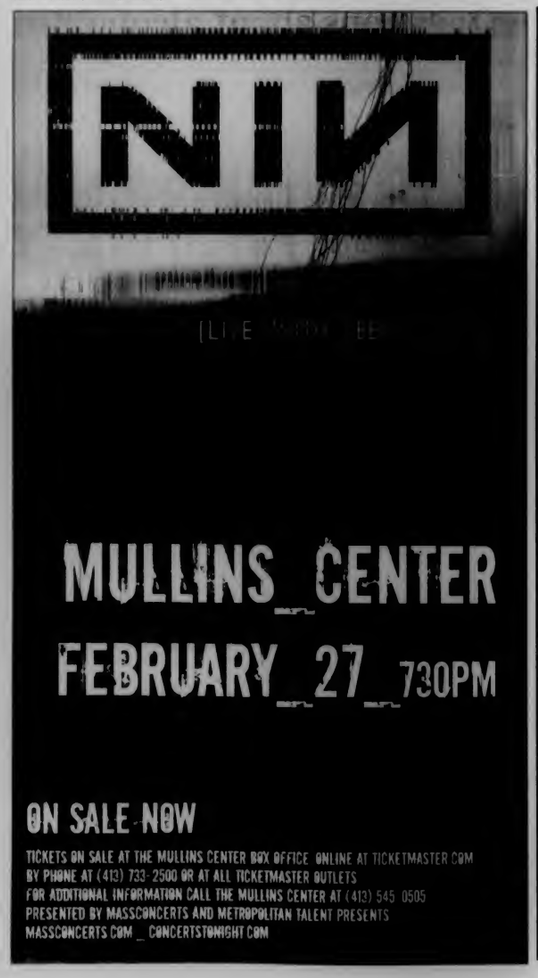
DeRosa continued to run well, placing third in the 3000-meter run with a time of 10:07.87.

Callahan, originally from Bangkok, Thailand, recorded a triple jump of 37 feet, 2.25 inches, her second best of the year, to lead the Minutewomen.

Head coach Julie LaFreniere expressed mixed feelings about the meet, which consisted of Boston University, Sacred Heart and Boston College. She said that the results reflected what was expected on account of the girls being on break until Jan. 15.

She added that most of her runners were focused on the URI Go Rhody Classic on Jan. 20, which produced better results for the girls, who finished fifth out of 5 teams.

LaFreniere was not informed of the post-meet results, so she could not comment on her team's placement, but she did pay homage to several of her athletes, including freshman Jordan Verney, Bakanowski and Budd.



Verney won the shot put event with a throw of 42 feet, 8 inches, the second best toss in UMass history. It was the first time since 2000 that a member of the women's track and field team posted a shot-put mark in the all-time top-five.

Bakanowski, an outstanding

See TRACK on page C11

Sophomore pole vaulter Kristen Bakanowski had a strong break, placing second in the pole vault at the Boston University Women's Meet on Jan. 18 and taking first in the URI Go Rhody Classic on Jan. 20.

STUDENTS & FACULTY
GOLD'S GYM
AMHERST
WELCOME BACK!
2 for 1 or 50% off ENROLLMENT
Redeem this coupon and enroll two people for the price of one or get 50% off for yourself!
Must be 18 or older, a local resident with a picture ID. Not redeemable for cash. Cannot be used in conjunction with other offers. Certain restrictions may apply. Offer expires 2/28/06
ChangeYourLife with a One Week Free Pass!
Come in and get: One week unlimited use. Free workout with a Coach
Must be 18 or older, a local resident with a picture ID. Not redeemable for cash. Cannot be used in conjunction with other offers. Certain restrictions may apply. Offer expires 2/28/06 email: sales@goldsgymamherst.com
CALL: (866) 57GOLDS
www.goldsgymamherst.com

No clear favorite in Atlantic 10 track

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

While most UMass students may take for granted their extended winter break, which ends on Jan. 30, winter sports athletes aren't quite as lucky. This includes the members of the Massachusetts women's track and field team, who had to report back to campus on Jan. 16.

However, the Minutewomen are not the only victims. The same holds true for all 14 women's track and field teams in the Atlantic-10, none of which will be a very easy matchup for the Maroon and White.

The Temple Owls are coming off two consecutive meets in New York, the NYC Gotham Cup and the Great Dane Classic, placing 12th in both of them. Both meets produced results that met, or nearly met, ECAC standards.

In the Gotham Cup, junior Tynishia Gardner qualified for the ECAC Championships in the 400m with a time of 57.13. At the Great Dane Classic, the Owls' 4x400 relay team set a season-best time of 3:54.49, and is 0.55 from qualifying for the ECAC Championship.

Dayton hopes to be a contender this year with the help of senior Kelly Pohlman, who helped the Flyers bring home two of the three gold medals it earned at the Bowling Green Invitational on Jan. 21. She threw for a distance of 56-06.00 in the weight throw and 45-04.25 in the shot put, each of which earned ten points for her team.

Junior Liz Forster helped the Flyers capture their third gold medal by recording a time 1:40.60 in the 600m.

The Duquesne women's track and field team got the ball rolling on the 2006 season at the Penn State Relays as their 4x800 meet relay team made up of Emily Beahan, Tara Gerlach, Amy Ruffolo and Brianne Scott ran a time of 9:34.44, an A-10 top season time.

Relay races seem to be the Dukes' forte, having won the 4x200 and 4x400, as well as the pole vault event, at the Robert Morris Holiday Open Dec 11.

Ken Simeone and Matt Hipps of UNC Charlotte finished in third and fourth place in the 5,000 respectively at the Clemson Invitational. Their performances put the 49ers in second place in the Atlantic-10 Conference.

Fordham University competed in the first day of the Manhattan Invitational with Candice Drinkwater, Ariana Washington and Maggie winning in the long water, weight throw and pole vault, respectively.

The Rams boast freshman Kerstin Greene, who placed first in the long jump at the Invitational at Manhattan College's Draddy Gymnasium.

La Salle has some promising athletes in Kimberly McIntosh, Meagan Green, Sara Leymeister and Carolyn Lipowsky. However, the women have only had three meets as of January 21.

Last year the Explorers boasted a second-place finish at the Paul Short Invitational in Bethlehem, PA and a third place finish at Navy in Annapolis, Md., and they look to be pole-vaulter for the Minutewomen, won her event by clearing a height of 11 feet, 6.5 inches.

See A10 on page C12

UMass stuggles over break

TRACK from page C10

Budd, a fourth year psychology and history double major, did well in setting the pace for her team by winning the 500-meter run with a time of 1:18.06.

UConn finished first with a total of 264 points, and Brown followed in second place with 104 total points. URI and Providence both gained 62, and UMass rounded off the top-five finishers with 54.5.

LaFreniere was pleased with her team's effort, but was even more proud when the coaches of other teams came over to her and complimented her on the women's gritty performance.

"They said 'Oh, your athletes look really good,' and 'My kids wouldn't be doing this if they had competed Wednesday night.' They were singing our athletes' praises," LaFreniere said. "I think some of the other coaches liked what they saw."

Fischer's hard work pays off

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The French countryside it's a place many tourists go to enjoy picturesque hills and meadows, to get away from the overwhelming hustle-and-bustle of Paris or to have a romance rekindled by the sunset of the nation of love.

It is not, however, a place many go to train for cross-country. Unless, of course, you are Massachusetts sophomore runner Nils Fischer. Fischer has spent every summer there since he was born.

"I mean, it's a nice countryside and a different landscape, so it's great for long runs. But at the same time I have a lot of close friends and family there, so I try to fluctuate my day so I can spend time with them and get my training in," says Fischer, whose mother hails from France. "I mean, training is training, but it is nice to be in a different landscape."

Not many college athletes would consistently find the time to get a workout while among family and friends in such a gorgeous country, but somehow, Fischer does. And that is something that UMass coach Ken O'Brien admires.

"He's one of those guys who, somehow, and I don't know how he does it, but somehow even when he's traveling he always finds time to do his training," O'Brien says. "I think his enthusiasm and his commitment and dedication, and his enjoyment of it, is one of the big reasons for our success."

Unlike many carefree student-athletes, Fischer is as enthusiastic as it comes, both athletically and academically.

"He's one of those guys who has a nice mix of interest and enthusiasm about everything that he does," O'Brien says.

"He is dedicated and has enough time management skills, and he finds time to do everything. His pursuit of his degree is [his] number one [priority], but not at the expense of also getting his training in for the day, and he seems to approach both with great enthusiasm."

Fischer is currently undeclared, but has expressed an interest in food science.

Fischer's solid work ethic has certainly paid off. He was named the Atlantic 10 Athlete of the Week, the ECAC Athlete of the Week and the UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week for his performance at the New England Championships, in which he finished 22nd overall with a time of 25:38, an improvement of nearly two minutes from his performance at the meet his freshman year.

He earned A-10 Rookie of the Week honors twice, had three top-five performances on the season, including a fifth-place finish at the Syracuse Classic, and this year finished 10th overall at the Dartmouth Invitational.

Despite all of these impressive credentials, O'Brien was impressed with Fischer even before he became a Minuteman.

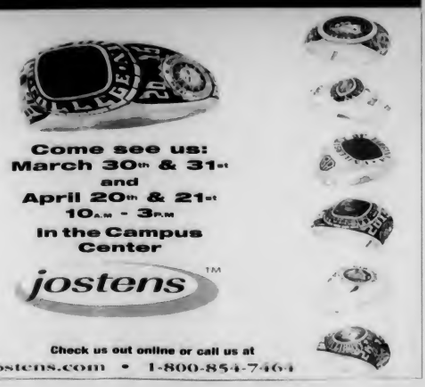
"I first noticed his running in a couple of newspaper articles [during Fischer's second year at Nashoba Regional High School] that I followed, and so I sent him some information and I was surprised to see that he was a sophomore," O'Brien says.

However, under NCAA rules, no recruiting efforts can be practiced until an athlete is senior. O'Brien, therefore, followed the remainder of Fischer's high school career and found that his consistency was what stood out. This consistency eventually led to Fischer becoming a proud member of the Maroon and White.

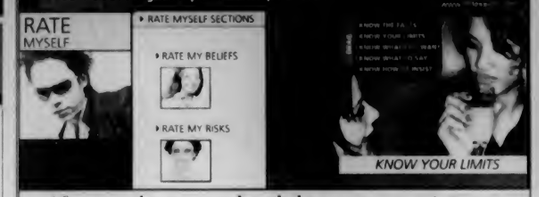
"It was the college jump," Fischer says about his freshman year. "I had to run five mile races, instead of three mile races [which is the distance of races run in high school competition]. The training was running 70 miles a week, from 30 to 40 in high school. So that was a little adjustment to make."

Both Fischer and O'Brien feel the team's camaraderie is what leads to success for the Minutemen.

"All the kids on the team are close," O'Brien says. "A lot of people have a tendency to think of track and field as an indi-



See FISCHER on page C12



Sophomore Nils Fischer (far right) has been an elite performer for the Minutemen on the track in his first two seasons at UMass. Fischer was named the Atlantic 10 Athlete of the Week following his performance at the New England Championships in October.

It's Your Life. It's in Your Hands.

Birth Control Pregnancy Testing GYN & Breast Exams Emergency Contraception
HIV Counseling & Rapid Testing STD Screening & Treatment Needle Exchange
Volunteers Welcome!
TAPESTRYhealth
www.tapestryhealth.org (800) 696-7752
16 Center Street, Northampton 413-586-2539
27 Pray Street, Amherst 413-548-9992

UMASS CLASS RINGS

Come see us:
March 30th & 31st
and
April 20th & 21st
10AM - 3PM
In the Campus Center
jostens
Check us out online or call us at www.jostens.com • 1-800-854-7464

Questions about alcohol?
MyStudentBody.com
has answers...
Personalized, interactive website to fit your needs and lifestyle
myStudentBody.com
It's here when you need it
Plus Free Condoms and Candy!
Logging on to MyStudentBody.com is as easy as 1, 2, 3:
Step 1: Go to www.mystudentbody.com
Step 2: Go to the "Is this your first time?" box to register. Click "GO"
Step 3: Enter the UMass School Code
UMASSA
and then create a user name and password to get started!

Remember to complete "Rate myself" to receive your personal profile!
inflexxion

After you have completed the program, print your certificate of completion and bring it to the Health Education Office (on the 3rd floor of UHS) to receive your free gift of condoms and candy, just for participating!
MyStudentBody.com was developed with support from the National Institutes on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST
University Health Services
Health Education Division
577-5181 • www.umass.edu/uhs
Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse Prevention
UMASS AMHERST

Boston College leads the pack in Hockey East

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

There is still a lot to be determined through the final few weeks of the Hockey East season, but a few things are beginning to grow clearer in detail. Boston College has emerged as the best team in the league, and the Eagles just even stronger once goalie Cory Schneider and forwards Nathan Gerbe and Dan Bertram returned from the World Juniors.

With the injury to Wisconsin's Brian Elliott, who is expected to return to the net near the end of February after spraining his ankle in a team practice, Schneider has emerged as the best goaltender in the nation with his spectacular play of late.

BC coach Jerry York has said that Bertram is also playing the best hockey of his career lately, and he is centering the team's second line with Gerbe and Brock Bradford. It's the Eagles' first line that has been the most dominant line in Hockey East of late, however. Chris Collins (20-14—34), Brian Boyle (7-16—23) and Stephen Gionta (4-10—14) have combined for 51 goals and 40 assists for 71 points this year.

The three teams sitting directly below BC in the standings will be the most interesting to follow through the final weekend of the regular season, though. Through Jan. 21, Providence, UNH and Boston University were deadlocked for second place in the standings with 21 points.

The Friars have struggled out of the gates in the second half after they came out of nowhere to sit atop first place for most of the second half, while the Wildcats have appeared to regroup after playing very mediocre hockey for a six-week stretch from November to the end of December.

BU has finally answered coach Jack Parker's call to bring its A-game to the ice every night, and the Terriers have gotten off to a great second-half start. John Curry has been solid in the net, and last year's leading scorer, David Van der Gulik, has finally been able to return to the team after recovering from a bizarre abdominal injury and has provided a spark in his first few games on the ice.

As the top four teams jockey for position and stay on the inside path to home-ice advantage in the first round of the playoffs, Vermont, Maine, Lowell and UMass are doing the same for the final four remaining spots. Since it looks like Northeastern and Merrimack have absolutely no chance at turning their seasons around, the playoff field seems set in terms of the players but not the positions.

Vermont (16 points) and Maine (16) hold a slight edge over Lowell (13) and UMass (12) through Jan. 21, and both have a chance to grab home ice in the first round if one of them gets hot and a team like Providence falters down the stretch due to the inexperience of its players in a playoff-like atmosphere in the last few weeks of the regular season.

With home ice all but out of the question for Lowell and UMass, the goal for each team is simple: Stay out of the eighth seed, because BC isn't going to lose two games at home in March.

UMass captain Marvin Degon gets into it with a Boston College skater earlier this season. If the season ended today, the Minutemen would themselves at Kelley Rink in the first round of the HEA playoffs.

Say It Ain't So, Joe

The Nov. 30 trade of Bruins captain Joe Thornton to the San Jose Sharks came as a huge surprise to everyone around the organization. Former Boston College Eagle and current Bruins rookie defenseman Andrew Alberts gave his thoughts on the trade of his former teammate just two nights after Thornton returned to Boston for the first time in what turned out to be a 6-2 Sharks win on Jan. 10.

"It was different because Joe has been the face of Boston for the last eight years, and then to see him go, it was a big void in the locker room," Alberts said. "We've got some good guys who came in for him, but it was a shock to everybody. You hate to see a player like that go. He was a good guy to me. He always treated me well, and he was a great player in the league. But you've just got to move on and go on without him.

"It was a little weird seeing him. It was short-lived, but it was weird seeing him in a different jersey."

Black Betty is Blackballed

It's one of the most popular rock songs among sporting arenas in the nation, but it will be resigned to nothing more than a remaining memory in Hockey East venues.

Ram Jam's smash hit "Black Betty," was to UNH's Whittemore Center what "Sweet Caroline" is to Fenway Park, but the NAACP asked Wildcat athletic director Marty Scarano to stop the music because of the song's offensive lyrics.

"Offensive lyrics?" you ask. Well, yeah.

Despite the fact that a majority of sports fans, and even plain music fans, don't have a single clue what "Black Betty" was really about, it's actually about a black female prostitute. Go ahead and check the lyrics.

Scarano made a conscious decision and decided if something his school plays at the Whit is offensive to someone, he'd rather avoid the battle – especially with the NAACP, which had recently sparked a public fight with Philadelphia Eagles quarterback Donovan McNabb – and just kill the song from the playlist.

As a result, Hockey East commissioner Joe Bertagna sent a letter to the other nine league schools, asking them to axe the track, too.

Results Are In

Vermont's strong play in the team's first season in Hockey East has been one of the better stories in college hockey this season, and it could get even better.

Senior captain Jaime Sifers has been named one of the nation's seven finalists for the 2006 Hockey Humanitarian Award, which is given to "college hockey's finest citizen". Former UMass forward Peter Tiravato was a finalist for the award last year.

Fischer working his way to top

FISCHER from page C11

vidual sport, but in reality it's a very close team sport because the kids all understand what's going [on], how hard it is, and they all accept the hurdles of having a chance to win, or do well, and they all know if they have a bad day that everybody else is there to support them."

"There's a great feeling on the team, "Fischer says. "It just feels like we're coming [together], like we've got momentum."

It was this momentum, perhaps, that led the Minutemen to a sixth-place finish out of 14 teams at the Atlantic 10 Championships on Oct. 29. The Maroon and White were aiming for fifth or sixth place as powerhouses like LaSalle, Duquesne, UNC-Charlotte and St. Joseph's were favored to make up the top four.

The official order of finishes was Duquesne (claiming its first men's crown), LaSalle, UNC-Charlotte, Saint Joseph's, Richmond and UMass claiming the sixth spot.

Fischer took second for the Minutemen and 26th overall, coming in just six seconds behind senior Ryan Corbett, who finished with a time of 25:45.1.

Because he is so dominant, some might forget that he is a sophomore. He's still a young second-year student who admires his upperclassmen teammates, who he describes as "good guys."

And his older teammates are not the only people Fischer appreciates.

"I have a great coach and a great team so there's nothing more I could ask for, really," Fischer says. "What I like about [Coach O'Brien] is his very conservative style. He won't overdo things. If something's wrong you can always talk to him. He's very trustworthy."

No one knows what the future will hold for this sophomore juggernaut. But no matter how races many races he wins, he will always be thankful to his Rhode Island-born father for introducing him to the sport.

"I always really looked up to my dad and ran with him when I was little, as much as I could. So he basically got me into it," Fischer says.

UMass in contention in A-10

A10 from page C11

very competitive this year.

The University of Rhode Island looks strong yet again as the '05-06 season recently began.

At Brown's Alden Invitational on Dec. 3, Destiny Woodbury qualified for the New England Championship in the 500m dash and Tylynn Graham, named Miss Massachusetts in 2004, qualified in the high jump and high hurdles.

Led by senior Kolleen McGrady, a strong 800m runner, the Rams hope to continue as a powerhouse in the A-10.

The University of Richmond posted the results of only their first meet, Liberty Collegiate Invitational. However, that meet produced stellar performances by freshman juggernaut Jessica Young and Jasemine Major.

Young set a new record in the 60-meter dash with a time of 7.63 and ran the 400m dash in 1:01.60, while Major won the 60-meter hurdles with a personal best time of 8.93 and placed third in the 60-meter dash.

Also providing spark for the Spiders, seniors Danielle Eaton and Amy Thesing finished first and second respectively in the 800m race.

Saint Joseph's placed third in both the Lafayette Invitational and the Fordham Invitational (its third meet, the Penn State Relays, had no team scoring).

The Fordham Invitational was highlighted by outstanding performances by Andria Smythe, who ran an IC4A qualifying time in the 60m dash to take first place; Huy Nguyen, who finished 2nd in the 800m; and Suzanne McHenry, who came in first in the 3,000m.

The Hawks hope that freshmen Andrea Florida, Lauren Walsh and Katie Petrack will help their cause to become a force to be reckoned in the Atlantic-10.

Xavier's first meet results, at the Purdue Invitational on Jan. 14, were not scored, but they placed fifth out of six teams at their second meet, the BGSU Invitational.

The Musketeers' standout performances were turned in by freshman Becky Clark and junior Kelly Sing, both of whom placed in the top five at the BGSU Invitational on Jan. 20.

Finally, UMass has put up fine performances in their first four meets. In the URI Go Rhody Classic, on January 20, freshman Jordan Veney won her shot put event by posting the second-best indoor track throw in school history, helping the Maroon and White pick up a fifth place finish. Also helping out the Minutewomen were senior Elisabeth Budd, who won the 500 meters, and sophomore Kristen Bakanowski, who took first place in the pole vault, clearing a height of 11 feet, 6.5 inches.

GO GREEK!

Fraternities and Sororities - Building Better Leaders Since 1869

Community Service Leadership Scholarship
University Involvement Networking

Informational Session with Greek Community Leaders!

Interfraternity Council & Panhellenic Council

February 6th, 6:30 pm
Campus Center Rm. 101

Questions? Call, 545-2727, or visit www.Umass.edu/greek for more information!

LABRAT By Richard Martelly

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

VALLEY OF THE SQUIRRELS By Comrade X

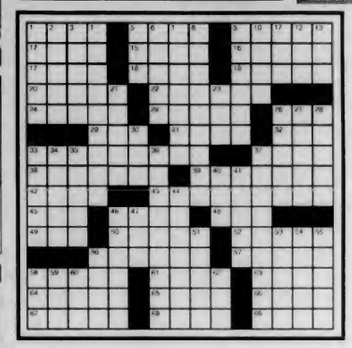
JACK DOGG By Xavier Rhodes

THE ZOO By Gabe Strine

Quote of the Day

"The sun is shining and the grass is green, under three feet of snow, I mean."

—South Park



ACROSS
1 Liquid weenier
5 From
9 Make happy
14 Pollster Roper
15 Italian river
16 Current events sources
17 King or Sues
18 'The Avengers' star
19 Felt beverage
20 Perished enclosures
22 Diagonal lines
24 Serengeti predator
25 Art house film
26 Flagged vehicle
29 False
31 Broadcasts
32 "Ben-"
33 Rerun payments
37 Rademes' love
38 Strawberry
39 Cape Cod town
42 Undersized
43 Police officers
45 Fruit beverage
48 Miami or Lima location
48 Brooch
49 Landscaping shrub
50 Kind of rocket
52 Poet Thomas
56 Conan or Pat
57 Struck forcefully
58 Puppeteer Lewis
61 Italian eight
62 Meal scraps
64 Capital near Casablanca
65 Western state
66 ICU elements
67 Portions
68 Scam targets
69 Min parts

DOWN
1 Arrive at 2 Sat to rest
3 Likeness
4 Forgettable someone
5 Distant
6 Small antelope
7 Of a painful spasmodic attack
8 Capital of Somalia
9 Roast hosts
10 Kauai souvenirs
11 Use a calculator
12 Even score
13 Jug handle
21 ___ Arabia
23 Guy's address
26 Porcelain plates
27 Financial review
29 Word with band or ring
30 Commuter's ride
33 Return in kind
34 Give the slip to 35 Tendon
36 Status seeking 37 Unnamed
40 Informal affirmative
41 Corrosive stuff
44 Actress Sent
46 Satellites' paths
47 That girl
51 Standing by
53 "Shi," producer Michaels
54 Room at the top
55 Hornet homes
56 Algerian port
58 B way posting
59 Cured pork
60 Homer's dad
62 Cries of surprise

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
Welcome Back!
Welcome Back!
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
JANUARY SPECIAL!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight. • Trivia Night
Trivia Night
Trivia Night
Wed. • Apollo Sunshine
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

wanna work for comics? call amanda in graphics at 545-1864

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
There is a stowaway living under your bed, feed him some bueno.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
That is NOT normal my friend, two words, four syllables, Heath Services

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Don't miss class today, if you do your bound to fail at life.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You dont even want to know what i saw someone doing in that water fountain.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Tony Danza KNOWS what you said about his talk show, and he is T.O-ed.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
We dont really care about YOU cancer, so think of your own horoscope.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Stealing your roomates food is much more fun than going to the DC

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Its alright, depends arent just for the elderly.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Frat party? why not just flush your money down the toilet and pump techno

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
If your mom told you she loved you before you left for school, she lied.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Nice tattoo, wait, wait, just kidding, who did that? the Hamburgerler?

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Prepare for a ROUNDHOUSE kick to the face when you least expect it.

Chicago Pizzaria
Yes, we Deliver!
Welcome Back Students
Start your semester off right with an order from us!
Look for our ad Wed. & Thurs featuring SUPER BOWL SPECIALS!
Hours
Sun-Wed 3pm-2am
Thurs-Sat 3pm-3am
To order Delivery or Pick-Up Contact
413-549-0003
150 Fearing St. Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, Ma. 01002

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Your classified ad could go here
Your classified ad could go here
Your classified ad could go here
Classifieds with the collegian
Advertise with us today!

Solid break for Minutemen

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Eds. Note Massachusetts played two games between today and the date this issue went to press. On Jan. 25 UMass faced Rhode Island on the road and traveled to LaSalle on Jan. 29. Check out tomorrow's Collegian for a recap of these two games.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team entered winter break unsure of what direction it was heading. The Minutemen had a 3-3 mark and the team was still adjusting to first-year coach Travis Ford.

After a month of basketball, in which the team stumbled early, the Minutemen seem to have hit their stride. UMass has improved its record to 9-6 overall and 4-1 in conference play as this issue went to press on Jan. 25.

UMass went 6-3 during the intersession and played its best ball when the conference schedule began. The Minutemen's most recent win was also their most impressive of the season, as they dominated Atlantic 10 rival Temple 60-34 on Jan. 21.

The win came in front of a national television audience on ESPN, as well as a crowd of 8,127 at the Mullins Center. The key to the victory was the smothering defense played by UMass; the 34 points were the fewest the team has allowed since 1950.

The Maroon and White held Temple to 27 percent shooting from the field and 10 percent from 3-point range.

Ford has stressed defense since day one, and the Minutemen have begun to deliver, as they have held their last four opponents under 40 percent from the floor.

At the other end, UMass was able to solve Temple's vaunted match-up zone, shooting 51 percent from the field and 47 percent from beyond the arc.

"Things went our way from the beginning and then just snowballed," Ford said. "We played probably our best game for a full 40 minutes."

The catalyst for the Minuteman offense was freshman point guard Chris Lowe Lowe, who logged 39 minutes of action against Temple, has seen his playing time increase as a result of Maurice Maxwell's suspension from the team.

Maxwell, who had been splitting time at the point with Lowe, was suspended indefinitely on Jan. 6 for failing to meet athletic department academic standards.

"He was the key to the game," Temple's legendary coach John Chaney of Lowe, who dished out a career-high nine assists while only committing two turnovers. "We just couldn't get him to turn it over. He did a good job penetrating and other people got into a rhythm."

Two players in particular were able to get into a groove for the Minutemen. Jeff Viggiano and Lawrence Carrier had 17 points apiece, matching the output of the entire Temple team.

Carrier found himself open repeatedly in the left corner, and capitalized by draining five 3-pointers. The sophomore forward came into the game just 3-for-15 from downtown.

Viggiano contributed both from the perimeter (three treys) and inside, as he had the play of the day with an authoritative breakaway dunk in the second half.

Viggiano and Carrier combined for 19 of the first 21 points UMass scored in the second half to put the game away.

The win was the seventh of the season for the Maroon and White at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen are perfect at home this season, while they have gone just 2-6 at road or neutral sites. UMass has won 11 games in a row at the Mullins dating back to last season.

The win against Temple was the Minutemen's second consecutive victory over an A-10 foe, as they downed Fordham 74-61 on Jan. 18 at the Mullins Center. Lowe got his first start of the season in the game, and looked like a battle-tested veteran, scoring 14 points to go along with seven assists and just two turnovers.

"I told him he's playing like a fifth-year senior," Rashaun Freeman said after the game. "He showed tremendous calmness."

Freeman was the main beneficiary of Lowe's assists, scoring 21 points and pulling down 13 boards. It was the sixth double-double of the season for Freeman.

Freeman's frontcourt mate, Stephane Lasme, turned in a solid all-around performance with nine points, seven rebounds and seven blocks. Lasme's 4.5 blocks per game are good for third in the nation.

UMass center Rashaun Freeman heads to the bucket in a game against Fordham earlier this season. Freeman leads the team in scoring.

Viggiano continued his stellar play, chipping in with 15 points. The senior has scored 15 points or more in the last three games.

UMass got off to a slow start trailing 32-26 at the break, but came out of the locker room hot. The Maroon and White shot 60 percent from the floor and outscored the Rams 48-29 in the second half.

The Minutemen could vies easily be 5-0 in conference play it not for a ladder-as jumper by St. Louis's Jaquay LaHell with 1.5 seconds remaining in a 50-48 UMass loss on the road on Jan. 14.

UMass dominated offensively all night as Viggiano (15 points) was the only player in double figures. Freeman and Lasme were plagued by foul trouble all night and were held to a paltry seven points combined.

The Minutemen reverted back to their turnover woes from early in the season, as they turned the ball over 23 times. UMass is averaging 16.7 turnovers per game.

The loss to St. Louis was a bit of a letdown, as the Minutemen entered the game on a high note after defeating Saint Joseph's 69-58 on Jan. 11 at home.

At the time, the win was the biggest of the season for UMass, and improved its record to 2-0 in the A-10. The win over the Hawks ended UMass's eight-game losing streak to Phil Martelli's squad.

"Getting ready for this game it was in the back of our mind," Freeman said of the team's struggles against Saint Joseph's. "I had never been in them and we had never really been in the game. When the ball went up we knew to win this game it would take tremendous effort."

UMass was led by its defense which held Saint Joseph's scoreless for over six minutes in the first half and held a big-on unsung players.

"The difference in the game was three guys: Dante Milligan, Chris Lowe and James Life," Ford said. "They gave us incredible energy and without those guys we don't win the basketball game."

Lowe, who has looked more comfortable each time he steps onto the court, turned in what is becoming a typical performance with seven points, seven assists and a career-high eight rebounds. Life added 11 points, nine of which came on 3-pointers, and Milligan turned in his best performance as a Minuteman, scoring 11 points on 5-of-8 shooting from the field.

Milligan joined the team after the first semester ended and has provided added depth in the frontcourt. The sophomore transfer from Pittsburgh has played a wide arsenal of offensive moves against the Hawks scoring on a variety of jump hooks and a tip-in.

UMass got off to a strong start in conference play, beating up on A-10 doormat Duquesne on Jan. 7.

The 82-63 drubbing of the Dukes is the only win the Minutemen have had an opponent's home court.

The game was never in doubt, as the inside duo of Freeman and Lasme dominated. Freeman scored 20 points and grabbed eight rebounds, while Lasme added 19 points in just 22 minutes. This was the fourth consecutive game that Lasme scored in double digits.

Life (11 points), Brandon Thomas (10) and Milligan (nine) rounded out a balanced scoring attack, as the Minutemen shot 55 percent from the field.

Thomas, a junior swingman, got the starting nod at point guard in the team's first game without the suspended Maxwell and had four assists and no turnovers.

UMass held the Dukes without a field goal for an 11-minute stretch, beginning late in the first half and extending to midway through the second.

The Duquesne game couldn't have come at a better time for the Minutemen, as they were coming off their worst loss of the season, an embarrassing 91-62 shellacking at Boston College on Jan. 3 in the 11th installment of the Commonwealth Classic. The Eagles, who are currently No. 20 in the Associated Press Top 25 poll, now hold a 6-5 advantage in the annual intrastate matchup that began in 1998.

The game got off to a good start for the Minutemen, as they hung tough, but ultimately they were unable to match the Eagles' superior depth. With the game tied at 18 with nine minutes to play in the first half, BC got hot and began to pull away. The Eagles finished the half on a 23-8 run to take a 41-26 lead into the break.

The turning point in the game came with five minutes remaining in the half, as BC hit three consecutive 3-pointers following two emphatic blocks by Sean Williams.

While Williams only registered two points and three rebounds, he recorded the two signature plays of the game. The first came when he blocked a layup attempt by Freeman and pinned the ball at the top of the square on the backboard. In the second half, he scored his only basket of the game on a rim-rocking follow-up dunk.

Freeman had a quiet double-double with 18 points and 10 boards, and Lasme and Thomas each added 12 points.

UMass committed 21 turnovers which led to 31 BC points, and was flummoxed by BC's halfcourt trap throughout the contest.

The Eagles had five players score in double figures, led by Sean Marshall's 18 and Craig Smith's 17.

Following the game, Ford was uncharacteristically curt with the media as he was clearly upset by his team's performance.

While the BC loss was clearly a bad way to begin 2006 for Ford and the Minutemen, they didn't end 2005 on a much better note. Participating in the Panasonic Holiday Festival at Madison Square Garden on Dec. 27 and 28, the Minutemen advanced to the championship where they lost to St. John's 51-49.

While the close loss was tough to swallow, early on it appeared that the Red Storm would run away with the championship. UMass shot a dismal 19 percent from the floor in the first half and, following a 14-2 St. John's run to close the half, trailed 27-14 at intermission.

UMass came out of the break a different team, and Freeman and Lasme combined for 12 points in the first 3:19 of the second half to narrow the deficit to 29-26. Behind 50 percent shooting in the second stanza, UMass clawed its way back, and tied the game at 47 with three minutes remaining on a Lasme dunk.

After two free throws by St. John's, Lowe answered with a hoop for UMass to tie the game at 49 with 2:06 to play. The score would remain that way until Aaron Spears scored from the block with 32 seconds left to give St. John's a two-point edge.

UMass turned the ball over with 7.5 seconds remaining when Lasme was called for a moving pick, but lucked out when the Red Storm's Anthony Mason Jr., the son of former NBA player Anthony Mason, threw the inbounds pass away.

With 6.5 seconds to play and one last chance, Lowe beat his man off the dribble and got into the lane, only to have his lay-up attempt tipped from behind by a Red Storm defender. A put-back attempt by Milligan came up empty and with it so did the Maroon and White's comeback bid.

The Minutemen advanced to the championship round with a convincing 66-49 win over St. Peter's.

The game featured Keydren Clark, the nation's leading scorer in each of the past two seasons, as well as Freeman's 1,000th career point at UMass, but it was Lasme who stole the show.

The junior scored a career-high 21 points, hauled in 14 rebounds and swatted eight shots.

"Last night we challenged him in front of the whole team because I think in the last few games he didn't give us the games he should have," Ford said of Lasme after the game. "He responded and that's what I'm excited about. Some guys can't take getting called out in front of the team, but the guys that can use it as a motivational factor come out with games like he had tonight."

Lasme was named to the All-Tournament Team after a monster two games in which he averaged 18.0 points, 9.5 rebounds and 6.0 blocks. Freeman joined him as an All-Tournament selection.

Almost as impressive as Lasme's showing against St. Peter's was the performance turned in by Viggiano, as he scored 11 points, grabbed 11 boards and blocked six shots. UMass blocked 16 shots in the game, the second-most in school history. UMass's 8.5 blocked shots per game are currently second in the country behind UConn's 9.2.

Freeman's 10-point performance made him the 37th player in school history to top the 1,000 point mark. Freeman is currently 28th all-time in scoring with 1,105 career points.

UMass did a solid job on Clark, holding him to 22 points on 8-of-23 shooting.

At halftime, Madison Square Garden presented the first annual "Alonzo Milligan Mentorship Award" in honor of the brother of UMass's Dante Milligan. Alonzo was murdered in Harlem in June at the age of 19. Jamal Crawford of the New York Knicks donated $5,000 to the fund.

Milligan's first appearance of the season came in the game prior to the Holiday Tournament, when UMass hosted Sienna on Dec. 23. The Minutemen prevailed 78-69, and Milligan looked sharp in his debut, registering seven points and eight rebounds.

Freeman led the way, with 23 points and 12 boards, while Viggiano, Life and Lowe all turned in solid efforts. Viggiano posted 12 points and five rebounds, Life added 12 points and Lowe scored 10.

Lowe played a big role down the stretch, as he hit a running jumper to put UMass up 73-29 with 1:02 remaining in the game, and his free throws down the stretch locked up the win.

Lasme reaches new heights

LASME from page C1

improve.

"He's just scratched the surface," Ford says. "I think he's one of the best big men in the county. He could be a dominant player at maybe the next level."

Talk of a potential NBA career did not seem likely to be centered on Lasme when he arrived in Amherst three years ago from Gabon, Africa. The rail-thin 20-year-old was recruited by former UMass coach Steve Lappas after a successful stint with the Gabon National Team from 2000-2003.

Lasme not only had to adjust to playing basketball at a higher level, he was also faced with the more daunting task of adjusting to life in a new country.

"It was hard in the beginning to get adjusted to the country, but once I got used to it, things got easier along the way," Lasme says.

Senior Jeff Viggiano has seen Lasme become more comfortable during his time at UMass, but realizes that many things are still new to Lasme.

"We're really close off the court," Viggiano says. "He's still learning new things about our culture everyday. It's funny; he still finds the young, really childish jokes really funny. He's a really funny guy."

Lasme's transition to playing Division I basketball has been easier than adjusting to the new way of life, but there have been a few bumps in the road. For instance, in Lasme's first game at UMass, the eager freshman was summoned by Lappas to enter the game, and he immediately ran onto the court rather than checking in at the scorer's table and waiting for a break in play.

"Back home, we didn't have to go check in at the table," Lasme says. "We just went in when the coach said to go in."

That mishap aside, Lasme showed flashes during his freshman season, and UMass appeared to have had uncovered a diamond in the rough. Lasme received the team's Jack Leaman Defensive Award after averaging 1.8 blocks per game, the second-highest total in the Atlantic 10.

During his sophomore campaign last season, Lasme took his game to another level, blocking 72 shots, the sixth-best single-season total in UMass history.

Junior forward Stephane Lasme is having a breakout season for UMass, averaging career-highs in points, rebounds and blocks.

With his defensive abilities already comparable to the best of anyone in the country, Lasme knew he needed to improve his all-around game. Lasme spend the summer working out, exhibiting the work ethic that teammates and coaches have come to expect.

While he is still listed at 190 pounds as he was last year, Lasme clearly seems bigger than that as he has added considerable bulk to his upper body. In addition to his time in the weight room, he put in long hours working on his offensive game.

"Coach Ford said during the summer that it would relieve a lot of the pressure if I was scoring more," Lasme says. "I work hard in my time off. I spend a lot of time working on the things the coaches ask me to."

"His work ethic is unreal," Viggiano says. "He was up here all summer — always in the gym, always working out. I think he realizes his potential, and he's in the gym every day trying to get better." The hard work in the off-season has clearly paid off, as Lasme is averaging career highs in points (9.6 per game), rebounds (6.5) and field goal percentage (60 percent).

Even with all of the improvements to his offensive game, it is still what Lasme does on the defensive end that causes people to sit up and take notice.

This season Lasme has become that rare player who is capable of completely dominating a game with his defense. Through Jan. 27, Lasme had registered 75 blocks, the fourth-highest single-season total in school history.

With 11 games to play, Lasme is looking up on the single-season list at only Marcus Camby, who recorded the three highest single-season totals in UMass history. If Lasme continues at his current pace he has a chance at topping Camby's school record of 128 blocks during the 1995-96 campaign. By the end of this season, Lasme will most likely hold the No. 2 spot in career blocks behind Camby.

Lasme, who was third in the nation in blocked shots at the start of last week, takes such accomplishments in stride.

"I just try to help everyone out," Lasme says humbly. "I know it's hard to play defense for 40 minutes, especially on the perimeter."

Viggiano, being one of those teammates Lasme looks to help out, is very appreciative of having his friend behind him to protect the basket.

"He's saved me personally so many times, and he's saved so many baskets for our team," Viggiano says. "Sometimes it's more of a disadvantage because being on the perimeter you might relax a little bit knowing you have one of the leading shot blockers in the country back there."

Ford is well aware of how valuable Lasme is to the team's defense, which has held opponents to under 40 percent shooting in each of the last five games.

"He is our defense," Ford says. "We're known as a pesty good defensive team, but if you watch us on tape, it's him blocking everybody's shot. We actually probably have four bad defenders and one good one, but he makes everybody look good."

There are times when all opposing coaches and players can do is shrug their shoulders and shake their heads as Lasme seemingly comes from nowhere and repeatedly rejects what were thought to be uncontested layups.

As University of Alabama at Birmingham coach Mike Anderson said following Lasme's seven-block performance in an 86-77 UAB win in the Tip-Off Classic in Springfield earlier this year, "Every time we went inside, it was like a turnover."

While Lasme has put up gaudy statistics this season, recording blocked shots is not an exact science, as it is subject to the scorer's judgment. In every game it seems that Lasme gets a piece of at least one or two shots that are not credited as blocks. That's why his value on defense cannot be measured in the box score alone, as that doesn't account for the number of shots he causes to be adjusted and altered.

After seeing Lasme swat away layup attempts early in games, opponents clearly think twice about attempting shots with him lurking in the lane. For every shot Lasme gets a hand on, there is another one that he causes to be released awkwardly as opponents try to evade his extensive reach.

And unlike many prolific shot blockers who sag off of their man and get all of their blocks in help defense, Lasme is equally adept at blocking shots on the ball as he is at coming from the weak side to ball out a teammate.

"It's just a knack he has," Ford says of Lasme's shot-blocking acumen. "It's nothing that you can teach. He has an incredible ability and great timing and instincts. It changes the game."

As Ford looks to a bright future, he knows that Lasme (who was named a captain on Jan. 16 along with Viggiano and junior Rashaun Freeman) will play a major role in leading UMass to success.

"I said this basically after a week of working with him: I saw something special in him, and he hasn't changed my mind one single bit," Ford says. "The sky's the limit for him. If he continues the route he's going, and continues to be humble and work hard everyday, he's going to have a lot of success in basketball and help UMass have a lot of success."

And with that, Ford hesitated for a moment — as if not to heap too much praise on a junior who still has a lot to prove — but then continued to reveal again just how much potential he believes Lasme has.

"He'll make a lot of money someday playing this game at the next level."

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY · EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2006 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 68

Students debate universities new alcohol restrictions

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

In hopes of improving the living environment for students living on-campus, the Student Affairs Judicial Committee (SAJIC) of the University of Massachusetts has created a new list of alcohol-related restrictions to be enforced starting in the Spring semester of 2006.

In an email sent Thursday to all students, Dean of Students, Jo-Anne Vanin, revealed five specific changes created in conjunction with a three-year $1.5 million federal grant awarded to the University to fight underage drinking and drug abuse.

The new plan forbids any student under the age of 21 from possessing empty alcohol containers in their residence hall, even if the containers are being used for decoration.

"Possession of empty containers by students who are under 21 will be viewed as evidence of possession or the consumption of alcohol," wrote Vanin.

Chris Wheeler, an 18-year-old freshman who claims to collect old beer bottles feels that the new policies are unfairly inhibiting his hobby.

"It's ridiculous," said Wheeler. "So if a Resident Advisor walks into my room and sees a 1972 Budweiser bottle, they're going to assume I drank it?"

The new rules also prohibit students from having more than ten people in their room at one time.

"Due to the potential for noise violations and illegal alcohol consumption, large gatherings are prohibited in the residence halls," wrote Vanin.

Under the new plan students are also prohibited from possessing and using drinking paraphernalia such as funnels, taps and beirut tables.

"It's kind of sad actually," said Julia Ball, 20, a UMass sophomore, "because what is college without a beirut table?"

Some students were concerned over how the new rules would be enforced.

"How are they going to know who has what?" Michelle Droeske, 19, a UMass freshman said. "Are Resident Directors going to go into every room looking for empty beer bottles and beirut tables?"

SAJIC also altered the amount of alcohol students over the age of 21 are allowed to bring into a residence hall.

Students over the age of 21 are now not allowed to bring in more than a dozen 12-ounce bottles of beer, two bottles of wine or one bottle of hard liquor.

Ball was skeptical of what effect the new rules would have on lessening campus drinking.

"Students are still going to drink, they're still going to play beer pong. They always find a way," said Ball.

One Resident Director who spoke on the condition of anonymity felt that the new plan wouldn't solve the drinking problem, it would only move it.

"I don't think this will stop anyone from drinking," said the director. "I think this will just drive students to drink off-campus."

The email also asked students to contact medical assistance for individuals experiencing severe intoxication or a serious injury after consuming alcohol as part of the universities involvement with the "Good Samaritan Protocol."

"UMass Amherst has developed the Good Samaritan Protocol to ensure that the health and safety of all community members remains our first priority," wrote Vanin.

Five new alcohol restrictions were created by the Student Affairs Judicial Committee and have students voicing their displeasure.

Berkshire Dining Commons under construction

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

For years, it's been a stigma that has stuck with Berkshire Dining Commons.

In the minds of so many of its passersby, the food at this particular dining hall in Southwest has been less than stellar in comparison to the three other dining halls on campus, and has been seen as the worst by default.

Students' voices are finally getting turned into action, as renovation plans were announced last November. But like all good things, this one comes at a price.

The entire Berkshire building has been closed down since the beginning of January due to a major overhaul that, when completed, Dining Services Director Ken Toong says will be "two or three times better than what Worcester (Dining Commons) is right now."

The projected finish date for the project is scheduled for August.

No funding from the state has been provided for this project. The renovation is coming as a result of revenue from trust funds and meal plans, as well as $13 million borrowed from the state, to be paid back over a period of 20 years.

But the finished product, Toong says, is going to be marvelous.

"I've toured 20 places around the country, and I can definitely say that when this is done, this will be one of the best in the nation," he said.

Among other things, the new Berkshire will feature stand-alone vegetarian and vegan stations, expanded salad bars, a "hot foods" station, brick ovens for made-to-order pizzas, calzones and sandwiches, a grill and a bake shop. Many of the themes from last semester will continue as well, such as lobster nights and midnight buffets.

But a major problem still lurks: how are 5,000-plus students living in Southwest supposed to cram comfortably into one dining hall (Hampshire) that is clearly incapable of handling it?

Toong says he is preparing for the worst, offering several alternatives and doubling up the staff in Hampshire to ensure a short waiting time.

In addition, a makeshift dining hall in the Hampden building, located in the center of Southwest and host to both the Southwest convenience store and the Southwest Café, has been set up. What was once a kosher dining area will now be able to fit about 200 students at a time.

The popular "Grab-n-Go" line, now a staple in all dining halls on the UMass campus, has been given a makeover to suit students as well. For starters, the line, which has been moved to the Southwest Café, will be split into two; one line is intended for cold foods, the other for what Toong deems "hot foods," including items such as vegetables and hot soup. In addition, the lines will be open longer, now Monday through Friday from 10 a.m. until 8 p.m.

But the inconvenience of too many people under too small a roof can still get out of hand, which is why bus shuttles from Southwest to the Worcester and Franklin dining halls on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays will be implemented.

In the end, the finished product sounds great. But half of the people living in Southwest may never see the fruition.

"I think its kind of going to be a pain," said George Kennedy, a political science major. "It's not going to be worth it for half the people on campus."

Kennedy, a junior, plans on living off-campus in the fall, but for now said he has his own plans for dealing with the overcrowding that will come to Hampshire. He is considering arranging for a move to the Thoreau dorm, located adjacent to Hampshire.

"I think it's an unnecessary hassle," said Lindsay Hawley, a freshman. "Yes, it's going to be really nice when it's done.

but I didn't see anything wrong with it, and now people on that side of Southwest have to go to the other side, where it is now going to be jam-packed with people all the time."

During her first semester of college last fall, Hawley worked part-time in Berkshire. In spite of the doubling up of staff at Hampshire, she will not be coming along for the ride, in spite of her monetary needs.

"It seemed like the only kids that were going to work at the other D.C. were the ones that had been there for a while.

I was never approached to be moved over to another dining place," she said.

Hawley said she is considering applying for a job up at Franklin Dining Commons in Central.

Asked if she thought the finished product will be worth the sacrifice,

Hawley responded, "As long as they complete it on time."

Coretta Scott King, widow of MLK, dies at 78

By Errin Haines
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Coretta Scott King, who worked to keep her husband's dream alive with a chin-held-high grace and serenity that made her a powerful symbol of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s creed of brotherhood and nonviolence, died Tuesday. She was 78.

The "first lady of the civil rights movement" died in her sleep during the night at an alternative medicine clinic in Mexico, her family said. Arrangements were being made to fly the body to Atlanta.

She had been recovering from a serious stroke and heart attack suffered last August. Just two weeks ago, she made her first public appearance in a year on the eve of her late husband's birthday.

News of her death led to tributes to King across Atlanta, including a moment of silence in the Georgia Capitol and piles of flowers placed at the tomb of her slain husband. Flags at the King Center — the institute devoted to the civil rights leader's legacy — were lowered to half-staff.

"She wore her grief with grace. She exerted her leadership with dignity," the Rev. Joseph Lowery, who helped found the Southern Christian Leadership Conference with King's husband in 1957.

Former Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young, one of Martin Luther King's top aides, said Coretta Scott King's fortitude rivaled that of her husband. "She was strong if not stronger than he was," Young said.

Coretta Scott King was a supportive lieutenant to her husband during the most dangerous and tumultuous days of the civil rights movement, and after his assassination in Memphis, Tenn., on April 4, 1968, she carried on his work while also raising their four children.

"I'm more determined than ever that my husband's dream will become a reality," the young widow said soon after his slaying.

She pushed and goaded politicians for more than a decade to have her husband's birthday observed as a national holiday, achieving success in 1986. In 1969 she founded the Martin Luther King Jr. Center for Nonviolent Social Change in Atlanta and used it to confront hunger, unemployment, voting rights and racism.

"The center enables us to go out and struggle against the evils in our society," she often said.

She also accused movie and TV companies, video arcades, gun manufacturers and toy makers of promoting violence.

King became a symbol in her own right of her husband's struggle for peace and brotherhood, presiding with a quiet, stoic dignity over seminars and conferences.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, who was with her husband when he was assassinated, said Tuesday that she understood that every time her husband left home, there was the chance he might not come back. Jackson pronounced her a "freedom fighter."

"Like all great champions she learned to function with pain and keep serving," he said, adding: "She kept marching. She did not flinch."

In Washington, President Bush hailed her as "a remarkable and courageous woman and a great civil rights leader."

After her stroke, King missed the annual King celebration in Atlanta two weeks ago but appeared with her children at an awards dinner a few days earlier, smiling from her wheelchair but not speaking. The crowd gave her a standing ovation.

Despite her repeated calls for unity among civil rights groups, her own children have been divided over whether to sell the King Center to the National Park Service and let the family focus less on grounds maintenance and more on King's message. Two of the four children were strongly against such a move.

Gov. Sonny Perdue ordered flags at all state buildings to be flown at half-staff and offered to allow King's body to lie in repose at the Georgia Capitol. There was no immediate response to the offer, the governor's office said.

King died at Santa Monica Health Institute in Rosarito Beach, Mexico, south of San Diego, said her sister, Edythe Scott Bagley of Cheyney, Pa. She had gone to California to rest and be with family, according to Young.

Coretta Scott was studying voice at the New England Conservatory of Music and planning on a singing career when a friend introduced her to King, a young Baptist minister studying at Boston University.

"She said she wanted me to meet a very promising young minister from Atlanta," King once said, adding with a laugh: "I wasn't interested in meeting a young minister at that time."

She recalled that on their first date he told her: "You know, you have everything I ever wanted in a woman. We ought to get married

See KING on page 5

Mourners pay their respect at the crypt of The King Center in Atlanta, Georgia. Coretta Scott King was 78.

Carroll shown on new video

By Paul Garwood
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The U.S. journalist Jill Carroll, weeping and veiled, appeared on a new videotape aired Monday by Al-Jazeera, and the Arab television station said she appealed for the release of all Iraqi women prisoners.

The video was dated Saturday — two days after the U.S. military released five Iraqi women.

Carroll, 28, was crying and wore a conservative Islamic veil as she spoke to the camera, sitting in front of a yellow and black tapestry. The Al-Jazeera newscaster said she appealed for U.S. and Iraqi authorities to free all women prisoners to help "in winning her release."

At one point, Carroll's cracking voice can be heard from behind the newsreader's voice. All that can be heard is Carroll saying, "... hope for the families ..."

The U.S. military released the women last Thursday and was believed to be holding about six more. It was unclear how many women were held by Iraqi authorities.

Carroll, a University of Massachusetts graduate and freelance reporter for the Christian Science Monitor, was seized Jan. 7 by the previously unknown Revenge Brigades, which threatened to kill her unless all women prisoners were released. Al-Jazeera did not report any deadline or threat to kill her Monday.

New video shows a weeping Carroll wearing a veil.

Car chase speeds through UMass

PALMER—A missing CT woman was found unharmed in Western Massachusetts with her estranged husband, who was arrested on kidnapping and other charges following a police chase and four-hour standoff, Palmer police said Sunday.

Paulette Taylor, 36, was reported missing on Wednesday after she did not show up for work.

Her husband, Robbie "Rashad" Graham, was spotted driving a car in the area of the University of Massachusetts in Amherst on Saturday and a chase ensued in Palmer and nearby Ludlow, said Palmer police Lt. John Janulewicz.

Graham turned down a dead-end street and drove about a quarter-mile into the woods on a cart road before getting stuck, police said.

The car was boxed in by police cruisers, and Graham refused to leave the vehicle, Janulewicz said. He also refused to release Taylor, police said. He emerged after several hours of negotiations with police, state police and the FBI.

Graham, 40, of Hartford, who was armed with a 25-caliber handgun, was charged with assault with a dangerous weapon, kidnapping while armed with a firearm, possessing a firearm while committing a felony and possessing a firearm with defaced serial numbers, police said.

He also was charged with several motor vehicle violations related to the chase, police said.

Graham was held on $500,000 cash bail on Sunday and was due to be arraigned in Palmer District Court on Monday.

ARTS & LIVING
IT'S A MISFIRE
'Annapolis' hits the theaters with a weak plot and poor acting.
PAGE 8

EDITORIAL/OPINION
HOUSING ISSUES
UMass keeps buliding dorms but not all are quality.
PAGE 6

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy, H42°, L27°
TONIGHT Cloudy, H27°, L11°
TOMORROW Cloudy, H46°, L33°

SPORTS
TEMPLE REMATCH ON TAP
The Minutemen play the Owls in Philadelphia tonight at 7 p.m.
PAGE 16

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Eric Athas
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Katie Houston
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Ian Jones
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Kristen LaCasse
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS. & LIVING Morgan-Ann Rousseau
ASST. ARTS. & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellerose
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elisabeth Carusi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Rob Greenfield
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristan LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALGIE LOG, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1907, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN RECOGNIZED 5 TIMES FOR EXCELLENCE BY THE ASSOCIATED COLLEGIATE PRESS AND PALADIN PRESS. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED. ©2006 THE DAILY COLLEGIAN.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Eric Athas
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jen Kennedy
COPY EDITOR
Ian Jones
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Ginny Nichen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Jackie Ronan, Chris Martin

Samuel Alito sworn in as 110th Supreme Court Justice

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Samuel Anthony Alito Jr. was sworn in as the nation's 110th Supreme Court justice on Tuesday after being confirmed by the Senate in one of the most partisan victories in modern history.

Alito was sworn in by Chief Justice John Roberts in a private ceremony at the Supreme Court building across from the Capitol at about 12:40 p.m. EST, court officials said.

Alito and his wife, Martha-Ann Bomgardner, along with other members of the court and their spouses, attended the ceremony in the justices' conference room. The 55-year-old New Jersey jurist took both the constitutional and judicial oaths so he can immediately participate in court decisions.

Alito will be ceremonially sworn in a second time at a White House East Room appearance on Wednesday.

"Sam Alito is a brilliant and fair-minded judge who strictly interprets the Constitution and laws and does not legislate from the bench," President Bush said after the vote.

"He is a man of deep character and integrity, and he will make all Americans proud as a justice on our highest court."

Alito's swearing-in came only hours after the Senate voted 58-42 to confirm Alito — a former federal appellate judge, U.S. attorney and conservative lawyer for the Reagan administration from New Jersey — as the replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has been a moderate swing vote on the court.

All but one of the Senate's majority Republicans voted for his confirmation, while all but four of the Democrats voted against Alito. Republicant Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island voted no and Democrats Ben Nelson of Nebraska, Kent Conrad of North Dakota, Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia voted yes.

That is the smallest number of senators in the president's opposing party to support a Supreme Court justice in modern history. Chief Justice John Roberts got 22 Democratic votes last year, and Justice Clarence Thomas — who was confirmed in 1991 on a 52-48 vote — got 11 Democratic votes.

Bush and Alito watched the vote together in the Roosevelt Room of the White House. Bush shook Alito's hand and aides erupted in a long round of applause when final approval came.

With the confirmation vote, O'Connor's resignation became official. She resigned in July but agreed to remain until her successor was confirmed. She has been at the court this week, and participated in one last appeal Tuesday. She voted with the other eight justices to refuse to block a Florida execution.

She begins teaching a class at the University of Arizona law school later in the week.

A court spokeswoman would not say if O'Connor attended the swearing-in ceremony.

Underscoring the rarity of a Supreme Court justice confirmation, senators answered the roll by standing one by one at their desks as their names were called, instead of voting and leaving the chamber. Alito and Roberts are the first two new members of the Supreme Court since 1994.

Alito is a longtime federal appeals judge, having been confirmed by the Senate by unanimous consent on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia on April 27, 1990. Before that, he worked as New Jersey's U.S. attorney and as a lawyer in the Justice Department for the conservative Reagan administration.

It was his Reagan-era work that caused the most controversy during his three-month candidacy for the high court.

Alito replaces O'Connor, the court's first female justice and a key moderate swing vote on issues like assisted suicide, campaign finance law, the death penalty, affirmative action and abortion.

Critics who mounted a fierce campaign against his nomination noted that while he worked in the solicitor general's office for President Reagan, he suggested that the Justice Department should try to chip away at abortion rights rather than mount an all-out assault. He also wrote in a 1985 job application for another Reagan administration post that he was proud of his work helping the government argue that "the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion."

Now, Alito says, he has great respect for the Roe v. Wade decision as a precedent but refused to commit to upholding it in the future. "I would approach the question with an open mind and I would listen to the arguments that were made," he told senators at his confirmation hearing earlier this month.

Democrats weren't convinced, with liberals even unsuccessfully trying to rally support to filibuster Alito on Monday. "The 1985 document amounted to Judge Alito's pledge of allegiance to a conservative radical Republican ideology," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said before the vote.

They also repeatedly questioned Alito at his five-day confirmation hearing after he would not discuss his opinions about abortion or other contentious topics.

At one point, his wife, Martha-Ann, started crying and left the hearing room as her husband's supporters defended him from the Democratic questioning.

"To Judge Alito, I say you deserve a seat on the Supreme Court," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

President George Bush shakes the hand of Samuel Anthony Alito Jr., as he is confirmed as the 110th associate justice of the United States Supreme Court.

Bush tries to take charge of policy agenda with address

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush, pushing to take charge of the election-year agenda, said Tuesday that "America is addicted to oil" and must break its dependence on foreign suppliers in unstable parts of the world.

In his State of the Union address, Bush also called for greater federal spending on basic science research and more money for math and science education. The president was to propose training 70,000 teachers to lead advanced math and science classes in high school, said Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y., chairman of the House Science Committee, who was briefed on the speech.

Bush also was to renew his commitment to the central pledge of his inaugural address. "Our nation is committed to an historic, long-term goal — we seek the end of tyranny in our world," he said. "The future security of America depends on it." Excerpts were released in advance of the 9 p.m. EST speech.

Bush discussed troubles at home and abroad and said the nation needs to strengthen its competitiveness in the global economy. "The American economy is pre-eminent but we cannot afford to be complacent," the president said. "In a dynamic world economy, we are seeing new competitors like China and India."

"Our great advantage in the world has always been our educated, hard-working, ambitious people — and we are going to keep that edge," the president said.

With the war in Iraq about to enter its fourth year and more than 2,240 American troops killed, Bush said the nation must not falter in what he called the central front in the war on terror.

"In a time of testing, we cannot find security by abandoning our commitments and retreating within our borders," he said. "If we were to leave these vicious attackers alone, they would not leave us alone. They would simply move the battlefield to our own shores.

Hampered by huge budget deficits and the unpopular war in Iraq, Bush offered modest initiatives addressing soaring energy and health care costs and the nation's dependence on foreign sources of oil.

Former postal employee kills five, self

By Tim Molloy
Associated Press

GOLETA, Calif. — A former postal worker who had been put on medical leave for psychological problems shot five people to death at a huge mail-processing center and then killed herself in what was believed to be the nation's deadliest workplace shooting ever carried out by a woman.

The attack Monday night was also the biggest bloodbath at a U.S. postal installation since a massacre 20 years ago helped give rise to the term "going postal."

Investigators would not release the killer's name or discuss a motive for the attack.

The rampage — the nation's first deadly postal shooting in nearly eight years — sent employees running from the sprawling Southern California complex and prompted authorities to warn nearby residents to stay indoors as they searched for the killer.

The 44-year-old woman had not worked at the plant for more than two years but still managed to get inside the fenced and guarded Santa Barbara Processing and Distribution Center. She drove through a gate by following closely behind another car, then got in the front door by taking an employee's electronic identification badge at gunpoint, authorities said. The employee was not hurt, authorities said.

She opened fire with a 9 mm handgun, reloading at least once during the rampage, Santa Barbara County Sheriff Jim Andersen said.

Authorities found two people dead outside the plant, blocks from the University of California, Santa Barbara. Another body was just outside the door, and a wounded woman was just inside. Three more bodies — including that of the killer — were farther inside.

The wounded woman, Charlotte Cohen, 44, was hospitalized in critical condition. She had been shot in the head.

All of the killer's victims were believed to be employees at the postal center.

Postal Inspector Randy DeGasperin said the woman had been placed on medical leave in 2003 for psychological reasons. He said she had been removed from the building by sheriff's deputies that year for acting strangely. She made no threats, but other workers were afraid she might hurt herself, authorities said.

DeGasperin said it was unclear if she targeted certain people or fired at random, but "chances are she might have known her victims."

The sheriff said the woman's hair had been cut, and her appearance was different from when she worked at the plant. Her electronic pass card had been taken away when she stopped working at the facility, he said.

James Alan Fox, a criminologist at Northeastern University in Boston and an expert on homicides, said the death toll might be the highest ever for any workplace shooting carried out by a woman.

"Men, more than women, tend to view their self-worth by what they do" at work, Fox said. Men also appear more prone to use violence in seeking revenge while "women tend to view murder as a last resort," he said.

As the shooting began, some of the 80 or so workers streamed out of the building. Some ran to a firehouse.

"I was dumping mail on a belt when the gunshots suddenly 'boom, boom, boom, boom!'" said postal worker Alger Busante, 56. He rushed out of the building.

"It is really very shocking. This is a peaceful place," Busante said.

Postal employee Charles Kronick told KEYT-TV in Santa Barbara that he was inside the building when he heard shots. "I heard something that sounded like a pop, and then I heard a couple seconds later, another pop, pop, pop," Kronick said.

Kronick said his boss came running over and told him to get out of the building, and "we all hightailed it out real quick."

The dead were identified as Ze Fairchild, 37, Maleka Higgins, 28, Nicola Grant, 42, Guadalupe Swartz, 52, and Dexter Shannon, 57.

Postmaster General John E. Potter said counselors would be available to the families and employees. "Our heartfelt prayers and condolences go out to the families of the victims and to our employees who have suffered through this tragic incident," he said in a statement issued in Washington.

It was the deadliest shooting at any U.S. workplace since 2003, when 48-year-old Doug Williams gunned down 14 co-workers, killing six, and then committed suicide at a Lockheed Martin aircraft parts plant in Meridian, Miss.

Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractic Physician
Participating provider for HMO's student Insurance, Blue Cross, GIC, car insurance & most others.
228 Triangle St. Amherst

THE BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
(36 years of service—and counting)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)
REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2006 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for meetings •Feb. 6th (Mon) •Feb. 8th (Wed)
Feb. 7th (Tues) meeting will be held in room 168C of the Campus Center
•Assignment notification ONLY: Thurs. Feb. 9th @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

DISCOVER NURSING AT OUR OPEN HOUSE
Information Seminar
NEW AND TRANSFER STUDENTS:
Study 12 months in the beautiful Caribbean... and 8 months in U.S. accredited colleges.
LEARN ABOUT: OUR ACCELERATED 2ND DEGREE PROGRAMS
STATE-OF-THE-ART CAMPUS; DIRECT ENTRY CURRICULUM
FINANCIAL AID POLICIES; AND ADMISSIONS PROCESS
MEET WITH MEMBERS OF THE ADMINISTRATION!
"Nationally, more than 125,000 applicants were denied admission to nursing programs!"
2004 National League for Nursing
(Official agency for baccalaureate degree accreditation)
ACCEPTING APPLICATIONS FOR MAY & SEPT 2006 CLASSES
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2006 - at 1PM
Boston Marriott Copley
110 Huntington Avenue, Boston, MA
"Join us for refreshments!"
Register on line at www.iuon.org or
RSVP Toll Free : 866-868-4720 x678
ROBERT ROSS INTERNATIONAL
UNIVERSITY OF NURSING, ST. KITTS
For information & to apply online: www.iuon.org
VIEW OUR ONLINE VIDEO: www.iuon.org/video

Yo!
Yo!
YO!
The Daily Collegian is always looking for new writers!
Come down to the Collegain newsroom to apply, located in the Campus Center basement.

Wounded journalists arrive at Maryland hospital

By Stephen Manning
Associated Press

ANDREWS AIR FORCE BASE, Md. — Wounded ABC anchorman Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt arrived in the United States on Tuesday for treatment at a Navy hospital.

They were airlifted from the U.S. military base in Ramstein, Germany.

They were among 30 patients on a C-17 military evacuation plane that arrived at Andrews Air Force Base. Woodruff, Vogt and three other patients were put on a bus for National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda. The other patients were taken to the Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington.

At Bethesda, Woodruff and Vogt are expected to receive treatment for the head wounds and other serious injuries they suffered Sunday in a roadside bombing in Iraq. The Navy medical center has specialized equipment that can treat penetrating head wounds, according to hospital spokeswoman Ellen Maurer.

Jeffrey Schneider, vice president of ABC News, said outside the hospital that the network considered but rejected the idea of sending Woodruff and Vogt to a private hospital.

"We talked to all the military people and determined that this is the best place in the world to treat those kind of injuries," he said. Schneider added that ABC is paying for its employees' treatment. "The cost will not fall on the American taxpayer," he said.

Doctors at the Landstuhl Regional Medical Center in Germany who treated Vogt, 46, and Woodruff, 44, after they were flown from Iraq said the conditions of both were improving. Military Col. Pete Sorini said the prognosis for both journalists was "excellent."

David Woodruff said Tuesday on ABC's "Good Morning America" that his brother's condition was "markedly" better Tuesday morning.

The co-anchor of ABC's "World News Tonight" also suffered some broken bones and injuries to the side of his face in the blast. Doctors told the family that Bob Woodruff's recovery would be more of a "marathon" than a "sprint," his brother said.

"At this point it would be too early to say what the end situation will be with him," David Woodruff said. "But we're all so encouraged."

Vogt and Woodruff were wounded as they filmed a report from the hatch of the Iraqi vehicle. Both were wearing body armor and helmets.

Bob Woodruff, co-anchor of ABC's "World News Tonight", and cameraman Doug Vogt, arrived in the United States Tuesday. Woodruff received treatment for head wounds and other serious injuries.

Reily selects running mate, angers Democrats

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — In selecting state Rep. Marie St. Fleur to be his running mate, Attorney General Tom Reilly adopted a tradition used successfully by Republicans in recent elections — but angered some of his fellow Democrats in the process.

Reilly apparently surveyed the political landscape and decided that none of the four Democrats running for lieutenant governor thus fall sufficiently boosted his chances of winning the governor's office. So he drafted St. Fleur into that race with the promise of forming a political partnership should they succeed in their individual campaigns.

"She's smart. She's savvy. And she is absolutely fearless," an ebullient Reilly told a crowd at a Boys and Girls Club near St. Fleur's Dorchester home on Tuesday. "She is a perfect running mate for this race. It's going to be tough. It's going to be hard, but we're going to win this race."

Among those present were Mayor Thomas Menino, a fellow Democrat, and former Suffolk District Attorney Ralph Martin, a Republican, both of whom urged Reilly to pick St. Fleur as his running mate.

"I want to thank Tom Reilly," St. Fleur said in a speech that at points brought tears to her eyes. "I've known Tom Reilly for a long time. I did not expect or anticipate this, but I will tell you, I want to thank Tom Reilly for his courage, for his courage to make a bold statement."

St. Fleur, married with three children, is the state's first Haitian-born lawmaker. She was first elected to the Legislature in 1999 and now serves as vice chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

The 43-year-old worked for Reilly both in the Middlesex district attorney and state attorney general's offices.

"We come from different places," said Reilly, 63, the son of Irish immigrants, "but we share a common set of values and vision for the state of Massachusetts."

While Reilly proclaimed St. Fleur as his running mate, candidates for governor and lieutenant governor run separately through the state primary in September. The Democrats and Republicans who win those individual races are then paired by party for the general election.

In 1990, though, William F. Weld began a string of Republican victories by declaring his preference for teaming up with then-state Sen. Paul Cellucci. Democrats followed suit in 2002, and Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, a Republican vying to succeed Gov. Mitt Romney this fall, plans to continue the practice in her own campaign.

"It's worked very well for Republicans in the past, and I think it's interesting that the Democrats are starting to use that strategy as well," Healey said. "It allows you to have someone who reinforces your strengths and fills in a bit on the things that, perhaps, you have a little weakness on, and I think it also allows you to work as a team throughout the race and cover the state more effectively."

Healey added: "We're looking at a number of very well qualified individuals, and we will be teaming up with somebody for this process. We haven't gone very far with it yet."

But selecting a running mate has become a flash point among Democrats, some of whom argue that such an anointment is undemocratic.

Worcester Mayor Tim Murray, who has spent over a year building a campaign for lieutenant governor, complained vociferously last week that Reilly had broken a pledge to him to stay out of the race, something the attorney general was asked about during his appearance with St. Fleur.

"The conversation that he must be referring to happened last August, in the very early stages of the campaign, when I was trying to put together my campaign, and, basically, I indicated I had no plans to run with anyone — at that point — which I didn't," Reilly said. "As things developed, I felt I needed a partner and I thought it was important that I do have a running mate. I've made my choice."

While heralding St. Fleur as "a perfect running mate," Reilly also courted millionaire businessman Chris Gabrieli for his ticket. The talks were so serious aides had prepared to announce the partnership Sunday afternoon.

While Reilly is the best funded of the Democratic candidates, with $3.7 million in the bank compared to Democratic rival Deval Patrick's $510,000, he conceded that St. Fleur brought none of the personal wealth Gabrieli would have contributed to the campaign.

Iran obtained plans to create atomic warheads

By George Jahn
Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — The U.N. nuclear watchdog agency said in a report Tuesday that Iran obtained documents and drawings on the black market that serve no other purpose than to make an atomic warhead. Tehran warned of an "end of diplomacy" if plans to refer it to the U.N. Security Council are carried out.

The report by the agency, ahead of a meeting of its 35-member board Thursday, also confirmed information recently provided by diplomats familiar with the Iran probe that Tehran has not started small-scale uranium enrichment since announcing it would earlier this month.

Nevertheless, the findings added to pressure to refer Tehran to the Security Council within days. Such a move, Iran said, would lead to a halt in surprise U.N. inspections beginning Saturday and prompt it to resume frozen nuclear activities.

"If it happens, the government will be required under the law to end the suspension of all nuclear activities it has voluntarily halted," Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said late Tuesday speaking on Iranian television.

Iran insists its nuclear program is civilian only and has no other purpose than to generate power. Enrichment can produce either fuel for a nuclear reactor or the material needed to build a warhead.

European and Russian officials insisted the opportunity for negotiations was not lost, even after envoys from Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States agreed in London overnight to recommend that the IAEA's board report Iran to the council when it meets in Vienna.

The top U.N. body has the power to impose economic and political sanctions, but none of those measures is immediately likely. Under the deal agreed to by Moscow and Beijing — previous opponents of referral — the Security Council will likely await a new IAEA report at the next board meeting in March before deciding on substantive action, leaving more time for talks with Iran.

"For us, the diplomatic path is not closed," French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei said in Paris. The process of taking Tehran to the Security Council is "reversible too if Iran makes the gestures we're waiting for."

The EU foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, insisted that talk of sanctions was premature. "We are in a diplomatic channel," he said.

But U.S. Ambassador John Bolton called the decision to report Iran to the Security Council a "major step forward."

In an attempt to reassure Tehran, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov underlined that the Council "will not make any (immediate) decisions." Russian and Chinese diplomats will head to Tehran shortly to explain the meaning of the London agreement and urge Iran to meet IAEA demands, he said.

Senate approves Bernanke chairman of the Federal Reserve

By Jeannine Aversa
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Tuesday approved the nomination of Ben Bernanke to be the next chairman of the Federal Reserve, the most influential economic policy job in the world.

Bernanke, 52, was cleared on a voice vote after a short debate in the chamber amid strong bipartisan support.

He succeeds Alan Greenspan, 79, who retires Tuesday after 18.5 years, making him the second-longest serving chairman at the central bank.

"We believe that Dr. Bernanke will serve this country well at the helm of the Federal Reserve," said Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., in remarks on the Senate floor before the vote.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes, D-Md., observed, "There's no question about Dr. Bernanke's qualifications for the position ... He commands great respect from his peers in the profession and I think great respect from all who have come in contact with him."

Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., was the only senator requesting to be recorded as voting against the nomination. Bunning cited concerns that Bernanke would be too much in Greenspan's mold. "Sadly, I have not seen very much evidence of him being independent," Bunning said.

A former Fed governor and Princeton economic professor, Bernanke, chairman of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, was tapped by President Bush in October for the Fed post.

Bernanke must be sworn in before he takes over as the chairman of the Fed.

The Fed determines interest rate policies that affect any person or business borrowing money. Its decisions can influence financial markets around the globe.

Bernanke will lead the Fed at a time when the U.S. economy faces challenges, including bloated budget and trade deficits, the question of whether the high-flying housing market will make a safe landing and the toll that high energy prices will have on business activity, household budgets and inflation.

The handling of monetary policy under the Bernanke-run Fed is not expected to be much different than of the Greenspan Fed. Both men share a similar philosophy in terms of the importance of fighting inflation, preparing for remote but dangerous economic risks and keeping the economy on an even keel while nurturing job creation.

And, Bernanke will work to make sure the Fed remains free from political influence. That's crucially important for the Fed to have credibility in the eyes of investors and central bankers around the world.

There are certainly differences between the two in both substance as well as style.

Bernanke favors numerically spelling out acceptable bounds for inflation. Greenspan didn't, arguing that it could crimp the Fed's flexibility.

In terms of setting interest rates, an inflation target wouldn't make much practical difference because the Fed's preferred range of inflation under Greenspan was 1 to 2 percent, excluding food and energy prices. That's the same range favored by Bernanke.

Bernanke, in his Senate confirmation hearing on Nov. 15, said he would move slowly and seek to build a consensus on the notion of inflation targeting.

While Greenspan is known for his Delphic discourse, Bernanke is known for his plain-speaking style.

The Senate's action is the latest step in Bernanke's journey from academic to economic policy maker.

The U.S. Senate approved the nomination of Ben Barnanke as the chairman of the Federal Reserve, Tuesday. Barnanke succeeds Alan Greenspan, who retired after after 18.5 years as acting chairman.

to Your Award Winning Dining Services!
JANUARY / FEBRUARY

Su	Mo	Tu	We	Th	Fr	Sa
29	30	31	1	2	3	4
5	6	7	8	9	10	11
12	13	14	15	16	17	18
19	20	21	22	23	24	25
26	27	28

Sunday, Jan 29
Free meals for family at Lunch and Dinner
Free UMass bottled Water at Lunch and Dinner
Monday, Jan 30
Free candy bar or granola bar at Dinner
Tuesday, Jan 31
Chinese New Year Celebration (Year of the Dog)
Win Lucky Money
Wednesday, Feb 1
Brioche Breakfast
Thursday, Feb 2
Get your coupon for Bluewall Cookies
Friday, Feb 3
Get your coupon for $1 off a purchase of $5 or more at any campus C-Store at the cashier
Saturday, Feb 4
Jazz Brunch in all DC's
DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst
www.umass.edu/diningservices

USED BOOKS = BIG SAVINGS

Save up to 25% over the cost of new.

UMASS AMHERST
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

Save your receipts for a 5% rebate!

proudly part of the
efollett.com bookstore network

LOW PRICE GUARANTEE

Your first choice to buy textbooks for less... and sell them back for more.

GUARANTEED BUYBACK
If I'm on the book you get the cash. 50% of purchase price at buyback.
Available on select titles only

Three years later, band manager to plead guilty to nightclub fire

By Eric Tucker
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The former manager of the heavy metal rock group Great White agreed Tuesday to plead guilty to 100 counts of involuntary manslaughter stemming from the deadly 2003 nightclub fire.

Superior Court Judge Francis Darigan said Daniel Biechele will serve no more than 10 years in state prison under a deal with prosecutors, sparing him the possibility of many more years behind bars. He is scheduled to enter the plea next Tuesday.

Biechele, 29, who is out on bail, was originally charged with 200 counts of involuntary manslaughter for setting the blaze that began when he ignited pyrotechnics during a Great White performance on Feb. 20, 2003, at The Station nightclub in West Warwick.

Sparks from the pyrotechnics ignited highly flammable foam lining the club's walls and ceiling, creating a fast-moving blaze that also injured more than 200 people in the fourth-deadliest nightclub fire in the country's history.

Each manslaughter charge carries a maximum of 30 years in prison, though Biechele could only have been sentenced on 100 of the 200 counts if convicted of all the charges.

Darigan did not say whether Biechele will cooperate with prosecutors in the case against club owners Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, who are also each charged with 200 counts of involuntary manslaughter and accused of installing flammable foam in the club in violation of the state fire code.

Tom Briody, a lawyer for Biechele, declined to comment about the terms of the plea deal, but told reporters that Biechele never intended to harm anyone and was remorseful. He said his client had made a "very personal decision to take responsibility for his actions" on the night of the deadly blaze.

"He hopes that his decision today will give some small measure of peace to the victims of this terrible tragedy," Briody said.

Briody had said Biechele had permission to ignite the pyrotechnics during the concert, but the Derderians have disputed that claim.

Kathleen Hagerty, a lawyer for the Derderians, declined to comment on Biechele's deal.

Some victims' relatives reacted angrily to the news.

"My daughter's life is worth more than a plea bargain," Diane Mattera, who lost her 29-year-old daughter, Tammy, in the fire said before the hearing.

"For the 100 victims, and for all the ones that are burnt and scarred and everything else, they deserve much more than this — not a plea bargain," she said. "This is absolutely wrong."

Attorney General Patrick Lynch issued a news release late Tuesday saying his office was prepared to go to trial, though he did not address family members' concerns.

"We're working through the process as best we can to bring them what justice we can," Lynch said outside court.

The deal is likely to change the landscape of the criminal case against the Derderians, said David Frank, a former prosecutor and current reporter for Rhode Island Lawyers' Weekly and Massachusetts Lawyers' Weekly. It could make it easier for them to point blame at Biechele if he admits responsibility.

"His lawyer isn't there to sort of present his side of the story or present his spin," Frank said. "So it really allows the Derderians to put whatever blame or whatever responsibility they think is appropriate on this manager."

The upside for prosecutors is that it would remove the uncertainty of a jury trial, he said.

"You never know what's going to happen in any case in front of a jury," added Andrew Horwitz, a criminal law professor at Roger Williams University in Bristol.

One count per death alleged criminal negligence, the other accused the defendants of committing underlying misdemeanor offenses that led to the deaths.

Under Biechele's deal, he would plead guilty to the counts related to misdemeanor offenses. The other 100 counts would be dismissed, Darigan said.

Student activism reaches new heights, survey says

By Suzanne Edwards
Daily Texan (U. Texas)

AUSTIN, Texas — Community involvement and political activism are up to record or near-record levels among college freshmen, according to results of a national survey released last week by a higher education research group.

Two out of three college freshmen said it's essential to help others who are in difficulty, said the study, released by the Higher Education Research Institute at the University of California, Los Angeles. A record number of freshmen, 83 percent, said they volunteered at least occasionally during their senior year of high school.

More than a third of freshmen, the highest percentage in 10 years, said it was important or essential to keep up-to-date with politics, the survey said. Nearly 50 percent of the students said they had participated in an organized protest in high school, the highest percentage in the survey's 40-year history, while 12 percent said they had worked for a local, state or national campaign during high school.

University of Texas sociology professor Cynthia Buckley said the increase in student participation is a result of structural changes and not any one specific event such as Sept. 11, 2001.

"Over the past 20 years, many forms of services with high social value have shifted from the governmental domain to the responsibility of community volunteers," she said.

While it seems student involvement in politics and volunteer work is increasing, "knowledge of local officials and political issues continues to have enormous room for improvement," Buckley said.

At UT, members of several political organizations said the increased activism is evident from activities and recruiting within their own organizations.

"There is a huge impulse for change at the state and national level," said Brandon Chicotsky, president of University Democrats.

"This is the Sept. 11 generation, and we understand that our votes impact the entire world."

The institute surveyed more than 263,000 incoming freshmen at the beginning of the fall semester at 385 participating colleges.

"There are more people coming to campus looking and ready to do stuff," said Joseph Wyly, membership director of Young Conservatives of Texas. "There seems to be a lot more enthusiasm and knowledge."

National politics is not the only area experiencing a surge of student interest. University politics have also had a significant impact on students, said Toyin Falola, a biology senior who is running for re-election as the natural science representative for Student Government.

"There are so many ways to make my college and UT as a whole better, and what student government does is to help turn those ideas into action," Falola said.

"It's a great resource for trying to change university life, because here are motivated people willing to help out in any way they can."

Former Wal-Mart vice chairman pleads guilty to fraud, tax charges

By Marcus Kabel
Associated Press

FORT SMITH, Ark. — A former Wal-Mart Stores Inc. vice chairman who was a protégé of founder Sam Walton pleaded guilty to fraud and tax charges Tuesday, admitting that he stole money, gift cards and merchandise from the world's largest retailer.

Tom Coughlin, 57, faces a maximum of 28 years in prison after pleading guilty to five counts of wire fraud and one count of filing a false tax return. He also could be fined $1.35 million.

The judge ordered a presentencing report that will take up to 14 weeks to prepare.

Wal-Mart lawyers referred Coughlin to federal prosecutors after discovering Coughlin had embezzled money from the company and used expense vouchers to buy products as varied as snakeskin boots, hunting trips and Bloody Mary mix. They estimated losses at up to $500,000.

In federal court, Coughlin spoke only when he was asked questions by U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson. Afterward, defense lawyers issued a statement in which Coughlin accepted responsibility for "serious personal mistakes in judgment."

"This was not an easy decision. I regret the embarrassment this matter has caused my family and friends and I thank them for their support, love and friendship," Coughlin said in the statement.

In documents filed with the court, Coughlin specifically admitted defrauding the company to pay for the care of his hunting dogs, lease a private hunting area, upgrade his pickup truck, buy liquor and a cooler, and receive $3,100 in cash.

As the company vice chairman, Coughlin received a base salary of $1.03 million in his final year with the company. A filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission last April said Coughlin also received $3.09 million in bonuses and other income in fiscal 2005. Coughlin held about $21 million in Wal-Mart stock, according to an SEC filing last February.

The former executive said his guilty plea was in the best interest of his family, friends and community. He remained a Wal-Mart cheerleader, asking associates "to pull together in fulfilling Sam Walton's dream of creating the world's greatest retailer."

Prosecutors recommended a sentence but Dawson sealed the plea agreement. The judge said he was concerned that he read many of the plea deal's details in newspapers before any documents were filed with his court.

Nothing was mentioned in court about restitution.

Wal-Mart spokeswoman Mona Williams said the ordeal has been "embarrassing and painful."

"Someone we expected to operate with the highest integrity let us down in a very public way. Wal-Mart has high ethical standards and the way we handled this matter makes it clear that every associate will be held to these standards with no exception," Williams said.

Widow of civil rights leader called 'matriarch of the movement' someday." Eighteen months later, in 1953, they did.

KING from page 1

The couple moved to Montgomery, Ala., where he became pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church and helped lead the 1955 Montgomery bus boycott that Rosa Parks set in motion when she refused to give up her seat on a segregated bus. With that campaign, King began enacting his philosophy of nonviolent, direct social action.

Over the years, King was with her husband in his finest hours. She was at his side as he received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964. She marched beside him from Selma, Ala., into Montgomery in 1965 on the triumphant drive for a voting rights law.

Only days after his death, she flew to Memphis with three of her children to lead thousands marching in honor of her slain husband and to plead for his cause.

"I think you rise to the occasion in a crisis," she once said. "I think the Lord gives you strength when you need it. God was using us — and now he's using me, too."

Her husband's womanizing had been an open secret during the height of the civil rights movement. In January, a new book, "At Canaan's Edge" by Taylor Branch, put his infidelity back in the spotlight. It said that not long before he was assassinated, King confessed a long-standing affair to his wife while she was recovering from a hysterectomy.

The King family, especially Coretta Scott King and her father-in-law, Martin Luther King Sr., were highly visible in 1976 when former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter ran for president. When an integration dispute at Carter's Plains church created a furor, Coretta Scott King campaigned in Carter's side the next day.

She later was named by Carter to serve as part of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations, where Young was the ambassador.

In 1997, she spoke out in favor of a push to grant a trial for James Earl Ray, who pleaded guilty to killing her husband and then recanted.

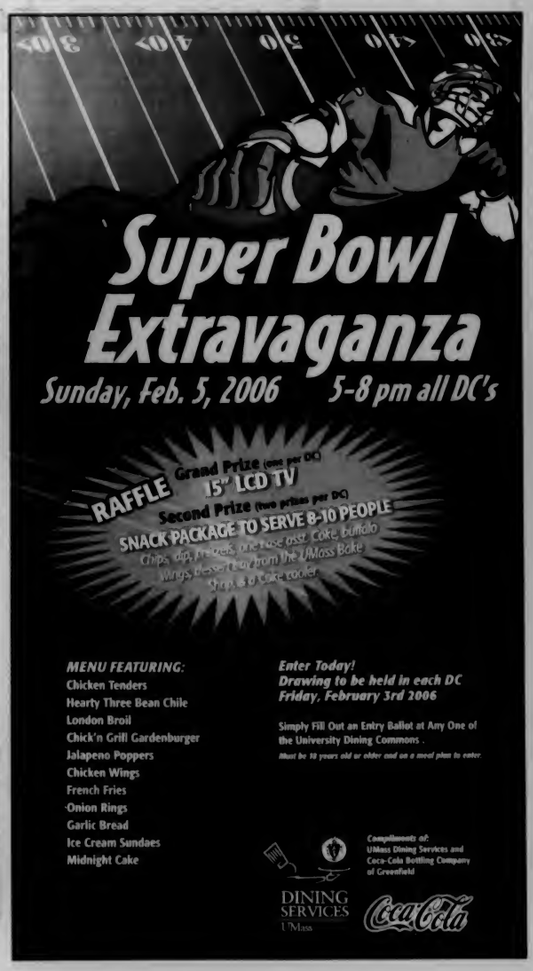
"Even if no new light is shed on the facts concerning my husband's assassination, at least we and the nation can have the satisfaction of knowing that justice has run its course in this tragedy," she told a judge.

The trial never took place. Ray died in 1998.

King was born April 27, 1927, in Perry County, Ala. Her father ran a country store. To help her family during the Depression, young Coretta picked cotton. Later, she worked as a waitress to earn her way through Antioch College in Yellow Springs, Ohio.

In 1994, she stepped down as head of the King Center, passing the job to son Dexter, who in turn passed the job on to her other son, Martin III, in 2004. Dexter continued to serve as the center's chief operating officer. Martin III also has served on the Fulton County (Ga.) commission and as president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, co-founded by his father in 1957. Daughter Yolanda became an actress and the youngest child, Bernice, became a Baptist minister.

In 1993, on the 25th anniversary of her husband's death, King said the war in Vietnam that her husband opposed "has been replaced by an undeclared war on our central cities, a war being fought by gangs with guns for drugs."



"The value of life in our cities has become as cheap as the price of a gun," she said.

In London, she stood in 1969 in the same carved pulpit in St. Paul's Cathedral where her husband preached five years earlier.

"Many despair at all the evil and unrest and disorder in the world today," she preached, "but I see a new social order and I see the dawn of a new day."

Wanda Smith, right, embraces Sarina Barbee after the announcement of Coretta Scott King's death.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2006

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass dorms need work

Nick Belanger

With an undergraduate population of roughly 18,000, UMass has 41 dorms, capable of housing 11,000 students. UMass guarantees housing for all freshmen and sophomores, however, with nearly 4,500 new students admitted annually, the University is continuing to face a severe housing shortage. A number of students lived in "temporary housing" at the Howard Johnson on Route 9 for the entire duration of the fall semester, and even more undergrads lived in converted lounges all across campus. So, I have to ask, why isn't available housing taken into serious consideration when capping the number of new students to admit?

The University is increasing the number of new students admitted each year, and with the addition of several new dormitories we can expect a drastic increase in admission for the class of 2010. Likewise, the University continues to make way for freshmen by designating entire dorms "freshmen only." Meanwhile juniors and seniors are being stuck with fewer on campus living options. Perhaps that's the University's subtle way of telling upperclassmen to get out.

> I call the "residence halls" dorms because the label "residence hall" is like putting frosting on a turd and calling it a cupcake.

Separating upperclassmen and freshmen is the administration's brilliant way of addressing the alcohol problem on campus. I'm skeptical that any dorm can truly be "dry" and anyone who lived through freshmen year knows, no one is rowdier or sloppier than a drunk, first semester college student. Yes, ladies and gentlemen, somehow, some way, Van Meter residents will get their hands on excessive amounts of booze next year, please mark my words.

The housing here does boast something that few universities can, that once you're in, you're in. As long as you apply for housing annually you are guaranteed a room for four years. The condition and location of that room is a gray area, but they won't toss you out on the street. However, once you're out, you're out. If you drop your housing, forget about trying to get a dorm room ever again. I know from experience.

I dropped my housing in early December to avoid a hefty cancellation fee. When my off-campus living arrangements fell through, I re-applied for housing about a week later. As a sophomore, I assumed I would still be guaranteed a room. In fact, I was told by a housing services employee that I would be fine. Turns out, in re-applying for housing they considered me a junior. (If that were the case I think they owe me about 15 credits).

Therefore, a week before classes started I received notification that I would not be getting a room. Thank you, Housing Services, you know, I would live in my car, but I think the parking tickets would wind up being more expensive than room and board.

My cynicism toward the housing process here isn't all derived from just this one adventure. I had heard enough horror stories from friends to realize the system is extremely flawed. It should come as no surprise that plenty of seniors couldn't get a room in a dorm of their choice, and many more students are extremely upset about being displaced from the newest all freshmen dorm, Van Meter, next fall. However what may come as some sort of a surprise is the deplorable condition of many of the dorms.

I call the "residence halls" dorms because the label "residence hall" is like putting frosting on a turd and calling it a cupcake. I experienced the maintenance process over the past summer working as a member of the Central/Orchard Hill paint crew. Armed with only our brushes and an endless amount of cheap antique white paint, my crew and I made our way through every room in the two areas. Ladies and gentlemen, here is what I discovered.

All of the corner rooms in Wheeler are falling apart with water damage, and the first floor and basement of that building have cockroaches. Gorman also has a number of rooms with horrible water damage. The showers in Baker are falling apart and the ceilings are a mold trap.

In fact, I believe we found extensive water damage in every building. Some of these dorms should be condemned, yet year after year problems are covered up rather than fixed appropriately. The offices in charge of maintaining the dorms do the best they can with the few resources they have.

The University is not doing nearly enough to improve the conditions of the older dorms, and they are not adequately supporting those who fix and maintain the buildings themselves. It's like trying to tell a doctor to fix a broken leg with a Band-Aid.

If this university truly prides itself on its "residence hall" community, then the actual conditions of these buildings should be a top priority. Maybe once one of the dorms is actually condemned the administration will stop ignoring the problem.

Nick Belanger is a Collegian staff member.

Framingham compared to Hadley

Dan O'Brien

With all the recent talk about expanding the Route 9 area of Hadley — to include building a "SuperCenter" Wal-Mart, a Home Depot and a Lowe's — local officials should examine the effects that retail expansion had on one town at the other end of Route 9.

If you live in Eastern Massachusetts, like I do, then you probably understand the nightmare that comes with shopping along Route 9 in Natick or Framingham on a given weekend. My trip to buy a shirt at the Natick Mall on a recent Saturday afternoon turned into utter dread.

Maybe I should have known better, not to drive to the mall in the middle of the weekend. Unfortunately, my friend just moved to Framingham and I was driving back from her house when I needed to buy the shirt.

Why should Natick/Framingham be avoided? Because on a typical Saturday afternoon, traffic jams stretch for miles. These towns have virtually turned into shopping malls. (Sorry if you live in Framingham, but you know it's true).

If you are from the metro-west area of Boston, which I know a lot of UMass Amherst students are, then you know exactly what I'm talking about. Route 9 from Natick through Framingham is a wasteland of corporate America. Chain stores as far as the eye can see. Truly a depressing sight.

I'm not anti-business. Hey, people need to buy stuff, and retailers need to make a living, right? However, the problem with the Framingham retail district is that it isn't located somewhere on the outskirts of town, for example, in some area that needed to be revitalized. Rather, it has literally taken over the town.

Looking around Framingham, it's not all bad. There are some nice houses in quiet neighborhoods away from the malls. But to live and work in the town is likely a nightmare due to traffic alone. The road that connects the rest of the world to all the major retailers – Route 9 – isn't just a road; it's a major highway, which runs right through the center of town. You have to take it to get just about anywhere.

> If you are from the metro-west area of Boston, which I know a lot of UMass Amherst students are, then you know exactly what I'm talking about. Route 9 from Natick through Framingham is a wasteland of corporate America.

From a business perspective, Framingham is a gold mine for retailers. Over the years, the town has grown into the retail center of the Metropolitan Boston area at the unfortunate expense of the town's people.

I recently talked to a real estate broker from the town of Southboro, which is located next to Framingham. The broker told me that Framingham property values are down, crime is up and he would "never buy a home there."

The low costs of rent undoubtedly attracted certain aspects of the population to live in Framingham, specifically, Brazilian immigrants. This has been met with both good and bad results.

One good thing that's happened: Framingham's recent Brazilian renaissance in the town center. In the past 10 years, these immigrants have truly revitalized Framingham Center for the better, with an array of Brazilian restaurants and shops.

On the flip side, there are many more Brazilian immigrants who don't work in these fancy shops, and many of these immigrants are illegal. Who do you think works all these low-paying, retail jobs at stores like Wal-Mart? You guessed it.

We all know that low property values and higher crime rates go hand-in-hand. To add to the town's demise, a recent article in the MetroWest Daily News pointed out that the number of level three sex offenders moving into Framingham has gone up, even though the offenders have no prior ties to the town.

In a high-profile news story, on Dec. 17, 2005, Evandro Doirado allegedly kidnapped a 25-year-old woman and her two-year-old son from the Wal-Mart parking lot in Framingham. Doirado had just allegedly stabbed a fellow drug dealer in nearby Natick and thought he killed him (the drug dealer survived).

Fearing that he would go to jail for murder, Doirado hid in the Wal-Mart parking lot, waiting for a nice-looking female to have one last "fling," police said. After he abducted the woman and her son, he allegedly raped her in a local parking lot, then forced her to drive about 60 miles to Plymouth, where he continually raped her in a hotel room for over 48 hours. As all of this was happening, her young son watched in horror. To make matters worse, police now believe that Doirado has the HIV virus. Doirado is an illegal Brazilian immigrant that has lived in the United States for nine years.

Now we must ask ourselves, is Framingham the kind of town we want Hadley to become?

Dan O'Brien is a Collegian editor.

Protecting economic interests

Andrew Freeman

Does our society value honesty? Increasingly this question has troubled me. Every institution – from government to the church to business to the media – has come under fire for serious, repeated deceptions. Are these isolated incidents, or is something wrong with our society?

One of the most recent controversies has centered on the memoirs of James Frey. In his book, "A Million Little Pieces," Frey presents an image of depraved criminality and desperate addiction, with a chorus of "I am an Alcoholic and I am a drug Addict and I am a Criminal" running throughout the work. He was "wanted in three states," spent three months in prison, had brawled with several police officers and been targeted by the FBI.

It was all hype. Frey spent a few hours in jail, at most, before he received bail, was not wanted in any state and his interactions with the police were, in the words of one officer, "polite and cooperative." All this was discovered by a website, thesmokinggun.com, and detailed in a long article on Jan. 8. Not only was "A Million Little Pieces" flawed, but so was the sequel memoir, "My Friend Leonard," which focuses on a prison term that, in reality, Frey never served.

Ordinarily, people try to hide the evils that they commit, rather than to embellish them. Frey seems to have been a more or less typical young man – he graduated on time, was a member of a fraternity, had problems with substance abuse and had a few minor and inconsequential run-ins with the police. This was not marketable material for a memoir.

Frey's first book started out as fiction and failed to impress the publishers he shopped it to, according to a 2003 article in the New York Observer. Instead, it was published as a memoir, presumably because the salacious story was only worthwhile if "true." But the whole enterprise was disingenuous.

Frey's fraud is not a story about an individual but the creation of a brand. That brand was "James Frey" – a tattooed, tough-talking, recovered addict with a heart of gold, who valued "honesty" and expressed that through obscenity. Much like a gangster rapper, "Frey" had to prove his manliness and street-cred, and inventing a dastardly criminal record was necessary. This hyper-masculine posing makes the depths of Frey's fabricated fall all the more believable to his audience.

> Witness the cult of celebrity: people are observed and followed and spun until nearly every aspect of their lives is public knowledge, until Brad or Jen becomes as recognizable as Coke or Nike.

Turning individuals into commodities is something our economy excels at. Witness the cult of celebrity; people are observed and followed and spun until nearly every aspect of their lives is public knowledge, until Brad or Jen becomes as recognizable as Coke or Nike. Even worse is "Reality TV," which transforms ordinary people into scheming egomaniacs while presenting them as the model of real people.

From an economic perspective abstract qualities like truthfulness and honesty are only valuable if they produce a profit. Lies that protect the company, promote the brand or advance the individual are justified under our system. Most of our economy is based on deception, starting with the basic lie that products will satisfy our every need. Once you accept the primacy of materialism, you are ready to trample other holiday shoppers, to defraud your company, to fabricate your own memoirs.

Frey's fraud is a product of this culture, a deception far beyond mere individual responsibility. The publisher did not bother to fact-check the sensationalistic memoirs. Oprah Winfrey, who helped promote Frey on her show, ignored indications that he had lied about his drug rehabilitation.

According to a Jan. 24 story in the New York Times, an addiction counselor told the show's producers that Frey's descriptions of the Hazelden rehab center were false and damaging. Yet Frey was featured and his book promoted. Both Oprah and Frey's publisher defended him after the memoirs were found to be lies, to protect their own economic interests.

We live in a country where men like Frey make money from lies and have no shortage of defenders when they are caught. Where serial liars like Jayson Blair, who fabricated articles for the New York Times, get book deals for their memoirs.

It has to end. People who abuse our trust and are rewarded ought to be rhetorically tarred and feathered, not excused or forgiven. They should be banished from jobs that require our public trust. Our economy often rewards lying, but as the collapse of Enron shows, deception ultimately harms it and society as a whole. We need to look beyond our crass material interests, and concern ourselves with the welfare of all, because a nation of "Freys" is not a nation at all.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

Don't be afraid to eat alone

Rebecca Paskievich

I just had an excruciatingly painful experience: I ate dinner alone. It's my first night back to campus and I'm so excited to be back at UMass after a far-too-long break. Yet, when my plans with a few friends for dinner fell apart because everyone was busy getting last minute errands done, I was stumped at what to do.

My roommate from last semester got an internship and left me stranded with a new person who I have yet to meet, and three of my good friends here have gone abroad. I decided I would try it, go to the dining hall and eat dinner — by myself.

As I trekked over to the Hampshire Dining Commons I noticed I was the only one walking by herself. Whether it was a couple holding hands as they passed, a group of girls giggling and shouting, recounting funny stories from their time apart or some guys bundled up and striding out of the winter night into a haven of chicken parmesan, everyone had a support-time sidekick or two.

I walked up the steps and handed over my U-Card. As I headed over to stand in line I was overwhelmed with an intense sense of loneliness. I felt like I needed someone to hand me a tray mid-conversation and I wanted to comment about how gross the salmon looked to someone who would surely agree. I decided I'd eat and go as soon as humanly possible; if standing in line caused this much agony, sitting and eating would be unthinkable torture.

I found an empty table after what seemed like hours of searching, plopped into the seat, grabbed the paper card on the table and read furiously about DL Hughley as I tried to finish my dinner in record time. I felt like everyone was watching me. The paranoia was insane. In reality, everyone else in the room could care less about me; they were too busy enraptured in conversation to study the lone girl at a table by herself.

On my way back to Patterson, my anxiety transformed into sadness. My fast pace slowed to a steady stroll and my heart sank. I tried to figure out why I was so gloomy and realized I missed home, and, oddly enough, I missed high school. As anxious as I was to get back here, I missed the comfort of family. The knowledge that at anytime there will be someone home to talk to, to watch a movie with or enjoy a meal with is a reassuring luxury I enjoyed for the past month.

Although I've been out of high school for almost two years now, being in my hometown over winter break brought back days before college. I was flooded with memories of hallway laughter and thoughts of warm summer nights at the beach; it was hard to come back to a campus where there are far more strangers than friendly faces.

> Although I've been out of high school for almost two years now, being in my hometown over winter break brought back days before college. I was flooded with memories of hallway laughter and thoughts of warm summer nights at the beach; it was hard to come back to a campus where there are far more strangers than friendly faces.

If anyone else feels overcome with a sense of lacking right now, know you're not alone. Also, you don't need constant entertainment by others; being by yourself can work sometimes too. Branch out if you really are lonely because you could be missing out on great friends by being unwilling to meet them.

Remember and cherish your high school days, but be excited about making new memories in college. Know your family will always be home when you need them, and it's good to get away every now and then.

Though it was a burden beyond belief, I'm glad I ate alone, because it allowed hidden insecurities to surface. I don't plan on eating alone again anytime soon, but I am planning on a great spring semester at UMass. Welcome back everybody. May this semester bring fun times, good grades and plenty of dinnertime pals.

Rebecca Paskievich is a UMass student.

The Collegian is looking for letters to the editor and Ed/Op columnists

Come down to the Collegian newsroom in the Campus Center basement to apply!

Drinking rules not effective

Bonnie Solomon

UMass Housing's new drinking policy can be taken in many different ways. Many students will glance over the article and not even pay the slightest bit of attention to it, some will not even know about it and others, like me, will read the whole article and try their best to understand it. Some of the new policies will be very beneficial to the UMass community, while others will be impossible to implement.

The first new rule, about alcohol in large gatherings, will probably be the easiest and only rule that will be able to be enforced by RAs and the UMass police. It is very obvious when a room is full to the brim with people by the noise level and students floating in the hallways. This is also one of the most beneficial ones, because the more people, the more noise; the more noise, the more they disrupt their neighbors. This way, the parties can be kept under control.

The next rule, about alcohol paraphernalia, will be very difficult to enforce. If a student is bringing a table up to their room, officials have no way to tell whether it is for beer pong or whether it is just to have a table in their room. However, 99 percent of the time the tables would be for beer pong.

> If a student is bringing a table up to their room, officials have no way to tell whether it is for beer pong or whether it is just to have a table in their room. However, 99 percent of the time the tables would be for beer pong.

The rest of the alcohol paraphernalia is almost impossible to detect. RAs and the police have no right to come into our rooms unless they have a search warrant or if the door is wide open. They will have a very difficult time discovering students with these items who will just give the enforcers extra trouble. I will not even discuss the drinking games rule, because this one is absolutely impossible for them to enforce.

The policy about having large volumes of alcohol is definitely a valid rule. If students have a smaller amount of alcohol at a party, they will not be able to have so many people. If they do end up having many people in the room, then each person will get a smaller quantity of alcohol, causing less of a risk of alcohol poisoning.

However, if students bring the alcohol into the building in their backpacks, it will be impossible to detect. However, off-campus residences, like the fraternities, will have a much smoother time getting alcohol in. Students can go to these if they cannot get alcohol into their dorms.

The rule about not having empty alcohol containers displayed in your room seems just plain silly, but it actually makes sense. While walking through the Southwest residential area, one can see empty liters of alcohol lined up on various windowsills. This is a common decoration, but it actually promotes alcohol use.

When seeing all these containers lined up a student might believe that they have to live up to another's party the previous night. Thus, this is a mild form of peer pressure. Also, it makes the owner of the room proud of their partying skills, something that should not be encouraged.

Again, it is going to be difficult to penalize students for this because enforcers cannot enter students' rooms without a warrant.

I can understand why Housing Services came up with these rules. They, and many students, feel that the drinking at UMass has gotten out of control. Students over 21 have a right to drink, but too many underage students are acquiring alcohol and this problem needs to be prevented. Also, students who party often are disrupting other students' experience at UMass. However, many students are going to completely disregard these new rules.

Housing services should instead put all students under the age of 20 into designated dorms, and students who are going to be 21 or who are 21 and older, should be in other dorms. This way, if an underage student comes into their dorm with alcohol, he or she can be penalized for it. The wellness dorms should be promoted more because many students do not want to live there because they feel it is "uncool" or they have boring reputations. Also, there should be more organized activities, besides sports, on campus on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights so students can have fun without drinking.

Bonnie Solomon is a Collegian columnist

Lombardi's housing blunder

Marisha Leiblum

Chancellor Lombardi's construction of apartment style dorms on the north side of our campus is a perfect example of just how screwed up our University's priorities are. While there is a clear need for more on-campus housing, the construction of these luxury residential suites has put our campus over $90 million in the hole. And just who is being asked to pay for our Chancellor's poor decision? We are, of course.

But perhaps a better question is: Why the hell did our Chancellor choose to construct dorms that will cost over $1,000 per person per month to pay off? It doesn't even cost $1,000 per month to rent a small house in the Valley. Isn't providing affordable student housing a requisite to providing an accessible education – which is mandated in the University's mission statement?

Doesn't, um, charging up to $1,000 per person per month for on-campus housing raise some significant class issues? Indeed, our Chancellor's motives for constructing these new dorms have everything to do with class and little to do with the University's mission. As the UMass housing website (http://www.umass.edu/budget/housingfees) states, "these new apartments address a competitive disadvantage the campus has faced in recruiting students who are interested in this type of living arrangement and can find it on the campuses of our peer institutions."

The decision to construct a $92 million housing project in order to increase UMass' appeal to students who are privileged enough to choose which college to attend based on whether or not their prospective school has two-bathroom, full-kitchen suites is a black mark on our Chancellor's record.

Indeed, it is not as if our campus has had a problem attracting enough applicants; Gargano's new "early admissions" program accepted a full two-thirds of the incoming freshman class for 2006-07 while we were still recovering from our New Year's Eve hangovers.

Rather, Lombardi and Gargano have crafted a vision of their dream University, and they will go to whatever lengths needed to pull in a creamier crop of students with every year. And guess what? If your family makes less than a hundred grand a year, if your SAT scores are below the 1,300 mark or if "beach parties" by the duck-s-covered lawn of the campus pond turn you off, you are not a part of their vision.

But then again, who gets to build the vision for our campus? Since when did infantilizing beach parties, flat-screen TVs and luxury suites become the high mark of the new UMass? Whatever happened to the notion of college as a site of dynamic relationships and a critical exchange of ideas? Whatever happened to the University's mission of providing "an accessible and quality education?" What happens to those who can't pay for the increased housing costs that will be caused by the construction of these dorms?

> How many of our families can afford to pay $1,000 a month for us to live on campus? How many of us want to graduate with a loan debt of up to $36,000 in housing costs alone?

Speaking again of money, in case you haven't visited the website, we have been graciously offered three payment options for the new dorms. According to the first option, regardless of whether we live in a new suite, a single or a double, we could pay $528 per room per month by 2008. Or, those of us living in singles and doubles could partially subsidize those living in the suites.

Under this equation, by 2008 singles would cost $596, doubles would cost $483 and suites would cost $908. Lastly, those students living in the new suites could cover the cost of the debt themselves, in which case they would pay a mere $1,022 each in rent per month. The administration is essentially asking us whether we want the knife, the gun or the rope.

How many of our families can afford to pay $1,000 a month for us to live on campus? How many of us want to graduate with a loan debt of up to $36,000 in housing costs alone? Or how many of us want to live at home with our parents or be forced to attend community college since on-campus housing simply costs too much?

Clearly, it is time to re-orient our University's priorities. It is time to bring it back to the basics: as a public university, UMass' mission is to provide an accessible and quality education to people from Massachusetts and beyond. Providing affordable housing is a part of that mission. The construction of these suites runs against the University's mission, and it is time to hold our Chancellor accountable.

While in the short term, perhaps we can't stop the construction of Gargano and Lombardi's new apartments, but we can demand that since the power-duo got us into this mess, it is their responsibility to get us out of it.

Perhaps Gargano, Lombardi and the Board of Trustees – who will approve the final payment plan at their meeting in February – can pay the $92 million in debt out of their pockets? Broken down into its $5 million a year payments, the Trustees alone have more than enough combined assets to cover the cost. Sure, it's a stop-gap solution, but something has got to give – and for once, let's make sure it's not us.

Marisha Leiblum is a Collegian columnist

Responding to illiteracy

Mike Sances

Recently, two respected and independent policy organizations released a study on literacy rates among American college graduates. An introduction to the report states bluntly:

"20 percent of U.S. college students completing four-year degrees – and 30 percent of students earning two-year degrees - have only basic quantitative literacy skills, meaning they are unable to estimate if their car has enough gasoline to get to the next gas station or calculate the total cost of ordering office supplies."

The survey's conclusions have sent shockwaves among the chattering classes. Writing in the Jan. 5 issue of the local weekly, the Valley Advocate, Alistair Highet quoted a federal education official who pointed out that "the assessment is not designed to test your understanding of Proust, but to test your ability to read labels." Highet expressed surprise at the literacy study, produced jointly by the Pew Charitable Trusts and the American Institutes for Research, condemning the nation's apparent "large population of self-obsessed illiterates."

The Christian Science Monitor concurred. "Reading this editorial is a test, of sorts," was the headline of a Monitor editorial dated Dec. 29. "If you have a college degree," the editors wrote, "there's no guarantee you can follow this editorial. That's because the number of graduates proficient in English fell from 40 percent in 1992 to 31 percent in 2003."

If the report's conclusions are to be believed, a question I'll return to in a moment, then reading this column is also a test, as is attending college generally. For when we factor in the percentage of Americans who actually go to college, the applicable number is reduced by half.

The results of any study of college graduates can be reduced by half again when we consider that only 54 percent of college students graduate within six years. Many simply never graduate at all; according to an Associated Press article from Nov. 15, "federal figures report 57 percent of white students finish their degree, compared with 44 percent of Hispanics and 39 percent of blacks."

Are we feeling privileged yet? Because that should certainly be one conclusion that follows if we accept these statistics as true — a sense of one's own status among a shrinking elite.

Another possible reaction would be disgust and resignation of the sort that characterizes Highet's piece, which begins by observing that "There are certain things that we just can't do anything about" and ends with an exasperated "Oh, well."

> "20 percent of U.S. college students completing four-year degrees – and 30 percent of students earning two-year degrees – have only basic quantitative literacy skills, meaning they are unable to estimate if their car has enough gasoline to get to the next gas station or calculate the total cost of ordering office supplies."

On the other hand, of course, is Benjamin Disraeli, who in the 1800s famously said, "There are three kinds of lies: lies, damned lies and statistics."

But I'm not about to launch a one-man crusade against the study's methodology, or its conclusions. Besides, what really matters is that they have by now been widely disseminated among and accepted by the privileged, whose reactions will in time translate into policy; for all practical purposes, they are true enough. Moreover, the decline of literacy in the United States is probably all too real. It certainly would explain a lot, and there certainly is a lot to explain it.

One explanation is the condescending attitude that many educated Americans, especially but not exclusively liberal Democrats, hold toward the majority of the population. By starting from an assumption that most of their fellow citizens are naturally stupid, they delude themselves into thinking that things like fast food, reality television and war are actually the result of popular demand.

After the 2004 election, for example, many self-identifying progressive Democrats concluded that their party's failure to win working-class votes lay not with their policies, but with how they communicate those policies to the ignorant masses. Since Democrats so obviously represent the best interests of the poor, this argument goes, then the poor aren't voting in their self-interest; instead, they must be voting on the basis of things like moral values and "identity."

They fool themselves into thinking that vacuous political campaigns, not informative ones, are what people really want; then, once the idiocy of the campaign concludes, they are "shocked, shocked" to discover that, for instance, a majority of Bush voters couldn't identify his policy positions.

And so it is with the "shock" we might feel toward the revelation that so few of us can adequately read a prescription label, let alone a newspaper.

Fortunately, the state of literacy in America, like other pressing national issues, is something we certainly can do something about. First, as always, is to shed this self-serving pretense of powerlessness — because it is self-serving, after all.

If you've gotten this far, and plan on graduating, you've already overcome several statistical hurdles — you're one of that 20 percent of 50 percent of 50 percent. You now have a decision to make. Will you laugh at the masses of "self-obsessed illiterates" and feel good about yourself? Or will you try to do something to change this?

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist

School and The Golden Rule

Sanam Hakim

Jane and Tom are both single college students at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst. Jane and Tom both like to go to the bars, get drunk and have sex with random people. At the end of the day, however, Jane will most probably be considered an "easy lay," while Tom will be considered a powerful and glorious sexual magnet.

Some argue that this discrepancy is a result of sexism, and perhaps to a certain extent it is. I, however, think that the root of this problem is much deeper than merely sexism. Jane and Tom are both wrong, and sexism is only the tip of the iceberg. Instead of women demanding higher standards for men, they are demanding the same respect for lower standards. It is a corruption in the roots of our society that is being more and more accepted and entirely unaddressed: a fear of words like "morality" and "decency."

When the Europeans first came to this country, they came with moral standards and religion. With Jesus Christ as their inspiration, the colonists elected government officials to uphold these moral standards, built homes and, in time, the United States of America flourished. Government officials and war heroes came together and eventually created a Constitution — the foundation of the laws of this country, which were essentially inspired by the Bible. In fact, George Mason, the "father" of the Bill of Rights, insisted that the Ten Commandments be included, with the argument that, "The laws of nature are the laws of God; whose authority can be superseded by no power on earth."

> When children, religious or not, are detached from basic human virtues in the schooling system, they either forget what they learned at home, or learn to despise the term "morality" because of the restrictions it implies.

However, American history has proved time and time again that the combination of church and state was flawed, at the hand of man, from the very beginning. An entire nation of people were brutally slaughtered and reduced to a handful of reservation camps in hopes of escaping the religious persecution in Europe. "Thou shalt not kill" was simply overlooked and the focus turned to words like "savages" and red skin color. The same thing happened during the times of slavery and the Salem witch trials, for example. Human misinterpretation of the Bible was used as law and thousands of innocent people were killed and oppressed because of skin color or "satanic symptoms."

Aside from government, the entire education system was also based more on a moral education rather than writing skills and mathematics. Children were taught virtues like kindness, honesty, respect and the Golden Rule, and they were punished if they misbehaved. Punishment was one of the things that led to the fall of moral education in the public classroom. Parents disagreed over whether their children should be slapped or spoken to harshly for being "immoral" – a term that increasingly meant different things to different people.

Perhaps more importantly, parents did not want their children learning anything in school that contradicted the family morals enforced at home, especially since the classrooms became continuously more diverse with different sects of Christianity and even other religions. Accordingly, moral education was entirely pulled from the public schooling system.

Our nation chose to separate religion and state, perhaps for the right reasons. In time, however, this split has turned into an unnecessary fear and caused underlying damage that is becoming more and more prevalent in our society. For some reason, as religion continuously slips away from this country, so does the basic decency that lays the foundation for all human relationships. When children, religious or not, are detached from basic human virtues in the schooling system, they either forget what they learned at home, or learn to despise the term "morality" because of the restrictions it implies.

Take college, for example. College, for a lot of people, is the first time students are living on their own, making their own decisions. It is the first time that many people don't have the watchful eye of their parents and the first time that many students can decide, entirely on their own, what happens next. In college, basic morality and decency become completely redefined for a lot of people.

Honesty, lying, but covering it up really well so that your friends don't find out and continue thinking you're honest. Kindness: lending someone your stuff, and then complaining that he/she always steals your stuff. Respect for others: talking trash about a friend when he/she is not around, but smiling and nodding when he/she is standing in front of you. The Golden Rule other people should treat you the way you want to be treated, but they should understand that your number one priority is yourself.

I don't know what defines "moral" and "immoral," and I don't even know if a country as diverse as ours could ever agree on a set of moral standards to abide by. All I know is that although this country is throwing away religion, it's throwing away basic virtues as well.

People have the word "freedom" blocking out any desire to change or adjust their personal lifestyles, when at the end of the day, it is these basic virtues that build the foundation of solid human relationships. I think children should be taught virtues in school, like kindness, not hurting others, mutual respect, even self-respect, through the process of community building. Perhaps you call these "morals" – but me? I call it being human.

Sanam Hakim is a Collegian columnist

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

CUT IT OUT BUT DON'T CUT IT OFF

Infant circumcision (male foreskin amputation) is declining nationwide. No national medical group worldwide recommends this harmful surgery. Nevertheless, few parents and physicians understand the protective, sensory and sexual functions of the foreskin, or the resulting losses from circumcision. The 85 percent of males worldwide who are left intact are the fortunate ones.

The foreskin covers and protects the glans penis, keeping its surface moist. Glands in the foreskin produce antibacterial and antiviral proteins, and the foreskin's mucosal lining secretes immunoglobulins that defend against infection. After foreskin removal, the glans becomes thickened, dry and less sensitive. Later in life, erectile dysfunction may result.

Male circumcision results in the loss of 10,000 to 20,000 exogenous nerve endings, including receptors called Meissner's corpuscles, the nerve-dense frenulum, the frenar band of soft ridges, the dartos fascia, over 50 percent of the mobile penile skin, the sliding and gliding mechanism that allows for nonabrasive, lubricating, normal sexual intercourse for both the male and female, and much more. (See Cold and Taylor, "British Journal of Urology," January 1999 and Lostlist at www.cirp.org).

Fortunately for children, more parents today are saying no to circumcision and respecting the bodily integrity rights of their sons.

Petrina Fadel

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2006 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

MEDIOCRE ACTING, POINTLESS PLOT TAINT 'ANNAPOLIS'

By Faith Korpi
The Lariat (Baylor U.)

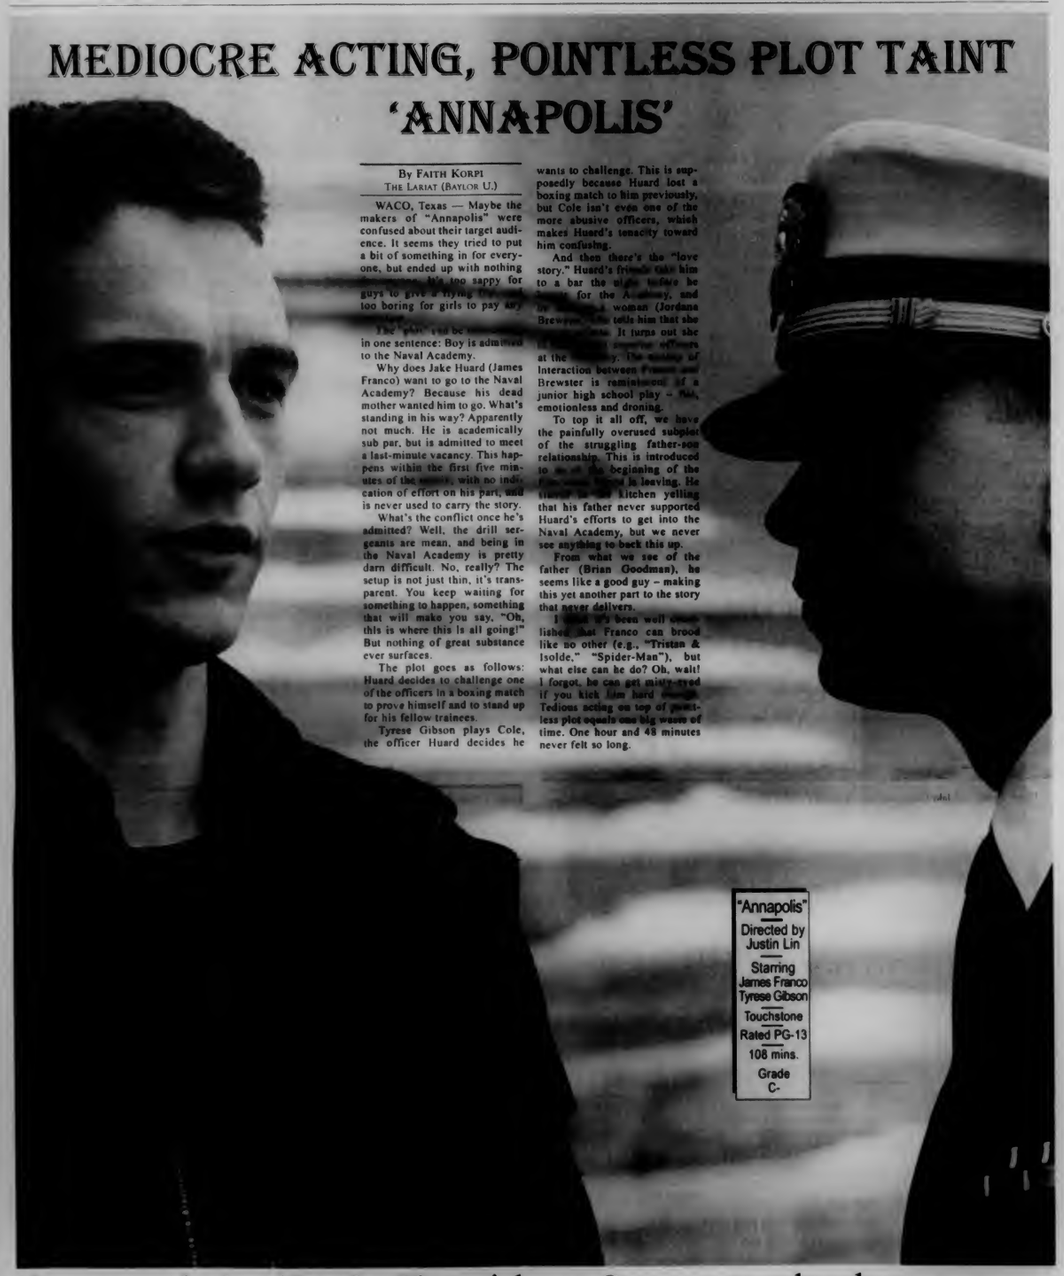
WACO, Texas — Maybe the makers of "Annapolis" were confused about their target audience. It seems they tried to put a bit of something in for everyone, but ended up with nothing [illegible] too sappy for guys to give a rating [illegible] too boring for girls to pay any [illegible]

The plot can be in one sentence: Boy is admitted to the Naval Academy.

Why does Jake Huard (James Franco) want to go to the Naval Academy? Because his dead mother wanted him to go. What's standing in his way? Apparently not much. He is academically sub par, but is admitted to meet a last-minute vacancy. This happens within the first five minutes of the movie, with no indication of effort on his part, and is never used to carry the story.

What's the conflict once he's admitted? Well, the drill sergeants are mean, and being in the Naval Academy is pretty darn difficult. No, really? The setup is not just thin, it's transparent. You keep waiting for something to happen, something that will make you say, "Oh, this is where this is all going!" But nothing of great substance ever surfaces.

The plot goes as follows: Huard decides to challenge one of the officers in a boxing match to prove himself and to stand up for his fellow trainees.



Tyrese Gibson plays Cole, the officer Huard decides he wants to challenge. This is supposedly because Huard lost a boxing match to him previously, but Cole isn't even one of the more abusive officers, which makes Huard's tenacity toward him confusing.

And then there's the "love story." Huard's friends take him to a bar the night before he [illegible] for the Academy, and [illegible] a woman (Jordana Brewster) [illegible] tells him that she [illegible]. It turns out she [illegible] at the [illegible]. The [illegible] of interaction between Franco and Brewster is reminiscent of a junior high school play – flat, emotionless and droning.

To top it all off, we have the painfully overused subplot of the struggling father-son relationship. This is introduced to us at the beginning of the [illegible] is leaving. He [illegible] in the kitchen yelling that his father never supported Huard's efforts to get into the Naval Academy, but we never see anything to back this up.

From what we see of the father (Brian Goodman), he seems like a good guy – making this yet another part to the story that never delivers.

I [illegible] Franco can brood like no other (e.g., "Tristan & Isolde," "Spider-Man"), but what else can he do? Oh, wait! I forgot, he can get [illegible] if you kick him hard [illegible]. Tedious acting on top of pointless plot equals one big waste of time. One hour and 48 minutes never felt so long.

Oscars ask for 'Daily Show' host Stewart to lead ceremony

By Richard Huff
New York Daily News

Tinseltown insiders will be buzzing about who was, or was not, nominated for an Academy Award.

Me, I'll still wondering why Jon Stewart was selected to host the Oscarcast March 5 on ABC in the first place.

Try as I might — and trust me, I've tried – I just don't get Stewart. I don't think he's all that funny and he's vastly overrated.

I realize he's gotten loads of critical acclaim. And I understand my lack of appreciation for Stewart & Co. is sacrilege in TV circles.

That's because many of my colleagues fawn over Stewart. A year ago, the Television Critics Association awarded his Comedy Central faux-news program, "The Daily Show," the best newscast.

Yet watching "The Daily Show" for me is like being on the outside of an inside joke. The audience cheers wildly and laughs like hyenas at every Stewart line.

It's during these moments, when I'm missing Stewart's appeal, that I realize I'm not alone. A lot of people are feeling the same way.

Take a look at the Nielsen figures for the show, and the numbers are startling. This supposedly terrific program, with its high hipness factor – people actually say they get their only news from "The Daily Show" — is averaging 1.3 million viewers in January, most of them men between the ages of 18 and 49. During November, the political high season in which Stewart and his cohorts supposedly thrive, the show averaged 1.45 million viewers.

For comparison, Nielsen estimates there are 218 million people over the age of 18 in the nation's 112 million homes with televisions.

That's a lot of people not getting Stewart's comedy.

Now, before the legions of Stewartites start bellyaching that the show airs on Comedy Central, so the numbers are going to be smaller, stop. Comedy Central is in 88 million homes, so it's well-distributed.

What's more, Stewart gets amazing press for his work – a level far outstripping his reach – so even if people aren't watching, they've heard about him.

But that's the point.

Stewart's appeal – at least from what's on Comedy Central – is limited at best. He's playing to a small crowd, just like many of the other critically acclaimed phenoms dotting the pop-culture landscape.

There's the rub.

Stewart is being given the reins of the biggest entertainment program in history – the Academy Awards. An estimated 42.1 million people watched the show last year. It's a show that's often referred to as the Super Bowl for women, a group that watches Stewart in far lower numbers than men do.

"One of the benefits of having a person who is a standup comic," said longtime Oscar producer Gil Cates told the New York Daily News when the deal was announced, "is they can deal with the unexpected, with the surprising.

"When you think of the Oscars, most of the things you remember were not prepared by the producer."

It would help, though, if they started with someone funny, who maybe spoke to the masses than to a small group of people pretending to be in on the joke.

Comedian and fake journalist Jon Stewart, host of Comedy Central's hit "The Daily Show," has been asked to host the 2006 Academy Awards due to his popular appeal.

'Brokeback Mountain' fans spark interest in Wyoming

By Jennifer Byrd
Associated Press

CHEYENNE, Wyo. — Fans of "Brokeback Mountain" don't seem to care the movie was actually filmed in Canada.

They want the Wyoming experience.

The Wyoming Business Council's travel and tourism department has received hundreds of calls asking about scenery in the movie, which is based on Pulitzer Prize-winner Annie Proulx's short story about two gay Wyoming cowboys.

"When we tell them it was shot in Canada, they're still interested in Wyoming," said Michell Howard, manager of the council's film, arts and entertainment office. "They don't hang up and call Alberta. They're intrigued in the story."

Wyoming Business Council spokesman Chuck Coon said he hasn't seen a movie generate this much interest in the state during his 15 years with the travel and tourism department.

"In terms of phone calls and Internet requests, it's usually slow this time of the year," he said. "This movie has changed that."

Tourism officials have long known that a good movie can attract tourists. Store owners in Livingston, Mont., say customers still come to see the area where "A River Runs Through It" was filmed, said Sten Iverson of the Montana Film Office; New Zealand is banking on "Lord of the Rings" tours; "Sideways" didn't just create a demand for wine tours around Santa Barbara, Calif., it boosted sales of certain wines.

Wyoming has had a hard time tapping into that market, though, because so few big-budget movies are filmed here.

Occasionally people who see reruns of "Close Encounters of the Third Kind" — a 1977 movie shot near Devil's Tower – call with questions about the state, Coon said.

"But there's surprisingly much more interest in Brokeback," he said. "The subject matter has something to do with it, but most of the calls we get are asking about scenery."

Coon said Ang Lee, the director of "Brokeback Mountain," toured much of the eastern Big Horn Mountains and several nearby towns when scouting locations for the film. But because of budget concerns, Lee shot the film in Canada.

Financial incentives have drawn many film companies to Canada, which has built a $5 billion film industry in the process. Because of the high amount of production there already, companies can hire local crews instead of bringing them from elsewhere, cheapening the overall price of the project.

Wyoming, on the other hand, doesn't have enough skilled workers for most large film crews, Howard said; if a major project was shot here, crews would have to be brought in from outside.

Three movies in the last three years — "An Unfinished Life" starring Redford and Jennifer Lopez in 2003, "Brokeback Mountain" in 2004 and "Flicka" in 2005 — had stories set in Wyoming but were not primarily filmed in the state.

"Flicka," a remake of the 1950's television series "My Friend Flicka," scheduled to come out next year, was primarily shot in California. There were, however, a couple of weeks of location shooting near Sheridan, Howard said.

Wyoming business and travel leaders are trying to find ways to lure movie production companies to film in the state, including a proposal to rebate up to 15 percent of purchases made in the state by film companies that spend at least $500,000 on production there.

The bill has good support in the legislature, Howard said, "but we'll just have to see what they want to do."

If it passes, Howard also wants to create a jobs program to train more Wyoming residents to work on film crews.

"It's kind of like the chicken and the egg, though," she said. "You don't want to train people until you know there will be work for them."

Heath Ledger and Jake Gyllenhaal star in Anne Proulx's love story "Brokeback Mountain," which is now nominated for eight Academy Awards.

VH1 'Finally' Selling Out?

By Amy Lichty
Oregon Daily Emerald (U. Oregon)

EUGENE, Ore. — As I sit on my couch desperately searching for anything remotely interesting to watch on television, I begin to feel old. At 22, there's no legitimate reason for me to feel that way, but my cable television seems to tell me otherwise.

Nick at Nite is one of the causes of my ancient ambiance. I recall being around eight and excitedly tuning into reruns of "The Dick Van Dyke Show." (Rob Petrie was so adorably silly in my young mind.) That was when Nick at Nite played primarily black-and-white shows that my mother remembered watching as a child.

Now, at a young 22, shows that I recollect seeing new are being played into the wee hours of the morning. Remember way back in 1993 when "The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air" replaced the original hard-core matriarch Vivian Banks (played by Janet Hubert-Whitten) with the sweeter, softer Vivian number two (Daphne Maxwell Reid)? I think I lost a couple of nights sleep wondering what happened to Vivian number one (rumor is she and Will Smith didn't get along). And recently, Nick at Nite began showing "Full House." What?! It seems like yesterday when I spent my Friday nights waiting for TGIF to come on so I could see the crazy things those Tanner girls got themselves into that week. And now, as the real Michelle Tanner, Mary-Kate and Ashley Olsen, get into crazy situations every Friday in my Us Weekly, that feeling creeps up on me again. I'm so old.

But the channel that most ruins my evenings, forcing me to put wrinkle cream on the face that lost its baby fat only three years ago, has to be VH1. I think I'm crazy, because I actually remember when VH1 was "all about the music." Now, with shows like "Best Week Ever," "My Fair Brady" and "The Fabulous Life Of... (fill in the blank)," VH1 has become the new breeder of celebrity culture. Step aside, E! Make room for the new – but definitely not improved – VH1.

VH1's "Celebreality" concept, which brings D-list stars like Hulk Hogan, Bronson Pinchot (come on, Balki from "Perfect Strangers"!) and Wendy Kaufman, aka "The Snapple Lady," back from the horrible, depressing world of us "commoners," is the most disgusting filth that's on TV today, even with "Cops" still pushing out new episodes. I hardly care about certain celebrities that are famous today (Paris Hilton, I'm staring at you), let alone "celebrities" that were famous before I was even born (Danny Bonaduce: Please, please, give it up already. It's over. O-V-E-R).

After MTV jumped the ship and began busting out craptastic shows having nothing to do with music, I could still sleep at night knowing that VH1 was still concentrating on what had made them good in the first place. Sure, I was a bit nervous when they started up with "Behind the Music" because it was running dangerously close to the "E! True Hollywood Story," but still, VH1 proved itself by dealing with only musicians and not actors. Now, VH1 has stepped over that line, pushing real musicians to the back burner and bringing in "real pop culture. Real fast," with their "Best Week Ever." Who wants to watch unfunny people try to be funny while recapping the stupid, trivial stories that happened that week? I don't know anyone with an IQ higher than 40 who does.

OK, so VH1 does play music videos. At 3 a.m., when other stations are airing the infomercials that "do not reflect the views of this station," VH1 finally gets back to its roots. Way to go. So they do keep videos on the line-up for the next eight hours, but at 11 a.m. sharp, VH1 is back to playing crap.

How I long for the good old days of 1998, when Nick at Nite played "Bewitched" and "I Love Lucy," or when VH1 didn't suck. I'm just waiting for the day that the oldies radio station starts playing Weezer. I'll probably be 26.

The Daily Collegian

Keeping it Real Since 1890

www.DailyCollegian.com

Hollywood sends a message

By George M. Thomas
Knight Ridder Newspapers

After hearing the list of Oscar nominees Tuesday morning, you might have thought Hollywood was trying to send a message with its best-picture choices.

It's not a stretch, given the increased criticism for liberal politics that movies and the entertainment industry in general have taken since the beginning of the millennium, some of it unwarranted, some of it completely justified.

Look at the best-picture category and you see "Brokeback Mountain," a movie about two cowboys who carry on a decades-long love affair; "Crash," a searing examination of racism in this country; "Good Night, and Good Luck," which chastises the government and media using the battle between legendary CBS journalist Edward R. Murrow and Sen. Joseph McCarthy; and "Munich," which filters the Israeli-Palestinian conundrum through the events after the Munich Olympics in 1972. Even the other nominee, "Capote," could tweak a few noses because its title character, celebrity author Truman Capote, was gay.

Of course, "Brokeback" did well in the preliminaries, winning awards from the Screen Actors Guild, Producers Guild of America and Directors Guild of America, all of which make up a significant membership in the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, the group that doles out Oscars.

At the risk of offending a segment of the population, I'll say it may be worthy of its nomination, but there are a few films I deemed better in 2005. Lushly filmed by Ang Lee, superbly acted by Heath Ledger and Jake Gyllenhaal, and languid at times, "Brokeback Mountain" would be a classic love story were it not for the fact that it involves two cowboys, the cultural ideal of macho.

But given the recent debates about gay marriage and the willingness of citizens of some states to convey second-class status on homosexuals, it's the right movie at the right time because it dispels stereotypes of gays and lesbians as promiscuous child molesters. It opens dialogue and gives viewers the opportunity to think.

The same is true for "Good Night, and Good Luck," a movie directed by Hollywood's uber-liberal George Clooney. The story of Murrow's pursuit of McCarthy is one of power run amok, but it also examines what should happen in a democracy when the system is working reasonably well. In some ways it was nostalgic, because in that film we got a little hint of the partisan politics that pervade the system and polarize the electorate today. As shown by Clooney, the good of the country was indeed on the minds of those elected to serve.

"Good Night" also reminded those of us who work in the media what our role should be – that of watchdog. We need to ask those in power tough questions, get them answered truthfully and hold responsible those who evade or lie.

"Munich" poses a question that Middle East watchers don't seem capable of answering: Will there ever be peace between Israel and the Palestinians when each side believes bloodshed is the answer to bloodshed? Since "Cinderella Man" (the best film of the year in my opinion) received no recognition in this category, "Munich" would be my choice to win. Director Steven Spielberg examines the underlying causes of Sept. 11, explores the issues and shows there is no easy solution.

Much the same can be said of director Paul Haggis. "Crash," arguably the most personal and intimate film of the lot. It's heart-breaking without being melodramatic, and given that racism and bigotry still divide this country in some respects – just look at perceptions after Hurricane Katrina – its exploration of the issue remains compelling and relevant.

They say the arts reflect the attitude and state of the culture. When the Red Scare was prominent in the 1950s and early '60s, Hollywood launched a steady stream of alien invasion movies. In the late '60s and beyond, the perceived innocence of the prior 15 years was stripped away in favor of gritty realism, depicted in movies such as "Bonnie and Clyde" and "Midnight Cowboy."

What do these nominations say about America today? That despite being the leader of the world, we are sorely in need of leadership, mutual understanding and guidance.

Matt Dillon stars along with Don Cheadle in "Crash," which focuses on American racial tolerance.

Save $$ on Textbooks at the Jeffery Amherst College Store

All These Courses and More at Discounted Prices:

Astronomy	101-2	The Solar System
Astronomy	114	Stars & Galaxies
Biology	101	Introductory to Biology
Biology	102	Intro to Animal Biology
Biology	285	Cell & Molecular Biology
Chemistry	101	General Chemistry
Chemistry	110	General Chemistry
Chemistry	262	Organic Chemistry-non majors
Chemistry	111	General Chemistry I
Chemistry	112	General Chemistry II
Chemistry	261	Organic Chemistry
CMP Science	105	Computer Literacy
ECE	232	Hardware Organization & Design
Economics	104 A-F	Intro to Macroeconomics
Economics	709	Political Economy II
Exer Science	100	Intro to Exercise Science
FOMGT	304	Information for Tech Finance
FOMGT	320	Investments
Geo Sciences	102	The Human Landscape
Geo Sciences	103	Intro Oceanography
HRTA	240	Hotel Operations
Italian	120	Elementary Italian II
Math	113	Math-Elem Teachers I
Math	121	Linear Methods & Probability
MICBIO	310	General Microbiology
Nutrition	130	Nutrition for a healthy lifestyle
Physics	100	Conceptual Physics
Physics	120	Big Bang to Black Hole
Physics	132	Intro to Physics II
POLISCI	111	Comparative Politics
POLISCI	121-B	World Politics
Psychology	305	Educational Psychology
Psychology	320	Learn & Think
Psychology	380	Abnormal Psychology
Psychology	100 sec 1-3	Intro to Psychology
Psychology	335	Behavioral Neuroendocrinology
Spanish	110	Spanish
Spanish	120	Spanish
Spanish	240	Intermediate Spanish II
Spanish	246	Intensive Intermediate Spanish
Statistics	111	Elementary Statistics
W&FCONSV	261	Wildlife Conservation

Jeffery Amherst College Store
26 South Prospect Street, Amherst 253-3870
(behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in downtown Am-

University of Massachusetts Amherst

Student Affairs & Campus Life

2006 Important Changes

Jo-Anne Vanin, Associate Vice-Chancellor and Dean of Students, announces important changes to the University of Massachusetts Amherst residence hall alcohol policies (Section II.D, Code of Student Conduct). These changes, recommended by the Student Affairs Judicial Issues Committee (SAJIC) which is comprised of students, staff, and faculty, were subsequently approved by campus officials and are intended to positively influence the living-learning environment in the residence halls. The following changes are effective for the Spring 2006 semester.

Alcohol – Large gatherings

Due to the potential for noise violations and illegal alcohol consumption, large gatherings are prohibited in the residence halls. A group of more than 10 people in a residence room in which alcohol is present (regardless of room size) will be considered a large gathering. Progressive large gatherings (i.e. round robins) and/or any gatherings that spill out into a common space are prohibited and may be viewed as a violation of the alcohol policy.

Alcohol – Alcohol paraphernalia

The possession and/or use of drinking paraphernalia or products that promote the abuse of alcohol and/or put the user in a position to consume alcohol irresponsibly is prohibited. This includes but is not limited to funnels, taps, and beirut/beer pong tables.

Alcohol – Drinking games

Creating, offering, and/or engaging in drinking games or other behaviors designed for the purpose of rapid and/or excessive consumption is prohibited. At no time should activities which encourage excessive drinking and/or lead to the endangerment of the individual served take place in the residence halls.

Alcohol – Large volume

The amount of alcohol which a student may possess and/or store is limited to twelve (12 oz) bottles/cans of beer, two (750 mL) bottles of wine, or one bottle of hard liquor (1L). This applies to each resident in a room who is 21 or older. Other quantity-dispensing containers, including but not limited to kegs and beer balls, are prohibited in all areas of the residence halls.

Alcohol –Empty containers

Possession of empty alcohol containers (i.e liquor bottles, wine bottles, and/or beer cans) is prohibited in residence halls by students who are under 21 and may be viewed as evidence of possession and/or consumption of alcohol. In addition, students are not allowed to use alcohol containers, whether full or empty, as decorations within their residence hall room.

Intoxication and Good Samaritan Protocol

Intoxication, defined as being under the influence of alcohol or any other psychoactive drug to any extent which requires the attention of University staff or which causes a disturbance or is a danger to persons or property is prohibited. You may be reluctant to seek medical help for an individual experiencing severe intoxication or a serious injury after consuming alcohol. However, it is imperative that you call for medical assistance since these emergencies are potentially life threatening. UMass Amherst has developed the Good Samaritan Protocol to ensure that the health and safety of all community members remains our first priority.

Kool & the Gang still keeps the funk 'n' soul flame alive

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

After all these years, says the man called Kool, it still happens.

It goes a little something like this: "People run into us," Robert "Kool" Bell says, "see that we're musicians, and they'll say, 'Who you with?' We say, 'Kool & the Gang.'"

And as strange as it seems that a band with more than a dozen Top 40 singles in a 40-year career would be forgotten, Kool says the moniker often brings only blank stares.

"So we add, 'You know that song 'Celebration'?'"

Then it all comes rushing back.

"That song is bigger than our name," he notes of the internationally renowned feel-good anthem from 1980 that became Kool & the Gang's only chart-topper.

That's not the only case of botched pop history that the band regularly encounters, however.

"We did a show in Atlantic City," Kool recalls, "and this kid – he couldn't have been more than 9 years old – comes up and says, 'Hey, I really like that new record you did.'"

This was in '94, not long after Quentin Tarantino's "Pulp Fiction" had reacquainted audiences with "Jungle Boogie," the Gang's first big record – more than 20 years earlier.

"I just started laughing," Kool says, "and told him, 'That record came out way before you born, young man.'"

In fact, if the woo-hoo-ing party fun of "Celebration" is recalled before the name Kool & the Gang, then the group's slew of sleeker '80s hits tends to overshadow everything the outfit did prior to that.

There is, after all, more than one Kool & the Gang.

There's the original Kool & the Gang, formed in '64 in Jersey City by bassist Bell and his horn-blowing brother Ronald, along with drummer "Funky" George Brown, Charles Smith and Woody Sparrow on guitar, Ricky West on keys and Dennis Thomas and Spike Mickens on brass and reeds. (Many of these players remain in the band four decades later.)

Pioneers of funk who were inspired by James Brown and Sly & the Family Stone and who could hold their own in a face-off with the Ohio Players, the Commodores and Earth, Wind & Fire, the Gang soon dented the eclectic '70s pop charts with jams like "Jungle Boogie," "Hollywood Swinging" and "Funky Stuff."

But then came disco. Funk was quickly sanitized, and though K&theG's "Open Sesame" was one of few non-Bee Gees tunes to play a major role on the "Saturday Night Fever" soundtrack – earning the band a Grammy win that Kool had forgotten he shared in – it still was a death knell for the fat-bottomed grooves on which the group built its reputation.

("But we've always had success with John Travolta movies," Kool points out, noting that even the inclusion of "Hollywood Swinging" in last year's poorly received "Be Cool" revived interest in the band's back catalog.)

Falling out of favor, though, is exactly what led to the creation of "Celebration" – and the birth of a new Gang.

After "Hollywood Swinging" cracked the Top 10 in '74, the band went into a five-year drought before "Ladies Night" got it back on radio in late '79, scoring the first of six American Music Awards soon after.

"People had written us off," Kool remembers. "That was a time of reinvention for us" – starting with the addition of vocalist James "JT" Taylor, whose smooth style defined the band's decade of smashes: "Fresh," "Cherish," "Joanna," "Too Hot," "Get Down on It."

"But we didn't really know what we had with 'Celebration,'" Kool continued. "Ronald brought in the chorus and the hook, and we just fleshed it out as a personal celebration for us, after what we had come through. We had no idea it would become anything like what it's become."

It remains a staple of weddings, bar mitzvahs and sporting events the world over.

"It's the type of song we haven't even tried to go back and duplicate. It stands by itself. It's one of those records that's just a blessing."

And it led to a very prolific and profitable '80s for Kool & the Gang. But in the two decades since its last Top 10 single and the departure of JT, demand for the outfit has dramatically declined once again. Its last album, a '96 reunion with JT called "State of Affairs," fizzled – and the singer split once more.

Yet in some ways, Kool says, things have never been better for the band.

Groove and romance sweep all the stage as Kool & the Gang perform for a crowd of eager listeners.

"When we were rolling in the '80s, we weren't doing 100 shows a year like we are now. We're getting more work these days without a big record."

What keeps the band busy? Corporate functions, which Kool says accounts for 50 percent of its gigs. Another significant factor: the rash of casinos opening up nationwide.

Gambling parlors and office parties – two places that are perfect for "Celebration."

But despite a seemingly uphill battle against the current dominance of hip-hop – "the funk of the day," Kool calls the sound that his band has contributed to through countless samples – the Gang isn't interested in remaining strictly a nostalgia act.

It is readying a new album, "Kool & the Gang Is Still Kool," for a spring release on its own label, Keep the Funk Alive. And the group is in talks with several Las Vegas bigwigs about building a "Mamma Mia"-style musical around its hits, tentatively titled "Ladies Night."

"We're kinda hoping we can get in there before that window closes," Kool says.

He realizes, of course, that anything new from Kool & the Gang will have to fight to be heard.

"Radio, you know, will play everything we've done in the past, but if you try something new, it gets difficult. We have to break our way through again, whether on the Internet or at Starbucks or whatever other avenue we can use.

"But Charlie Wilson (of the Gap Band) and Earth, Wind & Fire – they're back. ... Now that we've been around and seen just about anything that can go down in this business – and we're still out there – well, we're wiser. We're better off."

Resignation called for long running TV series 'West Wing'

By Oliver Bunic
Cornell Daily Sun (U. Wire)

ITHACA, N.Y. – Last week NBC announced the cancellation of their long-running political drama The West Wing." The show's seven-year run will end in May when Jed Bartlet's presidency will end with an hour retrospective show preceding the series finale. Although the show's recent emphasis on the Presidential election campaign between Texas Congressman Matt Santos (Jimmy Smits '82) (D) and California Senator Arnold Vinick (R) injected some creative energy into the series, falling Nielson ratings with the shift to Sunday nights made the cancellation inevitable.

Yet, the death of the "The West Wing" should not be lamented; rather it should be welcomed with open arms. All true fans know the series has not been the same since series creator Aaron Sorkin left after the fourth season, along with executive producer Thomas Schlamme and top-billed Rob Lowe. Under executive producer John Wells' helm, the series shifted emphasis from a character-driven drama featuring sharp dialogue and esoteric cultural references to a plot-driven melodrama. Although the post-Sorkin era episodes could be entertaining they were not nearly as memorable, nor nearly as funny. What many people often forget is that "The West Wing" could be one of the funniest shows on TV.

For many reasons it makes sense for "The West Wing" to end after completing its seventh season. Most of the characters working for the Bartlet administration will be out of jobs in either a Santos or Vinick victory. With the death of the great John Spencer and his character, VP nominee Leo McGarry, to be killed off within the show, only Josh Lyman and Donna Moss would have a place under a Santos Presidency. Flash forwards from the seventh season premiere have already indicated Will Bailey will be a U.S. Representative, Charlie Young will work in Congress, and C.J. Craig married to journalist Danny Concannon will be out of politics. Toby Ziegler of course for his space plane leak could never work in politics again. For the show to make an attempt at "The West Wing: The Next Generation" would be a travesty.

Nevertheless, when the show ends in May, "The West Wing" should be remembered as one of television's great shows, at least for the first four seasons. Aaron Sorkin, the playwright behind "A Few Good Men" and movie scribe for "The American President" took his skills to the small screen with ABC's short-lived but equally memorable "Sports Night" and "The West Wing," which premiered back in 1999 on NBC. Crafting a riveting drama about the men and women in Washington D.C. charged with shaping our lives could have been disastrous in the wrong hands. However, with excellent cast chemistry and wonderful prose, Sorkin was able to make news cycles, tracking polls and political jockeying compelling television. It's a testament to his skill that out of the first 88 episodes under his helm, many are excellent and most very good. Only two stinkers reside in the bunch. The post 9/11 response piece entitled "Isaac and Ishmael" and the C.J.-can't-go-home-again episode "The Long Goodbye," featuring a misplaced guest-starring stint from Matthew Modine.

Some may slap the show with that now over-used "Jump the Shark" brand, but that would be unfair. At one moment comes to mind that turned the show to the worse but rather it's been in a long decline. For it to run on inertia for years on end "ER"-style would be more disappointing.

As for Aaron Sorkin. He's finally returning to television in the fall with a new series for NBC entitled "Studio " on the Sunset Strip" set behind the scenes at a show not unlike "Saturday Night Live." Sorkin's return to TV has been a long time coming but as Jed Bartlet might say, Break's over.

Sony criticized for new Philly graffiti ad campaign

By Ben Marrone
Daily Pennsylvanian (U. Penn)

PHILADELPHIA – With a strange mix of art, crime and money, a Sony ad campaign has managed to spark outrage in Philadelphia. The ads – graffiti-esque cartoons of bug-eyed children playing with Playstation Portables, Sony's new game system – have been spray-painted on walls throughout the city. Without the Sony logo or name appearing anywhere, they are almost indistinguishable from regular graffiti.

Mary Tracy, who heads Society Created to Reduce Urban Blight, which aims in part to combat excessive outdoor advertising, was especially upset to find that Sony was behind the cartoons.

"It's extremely egregious for them to come into Philadelphia and ignore our laws," Tracy said. "They're putting these up in poorer neighborhoods and what it says is, 'They don't know better.'"

Sony spokesman Woody Mosqueda said that Sony felt this campaign was the "best fit for the urban nomad," city-dwellers constantly on the move who constitute Sony's target group. He also defended the legality of the ads, saying that property owners were paid for the use of their walls.

However, since 1991 Philadelphia has had a cap on outdoor advertising, meaning that anyone wanting to put up an ad in the city must remove an equal amount of ad space or apply to the Department of Licenses and Inspections for special permission.

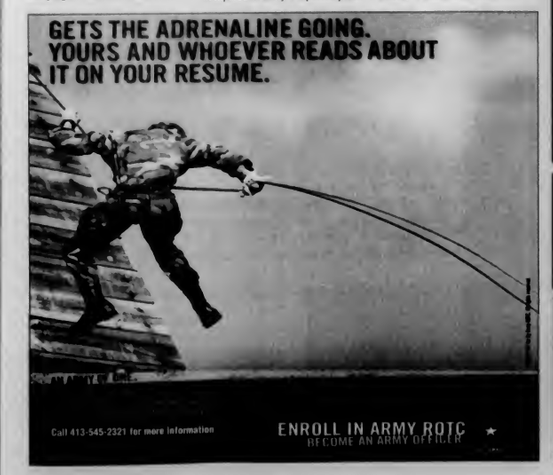
Sony did not alert the city of the new advertisements or apply for a license, according to SCRUB.

When SCRUB alerted the city of the ads, officials took quick action to have them removed.

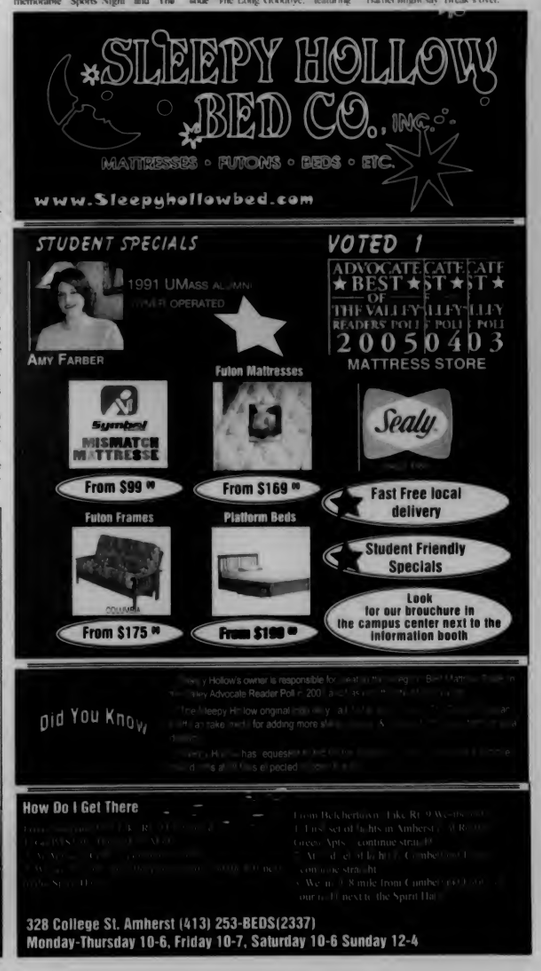
Philadelphia Managing Director Pedro Ramos sent a letter to the Sony Corporation ordering it to stop the ads and fined Sony and the property owners. The fines are currently in the process of being paid or contested.

The penalty – $150 for each violation – is a drop in the bucket compared to Sony's reported profit of $246 million for the quarter that ended Sept. 30, but the company removed the ads before the Dec. 29 deadline.

"We took it very seriously very early on because of all the city's done to fight blight over the years," Ramos said. "Pretty much they're gone. They were run out of town."



Chiat/Day, the San Francisco based ad company that organized the campaign, refused to comment on it, and Mosqueda said that no one knew the campaign would spark controversy.



However, Penn Communications Professor Joseph Turow, who teaches a class on advertising, was sure advertisers would be aware of the controversy.

"I think it's a little tawdry," Turow said. "But that's today's marketplace."

College senior Josiah Neiderbach, who works for SCRUB, supported the city's decision to take a hard stance.

"If nothing was done, there would be business graffiti everywhere," Neiderbach said.

Temple seeks revenge

PREVIEW from page 16

"Playing on the road isn't easy," Ford said. "We've run into some tough situations on the road, but we just have to stay focused and keep plugging, and hopefully get one [win] to give us some confidence."

Dealing with a hostile crowd will be the least of the Minutemen's concerns, as once they step on the court they will have to deal with Temple's All-America candidate Mardy Collins.

In the first meeting, UMass bottled up Collins, holding him to eight points, but he has exploded in the two subsequent games, averaging 26.5 points, 8.5 assists, 5.5 rebounds and 4.0 steals.

"He's one of the best players in the league," Ford said. "They have four guys that can score 20 points or more each night, so you can't really concentrate on just one guy. But, obviously, Collins is their leader."

Collins, a 6-foot-6 senior point guard, causes serious match-up problems for UMass, and two weeks ago forced the Minutemen to abandon their typical man-to-man defense to switch to a 2-3 zone that baffled the Owls throughout.

Ford expects that UMass will employ some zone again tonight, while changing up its defensive looks.

"We'll mix it up a little bit and see what's working," Ford said. "Obviously, Temple gives us incredible match-up problems, every player they play is 6-foot-6 or bigger. Their guards can really back you down and post up, and that's why we went to the zone. It worked a little bit so I'm sure we'll try it again."

KAREN WONG/COLLEGIAN

UMass forward Lawrence Carrier (left) heads after a loose ball against Boston University's Ben Coblyn in UM's 64-45 win on Dec. 12.

Viggiano Expected to Play

Late in Sunday's loss to LaSalle, senior forward Jeff Viggiano seemed to injure his arm and was looked at by the team trainer on the bench. While the team has not disclosed the nature of the injury, Viggiano is expected to be in the lineup tonight.

Not Doubting Thomas

Junior Brandon Thomas, who was second on the team in scoring early in the year, has struggled mightily of late. In the past five games, Thomas has averaged just 1.8 points in 10.6 minutes of action.

Ford believes the slump may have been brought on by an experiment at point guard a month ago, but expects that Thomas will bounce back.

"I don't think there's any question that Brandon is going to get back on track," Ford said. "I put him in a tough spot at point guard, and I take full responsibility for that."

Close but No Cigar

While in many ways the Minutemen's 9-8 record is disappointing, the team is tantalizingly close to being 13-4. UMass has dropped two games by two points (St. John's 51-49 and St. Louis 50-48) and another two games by three points (Davidson 66-63 and Rhode Island 58-55).

In three of the games – St. John's, St. Louis and URI – the UMass offense was anemic but still managed to hang tough with solid opponents, while the Davidson loss was the result of a late-game collapse in which Davidson went on a 16-3 run to close the game and escape with the victory.

Despite all of the narrow defeats, Ford has resisted the urge to look back on what could have been.

"You have to look at the next game," Ford said. "You can't start looking back at what-ifs. We understand who we are as a basketball team, and we're not a great basketball team. We're very shorthanded, so we've got to be overachievers. I've been happy with way the team has competed."

Stocking Up

During the past week, UMass has had three recruits verbally commit to the program. Ricky Harris, a 6-foot-2 guard from Baltimore who is attending prep school at the Winchendon School in Mass., is set to join the Minutemen next year.

Chris Donald, a 6-foot-4 guard from Boston who is a senior at Catholic Memorial High School, also recently said that he plans to attend UMass next year. Donald is expected to be a walk-on next season with the hopes of landing a scholarship in his sophomore year, when the departure of Rashaun Freeman, Stephane Lasme, Brandon Thomas and James Life will open up four scholarships.

Joey Rodriguez, a 5-foot-10 junior point guard from Winter Park, Fla., has also reportedly said that he plans on attending UMass. Rodriguez will join Marcus Matthews in the 2007-08 freshman class. Matthews, a junior at Bishop Loughlin High School in Brooklyn, verbally committed to UMass in October.

NCAA rules prohibit Ford from commenting on any recruits until they have signed a national letter of intent.

Rashaun Freeman drives to the net against Savannah State.

UMass is on two-game skid

MEN'S HOOPS from page 16

Minutemen were down for the majority of the game but, down eight points with just minutes left in the game, came alive and tied URI at 55 with a Rashaun Freeman lay-up.

Ten seconds remained in regulation, and the Rams inbounded the ball from under their basket. Dawan Robinson – URI's leading scorer – brought the ball up the court, and with time winding down Robinson used a ball screen at the top of the key to shed two UMass defenders and bury a 3 with three seconds to go.

It was too little too late for UMass, which didn't pick up the intensity until the deficit was almost insurmountable.

It was an ugly first half for both teams. Turnovers were rampant and shooters were off the mark. UMass couldn't get a shot to stay down, no matter how many attempted put-backs or second chances it had.

The frustration was visible, but URI won the first half, scoring four straight points to push its lead to 28-22 at halftime. It held that lead for the rest of the game despite a late charge from the dormant Minutemen who awoke with 1:13 left in the game and a 53-45 deficit to overcome.

From there it was a steady dose of 3-pointers from James Life and some lockdown defense from the Minutemen to get back in the game.

Freeman's lay-up tied things at 55 with just 10.8 seconds left in regulation. But the valiant comeback was put to rest by Robinson's 3-pointer, giving UMass its second loss of conference play and one it will look to avenge when the Rams visit the Mullins Center this Saturday.

Running down the Atlantic 10

By Ben Hodgkins
Collegian Staff

The 2005-06 Atlantic 10 men's indoor track and field season is officially underway for every team in the conference. Many school records have already fallen in the first month-and-a-half of competition, and many athletes have already put in IC4A qualifying times.

Charlotte

The 49ers competed in two meets during January, finishing in second place in the Clemson Invitational, and they also participated in the Virginia Tech Invitational which is not scored.

In the Clemson Invitational, host Clemson beat Charlotte by a mere 1.5 points to win the meet. Benjamin McCallum was the lone winner for the 49ers, taking the 200-meter dash title with a time of 21.91 seconds.

Several runners cracked the school's all-time top 10 finishes at the Clemson meet, including the second fastest time in the 60-meter (6.78 seconds), fifth fastest time in the 800-meter (1:56.41) and sixth best 3000-meter time (8:38.01).

Other school records were the fourth longest triple jump 149-3 3/4 feet) and the third (46-3 1/2) and fourth (45-0 1/2) best shot-put distances.

Fordham

Fordham finished sixth in the Fordham Kick-Off Classic and 12th in the NYC Gotham Cup during the month of January. The Rams also competed in the Yale Invitational and Manhattan Invitational, two meets that are not scored.

In the Kick-Off Classic, the Rams won only one event, the 4x800 relay with a time of 7:53.33. Three Rams finished second in their respective events, Aaron DeGraffe in the triple-jump (47-2 1/4), Chris McCutchan in the 5,000-meter (14:56.01) and Matt DiBiano in the weight throw (54-10 1/4).

In the NYC Gotham Cup, DiBiano continued his strong performances, qualifying for the IC4A Championship in the weight throw with a distance of 55-1 1/2. DiBiano then tossed an A-10-best 56-10 1/4 at the Yale Invitational.

La Salle

The Explorers also competed in the NYC Gotham Cup and had its best finish by Tom Ranalli in the one-mile run with a time of 4:16.71, good for eighth place.

La Salle performed well at the Penn State Relay, setting a school indoor record of 17:05.36 in the 4x1-mile relay. They also finished second in the 4x55 relay (25.21) and third in the 4x200 relay (1:29.34).

In the Maryland Invitational, Ryan Moseley finished third in the long jump with a distance of 7.06 meters.

Other notable performances were Dan McGrath, Bill Ceriello and Ben Franczuski, finishing 11th, 12th and 13th, respectively, in the one-mile run.

Rhode Island

URI dominated the Rhody Collegiate Open, a meet that only had Rhode Island and Central Connecticut State competing. In total, 12 events were won by the Rams. Ashad Agyapong won both the 55-meter (6.41) and the 200-meter (21.61).

Rhode Island finished in third place out of 11 teams at the Sorlein Track Invitational. Three Rams took first-place finishes, while the 4x400 relay team took second with a time of 3:27.74.

Saint Joseph's

The Hawks second meet of the season came in New York at the Fordham Invitational. St. Joe's was paced by Mike DiDio, Matt Petrocci, Andrew Thomas and William Rowland en route to a seventh place finish.

DiDio took first place in the one-mile run with a time of 4:09.01, while Petrocci finished second in the 800-meters (1:57.83), Thomas took third in the 500-meters (1:03.55) and Rowland placed third in the 3,000-meters (8:40.13).

DiDio earned the A-10 Men's Track Performer of the Week award for his first-place finish. His time of 4:09.01 in the one-mile run was the fastest in the A-10 this year, and it also qualified him for the IC4A Championship.

Temple

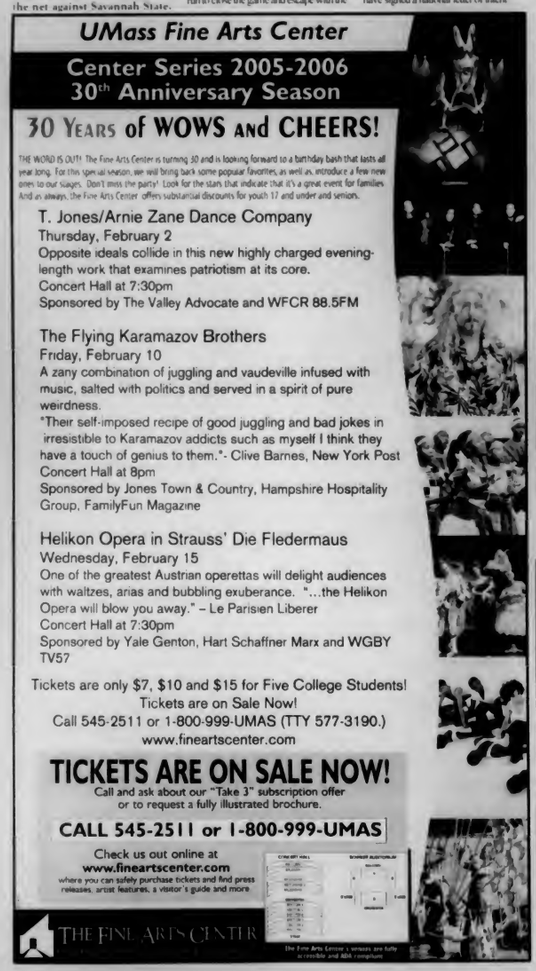
In its only scored meet of the season so far, the Owls finished 16th out of 18 teams in the NYC Gotham Cup meet.

The top performers for Temple were Bryce Buffaloe and Steven Johnson. Buffaloe broke the school record in the weight throw with a distance of 52 feet, good for fourth place at the meet. He also placed 13th in the shot-put.

Xavier

Xavier had three school records broken in its first meet of the season at the Purdue Invitational. In the one-mile run, freshman Luke Beuerlein ran a record time of 4:26.62, while in the 800-meter run, fellow freshman Clinton Womack set a school record with a time of 2:01.55.

Also breaking a school record for the Musketeers was Ben Milroy in the 3000-meter run with a time of 8:49.99.



KAREN WONG/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore sprinter Nathan Barksdale and the Minutemen have their hands full in the Atlantic 10 this season.

UMass swimmers gear up for A-10s

By Joey White
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team ended its regular season Saturday when it hosted Fordham on Senior Day.

The Minutemen defeated the Atlantic 10 foe 188-111 and finished with a record of 5-1. The next time the Maroon and White will compete will be in the A-10 Championships held in Buffalo, N.Y. on Feb. 16-19. UMass will be shooting for its sixth straight league title and ninth overall.

"The primary goal for this meet was to get the kids fired up and emotionally involved. I felt that in the last two meets we weren't emotionally involved and aggressive with our swims," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "We really took care of that today. I was very pleased with the attitude."

This meet also marked the last time some of Yarworth's swimmers would compete, as not all can travel to the A-10 Championships. Those in attendance at the packed Joseph R. Rogers, Jr. pool witnessed some U.S. records that had fallen.

Freshman Mike Prout, who earned A-10 Rookie of the Week honors and UMass/Dinn Brothers Co-Athlete of the week with his performance, set two U.S. records in his disability classification.

Prout was on the 2004 Paralympic Team, and on Saturday he shaved nearly 13 seconds off his previous record when he placed second in the 1000-yard freestyle event, behind freshman teammate Tristan Partridge, with a time of 10:18.01.

Prout placed third in the 500-yard freestyle event where he clocked in under five minutes for the first time (4:59.52), which destroyed the previous U.S. record of 5:46.33.

Sophomore Isaac Ebert also had two personal-best times when he won both the 500-yard freestyle event with a time of 4:53.16 and the 200-yard freestyle with a time of 1:45.86.

Also leading the Maroon and White was junior Evan Swisher, who won both the 200- and 100-yard backstroke events. He also helped lead the relay squad that took first in the 200-yard medley relay. Swisher's weekend earned him the honor of being named A-10 Co-Performer of the Week.

Ross Clay, the only senior on Yarworth's squad, helped the relay team that took first in the 200-yard medley relay.

The Minutewomen also ended the season on a good note, as they too defeated Fordham by a score of 185-115, which put their season record over the .500-mark at 4-3.

Six seniors for UMass had their last home meet Saturday, and three of them – Devon Moran, Melissa Stango and Kelly Hoffrage – jumped out of the gates to start off the day's events with a first-place showing in the 200-yard medley relay event.

Stango scored her season-best time of 1:10.11, when she won the 100-yard breaststroke event.

Hoffrage also won both the 200- and 100-yard freestyle events while senior Aimee Bourassa finished second in both of those events.

"We're swimming good quality races, solid races and smart races," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said.

The Maroon and White dominated on the boards as they took first, second, third and fourth in both the one-meter and three-meter events.

Junior Mary Jenkins won the low board, while freshman Karen Upperco won the high board.

On the men's side, R.J. Rappe won both diving events.

"[Diving coach] Mandy Hixon is the best coach in the country as far as I can tell. I can't say enough for what she does with the divers," Yarworth said.

Freshman Christa Narus also had an outstanding meet, as she won three individual races; the 200-yard individual medley, the 100-yard butterfly and the 200-yard butterfly. Her time of 2:08.43 in the 200-yard butterfly event was the third best time in school history.

"I'm very happy where we are right now," Newcomb said. "We're in a great place for going into the championships in two weeks."

After slow start, UM heats up

W.HOOPS from page 16

points of the game, but that soon led to a 13-0 run by La Salle with 13:00 left in the half.

The Minutewomen finished the half on a 20-9 run. Freshman Stefanie Gerardot converted on a three-point play to cut the Explorers' lead to three with 4:30 remaining in the first half. The last four minutes went back and forth, and the Minutewomen went into halftime trailing 31-28.

UMass came out strong in the second half, outscoring La Salle 13-6 in the first five minutes to take the lead back, 41-37. The Minutewomen continued to put points on the board, taking a 48-37 lead at the halfway mark of the second half.

La Salle came right back with a 10-2 run to cut the UMass lead to 53-50, but senior Katie Nelson's four-point play with less than five minutes remaining in regulation put the game out of reach.

The Minutewomen finished the game shooting 48 percent from the field, and had a season-low eight turnovers on the night. The win also ended the Minutewomen's 11-game road losing streak.

UMass remained in the City of Brotherly Love to take on its second nationally ranked opponent of the season, but this one did not turn out the same way it had just one week before.

The Minutewomen were blown out by No. 17 Temple (15-5 6-2 A-10) by a score of 85-50 on Sunday afternoon at the Liacouras Center. The loss put an end to UMass' season-high three-game winning streak, and has left them in the middle of the pack in the A-10 standings.

The story of the game was Temple's unstoppable outside shooting. The Owls ended the game shooting 51 percent from the field, while the Minutewomen shot only 35 percent. The Owls were also a lights-out 10-for-15 from behind the arc, and had 18 points off of turnovers.

Sophomores Kate Mills and Pam Rosanio combined for 29 points in the loss. Mills had a team-high 16 points, while Rosanio finished the contest with 13.

The Minutewomen started off the game very sloppy, causing the Owls to get on top early with an 8-0 lead just three minutes into the contest. UMass struggled from the field, missing its first six shots to begin the game.

Rosanio hit a 3-pointer to end her team's scoring drought, but it was Temple's hot shooting that could not be stopped. The Owls took an 18-11 lead halfway through the first half thanks to a few big shots from junior guard Fatima Maddox.

Temple went into halftime with a 32-21 lead, and never looked back. The Owls hit their first four shots of the second half, stretching their lead to 40-23.

Temple continued to dominate and ended up leading by more than 30 points from the halfway point up until the final buzzer sounded to snap the three-game win streak.

UMass senior Patrycja Gulak is averaging 3.3 points and 2.4 rebounds per game this season for the 6-14 Minutewomen.

Media frenzy for Steelers and Seahawks

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

DETROIT – Jerome Bettis said Tuesday he is retiring.

Or maybe he said he was perspiring.

It was kind of hard to tell amid the jostling in the scrum at Ford Field, where Bettis was holding court on Super Bowl media day. The return of The Bus to his hometown was almost as big an attraction to the media as the reporter in tight jeans and low-cut blouse from the BET network was to the players.

Joey Porter wasn't making matters any easier. Sitting at a podium next to Bettis, he was talking both loudly and quickly.

Until the questioning turned a little personal, that is. Like how it felt to be shot, as Porter was in the buttocks outside a Colorado bar a few years ago.

"Why would the guy ask me about being shot? What does that have to do with football?" Porter asked. "Is he trying to ask me about football or is he trying to get me to stand up here and say something wrong?"

Something wrong, of course. Any media type worth his salt knows there's nothing better than a good revelation to spice things up during Super Bowl week.

There weren't many to be found, though, in the annual exercise that provides notebook fodder for those who take the game seriously and funny video clips for those who don't.

Not that it didn't stop the BET reporter from trying.

"Tell me what position you play and what's your motivation," she asked Seattle's Peter Warrick.

"Punt returner," Warrick replied.

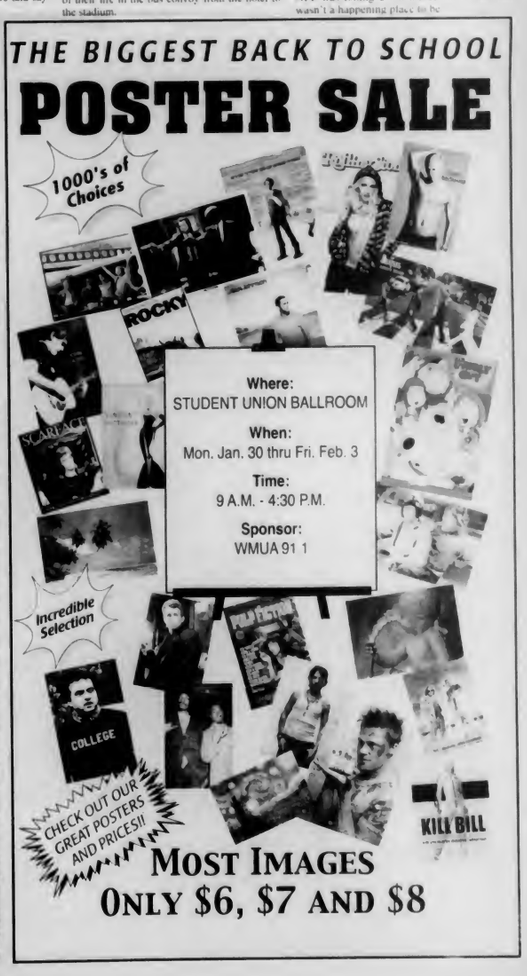
"What's that? Paint a picture for me."

Warrick kicked his leg in the air.

"They kick it. I catch it and return it," he said.

"Oh. Hey, you guys know you're on the VIP list for Friday night, don't you?"

And so it went on a day that the NFL uses to feed the voracious appetite of the assorted media, many of whom probably got the first police escort of their life in the bus convoy from the hotel to the stadium.



Once there, it was an hour with the Steelers, brunch and then an hour with the Seahawks. All timed down to the second, with the giant clock at Ford Field ticking down the minutes left in each session.

The major newspapers and the major networks were all there. So was the kid from the Weekly Reader, and the Telemundo goofball who fashioned a Troy Polamalu puppet out of a miniature Steelers' helmet and someone said was to get attention.

It was mostly a day, though, for the media to get business done, and for players to get the media out of their hair. There are two blue collar teams without attitudes – and it's one among the media had to worry about what the likes of a Terrell Owens or Keyshawn Johnson might do.

Likewise, there were the so-called media dressed up as cartoon characters and no Downtown Julie Brown in fishnet stockings. Super Bowl veterans said it was among the tamest such days they had seen, either because the NFL was toning down the act or Detroit just wasn't a happening place to be.

THE HARP
413-548-6900
163 Sunderland Rd.
N. Amherst
The Top Ten Reasons to go to The Harp
1. No one will pick a fight with you...or your boyfriend.
2. Where red-headed sluts and sugar daddies come together.
3. Giant Deck & Pavilion: at our bar, if you're outside it's cuz' you WANNA be.
4. The best live bands & NEVER a cover charge.
5. Super draft beer selection/great specials.
6. Our kitchen is bitchin' (Open 7 days a week til' midnight!)
7. Trivia Night! Trivia Night! Trivia Night! (Every Tuesday!)
8. Use our FREE Wireless internet: Homework munchies & beer, what could be better? (OCMP accepted)
9. The place to chill, talk, and NEVER wait in line.
10. Visit the hottest staff at the coolest bar.
* By Liz and Becky, disclaimer by Management.
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
www.theharp.net

Seniors lead the way

By Ben Hodgkins
Collegian Staff

In its first meet of the season, the Massachusetts men's track and field team took second place at the UNH Invitational on Jan. 21 behind strong performances by veteran performers.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien was pleased overall with his team's performance in their first meet.

"I was happy with the performance of the entire team. The team worked really hard since the fall and was extremely enthusiastic to get it started. They seemed to be in the meet 100 percent and competing hard. It was a great way to start," O'Brien said.

Leading the way for the Minutemen were seniors James Godinho and Jon Korhonen. Both Godinho and Korhonen were the lone first place finishers for UMass.Godinho won the 500-meter event with a time of 1:06.23, while also taking third place in the long jump with a distance of 21-feet, 8.75 inches.

Korhonen competed in the 3000-meter run and finished in first place with a time of 8:41.39.

The Minutemen also received a great performance from sophomore Nathan Barksdale, who picked up 13 points for the Minutemen; earning a second place finish in the 200-meter (23.52 seconds) and a fourth place finish in the 400-meter (52.24).

Nils Tischer and Brandon London finished in second place in the 3000-meter (14:03.86) and the high jump (1.90 meters), respectively.

Several freshmen contributed greatly to the second-place finish for the Minutemen. In all, seven freshmen placed in the top 13 in several different events. Leading the way for the newcomers were Steve Gerome and Mark Anderson, who both competed in two events and did very well.

Gerome took fourth in the 55-meter hurdle preliminaries with a time of 8.16 and had a time of 8.21 in the finals. Gerome also competed in the long jump and took fourth place with a jump of 6.60 meters.

Anderson also competed in the 55-meter hurdles, taking a time of 8.68 in the preliminaries and 8.24 in the finals. In his other event, the high jump, Anderson finished in fifth place with a jump 1.80 meters.

Kevin Ianetta was the Minutemen's third freshman in the 55-meter hurdles. He finished with a time of 8.26 in the preliminaries and took fourth place in the final with a time of 8.16 seconds.

Two freshmen competed for the Minutemen in the 1500-meter run. Finishing 11th was James Roberts with a time of 4:22.60, and finishing with a time of 4:28.50 was Matthew Weissinger.

The other two freshmen to compete for the Minutemen were Peter Fortunato, who finished sixth (2:40.72) in the 1000-meters and Jesse Regnier, who ran a time of 8:54.72 in the 3000-meter run.

"It's always nice to see them compete for the first time," O'Brien said. "They came through very well in a variety of events. I think the contribution of the younger runners was significant and fun to watch."

Four Minutemen finished in third place in different events. Andrew McCarron ran a time of 8:51.99 in the 3000-meter run, Kevin Murphy ran the 1000-meters in 2:39.92, Ryan Logan ran an 8:04 in the 55-meter hurdles and Manuel Harris-Lopes jumped 12.27 meters in the triple-jump.

Logan also took 10th place for UMass in the shot-put with a distance of 12.07 meters.

Rounding out the scoring for UMass was Tyler Simpson, taking 10th in the 400-meters (54.92), Zachary Pryzsiecki taking fourth in the 500-meters(1:09.62), Wesley Jones and Matthew Clark taking eighth and ninth places, respectively, in the 800-meters (2:04.66 and 2:05.76) and Jonathan Morse taking 10th in the 55-meter hurdles with a time of 9.02.

The Massachusetts 'A' relay team took third place in the 4x400 (3:34.49) and fifth in the 4x800 (8:33.24).

In all, UMass finished with 121 points, good for second overall behind host New Hampshire's 219 points. The Minutemen finished ahead of Holy Cross (117 points) and Boston College (111 points).

Sophomore runner James Bentley and the Minutemen took second place at the New Hampshire Invitational on Jan. 21.

Steelerettes first women in football

By Jennifer C. Yates
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — They wore knee-length skirts, bobby sox and hard hats, and couldn't fraternize with the players. Their pay: One ticket per game.

The Steelerettes were the first females of the gridiron, long before Seattle's Sea Gals, Oakland's Raiderettes and the Buffalo Jills. And get this: Pittsburgh had guy cheerleaders, too — the Ingots.

But the NFL's first rah-rah squad was far from a group of midriff-baring dancers that root from the sidelines today, make public appearances and — like the Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders — star in their own reality TV show.

The Steelerettes of the 1960s also didn't last long — just nine years.

"Other teams started bringing in cheerleaders and it was very different from the kind of wholesome group that we were," said Patricia Tanner, 58, of Ohio Township, who was a Steelerette from 1965-68. "It seemed like our era had passed and Pittsburgh's a very traditional town, so I don't think we would have gone that direction."

The Steelerettes were started for the 1961 season, a year after the Pirates won the World Series.

The Steelers were having a hard time giving away tickets at Forbes Field. William V. Day, the Steelers' entertainment coordinator, thought adding cheerleaders to the sidelines might change that. Day, who at the time was vice president of Robert Morris Junior College, also thought it could help the school, which didn't have a football team of its own.

So he spoke to his good friend and team owner Dan Rooney.

"I said to him one day, 'You got a team without cheerleaders and I've got a college without a team,'" Day said.

Day came up with the name Steelerettes, who were all Robert Morris students.

INDOOR SIDEWALK SALE
Winter Clearance
20%-80% savings
Final Markdowns
5 Days only!
Tuesday, January 31 through Saturday, February 4
Hurry!
Women's Clothing, Shoes and Accessories
Amherst Williamstown Northampton www.zanna.com
ZANNA

Terriers too strong for UMass

HOCKEY from page 16

The Minutemen were playing the Terriers tough and finally got that hard work to pay off in the third period when Matt Anderson stole the puck and sent it up ice to freshman Chris Davis, who found himself on a short-handed breakaway against one of the better goaltenders in the country in John Curry.

Davis kept the puck on his forehand but made a last-second move to his backhand and slid the puck through Curry's legs to pull the Minutemen to within a goal 7:58 into the third period.

"It was a great play by Matt Anderson knocking the puck down and finding Davis on a quick transition," Cahoon said. "I didn't expect to see that move from Chris to be honest with you. It was a nifty, backhand, five-hole dribble. I hope he's got a few more tricks up his sleeve."

BU put the game away about five minutes later when Roche won a faceoff back to Jekabs Redlihs, who fired a slap shot that deflected off MacArthur and into the net for the final score of the game.

UMass had a 5-on-3 opportunity with under four minutes to play in the game but could only manage one shot on Curry, as the BU penalty kill locked things up to preserve the team's seventh consecutive win, the longest current streak in the nation.

NOTE: Winer broke the all-time record for games played by a goalie at UMass over the weekend. He broke the mark in Friday night's contest with Lowell and then put a cushion between himself and Brian Regan (1994-97) with his 110th appearance on Saturday.

"I don't know if there have been a whole lot of college goaltenders who have gotten that many opportunities to play over four years," Cahoon said. "He has been very solid. He's won a lot of big games, gone into a lot of opponents' rinks and won and has won playoff games. He's got a great disposition for the position."

KAREN WINCH/COLLEGIAN

UMass senior captain Stephen Werner leads the team with 12 assists and 19 points this year. His seven goals have him tied for second.

Hawkins and Small dominate

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts ski teams continued their recent string of success on Saturday, as both the men's and women's teams swept the Brown Carnival slalom, held at Wachusett Mountain in Princeton, Mass. Both squads finished the day the with best overall team time in the slalom event Saturday.

The second half of the Brown Carnival, the giant slalom, will take place this Saturday at Loon Mountain.

The men's team once again had the top two individual times during an event. Junior Rush Hawkins and sophomore Jason Small finished first and second, respectively, for the third time in four races this season. The Minutemen have now had the top overall skier in each of the first four events of the season, with Hawkins claiming three victories, and Small earning the other.

The duo has certainly done great things for the team in a short period, but after looking at Hawkins' performance from last year, it makes this year's start less surprising. Small, on the other hand, is having a breakout year, and some of his success can be attributed to working with last year's USCSA Nationals winner.

"[Small] has got the best training partner in the nation in Rush, who won the Nationals last year," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said. "They compete against each other every day in training."

However, this is the first team victory for the men this season, as the team showed much better depth than in previous events. Senior Pat Bachant was third on the team and gave the Minutemen three skiers in the top 10. Rounding out the top five for the men were senior Patrick Kelly and freshman Alex Zahoruiko, who earned his first top 20 finish on Saturday.

With the win, the men maintain their hold on third place in the ECSC standings and move within one point of second place and Plymouth State, and just three points away from first place and Colby-Sawyer.

"He's improved a lot [since the start of the season]," Rouleau said. "We need to have our five best skiers in the top 15 to assure a win. We nearly achieved that [Saturday], and still got the win."

The women matched the men's performance with a victory of their own. Sophomore Liza Hawkins was the top performer for the Minutewomen, finishing in third place overall.

Behind her, senior Lisbet Rauh had a career day as she placed fifth overall. As a Princeton native, Rauh picked the perfect event to break out, as she helped the team earn a victory on her home turf. Senior Caitlin Doughty placed eighth for the women, giving the Maroon and White three top 10 finishers as well. The victory puts the Minutewomen just two behind Boston College for the top spot in the ECSC standings.

UMass is also the only school with both its men's and women's teams in the top three of the ECSC standings.

UM runners strong in Boston

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

Just days before other students report to campus for the start of the spring semester, the Massachusetts women's track and field team was already hard at work at the Reebok Boston Indoor Games on Friday, which were hosted by Northeastern University.

The meet, held at the Reggie Lewis Center, hosted 11 other schools, which included Southern Connecticut State, Williams College, Vermont and Holy Cross.

The Northeastern Huskies won the meet, but that did not prevent UMass from having a productive day, as it placed in seventh out of 12 teams.

"I thought it went well," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "We had some very good performances."

LaFreniere was especially proud of sophomore Kristen Bakanowski, freshman Jordan Veney, senior Elisabeth Budd and freshman Dionise Miranda.

Bakanowski, a pole-vaulter, cleared a height of 12 feet, which tied the UMass record, and she won the event.

She now shares that record with UMass alum Brandy Green, who set the record during the 2002-03 season.

Laura Ormielewski of Northeastern and Megan Malone of South Florida finished in second and third place, respectively, in the pole-vault.

Veney finished sixth overall in the shot-put event with a toss of 43-feet, 3.75 inches, a new UMass indoor record.

The freshman from Pittsburgh, Penn., has claimed center-stage for the Minutewomen of late, and for good reason – her throw was 3.25 inches farther than that of alumni Carole LaPlante, who had held the UMass record since 1999.

But prior to her record-breaking performance on Friday, she posted the second best indoor shot-put throw in school history on Jan. 20, with a mark of 42-feet, eight inches.

Those two heaves marked the first time in six years that a member of the women's track and field team recorded a throw in the all-time top-five for the shot-put. In 2000, UMass alum Alison Tostevin recorded a fourth-place throw of 42-feet, 2.75 inches.

Budd finished the 500-meter race with a time of 1:16.70, the fastest time turned in by the women this season.

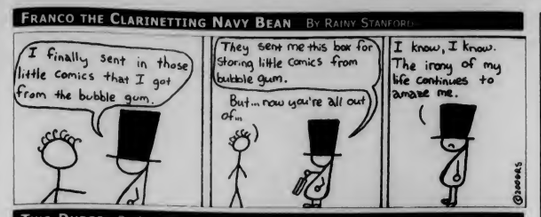
She placed second only to Katie Howard of Williams College, who ran a time of 1:16.30.

A psychology/history double-major, Budd has always produced stellar performances in the 500-meter, which won her the title of UMass Female Winter Scholar-Athlete in 2005.

Miranda, however, may not have been the busiest Minutewoman on Friday.

She finished fourth in the 55-meter dash, seventh in the 200-meter dash and seventh in the long jump to lead UMass in the latter two.

Sophomore cross-country star Christina DeRosa also competed well on the indoor surface for the Maroon and White.



She posted a time of 10:06.17, to finish fourth in the 3,000-meter run.

The teams that placed ahead of Massachusetts are Northeastern (169 points), Boston College (95.50), Southern Connecticut State (94.75), South Florida (90), Williams College (81) and Vermont (40).

"Overall, it was good," LaFreniere said of the meet. "I think everyone is improving. They did much better than they did last week [in regards to] coming back [from winter break] and then, right away, jumping into meets. So I thought we had some very good performances."

Ultimate Fitness
THE HEALTH AND FITNESS CENTER
Located in the Stop & Shop Plaza on Route 9 • For more information call 253-7571
Semester Special $175
Free unlimited Tanning!
first 100 to Join
Full Aerobics Program
Included with membership:
-Cardio Kickboxing
-Yoga, Pilates
-And Many More
-Juice Bar & Supplements
-Personal Training
-Core training
Over 20 pieces of cardio including...
-Treadmills
-Bikes
-Crosstrainers
-Free weight and circuit training equipment
No enrollment fee
now offering aerobics only memberships

Franco the Clarinetting Navy Bean — By Rainy Stanford

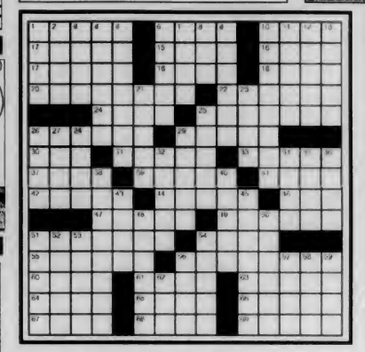
Two Dudes — By Aaron Warner

The Family Monster — By Josh Shalek

A College Girl Named Joe — By Aaron Warner

The Zoo — By Gabe Strine

Quote of the Day



"Don't cry because it's over. Smile because it happened."

—Dr. Seuss

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
Welcome Back!
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
FEBRUARY SPECIAL!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight. • Apollo Sunshine
Thur. • Furtune
Fri. • Irish Scream
Sat. • Apollo Sunshine
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. · N. Amherst
just north of the apartments

Yoga
Early Bird Special! Save 20%
Valid Thru 5 pm Friday, Feb. 3, 2006
1 class per week Only $65!
2 classes per week $120!
Spring Classes (Feb 6 - May 17)
Mon./Wed. Tues./Thurs.
Power Yoga 11:00 a. - 12:15 p. / 12:30 - 1:45 pm
Yoga Basics 1:00 - 2:15 pm / 4:00 - 5:15 pm
Yoga for Relaxation 2:00 - 3:15 pm
Intermediate Yoga 2:30 - 3:45 pm
T'ai Chi
Tuesdays 7:30 - 8:30 pm
(Feb 7 - May 9) $100
Learn this ancient Chinese system of physical exercise for health, vitality, longevity and self-defense
To Register
Campus Recreation • Boyden 215
545-0022 • www.umass.edu/umm

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will skip all your classes tomorrow because they are too early.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You should definitely buy some tea to have before bed.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Get yourself some sushi at some point this week.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You know what's fun? Three-hour classes.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
You should really start recycling all those cereal boxes.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Your computer will contract a nasty virus tonight.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Your favorite person in the world will IM you today.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Don't forget to write your holiday thank-you letters!

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
That mold in your refrigerator is pretty disgusting.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Just accept that the weather will be very confusing for a while.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You will be drunk dialed this afternoon from a friend on the west coast.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You need to get into the habit of dusting.

Chicago Pizzaria
Yes, we Deliver!
Super Bowl Specials!
Family size pizza Veggie platter w/Dips + 2 Lt drinks $24.95 +tax
Family size pizza Assortment platter w/ chicken wings & buffalo fingers + 2 Lt drinks $24.95 +tax
Hours
Sun-Wed 3pm-2am
Thurs-Sat 3pm-3am
To order Delivery or Pick-Up Contact
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing St. Next to Patterson Dorm Amherst, Ma 01002
Reserve your order by 2/4/06

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Learn, Lead, Succeed. Full Tuition ROTC Scholarships plus $5,000 yearly cash stipend Find out more www.umass.edu/armyrotc

Our NURSES call the shots! Guaranteed 3 ½ to 2 year Full ROTC Scholarships plus $5,000 yearly. www.umass.edu/armyrotc

Apartment for Rent

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone, (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Childcare

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part-time Spring – full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email: fjmooney@msn.com

Employment

Female PCA Wanted for Active Female; Variable shifts; Some over-nights. $10.84/hr. Call 413-210-6301 Ask for Martina. Car needed.

Spring & Summer Help Needed: Excellent Earning Potential working outdoors providing exterior carpenter ant treatments to residential customers. Reliable vehicle required (mileage compensation paid). Must be 18 years or older and certified with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by passing the Core Applicator Exam (information, all necessary study materials and payment of exam fees will by provided for qualified individuals). Apply in Person. No Phone Calls Please. Minuteman Pest Control 90 Conz Street, Northampton, MA 01060 (across from Hampshire Gazette Building)

Summer Jobs Apply to be a raft guide this summer at Zoar Outdoor. Applicants should be great with people and possess a can-do attitude. Outdoor recreation experience a plus. Training on weekends in March. Application deadline: Feb 7th call 413-339-4010 or see www.zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary We will train 413-625-2288 email: fjmooney@msn.com

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Instruction

Pioneer Valley Boxing School. Go to www.westernmassboxing.com

Miscellaneous

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.ATHENASHN.com Goddess/910

Advertise in the Classifieds. Discounted rates for students. Call (413) 545-3500.

Travel

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1988 Hottest Destinations – Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $159 www.sunsplashtours.com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Collegian Advertising
Visit us in the Campus Center Basement or call (413)545-3500.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2006 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass drops two straight

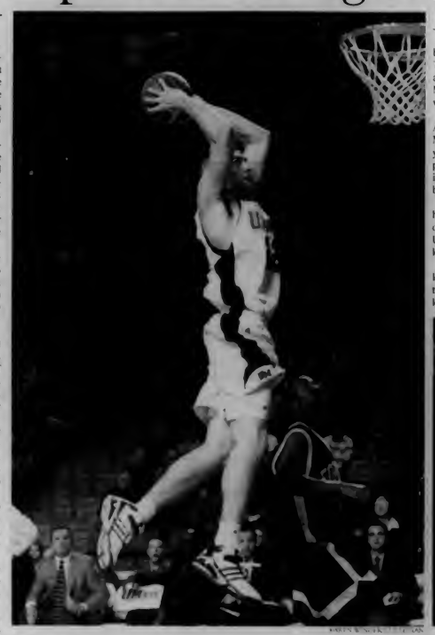
By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

All it took was 10 days for the Massachusetts men's basketball team to find out what it was really made of. On Jan. 21, the Minutemen smashed John Chaney's Temple Owls in front of 8,127 Mullins Center fans and thousands more watching the ESPN telecast.

At that point, UMass was 4-1 in the Atlantic 10 and staring at Rhode Island, the team tied with the Minutemen for second in the conference behind George Washington. URI and UMass matched up on Jan. 24, and it seemed the perfect opportunity for the Rams and Minutemen to flex their muscles against another worthy conference opponent.

The Rams did just that, and the Minutemen were nowhere to be found. UMass went on to drop the next game at La Salle, 69-61, in similar fashion, getting down early in the second half before scrapping to within three points, only to see the Explorers pull away again.

UMass went to La Salle still in good standing within the A-10. The Explorers were on a five-game losing streak (four of the five were against conference opponents – Temple, Rhode Island, Saint Joseph's and Charlotte) and were primed for another conference loss.



But the Minutemen continued their trend of late starts and allowed the Explorers to see the light at the end of the tunnel, yielding a 13-point second-half lead to a team that had not tasted victory in over two weeks.

The Minutemen cut the deficit down to three with just over two minutes left in the game, but a Jermaine Thomas 3-pointer put the Explorers up five and forced the Minutemen to foul.

La Salle went 7-for-9 from the free throw line down the stretch, sealing the victory and snapping the Explorers' five-game skid.

For UMass, it was all too familiar against Rhode Island four days earlier, the

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 12

Senior Jeff Viggiano has been a steady presence for UMass coach Travis Ford this season. He is second on the team in scoring, averaging 9.5 points per game.

Rematch in Philadelphia

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

On Jan. 21, when the Massachusetts men's basketball team put a 60-34 whipping on the Temple Owls in front of a national television audience on ESPN and with 8,127 fans at the Mullins Center, it appeared that the two teams were going in different directions.

The win improved UMass' record in the Atlantic 10 to 4-1 and seemed to signal that the Minutemen had turned the corner under first-year coach Travis Ford. For the Owls, the 34 points represented their lowest offensive output in over 32 years, and they seemed to be on the brink of a tailspin.

In the 10 days since the meeting, the teams have in fact gone in different directions. The only twist is that it has been the Owls, not UMass, who have been playing inspired basketball.

Perhaps spurred on by the embarrassing loss, the Owls (11-7 4-3 A-10) have won their two games since the Amherst debacle, and have looked quite impressive in the process. On Jan. 25, Temple knocked off A-10 foe Xavier, 81-79, at home, and followed that victory with a 91-85 upset of No.18 Maryland.

UMass (9-8 4-3 A-10) has struggled since the Temple rout, losing twice on the road to A-10 opponents. On Jan. 25, the Maroon and White lost 58-55 at Rhode Island, and then fell 68-61 at La Salle on Sunday.

Tonight at 7 p.m., these two teams will meet again, and UMass coach Travis Ford expects Temple to be out for revenge.

"You never forget games like that. When you lose like that, you always remember it. We know they're going to be ready for us," Ford said. "Temple's a great basketball team, and they're coming off of two huge wins, so we know they're going to be prepared."

Aside from how the teams have fared lately, the biggest difference in this meeting is that the game will be played at the Liacouras Center in Philadelphia. UMass has struggled away from home all season, posting a 2-8 record in games played away from the Mullins Center.

See PREVIEW on page 12

Junior James Life racked up 14 points in UMass' 69-61 loss to La Salle on Sunday. It was his second straight game in double digits and his seventh on the season.

UM drops two, loses ground

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – The Massachusetts hockey team (9-15-0 6-11-0 Hockey East) had a big opportunity to make a statement to the rest of the conference last weekend, but after losing its second game of the season to UMass Lowell, 3-2, and then succumbing to the hottest team in the nation in Boston University, 3-1, the Minutemen have found themselves in a tough eighth-place hole.

The Mass Attack skates back onto the ice on Friday night against No. 3 Boston College on White Out Night at the Mullins Center, and the Minutemen will close out their weekend at the Tsongas Arena in their final contest with Lowell.

UMass entered last weekend one point out of seventh place in Hockey East behind Lowell and could have leapfrogged the River Hawks and made a push up the standings with a Friday night victory, but UML has had UMass' number as of late and knocked off the Maroon and White in front of 2,880 fans at the Mullins Center on Friday evening.

"We were a little too sloppy in all three periods to be able to squeak out a win," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

Lowell has now beaten UMass four times in a row and has taken the season series for the third straight year.

UMass senior forward Jamie Solon scored his fifth goal of the season, a new career-high, to tie the game at 2 at the 4:28 mark of the third period. Moving towards the net with the puck, Solon got off a pair of shots that each deflected back to him off goalie Peter Vetri's pads, but his third shot held true and beat Vetri's blocker.

For the second time that night, though, UMass surrendered a goal within two minutes of scoring one of its own.

Lowell forward Elias Godoy and UMass defenseman Marvin Degon found themselves in a mad dash towards a loose puck that caromed all the way down into the UMass zone, and Godoy came away as the victor. Godoy knocked Degon off the puck inside the right circle and made a quick move to beat Winer for the short-handed and game-winning goal.

"I was just trying to put the pressure on their defense and was just racing to the puck," Godoy said. "I jumped to the other side of [Degon], jacked his stick and ending up getting the puck from him and put [the shot] upstairs."

UMass freshman Chris Davis (right) has a close encounter with Lowell winger Paul D'Agostino during UML's 6-2 win on Jan. 13.

Cahoon was quick to come to the defense of his star defenseman and leading goal-scorer after the game.

"When you assess what Marvin does over the course of the game, he is one of our biggest threats on the ice," Cahoon said. "He leads the country in shots on net, and he's threatening in every shift that he is out there. You can't blame this on Marvin. That was a tough play."

The Minutemen got on the board first against Lowell. Stephen Werner received a pass from Mark Matheson as he was entering the zone. Werner then dropped the puck back to Degon, who skated in and let go of a crisp wrist shot from the left point that got past Vetri at 9:05 of the first period.

The River Hawks answered just 1:40 later when René Gauthier won the faceoff back to Paul D'Agostino, who worked the puck over to Brad King. King charged in through the low slot, got a shot off that UMass goalie Gabe Winer got a pad on, but King recollected the puck and easily got his second attempt past Winer.

With less than three minutes to play in the second period, the River Hawks took their first lead of the game. With UM defenseman Patrick Dineen in the box for cross-checking, Jeremy Hall took a slap shot from above the right point that deflected off Winer's right pad to Danny O'Brien, who sent the puck back into an open net.

The Minutemen got off to a tough start in the first period against the Terriers on the following night, but they killed off four BU power-play opportunities and went into the first intermission trailing just 1-0.

Peter MacArthur put a shot on net that was saved by Winer, but Kenny Roche picked up the rebound and knocked it through Winer's five-hole to put BU ahead 1-0.

The Terriers found themselves on the right side of some puck luck to earn a two-goal edge in the second period. Bryan Ewing sent the puck into traffic in the low slot, and it deflected off of UMass defenseman David Leaderer's skate and past Winer at the 7:59 mark.

See HOCKEY on page 14

Maxwell no longer enrolled

The beginning of the spring semester brought with it a resolution to the suspension of Maurice Maxwell from the Massachusetts men's basketball team. The junior guard is no longer enrolled at UMass, and therefore is no longer a member of the team.

Maxwell was suspended indefinitely from the team on Jan. 6, for failing to meet athletic department academic standards. At the time, there was the potential that Maxwell could be reinstated to the team, but yesterday's announcement put an end to that possibility.

Because Maxwell is no longer enrolled at the university, UMass coach Travis Ford is prohibited from commenting on the issue.

Maxwell's initial suspension, which was announced the day before UMass was set to face Duquesne, came as a surprise. Maxwell started the first 10 games of the season, and had provided the team leadership by shifting from the wing to point guard.

The change in position clearly had an effect on Maxwell's production, as he was averaging just 6.5 points per game this season, down from 9.2 a year ago.

Maxwell has been replaced in the starting lineup by freshman Chris Lowe, who commented earlier in the year on his relationship with Maxwell, saying he "looked up" to him.

UMass currently only has eight scholarship players on its roster. Maxwell joins junior guard Art Bowers as Minutemen who have left the team this season. Bowers announced that he was transferring from UMass two games into the season, and has yet to find a new school.

–Dan Duggan

Junior Maurice Maxwell, after being suspended indefinitely on Jan. 6 for academic reasons, is no longer a member of the team.

Minutewomen hit their stride

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team hit the road after its stunning upset over No. 25 George Washington over a week ago, splitting a pair of Atlantic 10 games in Philadelphia last week.

UMass will finish its three-game road trip at 7 p.m. tomorrow night against Rhode Island at the Ryan Center.

The Minutewomen (6-14 3-6 A-10) used their momentum to defeat La Salle (10-10 6-3 A-10) by a score of 67-60 on Friday night at Tom Gola Arena. A late 40-15 run helped UMass knock off the A-10's first place team for the second consecutive game. It also marked the third win in a row for the Minutewomen, their longest winning streak of the season.

The Minutewomen finished the game with four players in double digits in scoring. Sophomore Alisha Tatham tied a career-high with 13 points while her sister, junior Tamara Tatham, tallied her fifth career double-double with 10 points and 11 rebounds. The other two players in double figures were senior Patrycja Gulak and sophomore Kate Mills. Gulak finished the game with 12 points, while Mills notched 11 of her own.

UMass scored the first four

See W HOOPS on page 13

UMass sophomore Pam Rosanio lit up No. 25 George Washington for 17 points in UMass' 55-53 upset on Jan. 22.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Thursday, February 2, 2006 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 69

A changing UMass worries students

Anne Reagan (left) feels the cost of a college education is "worth it," while Laura Cappellucci (right) thinks the rising prices are "unfair."

Nathan Garel, shown above, is finding it impossible to get through his education at the University of Massachusetts debt-free.

By Anna Dolianitis
Collegian Staff

While many students are attracted to the University of Massachusetts Amherst for its diverse community and lively social scene, tuition and fees have increased so dramatically that it's driving out these very students who were drawn to the school in the first place.

"Basically, UMass had the ultimate college experience: large classes, esteemed professors, frat parties, diversity, and a large window for opportunity at a more affordable cost than most schools," said Rachel Seavey, a UMass sophomore.

Seavey appeared to be a walking advertisement for UMass Admissions, until she continued, "That was during my junior and senior year in high school." Now, Seavey says that the price of a UMass tuition has risen so dramatically, that UMass is no longer attractive as it once was.

When the University was first established in 1863 as Massachusetts Agricultural College, or more commonly, "Mass. Aggie," it boasted only four faculty members, four buildings and 56 students. For most, this is difficult even to fathom, as UMass has now grown to include 10 schools and colleges, enroll 24,000 students, and offer over 85 undergraduate majors. Along with the changes in size and landscape, the cost of attendance has also increased.

Controversy has recently ensued as UMass Amherst was named the fifth most expensive public flagship university in the United States, according to a recent USA Today poll. Tuition and fees have increased steeply in the past few years, now reaching $15,197 in-state and $24,050 out-of-state per year.

The drastic increase has caused outrage among many UMass students.

"I don't think it's fair to have public education cost as much as it does," said sophomore Laura Cappellucci. "It makes it hard for people to get the kind of education they need in life."

"As an in-state student, my total bill has gone up $5,000 – 50 percent – since 2001-2002," from $10,822 to $15,795, said senior Pavel Payano, president of the Student Government Association.

UMass Amherst Chancellor John Lombardi put the issue of tuition increase into simple terms: "Tuition in public universities is low when the state pays most of the expenses, and high when the state pays less of the expenses As state funding for higher education institutions declines, tuition and fees rise," he said.

Lombardi links this reasoning to the need to compensate for the loss at the students' expense. In addition to funding received by the state government, UMass also competes with other public institutions for grants that help pay for the costs of maintaining the faculty and research that now play a large role in the institution's reputation.

As the number of full-time faculty has decreased from 4,943 members in 2001 to 4,561 in 2005, students are growing concerned about the effects that this may have on their education.

"I was in a lecture with about 500 students, though the seating capacity for the room was only in the 400s," Seavey said. "Students were sitting on the floor or in the aisles. UMass is taking more money from students, but not hiring enough new professors to cover this change."

Payano and Marisha Leiblum, SGA Secretary of Public Policy and Relations, who spoke collaboratively this month, pointed out that because there is a direct correlation between family income and students' SAT scores, as scores of the average UMass student have increased, the socio-economic class of incoming UMass students has increased as well.

"You can call it competitive or you can call it exclusionary," Leiblum said. "UMass may be the fifth most expensive public flagship school, but it's not the fifth most competitive – so competitiveness is driven by insufficient revenue; high cost does not lead to quality."

They went on to say that the administration targets out-of-state students for admission, hoping for 67 percent of the 3001 students per year that UMass plans to add in fiscal years 2002-2009, as part of the Chancellor's Master Fiscal plan, to be out-of-state students. This will allow the university to retain out-of-state students' tuition and fees instead of surrendering them to the state, as with in-state tuition.

Lombardi denied that the increase in tuition plays a role in the balance between in-state and out-of-state students, and confirmed only that out-of-state students pay their tuition in its entirety, while in-state students pay only a portion, the rest to be funded by the government.

What about student financial aid? The Princeton Review's book "361 Best Colleges" recently ranked UMass Amherst No. 3 in the nation in the "Students Are Dissatisfied With Financial Aid" category.

"I believe that," sophomore Nathan Garel said. "Just ask pretty much anyone on campus."

Private New York University ranked No. 1, and the University of Mary Washington, a public university in Fredericksburg, Va., claimed the No. 2 spot.

Garel, a finance major from Denver, Co., decided on UMass primarily because of its well-respected Isenberg School of Management.

"When I was first accepted, they estimated that I would receive close to $6,000 in grants and scholarships, which weighed my decision, but then only offering me a loan for $3,000, which I declined because I received an outside scholarship for $15,000," Garel said.

Because the organization

See CHANGING on page 2

SGA provides loans to student groups

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts voted last night to provide cash flow loans totaling over $180,000 to the Center for Student Business and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

"Student Businesses are one part of the SGA, and the University, which makes it unique. We're going to do everything we can to make sure they function as smoothly as possible, given the precarious situation they are put in," said SGA President Pavel Payano.

The CSB was loaned a total of $52,000; the Collegian was given $130,000.

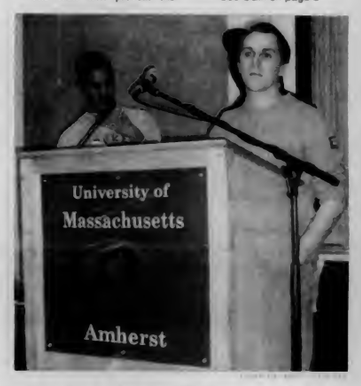
The Center for Student Development normally provided the Collegian with a yearly loan, but in August told the Collegian that they would no longer supply them.

"The CSD felt that it was no longer their responsibility, because we're a Resident Student Organization, and gave [the responsibility] to the SGA," said Michael Busack, editor-in-chief of the Daily Collegian.

The loan will prevent the Collegian from the possibility of being forced to shut down their presses for only the second time since the paper went daily in 1967.

"Not getting this loan would have left us unable to pay our staff and unable to print the newspaper. We couldn't function without that loan," said Busack.

"We're an RSO just like the rest of them, and for 100 years we have providing a free and independent newspaper for the entire student body," said Busack. "Everyone benefits from that, including the SGA."



Both loans were given under the condition that the sums would have to be paid back in one lump sum at the end of the Spring 2006 semester.

The funds will be taken out of the SGA's long-term reserves, which totaled $700,000 at beginning of the semester.

The motion also included a provision that SGA leaders will meet with Collegian business managers in order to supervise the paper's spending.

"I'm excited that everyone got their money," said Payano. "It's

See SGA on page 2

Michael Busack, editor-in-chief of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian makes a presentation to the SGA on behalf of the newspaper.

Eat Up

University of Massachusetts student, Jen Preman, feeds a hungry lion a bunch of greens in Worcester Dining Common. This lion dancer was one of many who showed up in the University's dining commons in celebration of the Chinese New Year on Tuesday, January 31.

Reilly's running mate leaves race

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Marie St. Fleur, a little more than 24 hours after entering the lieutenant governor's race, decided Wednesday to abandon her campaign after revelations of tax and loan delinquency, according to a top aide to her running mate, Attorney General Tom Reilly.

St. Fleur, a Democratic state representative from Boston, planned to read a statement outlining her decision early Wednesday evening at Reilly's Boston headquarters, the aide told the AP.

The Reilly campaign planned to release a separate statement from the attorney general, said the aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity in advance of the announcement.

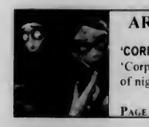
St. Fleur referred a call for comment to the campaign, which didn't immediately respond.

On Tuesday afternoon, Reilly stood side by side with St. Fleur to announce that he had chosen the state's first Haitian-born lawmaker as the person he wanted to run with on his ticket.

In Massachusetts, candidates for governor and lieutenant governor run separately through the primary, before being united in a common party ticket for the general election in November. Reilly's anointment was expected to give St. Fleur a boost at the polls.

But on Wednesday, Reilly got a jolt with the revelation his hand-picked running mate had not only failed to pay $13,000 in federal income taxes, but $40,000 in student loans.

At the same time, St. Fleur was forbidden by the Registry of Motor Vehicles from renewing her driver's license this year because she did not pay motor vehicle excise taxes to the City of Boston in 2005. The order was issued Dec. 22, five weeks before the attorney general announced he was teaming up with her — apparently with little or no background check.



Both Reilly and St. Fleur refused immediate comment, but the disclosures stood in stark contrast to comments made by Reilly less than a year ago, when the attorney general announced he was prosecuting two men accused of avoiding state income taxes.

"Every citizen who enjoys all that this state has to offer is obligated to pay taxes," Reilly said in an April 14, 2005, statement. "My office will continue to investigate and prosecute those who choose to avoid the laws and their responsibilities to pay taxes."

The Boston Globe reported that records showed last April the IRS placed a tax lien of $12,711 against St. Fleur and her husband, an accountant, for failing to pay sufficient taxes in 2003.

In an interview with the newspaper, St. Fleur said she and her husband, Jean B. Lauture, incurred the federal tax obligation because he did not have sufficient payroll taxes withheld from his paychecks in 2003.

See CAMPAIGN on page 2

ARTS & LIVING
'CORPSE' RISES ONTO DVD
'Corpse Bride' is a different kind of nightmare.
Page 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
'NEW' POLICIES ANNOUNCED
An e-mail describing rule changes is making quite a stir, but have the rules really changed?
Page 5

WEATHER
TODAY Mostly Cloudy, 114°
TONIGHT Showers, L 35°
TOMORROW Showers, H 47°, L 35°

SPORTS
TEMPLE GETS REVENGE
UMass falls 76-47 at Temple last night.
Page 16

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael A. Busack
Managing Editor Eric Athens
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Katie Houston
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egavian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Ian Jones
Copy Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Kristen LaCasse
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resources Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Belliveau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Caristi
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Sports Rob Greenfield
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently owned, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life. It was the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Massachusetts Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967, the Collegian has been recognized since 1993 for outstanding news, editorial and opinion pages. Subscriptions are $130 for one semester, $230 for two semesters, $30 summer session and $130 for the summer.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick Belanger
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Elizabeth Caristi
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Tiffany Van Langen, Chris Martin

SGA helps support struggling student groups with loans important to know that we're also going be ensuring that the money will be well spent with the weekly meetings. This should minimize the students' fear that we're spending the money."

SGA from page 1

SGA Speaker Sean Bliss was excited the SGA could help the Collegian.

"The Daily Collegian is a vital source of information to the entire student body," said Bliss.

SGA members also passed a motion that would facilitate discussions between the SGA, the Office of Information Technologies and Ruckus Networks, a free music download Web site.

According to the agreement, Ruckus would provide free music downloads to all UMass students on and off campus.

Students that want to play downloaded files on their MP3 players will be charged a $20 fee for the entire semester. Faculty and staff members can use the site for $5.99.

As part of the agreement, the SGA is obligated to pay $10,000 per year if under 3,000 students sign up for Ruckus's service in the agreed 90 day time period.

"In all likelihood, this will cost us nothing," said Bliss, "The University of Michigan had 4,000 users in the same 90 day period." Ruckus also plans to throw a promotional launch concert on February 15.

Reilly's runing mate plagued by finances

CAMPAIGN from page 1

St. Fleur said she paid down the $12,711 lien to about $8,000 by making $500 monthly payments since last spring. Later, though, a campaign spokesman told the newspaper that St. Fleur had only made one $500 payment last May, and that the outstanding balance was still more than $12,000.

In addition, the Globe reported, the City of Boston twice filed liens against a house the couple owns on Hartford Street in Dorchester. One was lifted in 2002, after St. Fleur made tax payments totaling $2,249. The second was removed in 2003, after payments totaling $4,948.

St. Fleur accumulated the student loans while attending Boston College Law School. A campaign spokesman said that starting about three years ago, she began making monthly payments of $100, increasing them to $300 about six months ago.

Meanwhile, Registry of Motor Vehicles records reviewed by The Associated Press showed St. Fleur could not renew her driver's license because of a failure to pay excise taxes.

From the outset of his campaign, Reilly has made taxes an issue, trying to contrast his hardscrabble roots with the millions made by Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, who is seeking the Republican nomination, and former Clinton administration official Deval Patrick, who is competing against Reilly for the Democratic nomination, during their careers.

Last month, in one of his first acts as a candidate, the attorney general released his own income tax returns for the past three years and called on his rivals to do the same. Had St. Fleur followed that demand, it would have covered the IRS returns for the year in which she and her husband now face the federal lien.

Correction

In the Wednesday, February 1, edition of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, the article titled, "Car chase speeds through UMass," was printed without acknowledging an author. The article is a product of the Associated Press. The Daily Collegian apologizes for the error.

Students work to pay rising costs of UMass education

CHANGING from page 1

removed his scholarship from their budget for the next academic year, Garel will be responsible for paying the rest of his tuition. "My biggest goal was coming out of college without any debt, but with UMass's fees and financial aid, I am not sure if that is going to be possible," he said.

When Seavey applied to UMass, she was given a sufficient financial aid package because she then lived with her single father, who was supporting three children. "However, my dad remarried, and this event changed my package so dramatically that I had to take out a $6,000 loan for fall 2005," she said.

She also shared her concern about the interest on her loans, and said, "The loans that hold off interest for four years are really only available to students who cosign loans with their parents."

Approximately 56 percent of UMass students receive financial aid, many of whom have been growing more and more disappointed as the financial aid awards they receive are becoming less substantial and their expenses more burdensome.

Student financial aid has decreased to $101,682,226 in 2005 from $119,610,395 in 2001. The contribution of the state of Massachusetts to this amount has dropped from $20,882,835 in 2001 to $18,763,865 this past fall.

Options for students who can no longer afford to finance their education are limited. Some transfer to community colleges or less expensive satellite schools, such as UMass Boston, UMass Lowell, or UMass Dartmouth, and often commute. Others leave school and enter the workforce immediately.

Some take even more drastic approaches.

"Two friends of mine actually got married to each other so they could file as independents," said Payano.

"I think the financial aid system at times can be generous, but has certain loopholes that hurt students like me in my situation. You either have to be incredibly wealthy and able to pay off the bill with no problem or severely poor and receive government aid to attend school," said Seavey.

Out-of-state sophomore Anne Reagan, who has never applied for need-based aid, feels that the high cost of education is worth it.

"I believe if a student really wants to continue their education, there is always a way to finance it," Reagan said. "It may mean taking out large loans and paying for it over the next 30 years of their life, but there are options. A loan of 50 or 60 thousand dollars is very overwhelming for an 18-year-old student, but when they are 30 and making that much a year, they will have a better perspective on it."

Chancellor Lombardi, who refuted the claim that UMass is taking steps toward privatization, said, "The state provides about $200 million in support. If UMass Amherst wanted to become a private institution, it would need to raise $4 to $5 billion dollars in new endowments to support its operations, and most likely double tuition and fees. This is not a reasonable alternative, it is not a practical alternative, and no one has any interest in pursuing such an alternative."

Although this is somewhat comforting to most students, for some, like Seavey, it is too little, too late.

Seavey has withdrawn from the University for the Spring 2006 semester, and although she plans to return to school in Fall 2006, she said, "I am considering transferring to a cheaper, local school where I could live at home [in Eastern Mass.], like UMass-Boston or Salem State.

"It's just disappointing after you get comfortable somewhere, make friends, and start to build a life, and then you have to start over. You often wonder where all that work went," Seavey said.

Coretta Scott King's health problems remained a secret

King Center employee, Bobby Blalock, brings flowers gathered by visitors to lay at the crypt in Atlanta, Georgia. Coretta Scott King, Martin Luther King's wife, died this week at the age of 78.

By Errin Haines
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Coretta Scott King's declining health was largely kept hidden from those outside her family — reflecting, perhaps, habits of secrecy developed during the most dangerous years of the civil rights movement.

When the widow of Martin Luther King Jr. died this week at an alternative-medicine clinic in Mexico at age 78, it came as a surprise to family friends, even those who knew of her recent diagnosis of ovarian cancer.

"They were very private," said Evelyn Lowery, the wife of the Rev. Joseph Lowery, who helped Martin Luther King Jr. found the Southern Christian Leadership Conference in 1957. "They would issue a little statement every so often. They gave us the impression that she was improving."

King's body arrived in Atlanta early Wednesday, and funeral arrangements were still being worked out. The Kings' four children have not appeared publicly since their mother's death, only releasing brief statements through a public relations firm.

Friends of the family offered several explanations for the secrecy, including the long need for the Kings to guard their private life for their own safety.

"All of their early life, they were constantly being threatened, and you had to worry about protection," said Bishop Eddie Long, leader of New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, where the Kings' youngest child, Bernice, is a minister.

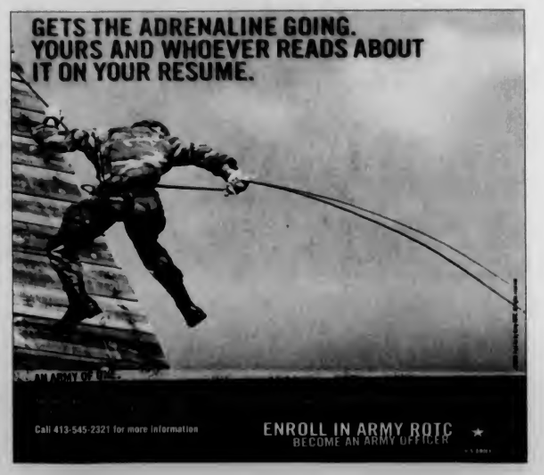
Seeing their mother incapacitated also was hard for the King children, said Markel Hutchins, a close friend of King and her oldest son, Martin Luther King III.

Also, Coretta Scott King was devoted to protecting the legacy of her husband through her own existence, and "in those final days, she really did not want people to see her in a weakened state," Hutchins said.

The family has not responded to an offer from Republican Gov. Sonny Perdue for a public viewing at the Georgia Capitol. The gesture was a measure of how far the South has come since the civil rights era.

After Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in 1968, then-Gov. Lester Maddox, a staunch segregationist, refused to close the Capitol for his funeral and expressed anger over the lowering of state flags in King's honor.

How their father has been portrayed, especially after his death, may have affected the children's openness, said Georgia State University professor Clifford Kuhn.



"It, in part, derives from experiences the family, and Mrs. King in particular, had over the years where there was a feeling that others were misrepresenting Martin Luther King Jr.," Kuhn said. "There were some times where there was a feeling that others were distorting his message. Undoubtedly, the privacy is a response to some of that."

Save $$ on Textbooks at the Jeffery Amherst College Store

All These Courses and More at Discounted Prices:

Astronomy	101-2	The Solar System
Astronomy	114	Stars & Galaxies
Biology	101	Introductory to Biology
Biology	102	Intro to Animal Biology
Biology	285	Cell & Molecular Biology
Chemistry	101	General Chemistry
Chemistry	110	General Chemistry
Chemistry	262	Organic Chemistry-non majors
Chemistry	111	General Chemistry I
Chemistry	112	General Chemistry II
Chemistry	261	Organic Chemistry
CMP Science	105	Computer Literacy
ECE	232	Hardware Organization & Design
Economics	104 A-F	Intro to Macroeconomics
Economics	709	Political Economy II
Exer Science	100	Intro to Exercise Science
FOMGT	304	Information for Tech Finance
FOMGT	320	Investments
Geo Sciences	102	The Human Landscape
Geo Sciences	103	Intro Oceanography
HRTA	240	Hotel Operations
Italian	120	Elementary Italian II
Math	113	Math-Elem Teachers I
Math	121	Linear Methods & Probability
MICBIO	310	General Microbiology
Nutrition	130	Nutrition for a healthy lifestyle
Physics	100	Conceptual Physics
Physics	120	Big Bang to Black Hole
Physics	132	Intro to Physics II
POLISCI	111	Comparative Politics
POLISCI	121-B	World Politics
Psychology	305	Educational Psychology
Psychology	320	Learn & Think
Psychology	380	Abnormal Psychology
Psychology	100 sec 1-3	Intro to Psychology
Psychology	335	Behavioral Neuroendocrinology
Spanish	110	Spanish
Spanish	120	Spanish
Spanish	240	Intermediate Spanish II
Spanish	246	Intensive Intermediate Spanish
Statistics	111	Elementary Statistics
W&ECONSV	261	Wildlife Conservation

Jeffery Amherst College Store
26 South Prospect Street, Amherst 253-3870
(behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in downtown Am-

Alito starts job as Justice with death row appeals

By Gina Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After a private welcome to his new job, Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito was confronted in his first hours with emergency appeals in three death row cases.

He bowed out as his colleagues blocked executions in Florida and Missouri, while allowing Texas to put to death an inmate.

It was a sign of what's to come for Alito, confirmed Tuesday by the Senate on a 58-42 vote.

In his first month on the bench, the court's new junior justice will find himself in the thick of fights over the environment, evidence rules for accused killers, Texas politics and the fortune of Playboy Playmate Anna Nicole Smith's late husband.

On a more practical level, there are other concerns for the 55-year-old Alito: getting a new office and staff, having his picture made, finding his parking space, even learning about the court cafeteria and gym.

He moved into chambers that had been used by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor over the past year while her corner office, with beautiful views of the Capitol, was being renovated as part of a major construction project at the court.

With Alito on the job, the court announced Wednesday a new division of the workload in emergency appeals. Alito will oversee cases from the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, covering Arkansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota and South Dakota.

In the courtroom, he will take the seat at the far right, the one for the court's newest member. He will sit next to Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a one-time women's' right attorney who was President Clinton's first Supreme Court nominee.

Justices, during oral arguments, often share jokes or have side conversations. Alito and Ginsburg have a few things in common. Both have two children – a daughter and son. Both are from the East Coast. Ginsburg from New York, Alito from New Jersey.

Three seats down will be Justice Antonin Scalia, the court's other New Jersey native and Italian American with whom Alito is often compared. O'Connor's retirement gives Scalia a better seat, right next to Chief Justice John Roberts.

To help with case prep work, Alito can bring his law clerks from the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and also ask some of O'Connor's clerks to stay.

Justices usually hire four law clerks, who review appeals and then briefly summarize them in memos for the bosses. They also usually help write drafts of rulings. Those jobs, held by the sharpest young lawyers in the country, can be grueling, with long hours often running late into the evening.

Alito's orientation will be more difficult because the court is in the middle of a nine-month term and already has heard arguments in dozens of cases. If justices are deadlocked in some of those cases, Alito may have to break the tie.

Justices meet behind closed doors Feb. 17 and an announcement could follow on cases that require new argument sessions with Alito. As the junior court member, Alito must keep notes during those meetings and serve as the doorkeeper.

Justice Stephen Breyer has been the junior justice since 1994, a modern era record.

Last fall, Breyer told The Associated Press that in the first days at the high court, "it's a little frightening ... it takes a while to become comfortable."

The court also has a new chief justice in Roberts, but as the court's leader he did not have the "junior" duties.

Roberts administered the oath of office to Alito in a closed-door ceremony at the court on Tuesday. O'Connor and Breyer were there, along with other justices and spouses.

A ceremonial swearing-in was planned Wednesday in the East Room of the White House.

U.S. Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito is sworn in as President Bush looks on during the ceremonial swearing-in at the East Room of the White House on February 1, 2006 in Washington D.C.

Bush says he understands Americans' worries

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — President Bush said Wednesday that even though the state of the union is strong, he understands why some Americans are worried in a time of war and job cuts.

"I understand there's an anxiety about the time of war," Bush said, trying to keep the momentum of the previous night's State of the Union address with an appearance at the Grand Ole Opry. "That's natural, seems like to me, even though this economy is roaring. It is strong, when you recognize we've overcome a lot."

Bush tried to pre-empt objections from Democrats, who are looking to regain control of the House and Senate in midterm elections this year. The Democrats are looking for advantage in Bush's weak poll numbers and burgeoning scandals in GOP congressional ranks.

"Our economy is the envy of the world," the president said. "And yet people are changing jobs a lot and there is competition from India and China, which creates some uncertainty. My worry is that people see that uncertainty and decide to adopt isolated policies, or protectionist policies. In other words, in uncertain times it's easy for people to lose confidence in the capacity of this country to lead and to shape our future."

Bush has been beset by criticism that his optimistic messages of recent years haven't squared with the worries many Americans feel over high energy and health care costs, the costly and deadly Iraq war and continuing terrorist threats. Democrats said his words could not overcome those problems.

"It just wasn't credible to hear him talk about making America more secure and honoring our troops or making America energy independent or making health care more affordable without hearing him explain why he's done just the opposite for the last five years," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Bush spoke Wednesday from the stage of the jam packed Grand Ole Opry House. Country music stars including Barbara Mandrell, Larry Gatlin, Lee Greenwood, Lorrie Morgan and the Oak Ridge Boys warmed up the crowd under a sign that said "Americans Win When America Leads."

Bush joked to the enthusiastic crowd that he should have given the State of the Union there. "How cool would it be to give a State of the Union address in a Porter Wagoner outfit?" he said, referring to the flashy singer who frequently played host on the stage.

Outside, more than 100 protesters held up their own signs that said "No Confidence" and "No warrant, no wiretap, no W." That was a reference to Bush's much-debated secret program of eavesdropping on phone calls and e-mails in an attempt to sniff out terrorist plots, which he vigorously defended in his State of the Union address.

In Tuesday's speech, the president declared that America must break its long dependence on Mideast oil and rebuked critics of his stay-the-course strategy for the unpopular war in Iraq.

"There is no peace in retreat," he said. He also slapped at those who complain he took the country to war on the erroneous grounds that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction.

"Hindsight alone is not wisdom," Bush said. "And second-guessing is not a strategy."

He pledged to maintain "a civil tone" in disputes with those in Congress who oppose his policies, like the nation's involvement in Iraq. But Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., complained Wednesday that he says that all the time and then his administration, through the vice president and the secretary of defense and others, says that anyone who criticizes the war, they imply they're not patriotic.

"I hope we're beyond that," Biden said on CBS's "The Early Show." "I think the president is sufficiently trouble politically, and understands that it's time to really reach out."

Bush declared "the state of our union is strong and together we will make it stronger." But Democrats said Bush was living in a fantasy land.

"Our country is ready for change and a new direction," Democratic Party head Howard Dean said.

Three-fourths of the people who watched the speech said they approve of the proposals made by Bush, according to a CBS News poll Tuesday night of 734 viewers. Those who watched the speech were more likely to be Republican, but only a third who saw the speech thought the president will be able to achieve the goals he mentioned.

President George W. Bush greets members of Congress after he delivered his State of the Union before a joint session of Congress on capitol Hill in Washingotn D.C. on Tuesday, January 31, 2006.

THE BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
136 years of service ...and counting!
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!

••EARN 1-2 CREDITS •GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE •REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN

Spring Semester 2006 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for meetings •Feb. 6th (Mon) •Feb. 8th (Wed)
Feb. 7th (Tues) meeting will be held in room 168C of the Campus Center
•Assignment notification ONLY: Thurs, Feb. 9th @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!

Volunteer, while earning credit!

Women sue Wal-Mart over contraceptives

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

BOSTON — Three Massachusetts women backed by pro-abortion rights groups sued Wal-Mart on Wednesday, saying the retail giant violated a state regulation by failing to stock emergency contraception pills in its pharmacies.

The suit filed in Suffolk Superior Court seeks a court order compelling the company to stock the so-called "morning after pill," in its 44 Wal-Marts and four Sam's Club stores in Massachusetts, all of which have pharmacies.

"Wal-Mart apparently thinks it is above the law," said Sam Perkins, a lawyer for the three plaintiffs.

A new state law that took effect late last year following heated debate on Beacon Hill requires all hospitals to provide the morning-after pill to rape victims. It also allows pharmacists to dispense the pill without a prescription, but does not require it.

The suit, backed by Planned Parenthood of Massachusetts, NARAL Pro-Choice Massachusetts and Jane Doe Inc., argues Wal-Mart is violating a state policy that requires pharmacies to provide all "commonly prescribed medicines." They are suing to force compliance with the regulation through the Massachusetts Consumer Protection Act.

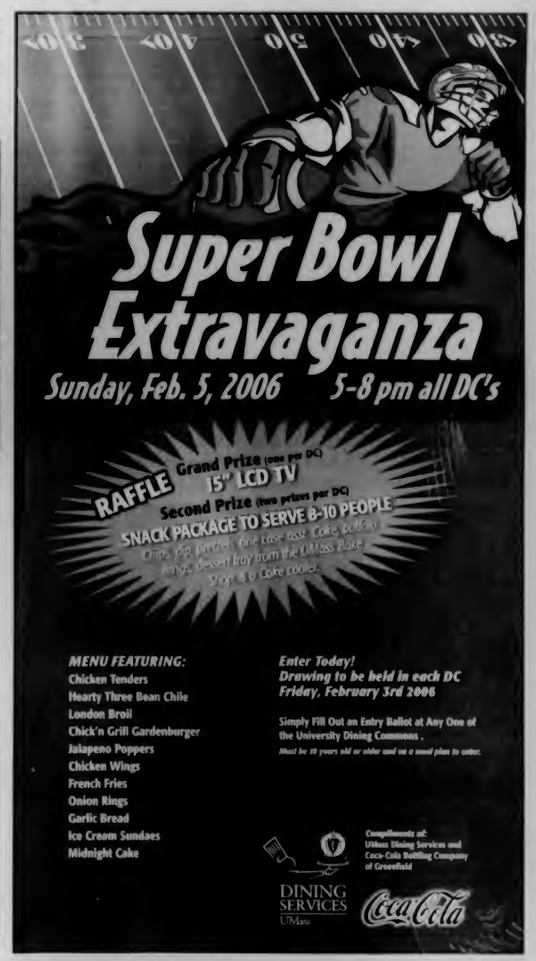
"Massachusetts pharmacies are required to stock all medications that are commonly prescribed to meet the usual needs of the community," Perkins said.

Dan Fogleman, a spokesman for Bentonville, Ark.-based Wal-Mart, said the company "chooses not to carry many products for business reasons," but he declined to elaborate.

However, in a letter to Perkins regarding the lawsuit, Wal-Mart attorney John W. Delaney wrote that Wal-Mart has "long had the corporate policy of declining to make available [C]emergency contraception[/] medication[,] based on, among other things, a view that [C]medication[s] not commonly prescribed and within the usual needs of the community."

Delaney also wrote that if a Wal-Mart pharmacy doesn't carry a certain prescription, the pharmacist is instructed to refer the customer to a different drug store.

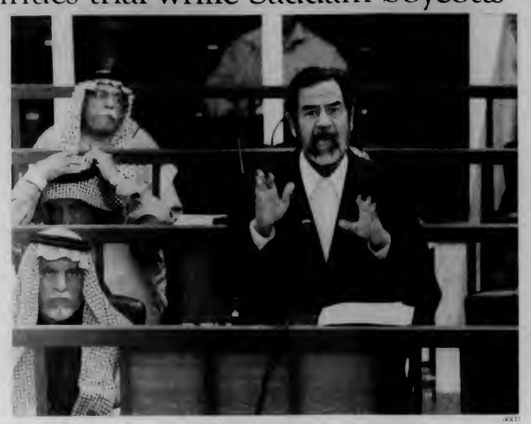
He added that Wal-Mart would formally request clarification of the state regulation from Attorney General Tom Reilly or the state's Board of Pharmacy. He said it either directs the company to carry certain products, "Wal-Mart is all ears."



Fogleman said Wal-Mart stores in Illinois, which, like it, is required by state law. But the drug is not stocked by Wal-Mart in any other state.

The morning-after pill provides a high dose of hormones that women can take up to five days after sex to prevent pregnancy. Some abortion opponents believe emergency contraception is a form of abortion because it blocks the fertilized egg from being implanted on the uterine wall.

The plaintiffs are Jeannia McCarty, 29, of Somerville; Julia Bartel, 37, of Boston; and Dr. Rebekah Gee, also of Boston. All three were turned away when they tried to buy emergency contraception pills at area Wal-Marts.



The women said they knew they would be refused when they went to the Wal-Marts in Quincy and Lynn and filed the action was planned with the abortion rights groups and lawyers.

After being refused, McCarty and Bartel went to other pharmacies and got their prescriptions filled. CVS, the state's largest pharmacy chain, stocks the pill at all of its pharmacy locations, as do the state's other major pharmacy chains.

Judge continues trial while Saddam boycotts

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press

Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein speaks at his trial in Baghdad earlier this year. Since the chief judge of the trial was replaced recently, Saddam, and other defendents, have boycotted the trial.

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A female witness testifying Wednesday at Saddam Hussein's trial said she was stripped naked in prison, hung by one foot and kicked in the chest by the former Iraqi leader's half brother.

The witness provided some of the most gripping testimony so far in the trial, which went ahead despite a boycott by Saddam and three other defendants who demanded the dismissal of the chief judge.

Weeping several times during her testimony, the woman described being stripped naked, hung by her handcuffs broken and given electric shocks.

Then she told the court, Barzan Ibrahim — Saddam's half brother and the top co-defendant in the trial — used words to instead hang her from her feet and then he kicked her three times in the chest.

"I told him [Ibrahim], 'For God's sake, I'm a woman. Master, I have nothing to confess. Why are you doing this to me?'" said the woman, who spoke from behind a white veil to protect her identity.

The woman was one of five witnesses who took the stand during Wednesday's 4 1/2-hour session — all of whom were hidden behind the curtain.

The woman's testimony directly contradicted Ibrahim. Saddam's spokesman said of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency. She recounted her torture at the Mukhabarat's Baghdad headquarters, where she said she and family members were taken after being arrested in a crackdown following a 1982 assassination attempt against Saddam in the Shiite village of Dujail.

She said she did not see Saddam taken to the notorious Abu Ghraib prison. Like the rest, she was driven back to the Mukhabarat headquarters for interrogation with her father, whom she said threw a dead baby into the car and ordered it taken "to the Mukhabarat garage."

"What crime have we all committed to go through this agony?" she asked, sobbing.

Chief judge Raouf Abdel-Rahman, who took over last week, pressed ahead with the proceedings Wednesday at a rapid pace, taking advantage of the calm in a courtroom that has been plagued by shouting matches, scuffles and protests since the trial began Oct. 19.

But the boycott by five of the case's eight defendants and their defense team was likely to further undermine the trial, which has been cast as a key plank in Iraq's transition from dictatorship to democratic rule.

President Bush said Wednesday he was not worried about the disarray surrounding the Saddam trial.

"Hopefully the trial will resume and be conducted in a fair" way, Bush told The Associated Press in an interview. "It certainly stands in a stark contrast to how Saddam treated his people. I'd like to see the trial move forward. ... That's what democracies do. They give people a fair trial."

Abdel-Rahman, a Kurd, appointed new defense attorneys, and the three defendants who accepted them and attended Wednesday's proceedings sat quietly, surrounded by the empty chairs left by Saddam and the others.

Saddam and his co-defendants are on trial for the killing of more than 140 Shiites after the 1982 attempt on the former ruler's life in Dujail, north of Baghdad. They face death by hanging if convicted.

The original defense team chosen by Saddam and his co-defendants has petitioned the tribunal to remove Abdel-Rahman, saying they will not attend until he goes.

They accuse Abdel-Rahman of having a "personal feud" with Saddam because the judge was born in Halabja, a Kurdish village hit by a poison gas attack allegedly ordered by Saddam in 1988. Some 5,000 Kurds were killed in that attack, including several of Abdel-Rahman's relatives.

"The judge is an enemy to my client," Saddam's original chief attorney, Khaled al-Dulaimi, told the AP in the Jordanian capital.

European nations set to report Iran to U.N. security

By George Jahn
Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — After months of fruitless negotiations, European nations set the stage Wednesday for reporting Iran to the powerful U.N. Security Council by the end of the week because of concerns the Islamic country's nuclear program is not "exclusively for peaceful purposes."

Iran remained defiant, warning such action will provoke it into doing exactly what the world wants it to renounce — starting full-scale uranium enrichment, a possible pathway to nuclear weapons.

Positions appeared to be hardening on the eve of an International Atomic Energy Agency meeting after European nations formally submitted a U.S.-backed motion for the IAEA's 35-nation board to refer Iran to the Security Council. The two-day board meeting was to start Thursday.

"Nuclear energy is our right, and we will resist until this right is fully realized," President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told a crowd of thousands in the southern Iran city of Bushehr, site of a Russian-built power plant. "Our nation can't give in to the coercion of some bully countries who imagine they are the whole world."

Speaking a day after President Bush declared in his State of the Union address that "the nations of the world must not permit the Iranian regime to gain nuclear weapons," Ahmadinejad derided the United States as a "hollow superpower" and vowed to pursue the nuclear program.

The IAEA board was expected to approve the motion easily because Russia and China — which both have veto power on the Security Council — now support reporting Iran following months of opposition.

"Iran will find itself before the Security Council," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington. "Iran is working to develop a nuclear weapon."

The developments were a boost to the United States, the main proponent of referral. Washington has waited years for international suspicions of Iran's nuclear ambitions to translate into support among board nations.

Iran's decision Jan. 10 to restart small-scale uranium enrichment – and Ahmadinejad's calls for Israel to be wiped off the map – apparently rattled Beijing and Moscow. Iran became more insistent on its right to pursue a nuclear program and less cooperative in talks with European negotiators after the election of the hard-line Ahmadinejad last June.

The call for referral was contained in a confidential resolution obtained by The Associated Press. It "requests the director general to report to the Security Council" on steps Iran needs to take to dispel international suspicion it could be seeking to make nuclear arms.

If the board approves referral as expected, it will launch a protracted process that could end in Security Council sanctions for Tehran.

Still, any such moves are weeks or months away. Moscow and Beijing support referral only on condition that the council take no action until at least March, when the board next meets to review the status of an IAEA probe into Iran's nuclear program and recommends further action.

Ali Larijani, Tehran's top nuclear negotiator, warned that Iran would start large-scale uranium enrichment at its Natanz plant and stop intrusive U.N. inspections of its facilities if reported to the Security Council.

"Natanz is ready for work. We only need to notify the IAEA that we are resuming [large-scale] enrichment. When we do that is our call. If they [report Iran to the Security Council], we will do it quickly," Larijani said.

Iran insists its nuclear program is civilian only and has no other purpose than to generate power. Enrichment can produce either fuel for a nuclear reactor or the material needed to build a warhead.

Iran's threat to resume large-scale enrichment immediately, however, appeared overblown.

Tehran is far from its ultimate goal of running 50,000 centrifuges to enrich uranium in the central city of Natanz for what it says will be the fuel requirements of its nearly finished Russian-built Bushehr reactor. It has fewer than 1,000 centrifuges.

But experts say Iran has enough black-market components in storage to build the 1,500 operating centrifuges it would need to make the 45 pounds of highly enriched uranium needed for one crude weapon.

A brief report prepared for the IAEA board session expressed concern about a possible linkage between "The Green Salt Project" – small-scale experiments linked to uranium enrichment – and suspected tests of "high explosives and the design of a missile re-entry vehicle, all of which could have a military nuclear dimension."

The draft to be voted on calls for Iran to:

—Reestablish a freeze on uranium enrichment and related activities.

—Consider stopping construction of a heavy water reactor that could be the source of plutonium for weapons.

—Formally ratify an agreement allowing the IAEA greater inspecting authority.

—Give the IAEA additional power in its investigation of Iran's nuclear program, including "access to individuals" for interviews, as well as to documentation on its black market nuclear purchases, equipment that could be used for nuclear and non-nuclear purposes and "certain military-owned workshops" where nuclear activities might be going on.

In arguing for involvement of the top U.N. body, the text expresses "serious concerns about Iran's nuclear program." And it mentions "the absence of confidence that Iran's nuclear program is exclusively for peaceful purposes."

Employers check students on Facebook

By Kati Mahoney
Associated Press

MADISON, Wis. — College students are now no longer the only people accessing Facebook. Employers are logging on to check up on both current and prospective employees.

The increasingly popular online directory is available to anyone with a valid e-mail address, but some university administrators across the country have noticed students' accounts are being accessed by people from both inside and outside universities.

Rachel Kearney, director of career services and alumni affairs at Indiana University, reported firsthand experience of employers using Facebook.

"People don't believe this is happening, but it is," she said. "I've seen it."

According to Kearney, in one such incident an outraged government employer who worked close with IU and hired a number of interns from the university contacted her.

Kearney said the employer used current and former interns to access Facebook. Looking into the personal profiles of other interns. Upon finding distasteful information and pictures of a former intern and current IU student, the employer "demanded" its name and the student's internship status be removed from the Facebook profile.

The apologetic student complied, she said.

It has taken steps to make its students aware of the issue, Kearney said, and other universities are doing the same.

Julia Barlow Sherlock, director of career services at Central Michigan University, said an e-mail was sent to all students warning them that employers are looking at their Facebook accounts to "see the 'other' side of who [they] are."

Administrators at other universities, including the University of Michigan and the University of Minnesota, have noted the growing controversy surrounding the issue and are planning to question employers at their respective spring recruitment rushes.

While Kearney said students should be aware of this issue, she doesn't blame employers for using Facebook as a resource.

"Employers are nervous about hiring decisions," she observed. "Any source of information, especially candid and unedited, can [allow them] to see how [students] represent themselves away from the office."

And the University of Wisconsin may not be immune.

Lori Berquam, UW interim dean of students, said she has yet to find any hard evidence but imagines it is happening "pretty regularly."

Matt Nelson, a career advisor for UW, echoed Berquam's concerns.

Though he has no firsthand experience, Nelson said he has heard tales of employers jumping onto Facebook to check up on students. Objectionable photos, especially including drinking or suggestion of illegal activity, are most likely to catch the attention of employers, Nelson said.

Nelson further mentioned "murmurings" of political beliefs and affiliations being among the information employers gain and consider by using Facebook.

Russell's Liquors
18 Main St. Downtown Amherst 253-5441
Featuring Busch & Busch Light
13.99* 30/pk cans
Rolling Rock 12oz bots
13.99* case
*all beers plus deposit
Popov Vodka 80° $10.99 1.75 liter
Dinkel Acker 12 pk bots. $8.99*
Bud & Bud Light 12oz bots $13.99* 30 pk
Ted Tail Ale 12oz bots $9.99* 12 pk
Parallele "45" Cote du Rhone $7.99 750ml

Tired of the Dorms?
IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE
Lincoln Real Estate
25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2006

curiosity + adventure + knowledge
= study abroad
And study abroad means the University Studies Abroad Consortium where you can choose from 25 countries. Come soak up the vibrant culture and be transformed by the experience. We offer personalized attention from start to finish.
• Summer, semester and yearlong programs
• Wide range of academic courses • Internships
• Language courses at all levels • Field trips and tours
• Small classes • University credit • Scholarships • Housing
A USAC representative may be coming to campus. Visit usac.unr.edu for exact dates and locations.
USAC Your Gateway to the World

UMASS Campus Recreation
STILL TIME TO ENTER:
Basketball (M/W/C)....A.S.A.P.
GET THOSE FORMS IN BY:
Wallyball (M/W/C)...2/6
Sports Trivia (M/W)...2/8
More Info: 215 Boyden, 5-2693
On the Web: http://www.umass.edu/umim
LATE ENTRANTS SHOULD CHECK FOR EXTENSIONS IN BOYDEN 215

Dance Stuff
Starting a dance class?
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs
220 W. Pleasant Street
253.5200

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
EDITORIAL OPINION
THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2006
"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" – Voltaire
EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Beer scare tactics via e-mail

Jon Brandt

The day before returning to UMass I checked my e-mail and found an e-mail sent by the dean of students, Jo-Ann Vanin. Normally when I get e-mails from the administration I don't worry too much about them, but this one caught my attention. The contents of this e-mail, which most students should have received, informed me that the alcohol policies of the school are being changed. Among other "changes," there were six main categories mentioned. For those who did not get a chance to read the e-mail, allow me to explain those changes now.

Having 10 or more people in one's room, including large gatherings around the floor, will now be prohibited. Any paraphernalia relating to alcohol is now prohibited. Any games, which encourage excessive drinking, are to be prohibited. Having large amounts of alcohol in your room, assuming you are in fact 21 or over, is prohibited. Being in possession of empty containers is prohibited. Finally, if you are experiencing sickness from alcohol you are supposed to take care of yourself and get down to health services.

There they are, ladies and gentlemen, the "new" measures being taken to curb the excessive partying and drinking that goes on at our fine campus. Excuse me if I sound a little sarcastic or wary of these changes, but to send out an e-mail to the entire student body and try to scare students into thinking things have changed is folly.

All the administration is trying to do is put some fear into the hearts of those loveable, underage lushes that can't read and assume their rights are being taken away.

At first glance an average student might think the sky is falling. These new guidelines look really tough and they must be moving towards the final push of bag searches and busting in doors. Unless you are a new student this semester or were born yesterday, none of these changes should shock or scare you. These are basically the same rules that we have always lived with.

All the administration is trying to do is put some fear into the hearts of those loveable, underage lushes that can't read and assume their rights are being taken away. They are stalling because they realize they can't really do anything big without having bag searches. They try very hard, don't get me wrong. Putting security guards-in-training outside of dorms in Southwest by three o'clock last semester really frightened students for about an hour, until they realized it was nothing new. These police are the same thing, just popcorn fluff for the alumni newspaper to show that they are flexing their muscles and cracking down.

Let's go over just why these new rules are nothing more than scare tactics. To start, having no more than 10 people in a room has always been a rule. You and your roommate are only allowed to sign in four people each per night. Add up yourselves and you get 10. While it is true that other kids from the hall could come into your room, even after you signed out the maximum amount of kids your room would essentially be flagged. RA's would know to keep an eye on your room while on rounds.

Paraphernalia relating to alcohol is now banned. Sadly for all of those cool people who need to display their rows of empty Captain Morgan's or Bacardi Limon, there is no way for everyone to know what crazy dudes they are. Maybe they could just pop their collar and act tough. Yeah, that will do. Sorry about the bottles and funnels hanging around guys; life sucks, grab a helmet.

If you play drinking games such as Kings or a number of other great games I can't get away with typing, the ban on these games might hurt your style. Don't worry kids, the Gestapo aren't going to bust down your door. As long as you weren't used to playing in the hall while setting off fire alarms, I don't think John Q. Law will find out about this one.

Having large amounts of alcohol in your room is prohibited. Well if you're under 21 you're already breaking the law, so should this really bother you that much? If you are over 21 you could argue that you need to stock up. You'll never know when there will be a flood and you won't be able to leave the dorm. Come on, you boozehound, put down the 30 and open a 40.

Having empties in your room is equally as dumb as leaving paraphernalia lying around. If you're too lazy to throw out your empty Busch Light cans, leaving a stench in the air, then you don't deserve to have friends over in your room anyway, and chances are they don't want to come over. Just throw it away casually like always and don't make a scene.

Finally, if you're dying of alcohol poisoning, man, up and go to the hospital. No excuse. Last time I checked, doctors know what to do, and I don't think it's worth dying over so that your parents wouldn't know you couldn't handle three Mike's Hard Lemonades. These are the same simple rules we have always lived by, and there is no reason why we can't get along now that an e-mail was sent out. So relax, kids, after all, today is Thursday.

Jon Brandt is a Collegian columnist

The underworld of underwear

Jennifer Lane

Have you ever noticed how many stereotypes there are in this world? Or how easy it is to start a new stereotype? Dumb blondes, seductive brunettes, flamboyant, gay men, butch lesbians, stupid jocks or intelligent library regulars. Where did these come from? Who made blondes dumb and lesbians tough?

I did. You did. Society did. And I'm excited to say that I'm going to do it again. In an attempt to make fun of society, I'm going to create a new stereotype, your underwear. What you wear underneath is private. It's your own. But does it, in a way, describe your personality? Let's venture into the underworld of underwear.

GRANNY PANTIES:

Why are you still wearing these? Did mom buy them for you and you just never stopped? They're big, they're probably Hanes and I imagine you have them in white. Maybe a black pair for those formal evenings when white just wouldn't cut it under your new choir dresses. You are usually labeled a nerd or a dork and you have friends who wear granny panties. Maybe you have a friend who wears bikinis, but that's your rebellious friend who drinks margaritas at the Holiday Inn instead of wine.

BOXERS:

You are the cool man. You rule the school; no matter if you're in high school, college or working, you are popular. You let loose and have fun. Sometimes you can be seen at parties, stripping down to only these boxers and sporting a bow tie for that "party boy" look. Whenever you're talking, you are the center of attention. Everyone likes you, and if you're a girl, you're either a theater/art major or a tomboy.

THONGS:

You are promiscuous. Your underwear drawer is filled to the brim with new styles and colors. Some even tie on the side for easy access. It's perfectly normal to have that little string shoved up your a because after a while you don't feel it. You're a b* and there's probably something permanently wedged up there anyway. You never feel ashamed to let people know you're wearing a thong, and it is often seen crawling out of the back of your pants.

BRIEFS:

You're that guy at work. There are two kinds of "that guy," however, and depending on your personality, you're one of them. The first "that guy" is the guy that no one talks to. You are scary in some way, shape or form and you don't belong to our society. You don't blend in. The second "that guy" is the guy who knows it all. You are getting a promotion next week, but you have no friends or family. Only work. Your life sucks.

BOY CUT:

You probably used to wear thongs only. You now have a steady boyfriend and are bored with the sexy thing but still want a little spice in your life. Either that or you're a tomboy who can't find any more cute boxers. People tend to like you and you can charm the pants off of anyone because you want everyone to see you in this new style of underwear.

MANTIES:

This is a new category for me. Boxer/briefs are what I refer to as manties. You are probably metrosexual. You take care of yourself very well. You're clean shaven, well dressed and polished. You don't know what a hammer looks like and you're probably off polishing your car or motorcycle right now instead of reading the newspaper. You're cute, but you know it. You're smart, but you don't show it. You like a nice, manly manicure every once in a while, and sometimes you can't help but look at another man's butt and wonder why it is so much more toned than yours.

The underworld of underwear is as easy to stereotype as any other subject. I don't know if I believe any of what I'm telling you, but that's what stereotyping is. Putting people into a group mentally, even if you know some of them don't belong, even if you don't believe it's true. It's an awful thing to stereotype, no matter how funny it is.

So the next time you find yourself rummaging through someone else's panty drawer, ask them something about their life in high school. Were they the class nerd? The class jock? And then ask them about their life to see if their underwear is also their outerwear.

Jennifer Lane is a Collegian columnist

Defending Frey-dom of speech

Matt Brochu

Every once in a while, Oprah Winfrey shocks the world (and when I say world, I mean the middle-aged women of America) by gaining 80 pounds in three weeks. Several months ago, she opted to use her influential book club, not her "badunka-dunk," to do the shocking.

After months of relying on classics to fuel her best-seller-creating book club, she switched things up by choosing an autobiography written by a drug-addicted man who A) lost his virginity to a prostitute, B) vomited several times every day for over a decade, and C) drops more f-bombs per minute than Bobby Knight during a halftime speech.

The man is James Frey. His book is "A Million Little Pieces," and it chronicles his recovery at a Minnesota-based rehab clinic after his addictions to everything left him with next to nothing.

Well, Frey is clean now, but his image is far from it. After selling over 3.5 million copies and inspiring countless addicts to give sobriety another shot, he was exposed as a liar by thesmokinggun.com. An investigation probing childhood acquaintances as well as police and court documents spawned an exposé revealing that "the book that made Oprah cry" is filled with embellishments, half-truths and blatant lies.

In other words, "A Million Little Pieces" simply needs to be translated from time to time. In his book, Frey claimed to strike a police officer while driving drunk and on crack. Translation: he struck a curb and caused it to crack.

In other words, "A Million Little Pieces" simply needs to be translated from time to time. In his book, Frey claimed to strike a police officer while driving drunk and on crack. Translation: he struck a curb and caused it to crack. He claimed to have undergone a root canal without Novocain. Translation: not only was he given Novocain, but the dentist also let him pick a prize out of the treasure chest (he chose a green slap bracelet) before he left the office.

After these developments hit the Internet, it was only a matter of time before Oprah weighed in with her two (zillion) cents. From sampling her quotes in various media outlets, one might have thought that Dr. Phil had defected to "The Tyra Banks Show." Her emotions ran the gamut from "shocked," to "betrayed," to "embarrassed," to the point where she even took some time away from her daily "O" Magazine cover shoot to do some damage control.

She played the part of the upset parent quite well, conveying through her live, ratings-boosting follow-up show that she wasn't mad, but she was disappointed in James. If she could've sent the man to his room without dessert (just two net carbs, as seen on page 39 of this month's "O"), she damn sure would have. Needless to say, I think she's an idiot.

Sure, James Frey exaggerated the truth to a certain extent. Welcome to the world of story-telling, a realm where details are omitted, actions are embellished and some things are just plain made up. We all do this, and we do so on a daily basis. Just ask the guy who told you he drank 15 beers last Friday night. Just ask Wilt Chamberlain, who claimed in his own memoir to have slept with 20,000 women (almost one a day) before he died at age 63. Just ask any rapper who would need a calculator to add up the hoes, guns and inches of rims he mentioned on his last CD. And just ask Oprah, who embellished her own self-proclaimed outrage merely to gain viewers, sell magazines and purchase the rights to rerun the fourth season of "Xena: Warrior Princess" on her TV network.

Primarily, exaggeration is done for bragging rights, but sometimes it's done to add an element of style. There's a scene in "Good Will Hunting" where Will, the janitor genius played by Matt Damon, finally breaks a prolonged silence with Sean, a troubled psychiatrist played by Robin Williams, by beginning a joke with, "I was on a plane once."

He goes on to tell a story involving a pilot, a stewardess, some coffee and some oral sex, and after the punch line they both had a good laugh. With the ice broken, Sean points out the fact that Will has never left Boston before, to which he replies, "I know, but the joke's better if I tell it in the first person." And he's absolutely right.

This is precisely why James Frey did what he did. Fiction and fantasy are all well and good, but nothing captures the imagination quite like reality. With the exception of the short dude down the hall who leaves a squirrel-sized pile of body hair in the bathroom sink each week, we happen to have a lot more in common with human beings than we do with hobbits. We want to see, hear and read about real people doing real things, simply because we can identify with who they are and what they go through.

In other words, "A Million Little Pieces," simply needs to be translated from time to time. In his book, Frey claimed to strike a police officer while driving drunk and on crack. Translation: he struck a curb and caused it to crack.

A few years ago, the American media finally caught on to this concept and ran with it. They must have realized that "America's Funniest Home Videos," a show consisting almost entirely of fathers getting hit in the junk by their sons' Wiffle ball bats, has been on for almost 20 years.

Which is what brings us here today, smack dab in the middle of the Reality TV age, where you can't change the channel without seeing people like us redecorating, renewing their faith in love.

So give James Frey a break. He's done more drugs than Courtney Love, Ozzy Osbourne and the cast of "Dazed and Confused" combined. If you were surprised by the recent news, then you didn't read the book for what it actually was. The addiction, the love, the misery, the recovery – all were real. He gave us what we wanted, we ate it up and I can't really fault him for that. This man was an alcoholic and a drug addict and a criminal. Now I guess we can add human to that list.

Matt Brochu is a Collegian columnist

Student wants beerocracy now

Brett Crosby

I like to believe that attending the University of Massachusetts qualifies me as an adult. Taking a catalog of classes that directly affect my future, the whole idea of not being twelve anymore, and oh yeah, not living with a parent or guardian. Hey Gargano, what time does curfew start?

I'm sure glad that the administration worked around the clock over intersession to improve my college experience. Maybe this semester there will be a plan to alleviate the concern that UMass is the most expensive (and rising) state school for residents? Maybe our major minor programs have expanded over intersession? Hey Mike, if I have a girl over, should she be accompanied by a chaperone?

Oh, I have an idea. Let's enlarge our beerocracy. Document that empty beer can. We'll rally UMass by making it not so bad. Beerocratic rules usually keep the masses in line; just ask King George III or the Iraqi insurgency. Take those empties out of your windows. Someone might have a seizure. And I cannot wait for, "Hey, you kids smoking cigarettes outside the building. Get your ID's out or else."

Better check behind your shoulder the next time you curse, or you may be checking your mailbox for judicial sanctions. Hey you with the beer t-shirt on, turn it inside out, it's not conducive to my learning.

Of course their new cigarette ID process will be for my benefit as a student, and will surely stop all underage smoking. I larger classrooms? Nah, let's just hire more storm troopers for IDing, that'll do it.

You know, students have filthy mouths these days. Down with profanity. Better check behind your shoulder the next time you curse, or you may be checking your mailbox for judicial sanctions. Hey you with the beer t-shirt on, turn it inside out, it's not conducive to my learning.

So what does my return to the University have in store this semester? Perhaps mandatory travel around campus in a single file line? Perhaps a campus-wide e-mail from Jo-Anne T. Vanin detailing all the new things that I am able to do at school? Sadly, the wealth of new opportunities and programs must be slated for next break's to-do list, as we are met only with new alcohol policies.

Every student signed a piece of paper acknowledging the new alcohol-related privacy expropriations before the move-in process. Oddly enough, I am unable to ever recall my having to sign for any new recreation or education programs. But it's okay because Mike Gargano is looking out for you.

It's simply incredulous that UMass's bad publicity is a direct result from the manner in which the University deals with and treats students. There is no way that cultures of negativity can continue to breed other cultures of negativity. The student body's general comportment is not a direct result of the way the administration interacts with it. The administration's playing dumb over where the bad publicity comes from, and it is as ridiculous as my trying to guess where all the empty 30 packs around campus come from.

And by the way, all those empty 30 packs in the halls and bathrooms from this past weekend must have been left over from last semester when they weren't allowed either.

However, I touched on earlier that I like to believe that I am an adult and as such I am willing to make concessions. Serious binge drinking definitely does take place here in Amherst, and it is a problem. However, the campus exudes a depressing environment: crumbling sidewalks, depressive concrete architecture, and an administration that is concerned only with its own image and subconsciously tells students that they are not wanted.

Constantly berating students with new fiats is not the answer. This campus simply cannot and will not be improved with stricter rules and regulations, and may even make it worse. Alcohol abuse and control will always be a problem as long as the University continues to ignore the physical and mental needs of students.

Brett Crosby is a UMass student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2006

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ton's 'Corpse Bride' d

By Michael Deehan
Collegian Staff

Thirteen years ago, Tim Burton's "The Nightmare Before Christmas" reached cult classic status among stop-animation fans, the melancholy youth of early '90s America and all sorts of tasteful in between. Burton's dark humorous style was perfectly paired with the music of regular collaborator Danny Elfman to create a fun and timeless holiday musical. "The Nightmare Before Christmas" enjoyed success on VHS and later on DVD, creating a legion of fans of all ages which to this day can be seen sporting the vast amounts of "Nightmare" merchandise available in stores. It is this sustained success among teens and young adults, (which is rare for an animated film) that led Burton back into the stop-animation genre with last year's "The Corpse Bride."

Comparisons between the two films are easy to draw. Both rely heavily on Burton's own character and art design, resulting in similar-looking environments filled with sometimes nearly identical creatures. "Nightmare's" Halloween Town was populated by skeletons, monsters and other ghoulish characters. The same can be said for the Land of the Dead as featured in "Corpse Bride." One almost expects Jack Skellington, the protagonist of "Nightmare," to make a cameo or sing a song.

"Corpse Bride" feels, at first, like a slightly altered version of the typical gloomy scenery Burton has dreamed up numerous times. Upon the introduction of the titular bride and the netherworld where she resides, the film takes a turn for the worst. It's here that the film's unoriginality leaps into tedious musical numbers, as ideas from "Beetle Juice," "Nightmare" and "Edward Scissorhands" intermingle to produce a stock mixture of the director's once-visionary style.

Longtime Burton collaborator Danny Elfman's score is appropriate for the dreary Victorian setting, but lacks the sort of punch that carries his other work so well.

"Corpse Bride" has several original songs written by Elfman and performed by the cast. There are no standout gems on the soundtrack, no "This is Halloween" or "What's This?" to quote endlessly every time it starts to snow. The music is forgettable, but mercifully short and doesn't bog down the pace of the film too much. The DVD's extras feature a short documentary focusing on Elfman's role in the film, but it fails to show why his usually distinctive and memorable music is as dead as the characters who sing it.

One characteristic "Corpse Bride" has over its predecessor is the look of the animation. Thanks to advancements in digitally controlled cameras and puppetry, co-director Mike Johnson and his crew of animators were able to bring the "Corpse Bride" to life without the visible frame transitions and jerky movements that have marred stop-animation since its inception. The puppets now move as smoothly and realistically as their computer-animated counterparts, while retaining the charm of being real objects manipulated by human hands.

The special features on the disc include interviews with cast and crew along with the typical behind the scenes documentary featurette. Most of the extras center on Burton's influence on the project and numerous interview subjects say how much of a genius he is to once again bring his cash cow of an imagination to the realm of stop-animation. As interesting as it is to see the extraordinary effort put into the movie by the puppeteers and crew, it's hard not to cringe as all their skill is exhausted on the bland script.

The highlight of the extra features is seeing the fine cast of actors in the recording studio. Johnny Depp, Helena Bonham Carter and Emily Watson disguise their voices inside their characters so well that it's easy to forget that they are well-known stars. Tracy Ullman, Joanna Lumley, Albert Finney and the extraordinary Christopher Lee all lend their more recognizable voices to supporting characters. Lee's booming voice makes his Pastor Galswells one of the more arresting performances of the film.

"The Corpse Bride," judging by the amount of 50 percent-off merchandise still seen hanging in Hot Topic, hasn't lived up to the high standard set by "The Nightmare Before Christmas." The movie and the DVD will be enjoyable for any fan of Tim Burton, but if you're looking for quality, creative, stop-animated fun, save your money until next Tuesday when "Wallace & Gromit – The Curse of the Were-Rabbit" comes out on DVD.

NBC's Winter Olympics coverage faces an 'Idol' threat

By Hal Boedeker
The Orlando Sentinel

Clocking in at 418 hours, NBC Sports' coverage of the XX Winter Olympic Games qualifies as a really big show. Ratings gold, however, is not assured for NBC. Fox's red-hot "American Idol" could singe the 17-day Games, which start Friday.

NBC's research indicates that viewers intend to watch with nearly the same fervor they tuned in the Salt Lake City Games four years ago, says Dick Ebersol, chairman of NBC Universal Sports.

"The Winter Games happen only once every four years," Ebersol says in a recent preview for TV critics. "'Idol' is going to be there for hours and hours and hours, well into May."

Despite "a pretty healthy feeling" about the ratings, Ebersol adds, "'Idol' is a strong, strong series."

Fox has reason to be hopeful after the fifth edition of "Idol" debuted to huge ratings last month. "We think the 'Idol' audience is unbelievably loyal," says Peter Liguori, president of Fox Entertainment. "This is their favorite show, and we anticipate that our ratings will be solid."

If "Idol" beats the Olympics, it will be the show that took down a giant. The Olympics will sprawl over the schedule like a behemoth. More than 230 hours will spill over to cable networks. CNBC, MSNBC and USA, and more than 75 percent of that coverage will be live.

The prime-time coverage on NBC won't be live because of the six-hour difference between the Eastern time zone and Turin, Italy. NBC goes the delayed route to serve station affiliates, advertisers and audiences. Viewers like it that way, according to NBC's repeated surveys.

"They tell us they want to watch the Games when they're available to watch the Games," Ebersol says. "Over 90 percent of them say that they're available in prime time and at no other point during the day."

NBC is trumpeting its strides in high definition. "For the first time in American television history, an Olympics will be presented in true HD, and it will be a simulcast," says executive producer David Neal. "If you have an HD set and you have HD available where you live, you'll be able to see the NBC broadcast product in true HD. It will be the same set of announcers, the same telecast, the same replays, the same graphics."

Outspoken skier Bode Miller should be a major draw. Boosting his profile were a recent "60 Minutes" interview and cover stories by Time and Newsweek.

"The amazing thing about Bode is that unlike anybody else skiing today, he's going to ski all five disciplines during the Games," Ebersol says. "He'll be a story through the entirety of the Games."

The backdrop of Turin, in northern Italy near the Swiss border, will be another attraction.

"You can't ask for a better setting," says Bob Costas, NBC's prime-time Olympic host for the sixth time. "It will be a glorious Olympic setting."

But there's the matter of what to call that backdrop. Many newspapers will stick with Turin. NBC is going with Torino. Ebersol made that call, noting that people there call it Torino.

"It just rolls of your mouth," he says. "It has a romanticism to it. And I just thought that that was a wonderful way to name these Games."

Costas quips, "[I'm] very much looking forward to our feature on the Shroud of Torino."

Despite its obvious appeal and the fact that it only comes around every four years, the Winter Olympics may not be able to distract viewers of the ever-popular "American Idol."

Kid Rock gears up for Super Bowl with two shows and an album

By Brian McCollum
Detroit Free Press

DETROIT — When Kid Rock proclaims that he's throwing the hottest Super Bowl bashes in town, it's reasonable to give him the benefit of the doubt.

He's a guy, after all, who has gotten rich by mastering the art of the Detroit party, then boasting about it on millions of records. When someone brazenly declares himself Pimp of the Nation and the nation goes along – laughing with him and not at him – it's a good bet he's got the whole fun-and-entertainment thing down pat.

There are about 35,000 others who figure that Kid Rock can show them a good time: During a 24-hour stretch in early December, they bought up all the seats for his Friday and Saturday shows at Joe Louis Arena. Since then, top tickets for the hometown rocker's Super Bowl shows have commanded a street value of up to $1,000 apiece, say area ticket brokers.

Kid Rock's life in the limelight was just hitting its stride in 2000 when the NFL awarded Super Bowl XL to Detroit. Ever mindful of the big picture – a shrewdness that has kept his career thriving while his rap-rock peers have quietly disappeared – he immediately contacted "every decent venue around here," locking in tentative holds at concert venues from the Pontiac Silverdome to the State Theatre for a date six years down the road.

"We decided we wanted to be right downtown in the mix," he says of ultimately settling on the old arena by the river. "When the NFL comes in town for a Super Bowl, they pretty much control the whole place. They've got a lock on everything. So we just said, 'You know what? We'll have our own party, in our own house.' We sold 35,000 tickets before the NFL even knew what happened."

Kid Rock says the league was eventually happy to play nice – to a point.

"All of a sudden, they were calling the office looking for tickets to the Kid Rock show," he says, referring to the headquarters of his manager, Punch Andrews. "They called and wanted 65 tickets. Punch said, 'Sure. And we get 65 tickets to the Super Bowl.'"

That little deal was never consummated. But Kid Rock will make it to Ford Field next Sunday, if only because he committed to taking a British buddy who's never seen the big game. This won't be Rock's first Super Bowl: He's attended several since his '99 national breakout, and even played the 2004 pregame show with Aerosmith – a performance "nobody remembers because Janet Jackson flashed her boobs at halftime."

"Honestly, I'd rather just sit and watch the game on the big screen," says Rock, taking an afternoon break last week at his home studio. "I like partying at home, with the TV, just having people over. It's kind of hard to do that this time, every freaking celebrity in the world will be here, everybody trying to VIP-this and RSVP-that."

Rock, who will dash out after his Saturday show to host Sports Illustrated's swimsuit-model party, wants to turn that to his advantage. Musical pal and mentor Hank Williams Jr. has already promised to hop onstage at Saturday's concert, and Rock says he expects several more brand-name guests both nights. And if a certain plan goes really well – he won't divulge details – concertgoers on one of the two nights could get a premium treat.

"We're working on a couple of guests for something that would be monumental," he says with a sly grin. "If it works out, it'll definitely make the history books in Detroit."

Next weekend's gigs will serve a handy dual purpose: Along with a handful of Midwest dates this week, the hometown shows are kicking off the promotional effort for his debut concert album, "Live Trucker," due in stores Feb. 21. It's his fifth release since "Devil Without a Cause" made him a household name, and his first since 2004's self-titled collection of countrified rock 'n' roll.

Kid Rock considers the record to be something of a throwback, the sort of straight-up rock concert album that was standard in the '70s. Featuring songs recorded at various Detroit shows during the past five years – chosen after months of listening to countless hours of live sets – the album is described by Rock as a no-frills record showcasing the years of road conditioning by Rock and his band, Twisted Brown Trucker. No bonus DVDs, no hidden tracks, no gimmicks, a sticker alerts buyers that the disc "Does Contain Real Music By An Actual Live Band."

The nod to tradition is apparent from the moment you see the cover image, an inescapable homage to Bob Seger's own Detroit concert record, 1975's "Live Bullet."

"I thought my first live record should definitely be Detroit, because this is where everything happened," he says. "I've always said I wanted to do a live record where half is recorded at [New York's] Apollo and half at the Grand Ole Opry. Maybe I can go that way now."

Rock says he's proud of the effort, confident that it expertly documents the best of his songs and his band at its best. That five-piece outfit now features scene veteran Kenny Tudrick (Detroit Cobras) on lead guitar, replacing longtime guitarist Kenny Olson, who split last year to pursue a solo career. Tudrick is no Trucker stranger: Eight years ago, he supplied the drums to Kid Rock's "Cowboy" and the guitar riff to "Bawitdaba."

Rock knows as well as anyone that there's one crucial element no live recording could adequately capture: the you-have-to-be-there electricity between Kid Rock, showman extraordinaire, and his fiercely devoted Detroit audiences.

It's a component that will get extra juice this weekend from his new live set up, a visual loudmouth of a stage that virtually screams its red-and-gold theme in what Rock calls a "rock 'n' roll Royal Albert Hall." Accompanying the new 20-foot video wall and elevated dance platforms are runways that extend well into the arena's side seats – a relatively new stage embellishment the concert industry has dubbed the "screamer deck" because of its effect on nearby fans.

For all his stylistic restlessness – which has led him from rap to country to Southern rock, from furs to cowboy boots – one big part of the Kid Rock formula remains unchanged: It's all about the show.

Especially when his hometown has a Super Bowl to show off.

"My crowd is made up of hard-working people. They just want to let loose, drink some drinks and have fun," he says. "That's what they get: a 100 percent rock 'n' roll show with everything – the pyro, the girls, the music, the lights, the video. Anything that's available, it's coming at you."

Rap-rocker Kid Rock will perform at the Super Bowl this year, in addition to releasing a new live album.

Howdy, partner. Love stories about manly men go way back

By Mark Rahner
The Seattle Times

You'd think people had never laid eyes on a guy cowboy before.

Weeks after "Brokeback Mountain's" release, a Poulsbo, Wash., theater, along with one in Utah, still makes national news for shunning the movie, even though most critics love it, it raked at the Golden Globes and led Tuesday's Oscar nominees, and it's a bona fide success at the box office.

Still can't wrap your head around the concept of gay cowboys? Got news for you, pardner: You've been watching them all your life.

The cowboys in a lot of classics may not be explicitly getting it on like the "Brokeback" boys, but there's no denying the obviousness of what you could delicately call a strong homoerotic subtext.

It doesn't take a decoder ring or a social/political agenda to spot the signals, whether you're straight or gay, a Western buff or tenderfoot. And I'm not even talking about Robert Conrad's tight little outfit in the old "The Wild Wild West" TV series.

But trust me, I've put in some time in the saddle and rustled up a few classic Westerns that really are love stories between men. Manly men.

"Red River" (1948): Howard Hawks' classic was already notorious before the 1995 documentary "The Celluloid Closet" outed it. See the flirting between cowboys Montgomery Clift and John Ireland while admiring each other's pistols. Ireland's character, Cherry, says, "There are only two things more beautiful than a gun: a Swiss watch or a woman from anywhere. Ever had a good ... Swiss watch?"

Later, damsel Tess Millay (Joanne Dru) hollers at feuding Clift and John Wayne, above: "Anybody with half a mind would know you two love each other."

Hawks' "Rio Bravo" (1959) isn't as overt. Sheriff John T. Chance (John Wayne) relies on alcoholic Dude (Dean Martin), cranky old Stumpy (Walter Brennan) and handsome young Colorado (Ricky Nelson) to fend off thugs trying to break a murderer out of jail.

Take a gander at the looks on the faces of Dude and Colorado as they sing – to each other. Or the way they walk down the street whistling together at the end, and the way Dude opens a door for his new companion.

"Hawks' camera does cast a pretty queer eye on the young Rick Nelson, but that could be there as much for the girls as for the boys," says Robert Cumbow, the Seattle-based author of "Once Upon a Time: The Films of Sergio Leone."

"Arguably the gayest thing in the film is Walter Brennan's funny old Stumpy, constantly bickering at John T. (while doing his housekeeping for him) as if he were genuinely jealous of the sheriff's relationships with younger men." Could that have anything to do with the playful kiss Johnny T. plants on the top of Stumpy's noggin?

"The Virginian" (1929, not on DVD): In the swishiest of several versions, Gary Cooper plays The V, and he wants to know why his friend Steve (Richard Arlen) is hanging around with that black-hatted tramp Trampas (Walter Huston), who's seducing him to the dark side.

"Why didn't you wait for me?" The V asks when he sees Steve with Trampas at a party. "You ain't very choosy about your company."

"Maybe you'll explain what you mean by that," Trampas retorts.

Catfight over a guy.

"You and I done a lot of loco things," The V later tells Steve, as he puts his hand on Steve's leg, leaves it there a really long time, then slowly slides it off.

"The Wild Bunch" (1969, R), just out in a magnificent two-disc special edition from Warner's must-have "Sam Peckinpah's The Legendary Westerns Collection," which also includes "Ride the High Country" (1962), "The Ballad of Cable Hogue" (1970) and "Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid" (1973, R).

Don't let the bloodshed distract you. Dutch (Ernest Borgnine) clearly has a man-crush on gang leader Pike (William Holden) and meets his maker with the other man's name on his lips. Ex-Bunch member Deke (Robert Ryan) pursues Pike with the determination of an old girlfriend.

"Ride the High Country" (1962): Aging cowboy stars Randolph Scott and Joel McCrea are like an old married couple as they bed down in a barn in their union suits. Scott removes McCrea's coat for him before a fight and puts it back on afterward.

Scott snaps at McCrea about rescuing damsel-in-distress Mariette Hartley. "She stays here. We're packing gold, not petticoats." And when they do rescue her from hilljack predators, they change her from a fancy dress into guy's clothes.

Which brings us to "Johnny Guitar" (1954, not on DVD). "I've never seen a woman that was more a man," a bartender says of Joan Crawford's Vienna character, perhaps named after those little sausages. She dresses and holds a gun like a man. And just so's you know who's in charge, her suitor goes by the moniker The Dancin' Kid. Some crowd: The Kid's pal, Bart (Ernest Borgnine), explicitly doesn't like women, and is even mean to horses.

"7 Men" director Budd Boetticher's Westerns with Randolph Scott might be on the "Brokeback" guys' Netflix list if they were in print. (They crop up regularly on cable's The Westerns Channel.) Rumors were widespread about Scott and Cary Grant, who lived together a dozen years.

And this doesn't even begin to get into the singing cowboys.

Actors Heath Ledger and Jake Gyllenhaal starred as gay lovers in Ang Lee's "Brokeback Mountain", although gay cowboys are not a new trend in filmmaking.

Oscar nominees predictable

By Beth Wickman
Oklahoma Daily (U. Oklahoma)

NORMAN, Okla. — Poor Peter Jackson. "King Kong" didn't get nominated as best film of the year. But that's OK because I'm tired of hearing about him and "Lord of the Rings." Even though he'll probably win sound editing and picture editing, it seriously seems like something a monkey could have done.

There are eight nominations for "Brokeback Mountain" and from what I can tell audiences might not be too pleased if it wins all of them. However, I believe its competition might stem from "Munich" or "Syriana." Today's society likes edgy movies. But then again, that could be why "Brokeback Mountain" is nominated so much.

I think maybe Joaquin Phoenix should win for his portrayal of Johnny Cash. It would be a nice repeat of last year's Academy Awards when Jamie Foxx took home the Oscar. And maybe, the Academy won't think of it as repeating itself and instead think of it as continuing a good tradition.

As for actresses, I'm pretty impressed with the turnout: Keira Knightley, Judi Dench, Felicity Huffman, Charlize Theron, and Reese Witherspoon. I liked Keira Knightley in "Love, Actually," and she did a pretty good job in "Pride and Prejudice," but she's definitely the underdog in this category.

Judi Dench was also in "Pride and Prejudice," but she's nominated for "Mrs. Henderson Presents" ... and I didn't see that. I'm thinking the Academy might go with its usual, "well she might not get another chance to win an award since she's old, let's give it to her."

As for original screenplay, I'm excited that "The Squid and The Whale" was nominated. I haven't seen it yet, but I hear it's worth a drive to Oklahoma City, since it's not in Norman for the time being.

But that might also be an underdog this year, seeing as it's up against "Crash," "Syriana," "Match Point," and "Good Night and Good Luck." I'd favor "Crash" or "Syriana," but that's because I have something against Woody Allen for marrying his daughter.

Of course, as an adapted screenplay, we have "Brokeback Mountain."

I think one reason I don't necessarily want it to win all the awards is because award shows should be exciting, not predictable.

If that wins, it'll be exactly why I started detesting things like "Lord of the Rings": People get a big head and think they are so great that they don't bother with other movies that made a difference to some people.

"Star Wars" and "Harry Potter" each got one nomination for a minor category that people will probably first-forward through.

Which is OK, because once again, there have been how many "Star Wars" movies made ... and how many of them have won awards? C'mon people, there's such a thing as overkill. Same with "Harry Potter," and we're only on the fourth movie.

Of course, some will say Michael Bay should have been nominated for everything. But, Michael Bay, friends, should be left on his own island, to start his own race of people who will actually watch and enjoy his movies.

That might be the better option than making us normal people suffer since we see and actually acknowledge that a pretty good nomination fist has been put out. None of the nominations include Michael Bay, so there's something for which to thank the Academy.

INDOOR SIDEWALK SALE
Winter Clearance
20%-80% savings
Final Markdowns
5 Days only!
Tuesday, January 31
through Saturday, February 4
Hurry!
Women's Clothing, Shoes and Accessories
Amherst Williamstown Northampton www.zanna.com
ZANNA

University of Massachusetts Amherst

Student Affairs & Campus Life

2006 Important Changes

Jo-Anne Vanin, Associate Vice-Chancellor and Dean of Students, announces important changes to the University of Massachusetts Amherst residence hall alcohol policies (Section II.D, Code of Student Conduct). These changes, recommended by the Student Affairs Judicial Issues Committee (SAJIC) which is comprised of students, staff, and faculty, were subsequently approved by campus officials and are intended to positively influence the living-learning environment in the residence halls. The following changes are effective for the Spring 2006 semester.

Alcohol – Large gatherings

Due to the potential for noise violations and illegal alcohol consumption, large gatherings are prohibited in the residence halls. A group of more than 10 people in a residence room in which alcohol is present (regardless of room size) will be considered a large gathering. Progressive large gatherings (i.e. round robins) and/or any gatherings that spill out into a common space are prohibited and may be viewed as a violation of the alcohol policy.

Alcohol – Alcohol paraphernalia

The possession and/or use of drinking paraphernalia or products that promote the abuse of alcohol and/or put the user in a position to consume alcohol irresponsibly is prohibited. This includes but is not limited to funnels, taps, and beirut/beer pong tables.

Alcohol – Drinking games

Creating, offering, and/or engaging in drinking games or other behaviors designed for the purpose of rapid and/or excessive consumption is prohibited. At no time should activities which encourage excessive drinking and/or lead to the endangerment of the individual served take place in the residence halls.

Alcohol – Large volume

The amount of alcohol which a student may possess and/or store is limited to twelve (12 oz) bottles/cans of beer, two (750 mL) bottles of wine, or one bottle of hard liquor (1L). This applies to each resident in a room who is 21 or older. Other quantity-dispensing containers, including but not limited to kegs and beer balls, are prohibited in all areas of the residence halls.

Alcohol –Empty containers

Possession of empty alcohol containers (i.e liquor bottles, wine bottles, and/or beer cans) is prohibited in residence halls by students who are under 21 and may be viewed as evidence of possession and/or consumption of alcohol. In addition, students are not allowed to use alcohol containers, whether full or empty, as decorations within their residence hall room.

Intoxication and Good Samaritan Protocol

Intoxication, defined as being under the influence of alcohol or any other psychoactive drug to any extent which requires the attention of University staff or which causes a disturbance or is a danger to persons or property is prohibited. You may be reluctant to seek medical help for an individual experiencing severe intoxication or a serious injury after consuming alcohol. However, it is imperative that you call for medical assistance since these emergencies are potentially life threatening. UMass Amherst has developed the Good Samaritan Protocol to ensure that the health and safety of all community members remains our first priority.

Fabio in funny Super Bowl ad

By Phyllis Furman
New York Daily News

Heartthrob Fabio, with his buff chest and long flowing locks, gives a beautiful woman a big surprise in his first-ever Super Bowl commercial.

Nationwide Insurance will go for bawdy laughs in its first national Super Bowl spot featuring Fabio, Nationwide execs told the New York Daily News.

While other Super Bowl advertisers are still steering clear of sex or crass humor following Janet Jackson's 2004 "Nipplegate," Nationwide will push the envelope this Sunday.

The insurance company's 30-second ad, which will run in the third quarter of the game, starts out looking like a cheesy, soap opera-inspired shampoo commercial.

Fabio, dressed in a white pirate shirt – his bare chest is showing, of course – is seen standing on a gondola, rowing, in Venice. His passenger is a beautiful woman with flowing hair that rivals his.

Then come the over-the-top, suggestive images: a white stallion, a flower opening in slow motion, Fabio blowing petals into the camera, and a gondola heading into a tunnel. In between it all, a shampoo bottle, labeled Fabio, pops in as well.

It's all one big Harlequin romance until Fabio reaches out to hand his lady a rose. She looks up in horror to see Fabio as an 85-year old man.

The cautionary punchline: "Life comes at you fast."

"We're going for big laughs and big talk value," said Steven Schreibman, vice president of advertising and brand management for Nationwide.

Though he's no ad man, Fabio said the goal of the ad, created by Dallas agency TM, was to set Nationwide apart from sober insurance ads. "The company was tired of silly commercials from the competition," Fabio said, calling in from Los Angeles.

Though his sculpted face has been on the cover of 2,000 romance novels and he is about to appear in an HBO film called "Star," Fabio said being on the Super Bowl is a new high for him. He plans to watch on Sunday and is rooting for the Seattle Seahawks.

The model went through 4 hours of make-up to perfect his older look. Does he expect to ever look that way? "I hope not," he said. "But in life you never know."

Fabio is about to expand his Fabio fashion line, which is now sold in Sam's Club stores. He expects an announcement with another national retailer shortly.

Fabio isn't the only celebrity appearing at the Super Bowl, which is expected to attract 90 million viewers.

Monday, Pepsi announced that P.Diddy will return to star in a Super Bowl ad for Diet Pepsi. A second Diet Pepsi spot will feature Jackie Chan. Comedian Jay Mohr, of "Jerry Maguire" fame, stars in both, acting as Diet Pepsi's "agent."

And Bayer's Aleve has tapped "Star Trek's" Mr. Spock Leonard Nimoy to star in its Super Bowl commercial.

But overall, this is not a banner year for celebrities in the Super Bowl, said entertainment consultant Ryan Schinman, who matches stars and advertisers. "People are looking for alternate ways" to tell their story, he said. Other Super Bowl ads will be heavy on special effects and wacky humor.

The average 30-second Super Bowl ad this year cost $2.5 million, up 4.2 percent, from last year's $2.4 million.

A devoted fan embraces Fabio, who has a large female fan base and will appear, bare-chested, in a humorous commercial during this year's Super Bowl game.

Sorry, Oprah, it's still a great book

By Julia Keller
Chicago Tribune

A nice deep breath, please. In and out. That's right.

Thank you.

Perhaps we can take advantage of this temporary calm, this blessed respite from rancor and scolding, to acknowledge a largely forgotten but not altogether irrelevant truth:

"A Million Little Pieces" is one terrific book.

It's hypnotically readable and deeply moving. It breaks new ground with its narrative structure and typography. Even the punctuation – or lack thereof – is weirdly riveting.

Yet amid the quite legitimate furor over author James Frey's fibs and flourishes, amid the high-decibel debates about the murky rules of memoir and the primacy of fact, one fact has been routinely overlooked:

The guy can write.

The scads of people who bought "A Million Little Pieces" long before Oprah Winfrey canonized it – and remember, the book was published three years ago, to critical acclaim and impressive sales – aren't fools. They're not drooling dolts who stuck with a boringly mediocre book because they had nothing better to do.

They read it because once you start reading it, you can't stop.

I'm not excusing Frey's lies or condoning his misrepresentations. (I feel I should repeat that sentence about 14 times, to head off the inevitable e-mail assaults from all the Diogenes wannabes out there, but space constraints forbid it.)

I simply wish the finger-wagging know-it-alls who have been taking such obvious glee in shaming Frey – "The facts come first!" – might have paused, ever so briefly, to consider the notion that the book is splendidly written, something I discovered when I first read it in 2003, and was reminded of when I reread it last week. And that more than likely, will still be reading it in 20 years.

Yet pundit after pundit all have said much the same thing: Frey shouldn't have made stuff up. Lies are bad. Truth is good.

Fine. OK. Stipulated. We get it.

But once the Sunday school lesson is over, what do we have before us? We have a whopping good book, a book that snatches you up and deposits you summarily in hell, a book that rocks and sings and repulses and enchants.

Maybe so, say Frey's fiercest critics. But people didn't buy the book for its literary delights; they bought it because they thought it was the gospel truth, plain and simple.

Really? The bookstores are full of books just bursting with firm, indisputable, unassailable, irrefutable truths. Those books don't sell the millions of copies that Frey's did. The reason for the success of "A Million Little Pieces" is far more complex than that, just as all literary successes are more complex. If the formula were that easy – "It's the truth, stupid!" – then everybody would follow it and every book would be a best-seller.

The presumed veracity of Frey's book undoubtedly was part of the reason for its success, but another part was Frey's masterful sense of narrative pacing and truly audacious willingness to indulge the grotesque. Consider the opening scene, when he's riding on a plane and realizes his clothes "are covered with a colorful mixture of spit, snot, urine, vomit and blood." In the ensuing pages, there's a lot more snot and blood where that came from. And there is also a pugnacious present tense – "are" covered, not "were" covered – which keeps rust from caking on the words.

Frey's use of staccato, sometimes even single-word paragraphs makes the pages look pale and anemic – all that strange white space – yet also makes the long story unspool like an overheard cell phone conversation: You can't stop listening.

Also effective is Frey's decision not to indent the first lines of paragraphs or to indulge in quotation marks. Here is an exchange with his parents:

How are you, James?

I'm fine, Dad.

You're doing okay?

I'm fine.

My mother speaks.

Are you getting better?

I don't know.

Do you feel any better?

I don't know.

Are you learning anything?

I don't know.

Sam Weller, author of the 2005 biography of Ray Bradbury, "The Bradbury Chronicles" (William Morrow), which will be published in paperback this month, also wishes that people would pause, even as they reach down to pick up the next rock to hurl at Frey, to reflect on the man's talents.

"Regardless of the controversy, he's an outstanding writer," declares Weller, a professor in Columbia College Chicago's creative writing program. A student recommended Frey's book to him some time ago, thus Weller read it before all heck broke loose over it. "He's an amazing writer. I found it provocative and visual and gut-wrenching."

So does Weller tell his students it's OK to make stuff up and call it fact? Of course not. And his Bradbury biography is scrupulously researched, he notes. But there's another important fact at stake in the Frey affair. The fact that Frey's work "grabs you and engages you," Weller says.

Frank McCourt's lovely, haunting "Angela's Ashes" (1996) is widely credited with helping to jump-start the current craze for memoir, a genre that has enjoyed a long and distinguished history despite its slippery and elusive character: Can events be rearranged? Can people be renamed? Should every last detail be fact-checked or is there room for a smidgen of poetic license?

It's a literary form that includes such classic works as Thomas DeQuincy's "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater" (1821) and Mary McCarthy's "Memories of a Catholic Girlhood" (1957). Yet will McCourt and others now be, in effect, frey'ed? Does thesmokinggun.com have a Dublin branch?

The fuss over Frey is the reverse of what happened when Stephen Crane published "The Red Badge of Courage" in 1895. Because it sounded so authentic, Civil War veterans were sure that it had been written by one of their own, despite Crane's youth. Everybody thought Crane's story was secretly a memoir, although it was billed as a novel. Now everybody thinks Frey's work is secretly a novel, although billed as a memoir. In both cases, the issue arises not from some esoteric quarrel over genre. But from the power of the writing.

I wish Frey had told the literal truth. I wish that not only because, as America's stern-browed and self-righteous columnist corps has been reminding us incessantly of late, truth is important. But also because Frey is a marvelously innovative storyteller. His book nabbed a large audience for the most ancient and basic of reasons. It's a great read.

Dumplings welcome Chinese New Year with tidings of good fortune

By Bill Daley
Chicago Tribune

Robin Xu Murphy sits at the head of her dining room table with her 4-year-old daughter cradled on her lap. Little Catherine looks very happy and content, basking in her mother's love and nibbling on a just-boiled Chinese dumpling. A faint, rhythmic pounding can be heard from the kitchen of Murphy's modest Chicago home. While she takes a short break to talk about dumplings, Murphy's parents are hard at work rolling out and filling the last of what amounts to nearly 100 pork and napa cabbage dumplings made in just less than three hours.

Murphy, 43, is the modern American mom, juggling kids and a freelance career that takes her around the United States offering diversity training and serving as a translator for corporate clients. Yet this native of China's Inner Mongolia autonomous region will pause with her family to laboriously and lovingly fashion dozens of pork dumplings throughout the year and especially now at Chinese New Year, which falls on Jan. 29 this year.

The dumplings are delicious: little crescents of dough stuffed with ground pork spliced with lots of minced ginger, cabbage and green onion, then moistened with aromatic sesame oil and other seasonings.

While there's always a probable excuse to make them, dumplings hold special symbolism at the new year, which is also known as the Spring Festival. The name in Chinese, jiaozi (JIOW-za), means midnight or the end and the beginning of time, according to the Web site of the China Daily newspaper.

The deftly pleated pockets of dough also look rather like purses or the ancient gold ingots of China. As such, dumplings symbolize good fortune or the promise thereof. And that counts any time of year.

"My mother also makes them before I travel, for good luck, and on my birthday," Murphy says.

Making dumplings is work, yes, and familiar enough around the Murphy household that her 11-year-old son, Joseph, prefers to go to a friend's house for pizza. But Murphy says dumpling-making is a party in and of itself, a time to gather family and friends to create something delicious out of relatively humble ingredients.

"Dumpling time is a good communication time," she says.

Watching the formation of the dumplings is to marvel at a well-choreographed dance of hands constantly in motion: dicing, stirring, rolling, filling and shaping. Murphy and her 75-year-old father, Xu Wenlin, and 68-year-old mother, Cao Zaisheng, share the dance. (Murphy took her husband's surname when she Westernized her name. Not all Chinese wives use their husband's name; the Chinese traditionally put the family name first and the given name last.)

There's no fancy equipment, just a plastic bowl for making the dough, a metal bowl for the filling and a couple of pairs of chopsticks. There's a pot for boiling and an old saute pan for frying.

Murphy occasionally will use a food processor to chop the ingredients. The big danger there is over-processing the vegetables into mush. But her parents prefer to do the knife work themselves to retain that prized texture. The family doesn't use measuring cups or spoons in making the dumplings, relying instead on years of experience.

Cao can tell by looking and feeling whether the dough needs more water or flour to become the right consistency, smooth and ear-lobe soft. She splits the dough into three smaller balls and covers them to keep the dough from drying out.

One at a time, she takes out one of the balls and slowly works it into a doughnut shape, then she breaks open the ring of dough and rolls it with her fingers into a long snake. Xu then takes over, picking up the dough in one hand and using the fingers of the other to snap off small pieces of dough. These pieces are rolled into balls about the size of cherry tomatoes and flattened slightly.

Now Murphy steps in. With practiced skill, she rapidly rolls a small wooden dowel across the flattened lump of dough. She holds the dough between her thumb and forefinger, turning it counterclockwise as she rolls the dough into a thin round circle that will soon hold the dumpling filling.

Murphy, Xu and Cao pick up chopsticks and begin to form the dumplings. Each puts a scant tablespoon of filling on a dough circle, folds the dough in half and then begins pleating and pinching the dumpling closed. A firm, impermeable seal is important, Murphy says, or the cooking water will get into the dumpling and dilute the flavor.

Each member of the family has his or her own style of pleating, and you can tell in one glance whose is whose. Xu doesn't fool around; his dumplings are shaped with few pleats. Cao, on the other hand, produces dumplings with pleats that appear almost frilly.

"My mother makes the prettiest dumplings," Murphy says admiringly. Her own style is a cross between her parents'.

The family works intensely, but there is still room for bantering. When Xu suggests there's no need to squeeze the vegetables dry, his wife laughs and shoots back a retort in Chinese.

"My mother says don't listen to him," Murphy translates with a smile.

Dumplings are traditionally enjoyed boiled in China, where they are called shui jiao (shway-JOW), or water dumpling.

A pot of water is brought to a boil, and Cao quickly drops a dozen or so dumplings into the pot. She gives the dumplings a gentle stir and waits for the water to come back to the boil. Then she pours in a cup of cold water to stop the boiling. Cao does this three times; the dumplings are cooked.

Cao fishes the dumplings out of the pot with a spoon and onto a plate. Served alongside is a dipping sauce made of sesame oil, five mashed garlic cloves and a Chinese black vinegar whose inky intensity is akin to a fine balsamic vinegar from Italy.

The family tastes this first batch. Good but not great. The ground pork, purchased from a large supermarket chain, is too lean for their taste. More oil and ground ginger are needed, Xu decides. The remaining filling is adjusted accordingly.

These small, playful dumplings are lined up to delight those celebrating the Chinese New Year.

This is sturdy fare, enough for a substantial meal. If Murphy has Chinese friends over, they will make a whole dinner of dumplings, followed by a broth made from the hot water used for boiling the dumplings. The flavor of this broth is very mild, almost like macaroni without the butter. The blandness serves as a restorative after the assertive flavors of the dumpling and the dipping sauce, she says.

The pork and napa cabbage filling used by Murphy and her family is one of the most popular in China, but there are variations. Xu, for example, likes to use celery instead of the cabbage. Islamic families, forbidden by religion from eating pork, use beef or lamb instead. There are shrimp dumplings and vegetarian dumplings and chicken-stuffed dumplings too.

For Murphy, dumplings represent something bigger, something fundamental and profound. Dumplings provide a link to her past, to her childhood home in Huh-hot, the capital of Inner Mongolia, and beyond that to her family's roots in the central provinces of Shanxi and Hebei. (Like the American pioneers who moved west to find their fortune, so did Murphy's ancestors move north to Inner Mongolia about a century ago.)

She learned to make dumplings at age 12 surrounded by helpful family members. Ever since, after Murphy moved first to Japan and then to the United States as a graduate student in 1988, and before and after her marriage, dumplings have been a constant, comforting symbol of her past and of Chinese culture. She is clearly determined to pass on that legacy to her children. Speaking Chinese at home and making dumplings are both part of that process.

"I think it is part of who they are," says Murphy, whose given name in Chinese, Xiaonian, means "little memory."

"My daughter is young now but I want my son to know it is part of his cultural heritage," she says. "Every family marks the Spring Festival with dumplings."

Tony Bennett makes a tradition out of the Grammy Awards

By Charles J. Gans
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Tony Bennett breaks with tradition on his Grammy-nominated CD, "The Art of Romance," by doing something he had shied away from throughout a recording career dating back more than half a century. For the first time on any of his 100-plus albums, Bennett's name can be found among the songwriting credits.

That might come as a surprise since Bennett, who received a Grammy lifetime achievement award in 2001 and became a Kennedy Center honoree last year, has introduced dozens of songs that became pop standards, starting with "The Boulevard of Broken Dreams" and "Because of You" in the early '50s.

Bennett has also written an autobiography, "The Good Life," and enjoyed a lifelong passion for painting, taking pride that his oil landscape, "Central Park," a view from his Manhattan apartment window signed with his family name Benedetto, was recently added to the permanent collection of the Smithsonian American Art Museum.

But Bennett, who turns 80 in August, had never written a song on his own until inspiration struck him during a visit to Hawaii. He heard a jazz trio playing the tune "Nuages" (French for "Clouds"), composed in the 1930s by the legendary Belgian gypsy jazz guitarist Django Reinhardt, and the dreamy melody stuck in his head.

"My son Danny, who's managed me for many years, said, 'Why don't you write a song like the contemporary artists?'" said Bennett, interviewed before a luncheon honoring him as one of the National Endowment for the Arts' Jazz Masters of 2006, the nation's highest jazz award.

"I always stayed away from that, I told him, because I can't compete with Cole Porter or Duke Ellington or Jerome Kern or Irving Berlin. ... I've always been an interpreter of the Great American Songbook through my life. And he said, 'Well give it a shot.' So I took a crack at it, and it's the first time I've ever written a song myself."

Bennett's debut as a lyricist, a hopeful song about falling in love that he titled "All For You" and adapted from Reinhardt's music, is among the highlights of "The Art of Romance," nominated for a Grammy as best traditional pop vocal album. The CD was also nominated for best instrumental arrangement accompanying vocalist for Jorge Calandrelli's work on "Time to Smile," a long-lost Johnny Mercer song.

The album, a family affair with son Danny serving as executive producer and another son Dae recording and mixing the tracks at his Bennett Studios in Englewood, N.J., is a collection of 11 humorous, sad and optimistic songs depicting all stages of romance, none of which Bennett had recorded before.

The arrangements feature Bennett in the traditional setting that has brought out his best performances – with his touring quartet, now led by pianist Lee Musiker; a 60-piece orchestra, and a special guest star, jazz saxophonist Phil Woods.

But the biggest thrill for Bennett was the chance to work again with Johnny Mandel, the arranger on the singer's 1966 "The Movie Song Album," which Bennett considers one of his all-time favorite recordings. For the new album, Mandel contributed three songs, wrote five arrangements, and conducted the orchestra on most tracks.

"Every musician I've ever met just adores playing his music and when we recorded it there were a lot of very, wise musicians that were just swooning around like teenagers over the changes in the orchestrations that he wrote," said Bennett. "He orchestrates in a way that becomes almost like a spontaneous jazz feeling."

That jazz feeling has been a key factor in Bennett's success as a pop singer. He took to heart the advice of his vocal coach, Miriam Spier, whom he studied with after returning from World War II.

She said please don't imitate other singers, recalled Bennett. "She said imitate musicians that you like, find out how they phrase and then be influenced by the jazz musicians."

Over the years, Bennett has surrounded himself with jazz musicians whether as part of his touring combo or in the recording studio where he made memorable recordings with such jazz luminaries as big band leader Count Basie and pianist Bill Evans.

"It gets terribly boring if you sing the same way every night," said Bennett. "What's great about jazz musicians and the art of jazz is that every moment is different, it's completely spontaneous, it's completely honest ... It's my favorite music in the world."

One tune that Bennett says he'll never get tired of singing is his signature song, "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

"I love it and I sing it different every night," he said. (That song earned Bennett the first two of his 12 Grammys back in 1962, including record of the year.)

In the '90s, Bennett became a major presence at the Grammys, dominating the traditional pop vocal categories by winning 10 awards starting in 1992 with his Sinatra tribute album "Perfectly Frank" and most recently in 2003 for "A Wonderful World," on which he teamed with k.d. lang to pay homage to Louis Armstrong. His biggest triumph came in 1993 when he won the album of the year category for "MTV Unplugged," which made him cool to a new generation of fans without compromising his art.

And Bennett, who will also be the subject of a documentary produced by Clint Eastwood, could be a major presence at next year's Grammys with his latest recording project – a duets album of songs he's introduced. Recording sessions are planned in New York, Los Angeles and London with Elton John, Paul McCartney, Bono, Billy Joel, James Taylor, the Dixie Chicks, Michael Buble, Diana Krall, Elvis Costello and lang, among others.

Bennett, the son of an Italian-immigrant grocer, is also looking forward to groundbreaking ceremonies later this year on a permanent home for the public performing arts high school he helped found in his old neighborhood, the Astoria section of Queens.

LIQUORS 44

80° 1.75 liter $20.49
1.75 liter $21.99
Parrot Bay Mango Passion Fruit Pineapple Coconut 1.75 liter $24.99
Captain Morgan Spiced 1.75 liter $24.99
Tattoo 750 mls $13.99
Jose Cuervo 1.75 liter $33.99
Tanqueray GIN 1.75 liter $28.99
Crown Royal 750 mls $20.99
Bacardi Light & Dark 1.75 liter $20.99
Bombay Sapphire 1.75 liter $33.99
All Flavors 12PACKS $11.99 + DEP
12PACKS $11.99 + DEP

DOMESTIC KEGS 1/2 Bbls 1/4 Bbls
Bud $63.99 $43.99
Bud Light $63.99 $43.99
Bud Select $63.99 $43.99
Coors Light $63.99
Miller Lite $63.99
Rolling Rock $55.99
Keystone Light $44.99
Pabst Blue Ribbon $48.99
Natural Light/Ice $48.99
Busch Light $47.99

AT THE HADLEY LOCATION
456 Russell St. #9 • Campus Plaza
413-253-9344
Visit us at our other locations:
NORTHAMPTON • 238 King St.
HOLYOKE • 44 Lincoln St.
FULL REDEMPTION AT ALL LOCATIONS
NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS
DON'T DRINK & DRIVE
www.dailycollegian.com

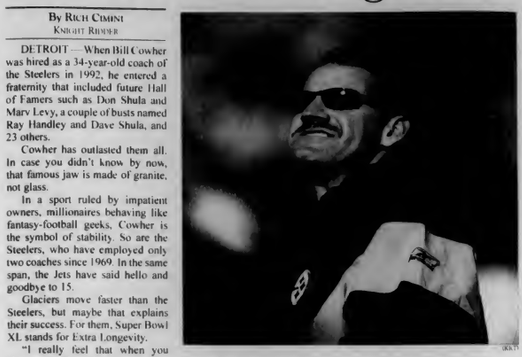
Cowher chasing title

By Rich Cimini
Knight Ridder

DETROIT — When Bill Cowher was hired as a 34-year-old coach of the Steelers in 1992, he entered a fraternity that included future Hall of Famers such as Don Shula and Marv Levy, a couple of busts named Ray Handley and Dave Shula, and 23 others.

Cowher has outlasted them all. In case you didn't know by now, that famous jaw is made of granite, not glass.

In a sport ruled by impatient owners, millionaires behaving like fantasy-football geeks, Cowher is the symbol of stability. So are the Steelers, who have employed only two coaches since 1969. In the same span, the Jets have said hello and goodbye to 15.



Glaciers move faster than the Steelers, but maybe that explains their success. For them, Super Bowl XL stands for Extra Longevity.

"I really feel that when you change coaches, it's almost like you're an expansion team, starting over again," Steelers owner Dan Rooney said after capturing the AFC championship last week in Denver.

While the Steelers were in the midst of their improbable playoff run – the first sixth seed in history to reach the Super Bowl – 10 other franchises were looking for head coaches. As Rooney might say, nearly one-third of the NFL is starting over.

"I count my blessings," Cowher said last week, when reminded of the upheavals. "We're a very stable organization. I feel very fortunate to be where I am. When those things happen, it reminds me of that."

Cowher, born and raised in Pittsburgh, joined the legendary Paul Brown as the only coaches in NFL history to earn a postseason berth in each of his first six seasons. But adversity hit in 1998, and the Steelers began a slump of three straight nonplayoff seasons. It hit harder in 2003, when they dropped to 6-10.

Pittsburgh Steelers head coach Bill Cowher is the longest tenured coach in the NFL, having coached the Steelers since 1992.

The zealous fan base got impatient, calling for Cowher's head. Fans demanded that Rooney make a move. So he did, but it wasn't what they expected.

He gave Cowher a contract extension through 2007.

"I never felt he couldn't do it at anytime," said Rooney, whose beloved team faces the Seahawks for the NFL championship.

Rooney inherited the patience gene from his father Art Rooney Sr., the late patriarch of the Steelers. The elder Rooney hired Chuck Noll in 1969 and, after only 12 wins in three years, the fans were grumbling. But he refused to bail out on Noll, and you know how it turned out – four Super Bowl titles.

Jets scouting consultant Dick Haley, who played for the Steelers and worked in the player-personnel department for 21 years, said the organization's stability is the byproduct of Art Sr.'s patience.

"He was probably too patient with too many coaches prior to Chuck Noll," said Haley, who was there during the halcyon decade of the 1970s. "A couple of early years with Chuck weren't real good, but he stayed with him. All of a sudden, it turned around. Even when things turned back in the '80s and '90s, they didn't deviate. It pays off."

For the Rooneys, football is the family business. Dan succeeded his father as the team president in 1975 after the first Super Bowl win. His son, Art II, took over in 2002 and can earn his first Super Bowl ring as president, as his father and grandfather did.

"I give a lot of credit to the stability this organization has, has had, and will have even after I go," said Cowher, one of 10 coaches to win at least 130 games with one team. "It starts at the top. We're all kind of one little spoke in the wheel, to be honest with you."

The Steelers, who arrive today in Detroit, haven't won a Super Bowl under Cowher. If he were a golfer, he'd have the dreaded "best-player-who-hasn't-won-a-major" title. But this might have been his finest coaching effort, one that took a team on the verge of falling out of contention at 7-5 and producing a seven-game winning streak.

Cowher said "nothing drives me more" than to hand the Lombardi Trophy to Dan Rooney. The players say nothing drives them more than to see their coach finally win the Big One.

"It's just great that we're able to win and give him another crack at that elusive Super Bowl ring," Jerome Bettis said.

They used to say the same thing about Noll and Art Rooney Sr., back in the day.

Sunday will mark Pittsburgh's second Super Bowl appearance under Bill Cowher. The Steelers lost Super Bowl XXX to the Cowboys in the previous trip.

Roethlisberger has confidence

BIG BEN from page 13

Moon was on hand Tuesday at Ford Field, giving Roethlisberger a big hug and words of support. Roethlisberger and Marino have talked several times this week.

"He told me to stay focused and that I'd get butterflies and get nervous and that there would be a lot of anxious feelings, but to make sure to keep them under control and not let them get the best of me early," Roethlisberger said.

Or, exactly what he allowed to happen a year ago, when his three interceptions in a 41-27 loss to New England doomed the Steelers to their fourth AFC title game defeat at home in 11 years.

Roethlisberger's rapid transformation from nervous, easily shaken rookie to the in-control leader he is now explains why offensive coordinator Ken Whisenhunt opened up his playbook during the Steelers' three consecutive road playoff victories.

"His development is the reason why we are here," Jerome Bettis said of the quarterback who can become the youngest to win a Super Bowl. "We've had some really good teams but, unfortunately, we haven't been able to get over the hump. He's been able to do that."

Consider this: During four consecutive Steelers championship game losses from the 1995 season through last year (three AFC title games and one Super Bowl), their quarterbacks threw a combined 12 interceptions – three in each game. Roethlisberger threw none as Pittsburgh beat Denver 34-17 in the AFC title game a weekend ago.

"I was a little overconfident last year," Roethlisberger said. "This year, I understand where I'm at."

At the Super Bowl, where every mistake is magnified, every flaw is exposed, every error can sink a season. And, too, where good teams and good players separate themselves and find greatness.

The Steelers, who haven't been so confident about a postseason quarterback since Bradshaw went 4-for-4 in Super Bowls, are convinced Roethlisberger will hold up Sunday just fine.

"Ben is different with his confidence this year. He has trust in everyone around him and he makes the team work for him," wide receiver Hines Ward said. "He has been a phenomenal leader."

Randle El brings unpredictability

By Joe Kay
Associated Press

DETROIT – A discombobulated kicker made the most surprising fling in Super Bowl history – Garo Yepremian's bar-of-soap pass attempt that resulted in a fumble and provided a comic ending to Miami's perfect 1972 season.

A couple of undersized players who know how to grip the laces could provide the most unexpected throw – or catch – in the latest title game.

Pittsburgh's Antwaan Randle El and Seattle's Seneca Wallace are the "X" factors in Super Bowl XL.

"You never know," Randle El said mischievously.

And that's the point. During the playoffs, both of them stunned defenses and put their imprints on some of the NFL's biggest games. Randle El set up a trick play in a first-round win over Cincinnati, and Wallace had the sweetest catch in the NFC title game.

"Some guys can do it, and some guys can't do it," Randle El said Tuesday. "You certainly can't force it on them, and you can't teach it. If they've got it, they can do it. If not, then they can't."

These two definitely have it.

In his fourth season, Randle El has developed into the Steelers' most versatile player. The former Indiana quarterback returns punts and starts as a receiver. And, should the defense relax, he can air it out.

"Whenever he is in there, he is a threat and you never know what he is going to do," offensive coordinator Ken Whisenhunt said. "That gives you more of an element of unpredictability."

Only 5-foot-10 with elusive moves, Randle El was one of the toughest players to catch in college. At Indiana, he was the first Division I-A player to throw for 6,000 yards and run for 3,000. The Steelers liked the way he returned kicks, and turned him into a receiver to get him on the field more.

Occasionally, he'll line up behind center – an old, familiar spot – for a direct snap. Every so often, he'll get a handoff and take off. And, occasionally, he'll make a napping defense pay for forgetting that he's still a quarterback at heart.

He took a handoff from Duce Staley and threw a 51-yard touchdown pass to Hines Ward in a Nov. 13 win over Cleveland. In four NFL seasons, Randle El is 7-for-8 for 83 yards and a pair of touchdowns as a passer.

In the playoff win at Cincinnati, he showed off his arm in another way. He took a direct snap from center, ran right, then turned and threw a beautiful lateral across the field to quarterback Ben Roethlisberger – the kind that only a real passer could make.

The Bengals' defense was so flummoxed that Roethlisberger had two receivers wide open downfield. His 43-yard touchdown pass to Cedrick Wilson put the Steelers in control.

Whisenhunt trusts Randle El with anything.

"He is so much more of a threat because he is a full-time starter," he said. "He is on the field a whole lot more than in the past. You can put him in anywhere, and whatever you need him to do he can do those things. It gives you an extra element."

So, what tricks are in Sunday's game plan?

"Next question," Randle El said, breaking into a knowing smile.

Polamalu all about winning

POLAMALU from page 14

sister Suila, brought the entire family to the remote outpost of Tenmile for a vacation, Troy asked if he could stay awhile longer.

He had never seen a cow before and wasn't sure what to make of so much open space around him, but something told him he had found a home. Salu told him he could go back to Suila's home in Santa Ana anytime he wanted, but Troy never did.

"When he asked permission to stay, we were just shocked," Salu said. "He spent the summer and then he just stayed. In a lot of ways, I was sad for my sister, but she had her hands full. I'm glad we took him."

On Sunday, Polamalu will be one of the most-watched players in Super Bowl XL. His long hair – a tribute to his Samoan heritage – identifies him to the general public, but his omnipresence on the field makes him priority No. 1 for the Seattle Seahawks.

There isn't a safety in the NFL who pursues the ball with the desire Polamalu does and few are as fundamentally sound. The Steelers utilize Polamalu in so many facets of their blitz scheme that it's next to impossible to know exactly from what direction he's coming.

And when you do know, it's not guaranteed you'll stop the two-time Pro Bowl selection.

"His acceleration is unmatched in the NFL, in history, I would say," Steelers defensive end Kimo Von Oelhoffen said. "You look at every defensive back in the NFL and compare their acceleration, their closing speed with Troy. There is none. There just isn't."

Polamalu was born with special athletic gifts, but without the discipline and guidance he received from Salu and his wife, Kelley, there's no telling how far he would have gone. Salu, who came to the mainland from Samoa in 1965, had three sons of his own, all of whom played football and have since pursued academic careers, so there were plenty of role models for Troy growing up.

More than anything, he was brought into the bosom of a community that supported him on all levels and taught him the lessons necessary to be a man.

"Problems follow you wherever you go," said Polamalu, whose father and mother divorced when he was an infant. "But I think the turning point was the discipline my uncle showed in my life. Everybody may need it in a different way, but I needed it in a military boot camp way. That's the way he applied it to me.

"There was always a trust factor because I never smoked or drank or did drugs. But there was a respect factor. First, respecting myself and then respecting elders. I think the great thing was I also had three older cousins who are like my brothers and they had a hand in raising me."

Polamalu found his escape in sports and woodworking. He wrestled, played football, basketball and baseball and basically took part in anything that involved competition.

He eventually decided he wanted to go back to southern California, so after excelling at football in high school he wound up at the University of Southern California. He started his final three years and became the school's first two-time All-American since offensive tackle Tony Boselli and emerged as a legitimate first-round pick.

However, many teams downgraded him because of his size, wondering whether he could cover big tight ends down the field.

"There were pass-coverage issues," Steelers secondary coach Darren Perry said. "There are matchup issues. But when you see a player with Troy's ability, you look beyond that. Sometimes people get so enamored with height and size it can alter your thinking a little bit. Troy had so many special qualities that you couldn't let that enter your mind."

The 16th pick overall in the 2003 draft, Polamalu was an instant success with the Steelers. He benefits from playing in a system where he is allowed to play near the line of scrimmage and doesn't have to worry about a lot of man-to-man match-ups down the field, but he is hardly a one-dimensional player.

During the week he studies the assignments of all of the defensive players because he can be lined up as an end, a tackle, a linebacker or a cornerback at any given moment. His height has become an advantage because when he's close to the line of scrimmage, it's difficult for opposing quarterbacks or running backs to find him.

"He's active and has a nose for the football," Seahawks fullback Mack Strong said. "He seems to always be in the right place at the right time. You can tell that he studies a lot of film. He's very smart and knows tendencies."

Polamalu's movie star eyes and soft speaking voice belie the fury that burns within him on the football field. He plays fast, hits hard and never wastes a chance to put a lick on an unsuspecting ball carrier.

But it's all about winning and nothing more.

"We always talk to each other about how Vince Lombardi used to say winning is everything," Salu said. "Some say winning is not everything, but I can never believe that winning is not everything. I believe winning gives you character. Even when you're growing up, it's important to know that."

Wallace suggests that the Seahawks are going to play it straight on Sunday, which means he'll be on the sideline as the No. 2 quarterback instead of lining up as a stealth receiver – which is exactly what he did in the conference championship game.

Wallace, a third-year quarterback out of Iowa State, sometimes lines up as a receiver and a defensive back during practice. Coach Mike Holmgren sent him in as a receiver in the NFC title game against Carolina, and he set up the Seahawks' first touchdown by putting a double move on Ken Lucas to get open along the sideline.

His sensational over-the-shoulder catch while getting both feet down accounted for a 28-yard gain and set up Seattle's first touchdown.

"Oh, man, it was awesome – just being part of a championship game and being able to catch a ball," Wallace said.

Unlike Randle El, who isn't counted on as a backup passer, the 5-foot-11 Wallace is first in line if anything happens to Matt Hasselbeck. Holmgren would be taking an unusual Super Bowl gamble by using his No. 2 quarterback as a receiver.

"Whatever I can do to contribute, I want to do that," Wallace said. "But my main focus right now is making sure that if I'm needed to step in and play quarterback, I'm ready."

The Steelers will be ready if he happens to show up in some other role.

"He can cause problems if we don't address the issue right away in practice this week," linebacker James Farrior said. "Those are the types of athletes that can change the game."

Shopping for a Health Club?
Do your homework first!
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS CLUB
Has it ALL for you!
"WINTER SPECIAL" $209
$188
WWW.HAMPFIT.COM
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
WHAT DO YOU GET?
Full Sized Indoor Pool • Aqua Aerobics
Cybex Nautilus Circuit • Cybex Free Weights
Full Court Basketball • Volleyball • Indoor Tennis
Cardio • Saunas • Indoor Cycling
Jacuzzi • Yoga/Pilates • Aerobics/Step/Bosu
COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL WITH JERRY MONDAY & THURSDAY 6-8 PM
NO INITIATION FEE OR LONG-TERM CONTRACT NECESSARY
90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill) Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10PM MON-FRI • 8AM-9PM SAT & SUN

UltimateFitness
THE HEALTH AND FITNESS CENTER
Located in the Stop & Shop Plaza on Route 9 • For more information call 253-7571
Semester Special $175
Free unlimited Tanning!
first 100 to join
Full Aerobics Program
Included with membership:
-Cardio Kickboxing
-Yoga, Pilates
-And Many More
-Juice Bar & Supplements
-Personal Training
-Core training
Over 20 pieces of cardio including...
-Treadmills
-Bikes
-Crosstrainers
-Free weight and circuit training equipment
No enrollment fee
now offering aerobics only memberships

USED BOOKS = BIG SAVINGS

Save up to 25% over the cost of new.

UMASS AMHERST
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

Save your receipts for a 5% rebate!

proudly part of the
efollett.com bookstore network

LOW PRICE GUARANTEE

Your first choice to buy textbooks for less... and sell them back for more.

GUARANTEED BUYBACK
If I'm on the book you get the cash.
50% of purchase price at buyback.
Available on select titles only

Big Ben plays it cool

By Alan Robinson
Associated Press

DETROIT — They came in waves from all directions, occasionally blindsiding him from angles he couldn't have anticipated. Other times they blitzed up the middle, challenging him face-to-face and daring him to stand up to the pressure.

No matter what their strategy, was, Ben Roethlisberger always had the answer — adjusting on the fly when needed, or adeptly sidestepping anything he wished to avoid with the polish and poise of a John Elway or a Terry Bradshaw.

Now, if only Roethlisberger can stand up to the Seattle Seahawks the way he did the dreaded media day at the Super Bowl.

"This is the best part of it, talking to you guys," Roethlisberger said Tuesday. "Being the quarterback, you know that cameras are pointed at you and people want to talk to you. You have to be smart — and know it comes with the territory."

The Steelers kept their 23-year-old quarterback away from the media hordes Monday, not including him among a six-player contingent made available for interviews. That created speculation they were worried Roethlisberger might be overwhelmed or distracted by the kind of attention no NFL player gets before any other game.

Turns out Roethlisberger handled his Super Bowl unveiling as easily as he did the Bengals, Colts and Broncos during the AFC playoffs. And certainly better than some much older quarterbacks at Super Bowls past. Hall of Famer Johnny Unitas was grumpy and glum-faced at media day before the Jets' mega-upset of Baltimore in January 1969, possibly because Earl Morrall was starting ahead of him.

Roethlisberger couldn't have looked more at ease. Relaxing at an elevated podium as reporters crowded five deep around him on the Ford Field turf, he tugged at the scraggly but lucky-charm beard he can't wait to shave — "win or lose," he said — and answered everything thrown his way.

His personal life?

"I have no personal life," he said.

Roethlisberger briefly dated UPDA rising star Natalie Gulbis last summer. He recently said it was so difficult for him to go out in public that he now finds it's easier to meet women on the Internet than in person.

The helmet-less motorcycle riding that so bothered coach Bill Cowher last spring? "That's why I grew my hair long, so it could blow on the wind — but we can't talk about my motorcycle," he said, laughing.

And what does he dislike about going on the road for a fourth consecutive game, even if the Super Bowl is officially a neutral-site game?

"My dog," he said, speaking fondly of the Rottweiler named Zeus that stayed back in Pittsburgh. "If I could have my dog here it would be perfect, but coach Cowher wouldn't let me bring him."

Really, sounds like the guy is bamboozled by all the attention, huh?

Because he's taken the Steelers to an AFC title game and a Super Bowl in his first two seasons — no other NFL QB has done that — Roethlisberger will be the better known of the two quarterbacks Sunday.

Matt Hasselbeck seems to be the perfect quarterback for a Seattle team that, until now, rarely gets much national attention: steady but not spectacular, a solid playmaker but not a big star.

"This week hasn't been bad at all," Hasselbeck said. "I'm actually enjoying it."

Roethlisberger wants to be that big star, talking openly of wanting to be remembered as one of the best in the game's history, but realizes that the Steelers' team concept will never allow him to accumulate the numbers of a Dan Marino.

Maybe Roethlisberger seems so relaxed this week because this is the closest thing to a backyard Super Bowl for him. He grew up 100 miles away in Findlay, Ohio, and his parents and teenage sister are coming this weekend to share the moment.

Or maybe it's because he has a support crew that extends beyond the Steelers.

Roethlisberger has become friends with several prominent NFL quarterbacks of the past, including Marino and Warren Moon, and often seeks their advice.

See BIG BEN on page 11

Pittsburgh Steelers quarterback Ben Roethlisberger will start in the Super Bowl on Sunday in just his second year in the NFL.

Jurevicius plays with heavy heart

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

DETROIT — Joe Jurevicius will stride into the Ford Field end zone before Sunday's Super Bowl, trace an "M," look up and say, "I need you."

Then he'll play in his third NFL championship game, one the Seattle wide receiver says will have extra meaning for him and his family.

"I do it all the time," Jurevicius said Tuesday of his tribute to Michael, his infant son who died three years ago. "I have him buried in Cleveland, Ohio, right down the street from his grandpa and grandma. As soon as I leave here and go back to Cleveland, I go there every morning and I go there every night.

"I kind of look at him as my 'X' factor," he said.

During the 2003 playoffs, his wife, Meagan, gave birth to Michael. Their son was born with sialidosis, a neurodegenerative disease, and was given 72 hours to live.

Jurevicius, then with Tampa Bay, missed practices to be with them, and the Buccaneers arranged for a private plane to take him to games.

He had a huge NFC championship game at Philadelphia, then had four catches for 78 yards in the win over Oakland in the Super Bowl — despite flying back and forth from San Diego to Tampa in the days leading up to the game.

Michael passed away two months later.

"Obviously, there are a lot of sad moments," Jurevicius said during media day, "but there's also a lot of good that came from that week. It was a lot of turmoil for my family, but I think the biggest thing to remember is that throughout that whole story I was able to contribute to a team."

And contribute to fighting the disease that claimed his child.

"I think the longer you play this game and the more you're around the media, you realize that was a big story then," Jurevicius said. "I'd prefer it to not be in the media, but it is what it is. In the same breath, I feel the media have helped get a lot of recognition for the March of Dimes. There's a lot of positive to come out of it."

Much of Jurevicius' career has been positive. How many players get into three Super Bowls in eight seasons — particularly complementary wide receivers?

A second-round draft choice out of Penn State in 1998, Jurevicius helped the Giants win the 2000 NFC championship. They lost to Baltimore in the Super Bowl and he didn't have a catch.

Tampa Bay signed him as a free agent in 2002 and he averaged 24.6 yards a catch in the Bucs' Super Bowl run. Against the Eagles for the conference crown, he caught a short pass and turned it into a 71-yard gain that put the Bucs in control.

He remained the third receiver for the Bucs the next season, but injured his knee. Although he returned to play well in 10 games, Jurevicius was not re-signed by Tampa.

Tim Ruskell, now the Seahawks' team president, eagerly pursued Jurevicius in free agency. Ruskell was the Bucs' director of player personnel while Jurevicius was in Tampa Bay, and he marveled at the man's fortitude.

"The level of play he performed at with what he was going through was remarkable," Ruskell said. "Joe loves this game, he was important to that team, just as he is to this one.

"Those last few games in Tampa, even though he was going through tragedy in his own life, he helped us get to that [Super Bowl]. That Philadelphia game, we don't even win that without him, and he didn't even practice all week."

Ruskell's only question about Jurevicius was his knee. Once Jurevicius showed he was healthy, Ruskell was certain there would be a significant role for the wideout.

And when starting receivers Darrell Jackson and Bobby Ingram got hurt, Jurevicius became an even more key player.

His best game came in St. Louis just hours after the bus ride to the Edward Jones Dome passed St. Louis Children's Hospital, where Michael died. Jurevicius had nine catches for 137 yards and a touchdown in a 37-31 win — and Seattle hasn't lost a meaningful game since.

Jurevicius is thrilled that Meagan will be able to attend Sunday's game, although their 17-month-old daughter, Caroline, will stay in Cleveland with her grandparents.

"The biggest thing for me is that this is a little bit different now," Jurevicius said. "We don't have a heavy heart that I'm dealing with and that my family is dealing with. I've got an opportunity now to kind of enjoy everything that maybe I didn't get to enjoy in my second one. My wife will be here this time, as opposed to having to be at bedside with our son.

"There's a lot of things I'm grateful for."

Kapler invited to spring training by Red Sox

BOSTON (AP) — Outfielder Gabe Kapler, who ruptured his left Achilles tendon less than five months ago, was among 20 non-roster players invited to spring training by the Boston Red Sox.

Former New York Yankees infielder Enrique Wilson also was in the group announced on Wednesday.

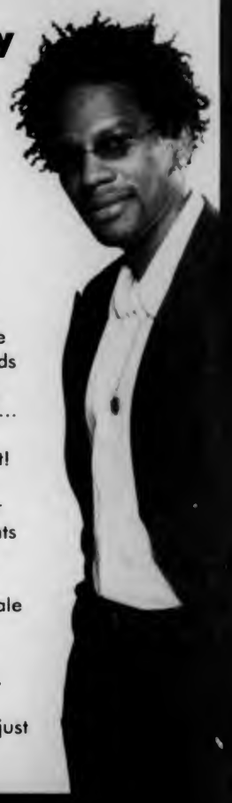
Kapler wasn't expected to be ready to play at the start of spring training after getting hurt in Toronto on Sept. 14. In 36 games last season with Boston, he hit .247 with one homer and nine RBIs.

He first joined the Red Sox in 2003 and was part of their 2004 World Series championship team before starting last season with the Yomiuri Giants in Japan's Central League. He re-signed with Boston on July 15.

Wilson spent four seasons with the Yankees before playing 29 games last season with the Chicago Cubs, hitting .136 with two doubles. He is a friend of Boston left fielder Manny Ramirez, who has asked to be traded.

The Red Sox also invited seven non-roster pitchers: right-handers Tim Bausher, Matt Ginter and Jimmy Serrano and left-handers Craig Breslow, Mike Burnatay, Mike Holtz and Phil Seibel.

The others invited are catcher Ken Huckaby, utility man Willie Harris, infielders Trent Durrington, Luis A. Jimenez, Rodney Nye, Dustin Pedroia and Josh Pressley and outfielders Luke Allen, Ron Calloway, Tyler Minges and Dustan Mohr.



The Red Sox think Pedroia, the organization's minor league offensive player of the year last season, could contribute to the major league team this year. He hit .324 with eight homers and 40 RBIs at Double-A Portland then .255 with five homers and 14 RBIs with Triple-A Pawtucket.

RETURN TO THE 36 CHAMBERS
O.D.B. TRIBUTE TOUR
WU TANG CLAN
ALL REMAINING MEMBERS
RZA • RAEKWON • METHOD MAN
MASTA KILLA • INSPECKTA DECK
U-GOD • GZA • GHOSTFACE with CAPPADONNA STREET LIFE & MATHEMATICS ON SALE NOW
THURSDAY FEBRUARY 9
THE HIPPODROME
1700 MAIN ST • SPRINGFIELD, MA designed by: www.nicksmithdesign.com

DL Hughley Performs!
February 4,
10:00 pm
Fine Arts Center
Concert Hall

You've seen him on Comedy Central's "Weekend at the DL," you've seen him on the "VH1 Big in '05" awards show and you've seen him on "The Hughley's"... now you can see him LIVE at UMass Amherst!

Tickets are just $10 for UMass Amherst students ($15 for Five College Students - $20 for General Public) – on sale now at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, by calling 413-545-2511, or online at www.umass.edu/fac - just click on "Buy Tickets."

UMASS AMHERST
Brought to you by Student Affairs and Campus Life and the Center for Student Development

Hasselbeck keeping his cool

By Gregg Bell
Associated Press

DETROIT — Oh, brother. This was the 3,456th question already this week asking under-appreciated Seattle about being a four-point underdog to Pittsburgh in the Super Bowl.

But instead of the rote, put response of "whatever," Matt Hasselbeck used the tired query during media day Tuesday to add to a season in which he has risen from unknown to the NFC passing leader and Pro Bowl starter.

He put standup comedian on his resume.

With his team cap on backward, the dry-witted Hasselbeck excitedly spread his arms wide to pantomime excitement. His high voice — "You know, kind of like – a girl," according to his playful antagonist, teammate Robbie Tobeck – climbed higher.

"Do we in the locker room even say, 'OK. We're favored by 2 1/2 points. All right?' No, no one does that," Hasselbeck said, shaking his bald head for emphasis.

"As Coach [Mike] Holmgren likes to say, all that stuff is minutia. I don't know what that means, but I hear him say it."

Next came the inevitable intrusion by roving television "reporter" and comedian Gilbert Gottfried.

"Oh, hi Gilbert," Hasselbeck droned, feigning annoyance.

The comedian loudly asked Hasselbeck for a joke.

Without hesitation, the quarterback said: "There are three kinds of people in this world. There are people who know how to count. And there are people who don't."

Silence. And blank stares – even from Gottfried.

"Anybody else?" he asked. "That was pretty good, eh? Just made that up. Thank you. Thank you very much."

Hasselbeck wasn't the only quarterback cracking jokes during Amateur Hour at Ford Field.

Pittsburgh's Ben Roethlisberger was asked what he dislikes about going playing away from Pittsburgh for a fourth consecutive game.

"My dog," he said, speaking fondly of the Rottweiler named Zeus that stayed back in Pittsburgh. "If I could have my dog here it would be perfect, but Coach Cowher wouldn't let me bring him."

It's all laughs now for Roethlisberger, after a playoff flameout and acknowledged fatigue ended his rookie season of 2004.

It's also all fun for Hasselbeck, thanks to 24 touchdown passes, just nine interceptions – his career-low for an entire injury-free season – and a 66 percent completion rate.

"It all came together this season and he has had his best season," Holmgren said.

But it wasn't always a gas for Hasselbeck in Seattle.

In 2001, the joke was on him.

Holmgren, in his third season coaching Seattle after leaving Green Bay, had just traded with the Packers to get Hasselbeck to be his starting quarterback. He had just finished his third season learning behind Brett Favre.

Hasselbeck had zero career starts. He was a sixth-round draft choice from Boston College. Holmgren's Packers were the only team to call him for a pre-draft tryout – yet he now acknowledges he was arrogant and difficult to coach.

But Holmgren loved Hasselbeck's intelligence.

Those brains got a beating in his second game as Seattle's 2001 starter. Philadelphia hit the new quarterback so often in a 27-3 Eagles' win the Seahawks almost had to peel him off the turf at old Veterans Stadium.

The following week, he strained a groin muscle. He sat the next two games behind Trent Dilfer. Hasselbeck eventually returned for nine more starts – five were losses – before he hurt his passing shoulder.

"Instead of people saying, 'Hey, I feel bad for you,' it felt more like people were applauding ... No, it didn't feel that way, it was that way," Hasselbeck said. "It was tough. It was very, very tough."

Before 2002, the Seahawks kept Dilfer from leaving as a free agent by promising he would start. But in the first preseason game, Dilfer hurt his knee. Hasselbeck came back again. And struggled again. Dilfer returned in Week 2.

Then, on Oct. 27, 2002, at Dallas, Dilfer tore an Achilles tendon. Hasselbeck entered and led the Seahawks to a 17-14 win. He started the final nine games, passing for 300 yards four times and over 400 yards twice, both Seahawks' season records.

He's started ever since.

"Well, it's taken a little while," Holmgren said Tuesday. "But right now we are in a very, very good place."

Hasselbeck completed 67 percent of his throws with three touchdowns and no interceptions in two playoff wins. He almost single-handedly took over the divisional-round win over Washington after league MVP Shaun Alexander left in the first quarter with a concussion.

"He's just matured," said receiver Bobby Engram, who arrived in Seattle with Hasselbeck in 2001. "He's taken his lumps like any star quarterback, but he's dealt with it extremely well. "He is the leader of this team."

Tuesday, Hasselbeck was their leader in laughs. Especially at his own expense.

"Anybody losing your hair, you can root for us, too," he said. "Anything to get the home-field advantage here in Detroit."

Seattle Seahawks quarterback Matt Hasselbeck began his career as a backup, but has become the NFC's passing leader and Pro Bowl starter.

UM faces Rams

HOOP from page 16

Minutewomen turned the ball over a whopping 33 times.

"We've got to be able to take care of the basketball, manage the turnovers, control the boards, and we've got to be able to make good decisions in the half-court game," Dacko said. "[URI is] a team that played against us here and we did not play well."

Since their last contest against the Rams, however, the Minutewomen have been able to lower turnover instances, especially as of late. In a 67-60 win over La Salle on Jan. 27, UMass committed just eight turnovers and surrendered 15 in Sunday's 85-50 loss at Temple. The team's average has decreased slightly as well, with the Minutewomen giving up an average of 18.2 turnovers per game during the last five contests.

Regardless of statistics, the true test will come when UMass takes the hardwood against the Rams tonight, and this time around, it is the team from the Ocean State that is trying to crack through a losing skid.

Although URI is averaging just 51.2 points per game over the last five games, the Rams certainly have the ability to break through their offensive dry spell.

Senior forward Tanya Rhodes has been the overall contributor for URI during her final collegiate season and has been effective on both the offensive and defensive end. Rhodes leads the team in steals (65), is second on the team in scoring (14.4 points per game) and is tied for first on the team in blocks (6). Rhodes cranked out 21 points in the first meeting and had four steals.

"We match-up well [with URI] if we communicate defensively," Dacko said.

Matching up against the likes of Rhodes and her teammates will be the sophomore standouts Pam Rosanio (13.7 points per game) and Kate Mills (12.1 points per game), who are both having breakout seasons for the Maroon and White.

Senior guard Katie Nelson has shown improvement during the latter portion of the season, putting up 18 points in the team's 81-67 win over Richmond on Jan. 19, which ended the Minutewomen's six-game losing streak at the time.

Polamalu overcomes adversity

By Tom Silverstein
Knight Ridder

DETROIT — Watching 5-foot-10, 212-pound Pittsburgh Steelers safety Troy Polamalu negotiate a football field, dodging obstacles like a subcompact on a freeway of SUVs as his long, curly locks labor to keep up with his swift change of direction, one can't help wondering whether it is all an illusion.

Salu Polamalu had that feeling 16 years ago.

Only he wasn't watching his nephew play football at the time. He was witnessing an 8-year-old boy with a troubled family life make a choice people 20 years his elder couldn't make on their best days.

The young Polamalu gave up the allure of the southern California streets and the comfort of his mother's arms to make his home in the tiny town of Tenmile, Ore. He made the choice because he saw the future and it didn't look very good.

"Could you imagine if a great young man like him had not been able to advance his athletic ability?" Salu Polamalu said Tuesday in a telephone interview from his home in Tenmile. "What a shame it would have been. He's so intelligent. He made a decision not to go back to a place where he saw violence and gangs as a way of life.

"He sacrificed being around his mom, his brother and three sisters. What young man is willing to say he would do that, I don't know. It's fascinating that someone that young would make a decision like that."

By his own admission, Troy Polamalu had fallen into some of the trappings of street life and was close to following in the footsteps of his three older siblings, each of whom had been through the legal system. After his mother, Salu's

See POLAMALU on page 11

Steelers safety Troy Polamalu has played a major role in Pittsburgh's run to the Super Bowl. The Steelers will face the Seahawks on Sunday.

Back Forward Stop Refresh Home AutoFill Print Mail
@www.SunraiseInc.com

Screen Printed Tee
*Exp. 2.31.06

$5*

Your Design or Logo!

*White T's ONLY small-XLarge
24 minimum • 1Standard Color • 1 side • Screen $20

Apparel Unlimited
SCREEN PRINTERS
322 Russell Street
Hadley, MA 01035

322 Russell St.
Hadley, MA 01035
413-586-7133
www.SunraiseInc.com

Graduating Seniors

Did you know that the UMASS Yearbook is the oldest yearbook in New England?

Even better, it is the third oldest in the country.

Rather than imagining how wonderful being a part of this momentous history would be like, act now and

Get your picture taken for the yearbook

Senior sitting portraits for spring semester begin

February 6 - February 10

Campus Center rm 176-174

iNDEX
umass yearbook

For more details on setting up an appointment and information on other available dates in April, visit our site at www.umass.edu/rso/index

Still have questions? Contact us by E-mail or phone

index@stuaf.umass.edu
phone: (413) 545-0848

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN By Rainy Stanford

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

THE ZOO By Gabe Stone

Quote of the Day

"The fire will always burn you and we still light the flame."

—Miranda Lambert

ACROSS
1 Major commodity
7 Knife thrust
11 Cheese
14 Plant a second crop
15 Distinctive atmosphere
16 & so forth
17 "The Lion in Winter" star
18 Wide smile
19 What person
20 Grange
22 More destitute
24 Ivory or Canary
27 Strongboxes
29 Darrell Evans
30 Tel-Aviv main
32 Wee lad
33 Cuban export
34 Bernard Smith et al.
37 Cow chow
38 Brute
39 Extinct bird
42 Uninvited guests
44 Knights' weapons
47 Swallow
48 Eddie Murphy movie
49 ___ Stanley Gardner
50 Little misses
52 Disorderly jumble
53 Oven-cooked
55 Cream shade
57 Chewy treat
58 Sen.'s son
60 Give a new title to
64 Psychic letters
65 Principia
66 English pope
67 ___ Moines, IA
68 Arizona city
69 Combined as resources

DOWN
1 Theater sign's letters
2 Hanoi holiday
3 Gone by
4 Nonreligious
5 "Damn Yankees" vamp
6 Fancy pitchers
7 Sins in the middle
8 Cagy-ed
9 Zodiac's 8-hr. sign
10 Cause of ruin
11 Felling
12 Goddess of wisdom
13 Olympics official
21 Screen stars
23 Podium
24 Part of a table setting
25 Neighborhood
26 Dark blue
28 Ferrari, e.g.
31 Andes people
33 Salad green
35 Wino
36 ISS partner
39 Little more than 40 Underground deposits
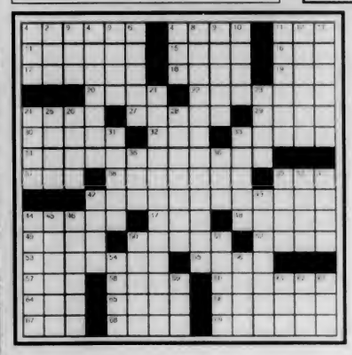
41 Queries
42 Force on astronauts?
43 Sak's real name
44 Combined
45 Stir up
46 B during devices
50 Bottle resident?
51 Assign to the junk heap
54 Part of the school year
56 Recombivir
59 Black or White
61 Be ill
62 Mae West
63 Pull the plug on

Find today's answers online



www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove

Belgian beer on through Saturday

themoanandove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Submit your comic!

e-mail collegianeom@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Do not attempt to engage that cop in a high-speed chase.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Do not buy plane tickets before you know your final exam schedule.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You are going to get into a lot of trouble this weekend.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You can totally get away with skipping that discussion today.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
You really need to work on your people skills.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Don't worry, beauty is only a light switch away.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
A pet monkey isn't such a great idea. Especially in a dorm room.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You really need to eat some vegetables today.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You will have lunch with your roommate today.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Everyone knows you watch Spongebob Squarepants when no one's around.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
There are some really embarrassing pictures of you on the Internet.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You should definitely consider shaving your head.

Chicago Pizzaria
Yes, we Deliver!
Super Bowl Specials!
Family size pizza Veggie platter w/Dips + 2 Lt drinks $24.95 +tax
Family size pizza Assortment platter w/ chicken wings & buffalo fingers + 2 Lt drinks $24.95 +tax
Reserve your order by 2/4/06
Hours
Sun-Wed 3pm-2am
Thurs-Sat 3pm-3am
To order Delivery or Pick-Up Contact
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing St. Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, Ma 01002

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Let Us Pay You To be a student here Full tuition plus $5,000 each year www.umass.edu/armyrotc

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Center of Town 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

CHILDCARE

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part-time Spring – full time

CHILDCARE

Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email: fjmooney@msn.com

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your Ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837

Female PCA Wanted for Active Female; Variable shifts; Some over-nights, $10.84/hr. Call 413-210-6301 Ask for Martina. Car needed.

EMPLOYMENT

Spring & Summer Help Needed: Excellent Earning Potential working outdoors providing exterior carpenter ant treatments to residential customers. Reliable vehicle required (mileage compensation paid). Must be 18 years or older and certified with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by passing the Core Applicator Exam (information, all necessary study materials and payment of exam fees will by provided for qualified individuals). Apply in Person.

EMPLOYMENT

No Phone Calls Please. Minuteman Pest Control 90 Conz Street, Northampton, MA 01060 (across from Hampshire Gazette Building)

Summer Jobs Apply to be a raft guide this summer at Zoar Outdoor. Applicants should be great with people and possess a can-do attitude. Outdoor recreation experience a plus. Training on weekends in March. Application deadline: Feb. 7th, call 413-339-4010 or see www.zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288 / email: fjmooney@msn.com

INSTRUCTION

Pioneer Valley Boxing School. Go to www.westernmassboxing.com

MISCELLANEOUS

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.athenahn.com/goddess/910

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1988 Hottest Destinations – Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $159 www.sunsplashtours.com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2006 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Temple gets revenge

Minutemen thrashed by Owls on the road

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Temple sharp-shooter Mardy Collins said that his team was looking to beat the Massachusetts men's basketball team by 30 points and embarrass them the way his team was embarrassed in a 60-34 loss to UMass on Jan. 21.

Collins' statements turned out to be prophetic: the Owls (12-7, 5-3 Atlantic 10) dominated the Minutemen in a convincing 76-47 win, outplaying UMass (9-9, 4-4 A-10) in all aspects of the game.

"I wasn't happy with the way we competed," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "We got out-rebounded by a team that doesn't out-rebound anybody."

UMass	47
Temple	76

It was definitely a group effort tonight as far as our not playing well.

"Our guys played great basketball when the game was over," Ford fumed. "It's easy to play when you're down 30 and you have nothing to lose. I'm very disappointed."

UMass will be back in action on Saturday at 7 p.m. when the Rhode Island Rams visit the Mullins Center for the second matchup of the season between the two teams.

The Owls were fired up for the rematch with the Minutemen, who handled John Chaney's team with ease in front of 8,127 fans in Amherst less than two weeks ago. This time, however, it was Temple dishing out the embarrassing defeat.

"They were killing us on the glass. They got to' lose balls quicker than we did," Ford said. "We were standing around and watching. We have so far to go as a basketball team; I'm done with this game. I'm more concerned with where our team is headed."

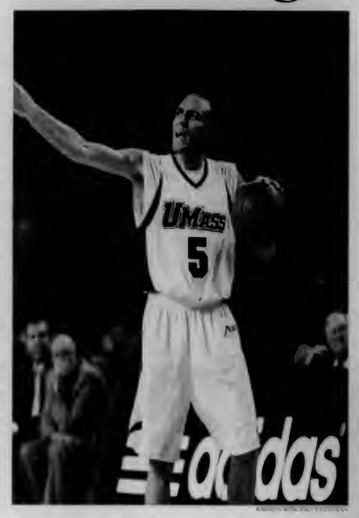
There wasn't much to celebrate for Ford and company. UMass committed 11 turnovers in the first half and scored only nine points, the fewest scored in one half ever at the Liacouras Center.

The Minutemen turned the ball over 17 times in the game, compared to just seven by the Owls.

The roles were reversed last night: in the first meeting UMass shot the lights out (51 percent shooting from the floor), but last night it was all Temple from downtown, shooting 10-21 from 3-point land.

Temple began the first half with a 5-0 run before Rashaun Freeman sliced through the defense and dropped in a baby hook shot about four minutes into the game.

Stephane Lasme got into the action early with an emphatic block on the weak side, but Temple's Mark Tyndale hurried a 3-pointer off of an offensive rebound to push the Owls' lead to 8-2.



At the 13:06 mark, Collins sent an early message to the Minutemen by extending Temple's lead into double digits with a perfect pass to Antywane Robinson on a fast break for a thunderous alley-oop slam. That made it 12-2 before a Temple steal followed by an offensive rebound and a put-back forced Ford to call a timeout.

The UMass offense was non-existent in the first half, as the Minutemen scored just three points in the first 11:29 of play. The Owls were feeling it from the start, burying 3-pointers (Robinson and Collins) on back-to-back possessions in the span of a minute, giving the Owls a 26-5 lead.

Freeman hit a 10-footer from the left baseline for UMass' third field goal of its dismal first half with 3:15 remaining, and Lasme added another two with a dunk around the minute mark to get UMass' point total to an abysmal nine by the break.

James Life led UMass with 19 points, scoring all of his points in the second half.

Freeman and Lasme added eight points apiece.

Junior guard James Life scored all 19 of his points in the second half of last night's 76-47 loss at Temple. UMass was held to just nine points in the first half.

UMass looking to continue strong play

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The last time the Massachusetts women's basketball team faced off against the Rhode Island Rams, the situation for the Minutewomen was slightly different. It was Jan. 13 and the Minutewomen were riding a four-game losing streak, glaring at a 3-11 overall record and had yet to win an Atlantic 10 contest.

Simply put, the scenario was bleak for UMass coach Marnie Dacko. As URI ousted UMass 63-54 that afternoon, the season outlook was dim.

Weeks later, as UMass prepares to take on the Rams for the rematch at the Ryan Center at 7 p.m. the plot has altered, and the two squads have almost reversed roles.

Along with a 6-14 overall record and a 3-6 A-10 record, the Minutewomen have won three out of their last five contests since falling to the Rams, including a 55-53 upset over then No. 25 George Washington on Jan. 22. The Rams, on the other hand, are looking at a five-game losing streak and have not won a single game since that Friday the 13th game in January against the Minutewomen.

Regardless of the new position the Minutewomen have put themselves in, Dacko stresses that in order to come out with a victory they have to keep their mind in the right place.

"We've got to be able to come out of the gates ready to go. We can't have any time where we have a mental lapse," Dacko said.

One category that has haunted UMass this season is turnovers. So far this season UMass is averaging 19.7 turnovers per game and it is a problem that Dacko attributes to decision-making.

During the loss to URI, the

See HOOP on page 14

Sophomore guard Kaylie Schiavetta and UMass will face Rhode Island tonight at 7 p.m. on the road. UMass lost 63-54 in a Jan. 13 game with URI.

Recent losses show UM has a way to go

Rob Greenfield

A lot can happen in 11 days.

Wars have been fought in less time.

Brad and Angelina could break up, get back together and announce a "Mr and Mrs. Smith" sequel.

The Celtics could – and after the game against the Timberwolves on the other night they might actually consider this – trade back for Marcus Banks, Ricky Davis and Mark Blount and welcome them back with their sincerest apologies.

For the Massachusetts men's basketball team, things have gone from promising to devastating in just a week-and-a-half.

Eleven days ago the Minutemen were 4-1 in the Atlantic 10 with convincing wins over lesser conference opponents. They beat the teams they should have beaten, something not done when Steve Lappas graced the UMass sidelines.

They had just humbled the Temple Owls on national television, 60-34, and drew praise from commentators, analysts and coaches. Andy Katz labeled Ford's team as one of the "Rising Teams" in college basketball. Everyone was fat and happy.

But that's all changed now – a buzzer-beater loss at Rhode Island (a game where the Minutemen were buried from the opening tap), a follow up 69-61 loss to the mediocre La Salle explorers and the Minutemen were looming dangerously close to the .500 mark.

Rhode Island and La Salle were the first challenges. They were the first decent conference opponents UMass faced this season, and it was a good litmus test for Ford's assembly. But after going 0-2 against the Rams and Explorers, most of my confidence in this year's team was shot. Those were two teams that, if UMass was going to establish itself as an elite A-10 team, the Minutemen had to beat.

But both efforts were sub-par, and UMass went to Temple last night with an unimpressive 4-3 record in conference play.

Now this, a humiliating 76-47 loss to the team UMass annihilated less than two weeks earlier.

It was embarrassing for all parties – players, coaches and fans. The Minutemen couldn't move the ball on the offensive end without turning it over. They couldn't grab a defensive rebound and they couldn't contain the red-hot shooting of Mardy Collins and the Temple Owls.

The Minutemen scored nine points in the first half, the lowest point total for a half in the Temple's history at the Liacouras Center. A calming presence on offense was nowhere to be found, and 11 turnovers in the first half – 17 in the game – was the glaring indicator that the Minutemen have some serious issues in the ball control department.

UMass looked helpless, a feeling that Ford would not like to feel more than halfway through the season. But the Kentucky grad will have to accept the team that he inherited. They weren't going to be an NCAA team overnight and the hype and expectation that engulfed this year's team was premature.

I have no doubt that Ford is the right coach for UMass basketball. He has playing experience under one of the best college coaches in basketball history. He played on a Final Four basketball team. He has coached on many levels, including Division I college, where he took an Eastern Kentucky program that was down-and-out and rerouted it to the NCAA tournament and a first-round matchup with Kentucky.

But this was never going to be the year for UMass basketball. It was just too soon – too soon for any coach (even a Pitino, Kryzewski or Calhoun) to come into a miserable situation and turn it into happy hour.

Last night was a perfect example. No matter how much Ford screamed and yelled and prepared, there was no way to prevent that loss.

It was completely on the players. There are certain aspects of a basketball team that coaches have no control over. Ford can prepare and prepare and prepare, but it will be up to the players whether they come to play, whether they listen, whether they execute.

The Minutemen still have the juggernauts of the A-10 ahead of them. They will be overmatched, mentally and physically, and quiet your dreams of an A-10 Championship, because UMass basketball is still a couple of years away.

But look at it this way, it didn't happen for Eastern Kentucky right away, either. It took Ford a good four years before Eastern Kentucky started to show serious signs of improvement. Then, in its fifth year, it went 22-9.

The UMass timeline will be similar. It won't be this year, and it might not be the next, but there is light at the end of the tunnel. UMass fans just need to sit back and let the coach with the Southern twang work his magic.

-Rob Greenfield is a Collegian columnist.

Weis brings in top recruits

By Ralph D. Russo
Associated Press

Charlie Weis and Urban Meyer proved to be first-class recruiters, too.

The new coaches for Notre Dame and Florida followed up successful debut seasons by bringing in top-notch recruiting classes Wednesday, the first day of the national signing period.

As usual, national champion Texas and Southern California restocked their rosters with blue-chip prospects. And Penn State, whose resurgence under coach Joe Paterno last season was aided by a stellar 2005 recruiting class, has another promising group headed to Happy Valley.

Weis came to Notre Dame and Meyer to Florida after the 2004 season with well-earned reputations as offensive gurus, but some questions about how well they'd recruit in their new jobs.

Weis was hired in Dec. 2004 and didn't have a chance to immerse himself in recruiting because he was busy helping the Patriots win a third Super Bowl in four seasons.

Taking over for Tyrone Willingham, the former New England offensive coordinator did his best to work the phones, but in the end last year's Fighting Irish recruiting class was considered just so-so.

Once Weis was able to focus all his attention on his alma mater, he quickly built a reputation as a relentless recruiter, securing a dozen commitments before he coached a game.

Then Weis went out and returned the Fighting Irish to national prominence with a 9-3 season and No. 9 final ranking. The straight-shooting disciple of Bill Parcells has brought the mystique back to Notre Dame and the big-time recruits have followed.

Notre Dame's class is rated among the best in the country by the analysts, something that hasn't happened for a while in South Bend, Ind.

Offensive lineman Sam Young, a 300-pounder from Florida considered one of the top-20 players in country by most experts, is the jewel of Notre Dame's class.

Weis has proved to be a perfect fit at Notre Dame, but he probably wouldn't be there if Meyer didn't turn the Irish down to take the Florida job.

Meyer's 9-3 debut in Gainesville, Fla., wasn't met with as much euphoria as Weis', but the first group of Gators recruits Meyer can take full credit for answered any questions about whether the Midwesterner could recruit in the Southeastern Conference.

Meyer's marquee newcomer is a highly touted quarterback and local hero, whose decision to become a Gator received national television coverage.

Tim Tebow of Ponte Vedra Beach, Fla., picked the Gators over Alahama. In the minds of many Florida fans, landing Tebow was as hig for Meyer as his wins over Florida State, Georgia and Tennessee.

With quarterback Chris Leak entering his senior season and last season's backup, Josh Portis, transferring, Tebow has a chance to shoot up the Gators' depth chart as a freshman.

Percy Harvin, a receiver from Virginia rated the No. 1 recruit in the country by Rivals.com, was committed to Florida but was waiting until later in the day to ink a letter of intent.

Texas coach Mack Brown and USC's Pete Carroll are college football's current kings of signing day, scooping up high school all-Americans by the bushel in recent years.

The Rose Bowl rivals were at it again Wednesday, signing up classes that should keep the Longhorns and Trojans in championship contention for years.

Brown, derisively labeled 'Coach February' when he seemed to win more recruiting battles than big games, has consistently lured most of the best prospects from the Lone Star state to Austin.

The Longhorns latest class has 23 players from Texas, highlighted by defensive end Eddie Jones from Kilgore and linebacker Sergio Kindle from Dallas, both ranked among the best in the country at their positions.

Carroll and his staff tend to reach farther in recruiting, and that was the case again as USC got commitments from top players from Utah, Colorado, Texas and New Jersey to go with many of the best California prospects.

The Trojans are looking for immediate help in the backfield, where there are no clear-cut successors to Reggie Bush and LenDale White, who both entered the NFL draft as juniors.

Stafon Johnson from Los Angeles and Emmanuel Moody from Coppell, Texas, both ranked among the top-10 running backs in the country by Rivals.com, were expected to sign with the Trojans.

USC's willingness to play freshmen has been a big seller with recruits. Now Penn State and Paterno can make the same claim after turning to fast frosh Derrick Williams and Justin King to help invigorate the Nittany Lions' offense last season.

Penn State plucked Williams out of Maryland and reached into that state again for several more players this year, including top-rated cornerback A.J. Wallace.

Notre Dame (seen here in last season's loss to USC) has stocked up for next year, as head coach Charlie Weis brought in one of the nation's top recruiting classes.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Friday, February 3, 2006 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 70

UMass celebrates Black History Month

John H. Bracey, Afro-American Studies professor at UMass, led a discussion named "Exploring Historical Leaders of the Past", in celebration of Black History Month.

Mark M. Cryer performed "99 Questions you've always wanted to ask an African American but were too afraid to ask for fear they'd break their foot off in your a" last night.

Alumn examines the behavior of the drongo bird

By Sarah King
Collegian Correspondent

The drongo, a species of bird found in the rainforests and remote villages of Sri Lanka and the Southern Asian tropics, has demonstrated a unique talent for mimicking the alarm calls of other birds.

Eben Goodale, who completed his Ph.D last May at the University of Massachusetts, has spent years studying and documenting the behavior of drongos, a relatively small, aggressive and fearless bird, in the wild.

Previously, birds, such as mockingbirds, have only imitated other calls in random order and out of context with no connection to what they are doing, while the drongo clearly understands the meaning of the call and how it is used.

"I still remember vividly the moment that I first observed this behavior," Goodale says.

"I was following through the rainforest a mixed-species flock of birds. Mixed-species flocks in this rainforest are large and noisy, averaging 12 species and nearly 40 individuals. From the back of the flock, one bird, a greater racket-tailed drongo, swooped down and approached me to within three meters at my head height. The drongo was clearly mobbing me – a behavior that birds use to notify other individuals of the presence of a stationary predator."

"The drongo did an extraordinary thing: it began to mimic the mobbing-specific note types of other species. It kept rotating through the mobbing notes of other species, in addition to its own notes. I wouldn't have understood what was happening if I hadn't just completed a study on the alarm-associated calls of all the species in the flock system."

According to Goodale, the drongo also shows the ability to imitate the alarm calls of eagles, hawks and even some mammals, such as squirrels, which was demonstrated to him as he was walking through a village and saw a bird with a broken wing lying on the ground. When he picked it up to help the bird, it called out the alarm of a squirrel.

"What's fascinating about this behavior," Goodale says, "is that it's reminiscent of what we know some birds – notably parrots – are able to do in the laboratory, learn to use other species' signal in a context-dependent manner. But such context-dependent mimicry has not yet been demonstrated in the wild."

Parrots have always been able to be taught to assign words to meanings in laboratories and then repeat them.

However, the fact that the drongo can naturally learn this behavior is a significant finding.

His thesis advisor and UMass biology professor Bruce Byers says this behavior is significant because "the idea that signals could've evolved beyond species boundaries hasn't really been demonstrated before."

"Proceedings of the Royal Society: Biological Sciences," a British scientific journal, published Goodale's article about drongo behavior online last month. "Context-dependent vocal mimicry in a passerine bird," is co-authored by Sarath W. Kotagma of the University of Colombo in Sri Lanka.

Goodale plans to continue his study on the drongo in Sri Lanka, India and Papua New Guinea.

Local historian to meet with faculty, students

Historians aren't typically associated with rock 'n' roll or beat poets, but Dennis McNally is not your typical historian.

McNally turned to writing as a way to bring history to the public by casting off the formal style of academia in favor of more accessible work.

Last year McNally gave the Five College History lecture and touched upon the importance of writing for the public at large rather than just for other historians and academics. This year, the Dean of the College of Humanities and Fine Arts is sponsoring an encore by bringing in McNally for a week in residence starting on Feb 20. McNally will meet with faculty and students here at UMass and at the other four colleges talking about his work and reprising remarks on writing histories for the public.

McNally's exact schedule of lectures and guest appearances at the University is still tentative, according to Larry Owens, a UMass professor.

"It turns out that scheduling appearances in literature, history and journalism classes along with those at the other campuses can be quite a hassle for a person like him," said Owens. He said that more details would be forthcoming but that any schedule would likely include open discussions with both faculty and students along with appearances in classes as a guest speaker.

McNally earned his doctorate in American History from UMass in 1978. Since then he has written two biographies, "A Long Strange Trip: The Inside History of the Grateful Dead" and "Desolate Angle" about Jack Kerouac and the Beat Generation. McNally also worked as the publicist and official historian for the Grateful Dead and is currently working on a book about the cultural history of the Mississippi from Mark Twain to Bob Dylan.

The atypical historian returns to UMass hoping to spread his atypical approach to history amongst the students at the University so that they will have a greater appreciation of writing history for the public.

-Ryan Richardson
Collegian Staff

Research shows little difference in MBA, undergrad

By Tali Yahalom
Daily Pennsylvanian (U. Penn)

PHILADELPHIA—An MBA degree may not provide much of a boost in getting to the top, according to a recent study. The study, conducted at Pace University's Lubin School of Business, indicated that top business executives with an MBA are not necessarily more successful than their colleagues with only an undergraduate degree.

Pace professors Aron Gottesman and Matthew Morey put together a list of companies in the New York Stock Exchange and reviewed their CEOs' academic background. Gottesman and Morey analyzed the companies' performance over two years and found no significant difference in success rates between CEOs with graduate degrees and CEOs without.

And while those who have graduated from the University of Pennsylvania Wharton School's undergraduate program earn almost as much money as MBA alumni, Wharton administrators still say that comparing the two programs is like comparing apples and oranges.

"An MBA can be invaluable to a student who wants to improve his [or] her business knowledge, [but] lots of Wharton undergraduate alumni do just fine without ever going on for an MBA," Barbara Hewitt, Wharton's associate director of Career Services said.

Hewitt has compiled data that seems to coincide with the Pace study's results. In her most recent survey, conducted in 1996 and 1997, she found that the average salary of a Wharton undergraduate alumnus was $93,609 per year. For a graduate with an MBA, it was $95,132.

In addition, while 30.6 percent of undergraduate alumni went on to earn an MBA, 55.8 percent pursued careers with only a bachelor's degree, Hewitt found.

Wharton undergraduates are offering explanations for the relatively small salary gap.

"Wharton seniors are not competing in the same job market as MBAs for the most part," Wharton and engineering junior Daniel Panzer said. "Undergraduates go for analyst positions and they get on one track of advancement [while] MBAs go for associate positions," he added.

Still, Gottesman and Morey acknowledge that the real variable in determining success is raw business acumen and the amount of natural talent an individual possesses.

Although having an MBA may not be the last word on success in business – or even be a consideration for an undergraduate seeking a job – Wharton officials still place a high worth on the school's MBA program.

"I really believe that an MBA adds value above and beyond," said Thomas Caleel, director of MBA Admissions and Financial Aid. "It's important to realize that nobody is saying that getting an MBA is going to make you successful. It's what you do with your MBA that makes you successful."

Study finds New Orleans may lose 80 percent of black popualtion

By Ross Frazier
Brown Daily Herald (Brown U.)

PROVIDENCE, R.I.– On Dec. 27, a team of Brown University researchers garnered national media attention for their findings that Hurricane Katrina disproportionately impacted New Orleans' poor blacks.

The study, led by Professor of Sociology John Logan, quantifies what was already suspected: the population of the storm-damaged areas is nearly half black (45.8 percent, versus 26.4 percent of the undamaged areas), and disproportionate segments of those affected live in rental housing (45.7 percent compared to 30.9 percent), fall below the poverty line (20.9 percent versus 15.3 percent) and are unemployed (7.6 percent compared to 6 percent).

According to the study of the area's 13 planning districts and 72 neighborhoods, a lower economic status forced poor people to live in low-lying areas. These areas, and thus the people who would have the most difficulty recovering, were hit the hardest when Katrina struck.

Most striking about the data, however, is the realization that if New Orleans' citizens are prevented from returning to flood-ravaged areas, the city could lose more than 80 percent of its black population.

With the migration of so many residents quickly becoming a diaspora, many New Orleans officials have made public comments about being in a race against time, saying that the city must rebuild before people settle into new homes in places like Houston, Dallas and Atlanta.

The Brown study is the first quantification of these fears and it paints a grim picture for the future of New Orleans' diverse cultural heritage.

The group's findings came not long before New Orleans Democratic Mayor Ray Nagin said in a Martin Luther King Jr. Day speech that God wants New Orleans to be a "chocolate city."

"You can't have New Orleans no other way. The city will be a majority African-American city. It's the way God wants it to be," Nagin told the audience on Jan. 16.

The Brown study seems to paint a different picture of New Orleans' future. Nagin has not commented on the Brown study, and his office did not return calls from the Brown Daily Herald.

Despite the mayor's comments, Logan said he believes public officials are beginning to do their jobs effectively.

"They didn't manage things well in the fall but now, maybe just in the last month, is when people have started to confront some of the policy choices that have to be made," he said.

Indeed, community leaders from the city's Bring Back New Orleans Commission recently introduced its urban renewal plan. The ambitious proposal calls for the immediate construction of a high-speed light rail system, levee repair and aggressive neighborhood planning. The plan drew much criticism for its proposal of a four-month moratorium on building in heavily damaged areas. Critics say the moratorium will prevent displaced citizens from returning and investing in a post-Katrina New Orleans.

Additionally, the commission gave its support to a bill proposed by Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., which would allow the government to use bond revenues to buy out homeowners in heavily damaged areas at prices near the homes' pre-Katrina value and then redevelop the land. The bill lacks support from the White House because of its high cost, and some residents believe it would push people out of the Crescent City.

The Brown study seems to bolster this idea, but also points out that it would be primarily poor blacks that would be bought out under the plan.

The commission also predicted in a January report that it expects the city's population to be nearly 247,000 people by September 2008. The Brown study contradicts this as well.

Logan believes there are two possibilities for the future of the Big Easy.

One option is for the city to be rebuilt for people who can afford to live in certain high-demand areas, pushing the working class into peripheral areas from which they would commute.

The other possibility is for more affluent and predominately white neighborhoods to become more inclusive, providing a range of affordable housing options thus preserving the historic pot that gives New Orleans much of its cultural identity.

"Ultimately what we're talking about is a third world city versus an inclusive city that would be very different from the American past," Logan said.

Shirley Floyd, left, and Elenora Hill, both originally from New Orleans, spend the afternoon on the front patio of the Big Bass Resort in Southeast Houston, Texas.

COACHELLA MUSIC FESTVAL
Sigur ros and TOOL headline the festival's seventh show.

PAGE 5

BROKEN PROMISE?
The University promises a quality education for each student, but are we getting our money's worth?

PAGE 4

TODAY P.Cloudy, H49°, L21°
TOMORROW Mostly Sunny, H53°, L28°
SUNDAY Rain/Snow, H42°, L33°

RAMS COME TO UMASS
The Minutemen host URI tomorrow night at 7 p.m.

PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael Busack
Managing Editor Eric Athens
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Katie Houston
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egerian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Ian Jones
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Kristen LaCasse
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising, Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Bellivieau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Caristi
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Sports Rob Greenfield
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts Fall and Spring semesters. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenues. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Adelphi, became the College News in 1903, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967, the Collegian has been honored with Associated Collegiate Press and Society of Professional Journalists awards. The Collegian's offices are located on the third floor of the Campus Center. Subscriptions are $100 per semester.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Elizabeth Caristi
COPY EDITOR
Michael A. Busack
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Sean Duram, Sarah Belanger

www.dailycollegian.com

CINEMARK
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for Friday 2/3/06
Digital Surround Sound in All Auditoriums
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Munich(R) 1:10 4:45 8:10
Underworld Evolution (R) 1:45 4:30 7:30 10:10
Capote(R) 1:15 4:00 7:20 10:00
The New World(PG-13) 1:00 4:00 7:10 10:15
When A Stranger Calls (PG-13) 1:30 4:25 7:30 9:45*
Housebroken(PG) 1:40 4:10 6:50 9:05
Something New(PG13) 1:00 4:30 7:25 9:50*
Brokeback Mountain (R) 1:00 4:00 7:00 10:05
Big Momma's House 2 (PG-13) 1:00 4:10 7:40 10:10*
Senior Show 2/9 Munich @ 10am
The Matador (R) 1:30 4:40 7:15 9:45*
Friday Night Rewind- -Feb 3rd
Annapolis(PG13) 1:00 4:05 7:05 9:55
Caddyshack - Midnight
Sat. only 10:10*
Nanny McPhee(PG) 1:20 4:20 6:40 9:10*
• NO PASSES NO SUPERSAVERS
Times & showtimes available @ cinemark.com

Police investigate attack at New Bedford gay bar

By Ray Henry
Associated Press

NEW BEDFORD—A teenager dressed in all black attacked patrons of a gay nightspot here Thursday with a hatchet and a handgun, police said, wounding three of them before fleeing into the early morning darkness.

Police issued a warrant for 18-year-old Jacob D. Robida, of New Bedford, seeking to charge him with civil rights violations, as well as attempted murder and assault.

"Obviously, we have a man who's dangerous, who's not rational, and he has weapons," said Bristol District Attorney Paul Walsh Jr.

The assailant walked into Puzzles Lounge, a popular gay nightspot in this historic seaport, around midnight.

He was wearing a black hooded sweat shirt and black pants, said the bartender, who asked to be identified only by his first name, Phillip, because of concerns about his own safety while Robida is at large.

He flashed an apparently fake ID to the bartender and ordered a drink, Phillip said.

The man asked if it was a gay bar, and was told it was, then ordered another drink and walked to the back of the bar where two men were playing pool, the bartender said.

He shoved one of the men to the ground, said Phillip, then pulled a hatchet from his sweat shirt and began swinging it at the man's head.

The second pool player intervened, swinging at the assailant with his pool cue, but the attacker fended him off, the bartender said.

Several other patrons tried to stop him, and he was knocked off his feet, sending the hatchet flying, Phillip said.

Police have issued a warrant for 18-year-old Jacob D. Robida, of New Bedford, in connection with an attack at New Bedford gay bar.

The attacker then pulled out the handgun and shot one man, according to the bartender. He fired another bullet through the chest of a patron who was leaving the bathroom.

"He was shooting at everyone," Phillip said.

He shoved the bartender before leaving the building and running up the street, Phillip said said. Moments later, the police arrived.

They found the hatchet on the barroom floor and a knife lying on the ground outside, though it was apparently never used in the attack.

According to a court filing attached to the arrest warrant, a woman in the bar recognized Robida as a current or former student at New Bedford High School. School officials declined to confirm whether Robida was enrolled there.

He's also known to New Bedford police because he graduated in 2001 from the city's Junior Police Academy, according to acting Police Chief David Provencher.

The "boot camp" program is designed to teach discipline to 12- to 14-year-olds, many of whom are referrals from the juvenile courts or social services agencies.

Robida is described as a short, stocky white man with dark hair. He was last seen driving a green 1999 Pontiac Grand Am.

"He's definitely considered armed and dangerous and has extremely violent tendencies," said New Bedford police Capt. Richard Spirlet.

According to the police affidavit, officers went to Robida's home and spoke to his mother, Stephanie Oliver.

She said her son came home around 1 a.m., bleeding from the head, then left again.

The officers went to his bedroom and found what they described as "Nazi regalia" and anti-Semitic writings on the wall, according to the affidavit.

Oliver declined to comment Thursday to The Associated Press through a family friend who answered the door at their home.

The injured men were identified by police as Robert Perry of Dartmouth, Alex Taylor of Fairhaven, and Luis Rosado of New Bedford.

Two were taken to Boston hospitals and a third was taken to St. Luke's Hospital in New Bedford.

Police said that one of the victims was in critical condition with unspecified head wounds, while the two others had gunshot wounds. Police would not say which of the victims was in critical condition.

Perry was listed in good condition at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston.

Puzzles is popular with the local gay community and is listed on several Web sites offering resources to gays and lesbians. Police said they rarely respond to reports of trouble there.

"If all the bars in the city were that quiet, we'd be great," Spirlet said.

The bar's owner, Richard F. Macedo, said he planned to be open on Thursday night. Staying closed would amount to giving in to homophobia, he said.

Puzzles and its patrons have never previously been targeted because of their sexual orientation, he said.

"We've been here almost 15 years," Macedo said. "All it takes is one bad egg."

Circumcision ritual generates controversy in New York

By David B. Caruso
Associated Press

NEW YORK—For thousands of years, rabbis performed a simple procedure to cleanse the wound during a ritual circumcision: Like outdoorsmen treating a snake bite, they sucked blood from the cut and spit it out.

That age-old procedure is now the subject of a clash between religion and science in modern-day New York.

Prompted by a child's death from an infection, the stat

Health Department is drawing up its first set of safety guidelines governing the practice, which was abandoned by most Jews long ago but has survived among the ultra-Orthodox in a few Hasidic communities.

Doctors have long been concerned that the procedure — called "metzitzah b'peh" in Hebrew — could spread disease. But their argument became urgent last year when New York City health officials said the practice had given a baby a fatal infection.

The illness was caused by herpes simplex type 1, the common virus in saliva that causes cold sores. Usually harmless to adults, it can be deadly to newborns.

The death was believed to be the first in the United States to be associated with metzitzah b'peh, but the city said it had linked four other herpes infections since 1988 to two mohels, as those who perform ritual circumcisions are called. Two more cases were reported in 2005, including one in which a child suffered brain damage.

Efforts to curtail the practice have met with resistance from some Hasidic leaders, who say the act is commanded by Jewish law. They threatened protests after the city's health commissioner recommended that infants not undergo the procedure.

The state guidelines will stop short of a ban but will include voluntary precautions that could reduce the chances of infection during a bris, as a ritual circumcision is called, said state Health Department spokesman Robert Kenny.

Rabbis will probably be asked to inform their congregations about the risks, and parents will be advised to seek prompt care from a pediatrician if their baby develops a fever or rash. Steps will also be taken to "ensure that mohels have full knowledge of their health status" before performing the ritual, Kenny said.

He declined to discuss details, saying the guidelines were still being developed. But several religious leaders have suggested that mohels be asked to rinse their mouths with alcohol, undergo regular testing for disease and refrain from doing circumcisions if they have a cold sore.

The guidelines are likely to displease some doctors.

Dr. Jonathan M. Zenilman, a professor at the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine in Baltimore, said that while infections have been rare, the potential for harm is substantial enough to justify a ban.

"This is something that is pretty much counter to all of the infection-control measures that we have," Zenilman said.

Asking mohels (the word is usually pronounced MOY-il) to police themselves could be ineffective, he warned. As many as 70 percent of all adults have herpes simplex 1, and it is difficult to detect periods when the virus is contagious.

It is unclear how the Hasidic community will react to the guidelines.

Rabbi David Niederman of the United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburg, a Brooklyn neighborhood with a large number of ultra-Orthodox Jews, has argued for no government action, saying there is too little medical evidence to justify a public warning about a ritual performed safely thousands of times a year.

"Parents have been alarmed unnecessarily," he said, adding that he has received calls from worried mothers.

"We are not fanatics," Niederman said. "If there is evidence that this practice is not safe, we will not do it. We will be the first ones to act. That is embodied in the same Torah that tells us to make a bris for a child."

Rabbi J. David Bleich, a professor of both Jewish and secular law at Yeshiva University, said the debate over metzitzah b'peh began in Europe during the mid-19th century, when suspicion arose that it was spreading tuberculosis. Ever since, there has been disagreement over whether the practice was required under Jewish law or simply recommended for medical reasons.

A majority of Reform and modern Orthodox mohels decided it was recommended, and now clean a circumcision wound with sterile gauze, a sponge or a glass tube.

But a century and a half of debate has not resolved the argument, and Bleich suggested that actions by health authorities would not settle the issue either.

"Whatever changes are going to come are not going to come because of government pressure," he said. "If you want to change the way rabbis are doing things, the way to do it isn't to threaten them."

Twelve universities suspend Coca-Cola contracts

By Nicole Kelley
University Daily Kansas

LAWRENCE, Kan.—Twelve universities have suspended contracts with The Coca-Cola Company after allegations surfaced about abuse to workers and the environment at the company's foreign plants.

One of the schools leading the charge is the University of Michigan, which, after being contacted to take action by factory workers in Colombia, suspended its contract with the company.

A group at the university called Coalition to Cut the Contract with Coca-Cola claims the company was behind the deaths of eight union members in Colombia through its partnership with paramilitary forces.

The Coalition also claims that in India, Coca-Cola depleted the groundwater supply, causing an increased number of pesticides found in the water and soil. Coca-Cola denied any of this happened.

Lindsey Rogers, University of Michigan sophomore and member of the Coalition to Cut the Contract with Coca-Cola, said, "Coke likes to say that they're not responsible for the action in their bottling camps, but somehow when paramilitary blockade the roads they find a way to get through."

The University of Kansas has a contract with Coca-Cola worth $15.7 million over a 10-year span. In the 2004-2005 school year, a total of 28,563 Coke products were sold in vending machines throughout campus.

Theresa Klinkenberg, chief financial officer of the University, said no specific concerns about the subject from students had been brought to her attention. She said she couldn't speculate about the action the University would take.

Kerry Kerr, Coca-Cola spokeswoman, said the company plans to hire an impartial, independent third-party to access the situation in Colombia. Coca-Cola also wants to meet with the University of Michigan to address the boycott, she said.

"We are committed to work with all those schools so they have the acts and we can continue to have a partnership with them in the future," Kerr said.

Rogers said Coca-Cola sent the coalition a letter explaining what the company was going to do, but she wasn't satisfied.

"I don't think that's good enough," Rogers said. "There have been investigations in the past. The real issue is whether or not they are going to fix these problems."

Nolan T. Jones, junior and communications director for University of Kansas Student Senate, said the allegations against Coca-Cola need to be fully investigated before any decision regarding the stance of the University can be made.

"At the end of the day, unless you're a Pepsi fan, I highly doubt most members of the student body want their Senate to jump up and lead a charge against Coke unless something substantial in terms of humanitarian issues was proven," Jones said.

GETS THE ADRENALINE GOING.
YOURS AND WHOEVER READS ABOUT IT ON YOUR RESUME.

AN ARMY OF ONE.
Call 413-545-2321 for more information
ENROLL IN ARMY ROTC
BECOME AN ARMY OFFICER

THE BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
136 years of service ...and counting!
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)
REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2006 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for meetings •Feb. 6th (Mon) •Feb. 8th (Wed)
Feb. 7th (Tues) meeting will be held in room 168C of the Campus Center
•Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Feb. 9th at Boltwood table CC Concourse.
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

Bush to request $18 billion for Katrina relief, more Iraq funds

By Andrew Taylor
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The White House has told Congress to expect requests for about $70 billion more for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in the ongoing budget year and $18 billion more for hurricane relief, Senate GOP aides say.

The details of the requests are not finalized but President Bush's budget for 2007, to be submitted next week, will reflect the totals for planning purposes, said the aides, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the White House has not yet announced the requests. Another $2.3 billion to combat avian flu is also expected.

The funding for Iraq is in addition to $50 billion approved in December and should be enough to conduct the war through Sept. 30, the end of the fiscal year.

Bush is also expected to set aside $50 billion in the 2007 budget for the war effort, though such funds won't be enough for the entire year.

"We understand that besides the supplemental that now, for the first time, they're going to request a bridge fund," said Rep. C.W. "Bill" Young, R-Fla., who chairs the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee. "This is what we're hearing."

Young and Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the senior Democrat on the panel, said late last year that military officials had told them to expect additional Iraq funding of as much as $100 billion for 2006.

But the lawmakers said this week that the total could be lower because of expected troop reductions.

On relief for Hurricane Katrina, Donald Powell, the Bush administration's coordinator for rebuilding the Gulf Coast, confirmed to reporters Thursday that the administration would request $18 billion for rebuilding the Gulf Coast.

He said the money, pushing the total federal commitment to Katrina rebuilding over $100 billion in total assistance, according to administration tallies, would likely be the last spending request from the administration for recovery from the storm for some time.

He said a detailed request would be sent to Congress within 10 to 30 days.

Powell said he does not anticipate additional money for the region in the 2007 budget Bush will announce Monday.

Powell provided little detail about specifically what the money would be used for, saying it would include money for housing, roads and levees.

"That's a lot of money," he said, referring to the $100 billion.

The request is also likely to include funding for federal facilities such as military bases and veterans hospitals damaged by the September storm.

In December, Congress dedicated $29 billion of previously appropriated funds for such purposes as levee repair and construction, emergency funds to compensate homeowners whose hurricane insurance does not cover flood losses, and child care, mental health and other social services.

At that time, Congress exceeded Bush's request by $10.4 billion, mostly by approving $11.5 billion in flexible Community Development Block Grants.

On Iraq and Afghanistan, Congress in December sent the Pentagon $50 billion to pay for wars for the beginning of 2006. Military officials had indicated then to lawmakers that the money would last through May.

But this week, several lawmakers said that the Pentagon recently informed them the money was being spent more quickly than anticipated.

With that money, Congress has approved more than $350 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, including military operations, reconstruction, embassy security and foreign aid, as well as other costs related to the war on terrorism, according to the Congressional Research Service, which writes reports for Congress.

Reilly takes responsibility for running mate resignation

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON—Attorney General Tom Reilly on Thursday blamed his poor political skills for the spectacle in which he tapped a state lawmaker to be his running mate, only to see her withdraw a day later because of her many financial problems.

State Rep. Marie St. Fleur quit the race for lieutenant governor a day earlier amid a storm of revelations about unpaid taxes and student loans. Her announcement came just 27 hours after Reilly, a candidate for governor, formally introduced her as his choice for running mate on the Democratic ticket.

"The process certainly could have been better," Reilly told reporters after he addressed an economic forum at a downtown hotel. "More complete. More thorough. And you learn from these experiences and you try to make sure that they don't happen again."

Reilly blamed the gaffe on his own weak grasp of politics.

"I have to work and improve on the politics of this campaign," he said. "This is a whole different level of politics and it's never been my strong suit, and I have to improve upon that."

Reilly said he routinely hires people who have financial problems to work in the attorney general's office, and he previously did the same a Middlesex district attorney. He said many law school graduates are saddled with heavy educational debt.

But he felt that St. Fleur had to leave the ticket because of the ongoing nature of her $12,000 federal tax debt and $40,000 in delinquent student loans, as well as unpaid excise taxes that prompted the Registry of Motor Vehicles to prohibit her from renewing her license. The Dorchester Democrat graduated from Boston College Law School in 1987 and is now paid an annual salary of $70,569.

Reilly, 63, said he hopes voters would judge him on the full span of his career in state government.

"This is one episode," he said, "one set of experiences in a career that goes back a long time."

He reiterated Thursday that he would not choose another running mate to replace St. Fleur.

"I'm moving forward with my campaign right now," he said, "and there will be no lieutenant governor. I learned that."

Reilly selected St. Fleur as his partner on Sunday evening, just hours after talks broke down with Chris Gabrieli, a millionaire businessman with whom he had held repeated negotiations in prior days.

Campaign spokesman Corey Welford said St. Fleur told Reilly she had financial problems when they met over the weekend to discuss running in tandem, but the attorney general did not know the full scope before making his announcement on Tuesday.

In Massachusetts, candidates for governor and lieutenant governor run separately through the fall primary, but Reilly attempted to pair with St. Fleur by anointing her as his running mate.

While other Democrats had branded the move presumptuous, given that Reilly has yet to win the gubernatorial nomination, any embarrassment over St. Fleur's financial problems was softened by the simultaneous disclosure of tax problems by Deval Patrick.

The former Clinton administration official is challenging Reilly for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

The IRS placed a tax lien on Patrick's home in 1996 when he missed payments in an installment plan arranged after he was hit with what he said was an unexpectedly large tax bill in 1993. Patrick and his wife then retired the remaining $8,778 debt in five months, he said.

The IRS similarly placed a lien on St. Fleur's Dorchester home in 2003 for $12,711 in unpaid taxes. The city of Boston twice this decade placed liens on her property for delinquent taxes, and St. Fleur said she was late in repaying $40,000 in federally back student loans.

In addition, the Registry of Motor Vehicles issued an order in December not to renew her license because she had failed to pay automobile excise taxes in 2005.

In announcing her decision to drop out of the race, St. Fleur said: "This year the race for governor is more important than any one individual."

State Representative Marie St. Fleur quit the race for lieutenant governor one day after a storm of revelations about unpaid taxes and student loans.

Photographers wanted
Paid positions available
Gain valuable experience in photo journalism come down to our offices in the Campus center basement and apply today!

Save $$ on Textbooks at the Jeffery Amherst College Store
All These Courses and More at Discounted Prices:

Astronomy	101-2	The Solar System
Astronomy	114	Stars & Galaxies
Biology	101	Introductory to Biology
Biology	102	Intro to Animal Biology
Biology	285	Cell & Molecular Biology
Chemistry	101	General Chemistry
Chemistry	110	General Chemistry
Chemistry	262	Organic Chemistry-non majors
Chemistry	111	General Chemistry I
Chemistry	112	General Chemistry II
Chemistry	261	Organic Chemistry
CMP Science	105	Computer Literacy
ECE	232	Hardware Organization & Design
Economics	104 A-F	Intro to Macroeconomics
Economics	709	Political Economy II
Exer Science	100	Intro to Exercise Science
FOMGT	304	Information for Tech Finance
FOMGT	320	Investments
Geo Sciences	102	The Human Landscape
Geo Sciences	103	Intro Oceanography
HRTA	240	Hotel Operations
Italian	120	Elementary Italian II
Math	113	Math-Elem Teachers I
Math	121	Linear Methods & Probability
MICBIO	310	General Microbiology
Nutrition	130	Nutrition for a healthy lifestyle
Physics	100	Conceptual Physics
Physics	120	Big Bang to Black Hole
Physics	132	Intro to Physics II
POLISCI	111	Comparative Politics
POLISCI	121-B	World Politics
Psychology	305	Educational Psychology
Psychology	320	Learn & Think
Psychology	380	Abnormal Psychology
Psychology	100 sec 1-3	Intro to Psychology
Psychology	335	Behavioral Neuroendocrinology
Spanish	110	Spanish
Spanish	120	Spanish
Spanish	240	Intermediate Spanish II
Spanish	246	Intensive Intermediate Spanish
Statistics	111	Elementary Statistics
W&FCONSV	261	Wildlife Conservation

Jeffery Amherst College Store
26 South Prospect Street, Amherst 253-3870
(behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in downtown Amherst)

WELCOME BACK STUDENTS!

Live a little.
426 Russell street Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
413.253.4008
Open: Sun -Thurs: 11am -11pm
Fri - Sat: 11am - 12am
COME IN DURING THE MONTH OF FEBRUARY FOR BACK TO SCHOOL DRINK SPECIALS!
FEATURING:
GIFT CARDS
PARTY PLATTERS
CHILI'S TO GO
GRILLED ENTREES
BIG MOUTH BURGERS
GUILTLESS GRILL AND MANY
OTHER TRADEMARK FAVORITES!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Significant academic support'

Michael Busack

The University of Massachusetts' Web site boasts many things to prospective students and with good reason. This is a great place to be. However, there is an excerpt I find a little disheartening.

"UMass Amherst is the place for you if you want a broad array of majors and classes to explore, faculty who are the best in their fields, the opportunity to dive into high-level research as an undergraduate, and significant academic support to keep your ambition fueled."

Personally, I pay, have paid and will pay a great deal of hard-earned money for my education. In return, the University has agreed (in the above terms) to provide a quality education, from quality professors.

However, I have noticed during my time at UMass, oftentimes professors are green, not ready and a hindrance to my education.

Yesterday I was enrolled in a course in the political science department that fulfills a graduation requirement for the major I need to take this course to graduate in May and therefore would expect this class to be taught by a professor who is capable of teaching a wide range of students.

Without having to exaggerate, I can honestly say that my teacher has one of the thickest foreign accents I have ever heard. It is actually so difficult to discern that I must attempt to decipher the entire lecture, rather than learn it.

Now, I know what you're thinking. This is a free country and every person shares my right in the pursuit of happiness. You're right; this professor should be afforded the same chance to teach that every other professor is given. However, I hold the University responsible in its promise to provide a quality education.

If I cannot understand my professor and I am tested on what is discussed in lecture, can I be expected to perform well? You might say that maybe I should take another course, but due to the requirements, this is not possible. I could seek an advisor, but would I find an answer? Probably not, and why should I have to? So once again, in true UMass fashion, I am lost in bureaucracy.

I love this university, and am glad I made the choice to transfer here, but this mishap is just an example of a much larger problem that students face. For years, students have accepted the paper pushing that goes on from office to office. We live with the fact that the phrase "one-step process" does not exist here.

If it is not the teacher's accent, it's having a teaching assistant that is only a year older than you. If it is not the teaching assistant, it is the professor that feels your time is better spent learning about their political beliefs than the history you signed up for. If it is not the biased professor, then it is the professor who teaches only because they don't make enough money at their other job and could care less what your name is or why you were absent.

You just need to get a letter from your congressman, the feather of a bald eagle, a birth certificate, a blood sample, a 10,000 word essay about what you want to be when you grow up and your student ID.

Need to change your major? Need to talk to a person at financial aid, and not a "full" answering machine mailbox? Need to speak with an advisor? All of these things are easy, provided you like to walk. You just need to get a letter from your congressman, the feather of a bald eagle, a birth certificate, a blood sample, a 10,000 word essay about what you want to be when you grow up, and your student ID.

OK, so maybe I am being a little sarcastic, but we all can agree that doing anything at this university is a bureaucratic pain in the ass.

I am tired of hearing the administration spout this claim of "students first." You can tell me a thousand times that "Glitter" was a good movie, but no matter how many times you say it, it's not true, and I'm not that stupid. Maybe this university could be a bit more honest. How about "students fourth?" Or does that not sound as good at the press conference?

Michael Busack is the Editor-in-Chief of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

Hacking the teleprompter

Gilowen Jenkins

Imagine, if you will, that things had gone a little differently on Tuesday night. That instead of the useless banal rhetoric from the president, a group of enterprising, young hackers was able to tap into the teleprompter during Bush's State of the Union speech. Suppose these clever, bold hackers loaded another speech on to the scrolling screen, a speech that reflected a more sincere view of the State of the Union.

In this scenario, it may not be such a leap to assume that President Bush (robotic and blissfully unaware), might have actually read this script verbatim. In this tragically humorous and profound situation the President might have spoke a good couple of minutes uninterrupted. A couple of minutes allowing the time it would take before the audience stopped gasping and noticed Cheney clutching his chest, Laura fanning an oncoming faint, Bill Frist noticeably tearing up and general chaos ensuing. How would that State of this Union sound? Maybe a little something like this:

President Bush: Members of Congress, distinguished guests and dignitaries, citizens of America. I am humbled and ashamed to present to you the State of our Union ... dreadful. The year 2005 was tumultuous, to say the least, a year in which my administration and my party failed Americans and the world community miserably.

In years past, I tried with great success to keep you, the American public, in the dark, afraid and distracted. Through doublespeech, propaganda and outright lies, we succeeded in keeping a majority of the people indifferent or behind our initiatives and leadership.

But that's all over now; the jig is up. I suppose it all comes back to Iraq in the end, that's what historians will say. Today remains clearer than ever of our abuses of power. It's plain to see that we cherry-picked and doctored intelligence to start a costly war, a war to serve interests of vengeance and greed for this empire, not for democracy. Saddam tried to kill my daddy, and now his gun is hanging in my office. We're getting his treasure now too, his black gold and the strategic land for building bases and prisons for new wars. We are addicted to oil, folks, and I'm your best supplier, your pusher man. Trust me, it runs in the family.

In the war on the terror, the crusade, I have violated basic precepts of our land, crucial civil liberties and privacies you once held dear. I'm told some on the left are calling it Orwellian, in reference to an author and a book I never read. I have spied on millions of you, but I haven't made us any safer or more secure. Our borders and ports are still largely unregulated and unguarded. The Department of Homeland Seeurity is a bloated bureaucratic, ineffectual agency, Katrina proved that, and every day we are creating new jihadists in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East.

As many of you know, I have said that the good Lord talks to me, advises me, but when my policies violate the fundamental teachings of Jesus Christ: love, peace and forgiveness of my fellow man; you have proof of my hypocrisy.

As many of you know, I have said that the good Lord talks to me, advises me, but when my policies violate the fundamental teachings of Jesus Christ: love, peace and forgiveness of my fellow man; you have proof of my hypocrisy.

I am corrupt. The Republican Party is corrupt. Its operatives and I will go to any length to secure our stranglehold on power in this government. If you're a millionaire, you should feel secure in my leadership because I'm looking out for your pockets so they grow fatter with my tax cuts, which I'll push for permanence.

If you are a student, if you are poor, if you are a single mom, if you are sick and elderly, if you are an orphan, if you are a minority, then you're out of luck in my government. Latinos, I need some of your votes, so I'll prop up a couple of figureheads and speak Spanish when stumping. I was making progress with African-Americans until Katrina and Mr. West, but you'd probably never vote for me anyways.

Before I go any further, let me say this unequivocally: it is the policy of this admistraion to torture now and it will continue to be. Geneva conventions are quaint and outdated, and Congress can't stop me. We will torture our detainees physically and emotionally, yielding little or nor credible intelligence, and we will continue our torturous economic policies on hardworking, lower- and middle-class American families and individuals.

Truth be told, I never really expected I could do this job. I couldn't run a baseball team with much success or even an oil company, ironically. I am a simpleton, a charlatan, a silver-spoon, Ivy-League recovering frat boy and religious right-winged zealot. Most days I'd rather be on my ranch aclearing brush, but sometimes being king has its perks.

May God Bless America and may God save America from me and my cronies.

Gilowen Jenkins is a Collegian columnist.

Continuing to find a cure for A1

Katelyn Harding

If you look at my Uncle John W. Walsh's license plate, it sums up his attitude and mission in life: "CURE A1." An extremely active person, my Uncle John always seems to be moving in the direction of a cure for the disease alpha-1 Antitrypsin Deficiency (A1AD). He has traveled all over the world campaigning for a cure for Alpha-1. One day he could be in Japan, the next day he could be in Switzerland, talking to anyone and everyone who will listen to his cause. His efforts are tireless, and he will not rest until a cure for Alpha-1 is found.

John and his twin brother Fred lost their mother in 1965 when she was only 48 years old. It was believed she passed due to emphysema, when in reality she suffered from Alpha-1. At the age of 40, Fred discovered he had acquired this disease, and not long after, it barged into John's life as well.

In some patients, the Alpha-1 protein is defective, which damages the liver with cirrhosis. In other patients, the liver produces the protein in insufficient quantities. If the protein is missing or insignificant in the body, the protein cannot protect the lungs and alveoli. This lack of protection can lead to profound emphysema.

The damage done to the alveoli sacs from Alpha-1 is irreversible. There is no cure for Alpha-1, but the research is ongoing.

The damage done to the alveoli sacs from Alpha-1 is irreversible. There is no cure for Alpha-1, but the research is ongoing. Early detection can provide patients with ways to evaluate career and lifestyle options. This is the impetus that drove my uncles to their work for a cure for Alpha-1.

My Uncle John formed a revolutionary network system and a non-profit organization for what seemed like a lost cause. In 1994, The National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute had just concluded that augmentation therapy provided an effective treatment for Alpha-1. It was not a cure, but it seemed to work.

This was not good enough for John. He became an Alpha-1 activist and is now the president and CEO of the Alpha Foundation in the United States. In 1995, he developed the AlphaNet in Florida to provide Alphas (others who suffer from A1AD) in the United States health management services. Fred Walsh actively lectures in the U.S. for the Alpha Foundation.

The biggest step in spreading awareness that my twin uncles achieved was during their testimony before the House Appropriations Labor, Health and Human Services, Education and Related Agencies subcommittee – the group that controls funding for public health. During their testimony, my uncles also urged increased funding for the National Institutes of Health and continued NIH collaboration with the Food and Drug Administration on developing new therapies.

This is monumental because the subcommittee hears "very few witnesses" and "other appropriations subcommittees do not hold public hearings, so this is unique," said Miriam O'Day, the foundation's senior director of public policy, in explaining the significance of the brothers' testimony.

More than anything, John and Fred Walsh are determined to find a cure. John Walsh states Alpha-1 Foundation's mission: "We had to demonstrate to the broad scientific community that we were different. We weren't selling balloons and t-shirts. We were taking responsibility for finding a cure." Today, AlphaNet funds 56 projects and 34 institutions and has contributed more than $10 million to support that work – while making treatment more accessible and affordable to thousands of Alphas.

The Alpha-1 Foundation has also gained the knowledge and experience necessary to launch a national targeted detection program. This program would mean earlier detection and longer life for thousands of Alphas – as well as long-term savings to the health care system.

The work and dedication of my uncles to find a cure for Alpha-1 is commendable and admirable. Instead of just worrying about themselves and dealing with their disease quietly, they wanted to help others who needed it. In doing so, they have succeeded in raising awareness tremendously.

Knowing about Alpha-1 is important because it can sometimes be misdiagnosed, and early detection is an important step in diminishing this disease altogether. Although some might not deem this disease as significant, it is, because it affects thousands of people in just the United States alone.

We need to stop caring about just ourselves and open our eyes to the reality of the world surrounding us. This disease might not affect you directly, but it could affect someone you know. Now that you know the hard work my uncles have put in to find a cure, we should appreciate the fact that they are out there, campaigning for a vital cause. I can only hope that a cure for Alpha-1 is found in the near future. Until then, I know my uncles will never stop working until they find one.

Katelyn Harding is a Collegian columnist.

Shape up or ship out

Duncan Devlin

The college years are a great time for developing many friendships. Each school day, as classes end, students shuffle back to their dorms, whereupon they talk about everything that happened during the day. There seems to be one common thread amongst the majority of these conversations and one thing universally missing. The common thread: whining. The missing element: a good response, get over it.

The following are a few of the common nuggets of complaint from the average UMass student. Talking about them is basically a giant waste of your time, and the sooner you learn to just get over these problems, the better off you will be. If you are developing deep friendships with dormmates while commiserating about any of these issues, then I suggest you seriously rethink the quality of your friendships with these people. Often you are just burdening their lives with your problems, and you are preventing each other from just getting past your respective issues.

Are your classes too tough? Do you have an 8 a.m. class? Do your professors hate you? Did you have to spend too much money on books? Get over it. School is tough, and it prepares you for the real world, which is definitely worse than anything you will experience at school. When you get your first job you will quickly discover that you have a 5:30 a.m. class every morning.

Do you just "not get along" with your roommate? Must everyone around you act and think exactly like you do? Are you destined to rule the world? Is it preposterous to think that you may have to compromise on some small issue? Well, get over it, and get over yourself, too. Not everyone is exactly like you, and if this paragraph applies to you, then it is a good thing not everyone is like you.

Do you detest the D.C. food? Did your mother or father make a dish that you cannot live without? Are you so attached to eating out that if you cannot afford wings, you would rather starve than go to the D.C.? Well, eat up while you still can, and don't forget a good helping of "get over it." Odds are you have never cooked a meal in your life. The day you graduate and have to cook for yourself you will quickly discover the joy of mediocre food, and how much of a drain it is on your budget to maintain your insignificant complaints about taste.

Does snow make you want to stay in bed all day? Get over it, or get out. We're in New England, the home of the 36-month winter. Do you think you are going to live on a nice tropical island, paying no rent, lying on your back in the sun, being fed grapes by a beautiful servant? You have two choices: move south, or get used to it.

Does New England weather bother you? Are you sick of waking up on cold mornings and braving the freezing weather? Does snow make you want to stay in bed all day? Get over it, or get out. We're in New England, the home of the 36-month winter. Do you think you are going to live on a nice tropical island, paying no rent, lying on your back in the sun, being fed grapes by a beautiful servant? You have two choices: move south, or get used to it.

Do you have to walk too far for classes? Must you brave the cold, day in and day out while your automobile sits idly in a parking lot? Does the idea of public transportation make you shudder? Have you not run a mile since grade school? Get off your butt, and get over it. If you are planning to live or work anywhere near a city, you will have to learn to use public transportation, or even worse, get to work by using a device as demeaning as a bicycle, or even your own two feet.

Do you ever feel like life is just too difficult? Is every day a bad day? Are your classes too tough? Do people love you just for your body? How about just your mind? Do you feel unappreciated? Do all your friends have more money than you? Does the elevator take too long to get there, but there are too many stairs? Are you too tired, depressed, hungry, thirsty, bored, drained or emotionally unsound? Are you just not happy? Well, as I keep saying, get over it. Life sucks, get a helmet.

You will one day have to leave college and join the real world. If these problems hurt now, imagine how tough they will be when calling in sick counts as a pay cut. Give up your problems, get out there and enjoy life. Stop dwelling on the small stuff. I know you do not want to do it, but when life gets you down, the best thing you can do is just get over it.

Duncan Devlin is a Collegian columnist

YO!

The Collegian wants YOU to be a columnist! Come down to our office in the Campus Center basement to apply!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVIN

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Coachella festival ready for number 7

Sundance looking to stay independent, free and small

By Dan Kirkwood
The GW Hatchet (George Washington U.)

WASHINGTON — See the Sundance Film Festival while you can. Like a mythic beast in its last spasms, the altruistic nature of the event is being suffocated by the influx of Hollywood and its beautiful ilk. But it still lives on, it's still a blast, and it's still accessible to the average movie-lover.

The festival grew out of workshops organized for filmmakers. The Sundance Institute included a competition to highlight less mainstream films.

Hollywood, however, comes to the festival with big bucks, looking to buy. They come in droves, and somedays may drag the whole festival out to California, and then to sea. So go see it now, while some of the romanticism remains. It is still possible for the average, honest, movie-loving American to see films at the festival.

The films still, to a great extent, represent some of the best in independent cinema. It ranks as one of the more respected film festivals, with Toronto and Cannes, and so the films are generally of a high caliber.

Sundance has fostered great and popular films like "Hoop Dreams," "Whale Rider," "Garden State," "Hedwig and The Angry Inch" and last year's "Hustle and Flow." Despite the prevalence of industry types, the Sundance Institute is certainly doing worthy work in its 25th year.

The heart of Sundance is Park City, Utah, where any large, available space has been converted to a screening room. Since the festival is in January, there is a rough, friendly equality between all the blue-toed, numb-nosed festival-goers. Celebrities came and tried to shed their fame, to walk with the people. These commoners normally left them alone, and were able to walk from film to film. Now, the celebrities take refuge from what they expect would be fawning fans (I expect they would be disappointed). The sponsors have rented out buildings and titled them "lounges" and "retreats," for celebrities only. The great democratic festival is changing, so before it goes too far, this is how you should Sundance.

Waitlisting is the phrase on everyone's lips. It's supposed to work like this: Show up an hour or two before the screening, and get in the line. The line is a chance to buy a ticket to an empty seat in the screening. The past few years that I have gone, this has been quite a viable option, and in 2004 I only failed to get into one of two films (one was the solidly sold-out "Motorcycle Diaries").

This year was different. Not only were the lines for premieres out the door, but screenings for obscure documentaries and early screenings were packed too. Too many people, maybe, but the bigger problem is this. No matter how big you were, no matter how much money you had, if you weren't in your seat half an hour before the show, tough cookies. This year, the festival gave in to the pass holders and stars, and they held their seats until after the film started. I waited more than four hours and failed to get into a film, and ended up staying in line for another four to see a mediocre star-studded gangster film.

Sundance has become a mixed bag, sure, but if ordinary people stop going out there to see the movies, the sinkhole will open up and swallow the whole shebang. The glamorous and glassy parts are not worth going for, so don't expect much more than fool's gold. If you go to see some films, meet some fun people, and have a laugh at how silly Scarlett Johanssen looks in her snow getup, Sundance still offers the rich promise of the American West.

"Food Grew Tired of Us" stands proudly at the front of the Sundance film festival, capturing the Grand Jury prize for best documentary.

UMass hosts Eagles

HOCKEY from page 10

line that is playing as well as any trio in college hockey right now. The three have accounted for 35 goals and 48 assists for 83 points this season, and Chris Collins is beginning to run away with the Hockey East Player of the Year award, as his 20 goals and 40 points have him well ahead of the pack in both categories.

Add centerman Dan Bertram who has been playing the best hockey of his career since returning from winning the gold medal for Canada at the World Juniors – to the mix on the team's second line, and the Eagles become as dangerous on the offensive end as they are on the defensive side.

"We're a pretty good skating team," Cahoon said. "We have to be able to anticipate extremely well, and we have to put ourselves in a position where we don't hurt ourselves around the rink. If we're caught out of position and we're giving up speed to boot, then we're at a distinct disadvantage."

When the Minutemen shift their weekend to Lowell, they will find themselves in as close to a must-win situation as they will have all year. Trailing the River Hawks in Hockey East by three points plus the tie-breaker, UMass will have its final opportunity to directly make up some ground on Lowell before the playoffs begin.

The two met up last Friday at the Mullins Center in a game that went back and forth before Elias Godoy came away with a clutch third-period game-winning goal.

NOTE – Cahoon, a Boston University grad and three-time Beanpot champion, weighs in on the 54th Beanpot, which kicks off Monday night at the TD Banknorth Garden.

"I'm certainly aware of it, and it's probably as much about being a BU grad and probably more about growing up around Greater Boston. But I've got to be honest, I've been away from the Beanpot for 15 or 16 years now with my own teams. If you're not a part of it, it's just another tournament. It's a great tournament for the city of Boston. ... I never overtly root against BU unless I'm playing against them, and then I root real hard. Our team [UMass] always comes first."

Collegian staff breaks it down

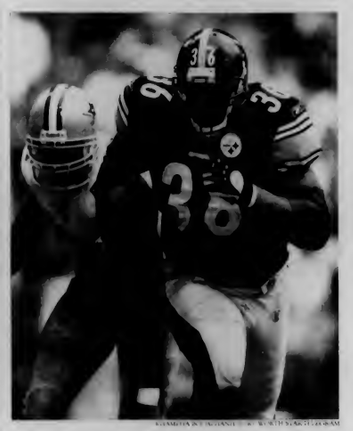
PICKS from page 10

It seems as though the Seahawks are this year's Patriots, everybody keeps betting against them but they just keep winning. The wheels on the Bus run finally come off in Detroit as league MVP Shaun Alexander and Steelers safety Troy Polamalu should give this "Super Bore" a spark.

DANNY PICARD, STAFF WRITER
SEAHAWKS 31, STEELERS 21

Don't get me wrong, Pittsburgh has been quite impressive in their wins over Cincinnati, Indianapolis and Denver. But it's about time to kill the dream scenario of Jerome Bettis winning a championship in his hometown of Detroit. Also, Seattle has a guy by the name of Shaun Alexander. You may have heard of him. Look for him to be the MVP.

JEREMY RICE, STAFF WRITER
SEAHAWKS 31, STEELERS 23



Seattle's O-line is the best in the league, so MVP Shaun Alexander will have another big game and Pittsburgh will have to blitz even more to get to Hasselbeck. This will leave Seattle's three receivers in one-on-one situations. Roethlisberger and Co. will continue favor the pass and it will hurt them in this game.

JOEY WHITE, STAFF WRITER
SEAHAWKS 34, STEELERS 30

Seattle will win its first appearance in a Super Bowl behind the legs of MVP Shaun Alexander and the arm of Matt Hasselbeck. The heart-warming story of Jerome Bettis coming home to finish out his career in Super Bowl XL will not be completely lived up to the dream, but Pittsburgh will put up a valiant effort. They will have the ball at the end of the game and will be forced to go for a game-winning touchdown instead of a field goal. The most recent Super Bowl I would compare this one to would be Super Bowl XXXIV when the St. Louis Rams defeated the Tennessee Titans 23-16, and the Titans had to go for a game-tying touchdown and were stopped at the one-yard line as time ran out.

DOMENIC POLI, STAFF WRITER
STEELERS 28, SEAHAWKS 17

Though recovering from a concussion, Shaun Alexander will make his presence felt in Detroit on Sunday. Plus, quarterback Matt Hasselbeck and kicker Josh Brown certainly bring a lot to the table. But the game will come down to the Steelers tremendous receiving corps, primarily Hines Ward and Antwaan Randle El. Pittsburgh wins Super Bowl XL by a score of 28-17.

Steelers running back Jerome Bettis leads Pittsburgh into Sunday's Super Bowl matchup with the Seattle Seahawks.

Bettis gets one more chance

By Joe Kay
Associated Press

DETROIT — Jerome Bettis returned for one more chance to make a run at a championship. Against long odds, he got it.

Many stars in all sports go entire careers without playing for a ring. A few – Bettis, Mark Grace, Oscar Robertson, Ray Bourque come to mind – finally get a shot at one as they're heading for the exit.

It doesn't happen often or easily.

"In sports, you're going to have players who are great but haven't won championships," said Robertson, a Hall of Famer who got his NBA title with Milwaukee near the end of his career. "That's true. You only get one winner a year, and the rest of the guys don't win."

They sure try.

Like Bettis, who decided to play another season for the Steelers in hopes of reaching the Super Bowl, athletes will push their bodies as far as they'll go – and sometimes hang on longer than they should – to get the thing that sets a winner apart.

The ring.

"You look at me – I played 17 years and didn't get one," quarterback Warren Moon said. "That had a lot to do with how long I played. I was still chasing that elusive, one last goal that I had left to accomplish in my career. Unfortunately, it never happened. But I'll tell you what: I did try."

Pro Football Hall of Fame spokesman Joe Horrigan notes that it's commonplace for stars to miss out on a shot at a championship. Before free agency changed the dynamics of sports and gave players freedom to pick their teams, a player could be stuck on a struggling franchise for a long time.

Archie Manning is Exhibit A. He spent his first 11 years with New Orleans, becoming the face of misery for 'Aints fans who hid their own faces with paper bags. Now, it's up to sons Peyton and Eli – quarterbacks for the Colts and Giants, respectively – to do what their father never could.

"I never got close," Archie Manning said this week at a Super Bowl function. "Everybody just wants to get here, and I hope both of my boys get to do it."

Folks around these parts know that greatness doesn't translate into glory. Running back Barry Sanders spent 10 years with the Lions, but had only one playoff victory to show for it.

"It's a reality of the game," Sanders said. "Coming into the NFL, my assumption was that this is the NFL and, naturally, I'll get to the Super Bowl because all you have to do is win three games in the playoffs. That was a mistake I made, because I later found out how tough it was."

It's universal.

Robertson was already a superstar – the only player to average a triple-double for a season – during his 10 seasons with the Cincinnati Royals when the struggling franchise traded him. With Kareem Abdul-Jabbar – then Lew Alcindor – as his teammate, he got an NBA championship in his first season with Milwaukee.

"It meant that the critics who needed something negative to say about my career couldn't say something negative about it," Robertson said.

Grace spent the first 13 years of his career with the Chicago Cubs – enough said – before heading to Arizona and getting his long-awaited chance. He was 37 years old when it finally came.

Grace's single started a ninth-inning rally that swept the Diamondbacks a 3-2 victory in Game 7 of the 2001 World Series against the Yankees.

That same year, Bourque got his last-chance Stanley Cup title with Colorado. The Hall of Fame defenseman spent the first 21 years of his career with the Boston Bruins, never getting to hoist the Cup over his head.

For each of these late-in-life success stories, there's dozens who fail.

Again, the Cubs provide a benchmark. Ernie Banks put together a Hall-of-Fame career during 19 years in Chicago, but never even came close to the ultimate prize.

"Some guys are more fortunate to be in the right place at the right time, part of that right chemistry on that right team," Moon said. "And other guys aren't. You look at Ernie Banks in baseball – he never even played in a playoff game his whole career."

Even in the era of free agency, going to a winner doesn't guarantee getting a shot at becoming the ultimate winner.

"Look at A-Rod with the Yankees," Robertson said, referring to Alex Rodriguez. "It doesn't mean that you're going to win. I'm sure he thought when he went to the Yankees that they were going to walk through the World Series."

Now, it's Bettis' turn to make that one final stab at a title. He considered retiring after the Steelers lost in the AFC title game last season, but came back in part because this year's Super Bowl is in his hometown of Detroit.

It looked like he'd frittered the chance away when he fumbled near the Colts' goal line with 1:20 left in a second-round playoff game, and Nick Harper scooped up the ball and headed downfield.

If quarterback Ben Roethlisberger doesn't double back and make a lunging ankle tackle on Harper, Bettis doesn't get his chance.

And if Mike Vanderjagt doesn't miss badly on a 46-yard attempt, the game might go to overtime and a different outcome. It took all of those quirky things to get the Steelers a 21-18 win and get Bettis to his Bowl.

That's how fine the line is between getting a shot and being shut out.

"Jerome Bettis had 13 years to prove how great he is," said the Hall of Fame's Horrigan. "If he wouldn't have made the decision to play this year, we would be talking about 'poor Jerome.'"

Bakanowski leads Minutewomen

TRACK from page 10

Also, senior Jon Karhonen and sophomore Nils Fischer are coming off second and fifth place finishes, respectively, in the mile.

However, despite his athletes' specialties, O'Brien intends to mix it up a little bit, as he always does at this point in the season.

"I like to spend some time early in the season trying kids out at new positions, you know, like a basketball team or a football team or a baseball team would," O'Brien said.

He mentioned that he does this in order to figure out, first, which is the best event for each person, then the second and third best event for each person.

"Because when you get to start to fill out your lineups for the later meets of the season, you want to make sure you have your kids in exactly the right events," O'Brien said.

This Saturday will probably be the last time O'Brien does such experimenting this season.

The Rhode Island Mega Meet will not be a walk in the park for the Minutemen, as URI has finished in the A-10 Conference's top two or three teams for each of the last five or six years.

Also, schools like UNH and the Hartford always give UMass a run for their money.

"It's the kind of a meet where it's a good, competitive opportunity for us to see where we stand at the conclusion of the first half of our season," O'Brien said.

Seahawks almost left Seattle

By Tim Booth
Associated Press

SEATTLE — As a Californian, Ken Behring never felt welcomed in the Pacific Northwest. And that even before he tried moving the Seattle Seahawks to Southern California.

A decade after Behring announced his plans, the Seahawks are about to play in their first Super Bowl.

"I don't believe my father ever felt embraced," David Behring, Ken's son and Seahawks team president from 1993-97, said in a phone interview this week. "From the beginning there was an outpouring of negative articles from the media and a lot of backlash."

On Feb. 2, 1996, Ken Behring made public his intentions of moving the Seahawks to Southern California, believing the chances for a new stadium in Seattle or a remodel of the drab Kingdome had reached an impasse.

Behring asked for $150 million in improvements to the Kingdome. He claimed the facility was unsafe, and that King County had misled him about its vulnerability to earthquakes.

Former Washington Gov. Gary Locke, then the county executive, believes Behring just wanted out of Seattle.

"What they were raising was high-in-the-sky things that simply could not happen and there were no assurance that they would keep the team here even if we could do those things," Locke said. "He was just tired of Seattle and felt like wasn't being treated right. He made it clear he felt he could make a lot more money in Los Angeles."

Unable to make progress with county officials, Behring locked up the team's training facility in suburban Kirkland and stationed guards at the front door. He ordered a moving van to be loaded with equipment and sent it south to Rams Park in Anaheim, Calif.

Seahawks fullback Mack Strong, the only current Seattle player on the roster back then, heard about the shift from his girlfriend.

"It was very surreal," Strong said. "I came home one day and she said, 'You're moving.' I said, 'No, we're not moving.' Then about a day later I call a call from a coach and he said, 'Pack your bags.'"

"That was a weird time in our history."

While the announcement came in early 1996, David Behring believes his father soured on owning an NFL franchise after the 1992 season. Seattle was 2-14 that year – tied with New England for the worst record in the league.

David Behring came on as team president the following season and tried to fade his father out of the spotlight. He became more of the public face of the Seahawks organization as the backlash against his father increased.

"I had tremendous passion for the game. I felt that I was getting along with many of the people and I was trying to push my father into background so as not to be a target," said David Behring, who opposed his father's decision to move the franchise. "But the '92 season really turned him off from football. When you're 2-14 you're criticized daily."

Behring's attempt at moving the franchise came as the NFL became short-tempered with franchise relocation. In the previous years, the Cleveland Browns moved to Baltimore, the Los Angeles Rams to St. Louis and the Houston Oilers to Nashville, Tenn.

With NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue against the proposed move, Locke and the county won a brief restraining order that prevented the team from playing its home games anywhere but the Kingdome. At the time, the Seahawks' lease agreement with the Kingdome ran through the 2005 season.

Locke remembers being in a meeting with Behring and telling his lawyers to file the suit. At the same time, Behring's lawyers were filing a lawsuit against the county.

"It's ironic that we were having these meetings and each side was commencing these lawsuits," Locke said. "Fortunately we filed ours a few minutes before he did."

And while workout equipment sat idly in California, Locke and billionaire Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen held secret meetings about purchasing the franchise from Behring. Allen put a $20 million down payment on the franchise and completed the transaction after taxpayers approved a financing package to replace the Kingdome.

Today, the Behrings stay far away from the professional sports realm. Ken Behring has become a widely regarded philanthropist, donating hundreds of millions of dollars to various charitable organizations. In 1997 he donated $20 million to the Smithsonian Museum of Natural History and in 2000 donated another $80 million to the National Museum of American History.

In June 2000, Behring started the nonprofit Wheelchair Foundation, delivering wheelchairs to needy people in more than 125 countries. He was out of the country this week, working for the organization, and unavailable for comment.

EXTRA EXTRA!!
YOU ARENT COOL UNLESS YOU READ THE DAILY COLLEGIAN... GET YOUR COPY TODAY!!

Back Forward Stop Refresh Home AutoFill Print Mail
@www.SunraiseInc.com

Screen Printed T's
*White T's ONLY
24 minimum
1 Color, 1 side
Standard Ink
Max Size 10x13
Screen $20
$5
Your Design or Logo!
Apparel Unlimited
SCREEN PRINTERS
322 Russell Street
Hadley, MA 01035
322 Russell St.
Hadley, MA 01035
413-586-7133
www.Sunraiseinc.com
*Exp. 2.28.06

Delivery drivers wanted
Paid newspaper
Delivery positions are available.
Hours won't interfere with classes, and no weekend shifts!
Come apply today in person at the Daily Collegian's main office in the basement of the Campus Center.
APPLY TODAY!!

have a spring break you'll remember
London $701
Sydney $1660
Acapulco $1020
(413) 256-1261
STA TRAVEL

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN By Rainy Stanford

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

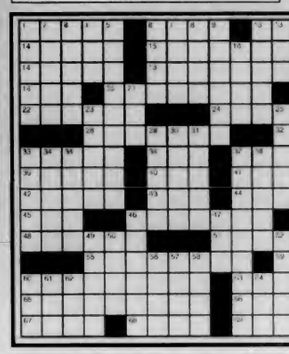
TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

Quote of the Day

"Egotism is the anesthetic that dulls the pain of stupidity."

—Frank Leahy

Find today's answers online



www.dailycollegian.com

ACROSS
1 Zeno, for one
6 Comedic Coward
10 Domesticate
14 Holy city of Islam
15 Backup
17 Bury
18 Landing figure
19 Little piggy
20 Level of esteem
22 Main course
24 Until now
28 Backs with money
32 Craze
33 Mine passageway
36 Cheerleader's yell
37 Cake covering
39 Soup server
40 Beta
41 Boot camp boss
42 Church officer
43 Junior, to senior
44 Complies
45 Night before
46 Language of Bangladesh
48 Sell door-to-door
51 Markings on Mars?
55 Shootout rebound
59 Convened
60 Pleasant
63 Point of contention
65 Some carpers
66 "La Boheme," e.g.
67 Point-to-be
68 "Miracle" team of 1969
69 Birth-related

DOWN
1 Hit hard, old-style
2 Mortise insert
3 Group of eight
4 Drink cooler
5 Woodworker
6 Scruff
7 Yours and mine
8 Turnpike turnoff
9 Bounds
10 Played out
11 Org. with maps
12 "The A-Team" actor
13 CBS logo
14 Toy block maker
21 Goose the gas
23 Search through
25 In flames
26 Pungent
27 Bidets
29 Remove date
30 Hairdresser's shop
31 Some, any or no conclusion?
33 REM state
34 Cut in two
35 Totaled up
37 Quarantine
38 Building made of logs
46 Don't panic!
47 Term's point of no return?
49 Trepidation
50 Related a whopper
52 Something of value
53 Dern of "Jurassic Park"
54 Rig off
56 Hautboy
57 Crackpate
58 Sixes edges
60 Tummy muscles
61 Teal for sra
62 Deer
64 Hot tub

Sudoku brought to you by

andiamo
256 • FOOD
www.andiamo.cc

Yoga
Early Bird Special! Save 20%
(Valid thru 5 pm Friday, Feb. 3, 2006)
1 class per week Only $65!
2 classes per week $120!
Spring Classes (Feb 6 - May 17)
Mon./ Wed Tues./Thurs
Power Yoga Yoga Basics
11:00 a 12:15 p 1:00 - 2:15 pm
12:30 - 1:45 pm 4:00 - 5:15 pm
Yoga for Relaxation 2:00 - 3:15 pm
Intermediate Yoga 2:30 - 3:45 pm
T'ai Chi
Tuesdays 7:30 - 8:30 pm
(Feb 7 - May 9) $100
Learn this ancient Chinese system of physical exercise for health, vitality, longevity and self-defense.
To Register
Campus Recreation • Boyden 215
545-0022 • www.umass.edu/umm

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
You will lose your favorite earrings tonight, but will find them again tomorrow.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
The carpet in your room is absolutely hideous.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
If you continue to play poker like that you will blow all your college savings.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Your cell phone will ring in the middle of class today.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
You and your friends will order four large pizzas tonight.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
You will get your finger slammed in a door by a Virgo this weekend.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
That Britney Spears ring tone has got to go.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
You will be extremely inebriated tomorrow night.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
You should start selling a lot more things on ebay.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You are not allowed to wear overalls ever again.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
You better get started on all that reading now.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
It is not warm enough to wear a skirt today. Try again in a few weeks.

Chicago Pizzaria
YES, WE DELIVER!
SUPER BOWL SPECIALS!
Family size pizza Veggie platter w/Dips + 2 Lt drinks $24.95 +tax
Family size pizza Assortment platter w/ chicken wings & buffalo fingers + 2 Lt drinks $24.95 +tax
RESERVE YOUR ORDER BY 2/4/06
Hours
Sun-Wed 3pm-2am
Thurs-Sat 3pm-3am
To order Delivery or Pick-Up Contact
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing St. Next to Patterson Dorm Amherst, Ma. 01002

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Can you lead? Prove it with Army ROTC FREE MONEY for school Because we can! www.umass.edu/armyrotc

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

CHILDCARE

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part-time Spring – full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email: fjmooney@msn.com

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your Ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Female PCA Wanted for Active Female; Variable shifts; Some over-nights. $10.84/hr. Call 413-210-6301 Ask for Martina. Car needed.

EMPLOYMENT

Spring & Summer Help Needed. Excellent Earning Potential working outdoors providing exterior carpenter ant treatments to residential customers. Reliable vehicle required (mileage compensation paid). Must be 18 years or older and certified with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by passing the Core Applicator Exam (information, all necessary study materials and payment of exam fees will by provided for qualified individuals). Apply in Person. No Phone Calls Please. Minuteman Pest Control 90 Conz Street, Northampton, MA 01060 (across from Hampshire Gazette Building)

EMPLOYMENT

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288 / email: fjmooney@msn.com

Summer Jobs Apply to be a raft guide this summer at Zoar Outdoor. Applicants should be great with people and possess a can-do attitude. Outdoor recreation experience a plus. Training on weekends in March. Application deadline: Feb. 7th, call 413-339-4010 or see www zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE

INSTRUCTION

Pioneer Valley Boxing School. Go to www.westernmassboxing.com

MISCELLANEOUS

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.ATHENASHN.com/Goddess/910

ROOM FOR RENT

Great Sunrise/sunset bedroom available 'til May. Overlooking UMass Agricultural Center / Stadium. Walk to campus. Renovated 3 bedroom apt. $300/month (413) 665-7313

EMPLOYEES

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1988 Hottest Destinations – Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $159 www sunsplashtours com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Collegian Advertising: Located in the Campus Center Basement. BUISNESS HOURS 8:30am - 3:30pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2006 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

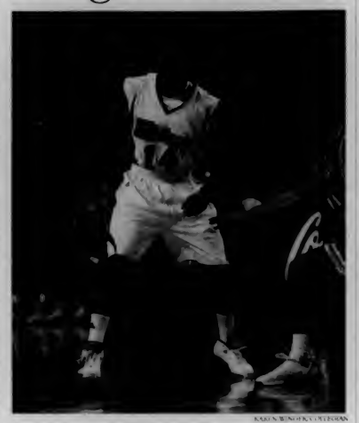
URI coming to Mullins

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The good news for the Massachusetts men's basketball team in the wake of the embarrassing 76-47 drubbing it received at Temple on Wednesday night is that there won't be much time spent dwelling on the loss.

The schedule doesn't allow that, as UMass (9-9, 4-4 Atlantic 10) will be back in action tomorrow night at home at 7 p.m. against Rhode Island.

Returning to the Mullins Center (where UMass is a perfect 7-0 this season) could be just what the doctor ordered, as the Minutemen are coming off their worst stretch of the season, an 0-3 road trip.



During the stretch, UMass lost to three conference foes, beginning at Rhode Island on Jan. 25. The Rams (11-8, 5-3 A-10) downed the Maroon and White 58-55 on Dawan Robinson's 3-pointer with three seconds remaining in the game.

That shot came at the end of a spirited comeback by the Minutemen, as they erased an eight-point deficit in the final 1:13 to tie the game. Since that point though, UMass has played largely uninspired basketball.

In the second game of the trip, UMass traveled Philadelphia to face a La Salle squad that had lost its five previous games. The Explorers were in control throughout the game, pulling out a 68-61 win.

UMass comes limping home after the beating it took in Philadelphia two nights ago, needing a win to get back over the .500 mark. Tomorrow night's game will be the second matchup between UMass and the Rams in a 10 day span, and the Minutemen will have a chance to exact some revenge on the team that started their current nosedive.

One of the keys to snapping this current skid will be getting off to quicker starts, as the Minutemen have trailed at halftime in each of the three losses. No start was slower than Wednesday night's, when UMass managed just nine first half points.

KAREN WINOKUR/COLLEGIAN

Freshman guard Chris Lowe and the Minutemen will be looking to get back on the winning track Saturday night at 7 p.m. at home.

Following the Temple game, UMass coach Travis Ford said he was looking for some leadership, especially from the captains. Jeff Viggiano, Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme were named the team's captains on Jan. 16.

Freeman and Lasme missed just one shot against Temple, but attempted only nine, registering eight points apiece. Viggiano was limited to only 15 minutes of action, as he was battling the flu.

The Minutemen will need more aggressiveness from Freeman and Lasme, and a healthy Viggiano if they expect to topple the Rams.

URI is currently a game ahead of the Minutemen in the A-10 standings, and despite their recent struggles, a win would put UMass right back in the thick of things in the conference standings.

The Rams have lost their two games since beating UMass, falling 81-62 at No. 10 George Washington and 58-53 to Saint Louis.

Robinson leads the Rams in scoring, averaging 15.1 points per game.

Will Daniels and Jamaal Wise also average double figures for URI, scoring 11.2 and 10.3 points, respectively.

Critical weekend for Minutemen

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Only five weekends and 10 games remain on the schedule for the Massachusetts hockey team (9-15-0, 6-11-0 Hockey East), and there isn't a single easy game left to play, especially for a squad in the thick of a tight playoff race.

This weekend is no exception, as the Minutemen will meet with No. 3 Boston College (17-5-2, 15-3-1 HEA), the cream of the Hockey East crop, tonight at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center before they shift to the Tsongas Arena in Lowell to get their final crack at the River Hawks (10-14-1, 7-10-1 HEA), also at 7 p.m.

UMass has lost four in a row to Lowell and hasn't beaten UML since Oct. 22, 2004, when Stephen Werner scored a quick overtime goal at the Mullins Center.

The Eagles have had even more success with the Minutemen, winning six games in a row, including sweeping them out of the playoffs last season. The Maroon and White is 0-10-1 in its last 11 dates with BC, though the tie came last season at Kelley Rink when the Eagles were the top-ranked team in the nation.

Boston College has been led by sophomore goaltender Cory Schneider, who had been on fire before last weekend, when he came down to earth while losing to the rival Terriers. He was working on three consecutive shutouts, and had a shutout streak of 242:19 snapped in the eventual 4-3 loss to BU on Friday night. Schneider was just 12:04 away from tying Scott Clemmensen's national record of 254:23.

KAREN WINOKUR/COLLEGIAN

Freshman forward Chris Davis and UMass host No. 3 Boston College tonight at 7 p.m. at home. UMass will face UMass-Lowell on Sunday.

UMass coach Don Cahoon gave his troops a light practice workload this week – only skating for about an hour on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday after having Sunday and Monday off so they could save their energy for this weekend's tough slate.

"We've got to remain on target and take care of detail, but at the same time you can't expend yourself at practices and not have anything left for the weekend," Cahoon said.

Matching the Eagles' speed is critical, and that starts with BC's top line of Brian Boyle, Chris Collins and Stephen Gionta, a

See HOCKEY on page 8

The Collegian sports staffers make their Super Bowl picks

The Collegian Sports staffers, regardless of how disinterested they happen to be with this year's Super Bowl matchup, weigh in on this year's game between the Pittsburgh Steelers and Seattle Seahawks in Detroit.

Jeff Howe, Sports Editor
Seahawks 30, Steelers 24

The ground games should be a wash, and while I think Ben Roethlisberger is a much better quarterback than Matt Hasselbeck, I don't see either one of them making a key mistake to lose the game for his team. I do, however, see Seattle's opportunistic defense creating one or two more big chances for its offense to lock up the game. If the Seahawks can't solve Pittsburgh's screen plays, the Steelers could take the Lombardi. Jerome Bettis does happen to be from Detroit, and he certainly is Xtra Large, but the 40th Super Bowl champions sleep in Seattle.

Dan Duggan, Assistant Sports Editor
Steelers 27, Seahawks 17

I really could care less about this game, so I'm going to take this space to address an issue far more serious than the game on Sunday. Has anyone seen Jerome Bettis lately? I think the toughest part about retirement for him will be how much he'll miss those post game spreads in the locker room. But seriously, I'm worried about this guy, and what will happen to him when he retires and really lets himself go. Scary. He could very well become the first person to win the Super Bowl one year and appear on Celebrity Fit Club the next.

Rob Greenfield, Assistant Sports Editor
Steelers 30, Seahawks 24

What can we say about this Super Bowl that hasn't already been repeated a dozen times, beaten to a pulp and then dragged out over the last two weeks? The media presence is so ubiquitous that the athletes go to great lengths (except maybe a certain Eagles quarterback that had to get some stuff off of his chest) to keep their sentences microscopic.

I have to admit, I'm rooting for Jerome Bettis this time. Don't you think he's paid his dues?

Eric Athas, Managing Editor
Steelers 31, Seahawks 24

This Super Bowl will be tight up until the end. Despite the strong running games on both sides, it will be a shootout between Seahawks QB Matt Hasselbeck and Steelers sophomore Ben Roethlisberger. With the game tied 24-24, The King will take the field for the Steelers as a dime back, pick off a Hasselbeck pass and take it to the house.

Brendan Hall, Staff Writer
Steelers 20, Seahawks 13

I was reading some columnist earlier this week who thinks that about 98 percent of Detroit will be rooting for the Steelers, and I tend to agree with him. Jerome Bettis is from one of the poorest districts of the Motor City, and Pittsburgh is a blue-collar, rust-belt, working man's city –just like Detroit. Put that crowd indoors and you have to think that at some point that will affect the game to some degree.

Jon Pelland, Staff Writer
Seahawks 24, Steelers 20

See PICKS on page 8

Two races on tap for UMass

Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

On Saturday the Massachusetts ski team will compete in the second half of the Brown Carnival when the Minutemen and women race in the giant slalom event at Loon Mountain in New Hampshire. Sunday, the team will compete in the UConn slalom at Cranmore, just 30 minutes from Loon.

Sunday's meet is a make-up of the Jan. 14 event which was cancelled due to weather concerns. Each teams' coaches collectively felt that the two locations are close enough that holding the events on back-to-back days would give them the best opportunity to make up the event.

"[Cranmore] is only a half-hour from Loon, so the move was made to [make up the event] on Sunday," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said.

Last week, the Maroon and White swept the competition in the slalom portion of the Brown Carnival, placing first in both the men's and women's events at Wachusett. Junior Rush Hawkins and sophomore Jason Small continued to dominate with another 1-2 finish for the men, while Hawkins' sister, sophomore Eliza Hawkins, placed third as the top women's skier for UMass.

Back on Jan. 13, UMass opened the 2006 season at the UConn Carnival giant slalom. The men finished second overall, while the women finished third. The Hawkins siblings took first overall for the men and women respectively before extreme weather forced the teams indoors on the second day of competition.

Both squads hope to repeat last week's performances this weekend in the faster giant slalom event. In last year's Brown Carnival the men placed fourth overall in the GS, behind a strong performance by Rush Hawkins, who placed first overall with a time of 1:46.93 after two runs. The women finished second overall with Eliza Hawkins leading the way, placing second with a time of 1:53.98.

"We didn't make any mistakes last week [at the Brown slalom], and the other team's made quite a few," Rouleau said. "If the same thing happens [at this week's giant slalom] I think we'll win this one too."

This year however, the official scoring will be different for the men.

Typically, the men's team submits the top five racers' times for each event, but Saturday's race will only score the top three. Once a year, the league holds a top three race for the men in a giant slalom and a slalom event close to the midway point of the season. The women will continue to use the top three skiers, as they have all season.

The change should benefit the Minutemen, who have consistently held the top two individual times at each race, thanks to consistent performances by Hawkins and Small.

Only one race saw a non-UMass athlete finish in the top two of a race. Plymouth State's Topher Harlow finished second behind Small by nearly three second at the Plymouth State Carnival slalom back on Jan. 21. On that day, Hawkins fell on his second run and didn't finish, so his time was not counted toward the team's overall time.

Despite the duo's success, the Minutemen have only one win as a team, mainly due to the inconsistency at the third, fourth and fifth spots.

"The league does this for teams that don't have a lot of depth," Rouleau said. "I don't think it will affect the outcome, though. The fastest racers will still win."

UM track heads to Rhode Island

By Domenic Polt
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's and men's track and field teams head for Kingston, R.I., this Saturday for the Rhode Island Mega Meet.

The event – the sixth of the year for the women and third for the men – will host a smorgage board of other teams, including Brown, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Central Connecticut State, Quinnipiac and Hartford.

Women's coach Julie LaFreniere mentioned that she expects several of her athletes to look strong in their events.

"I think it'll be a nice meet for our sprinter Dionise Miranda, a freshman. You know, she ran very well in the 55 [meter dash] last week," LaFreniere said.

Miranda is expected to have "some good company" with some of the sprinters from Brown and URI, who LaFreniere acknowledges as the two toughest teams going to Kingston.

Other athletes LaFreniere is excited to see compete are freshman Jordan Veney and sophomore Kristen Bakanowski.

Veney, a shot-putter, has exploded onto the UMass scene as of late. Her last two meets were the first time since 2000 that a Minutewoman had recorded a mark in the all-time top five for the shot put.

First, at the Rhode Island Sorlein Invitational with a mark of 42 feet, eight inches, and then at the Reebok Boston Indoor Games with 43 feet, 3.75 inches, a new UMass indoor record.

Bakanowski, an outstanding pole-vaulter for the Maroon and White, just tied her UMass school record with jump of 12 feet and has been on fire lately.

LaFreniere said that Bakanowski will be a good match-up for junior Lauren Contursi from Brown, who can also clear 12 feet.

As for the men, the athletes are nursing some aches and pains, as well as the early signs of the flu, which coach Ken O'Brien says is typical after the first week back from winter break.

The Minutemen are pretty well equipped as far as talent is concerned.

Senior James Godinho recently won the 500-meter dash with a time of 1:05.12 at the Reebok Boston Indoor Games on Jan. 27.

Godinho is the all-time record holder in the 500-meter dash with his time of 1:02.98, which he set last year.

See TRACK on page 8

Dacko's squad begins stretch run against Saint Joseph's

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (6-14, 3-6 Atlantic 10) will begin its stretch run when it takes on Saint Joseph's (14-6, 6-3 A-10) at 2 p.m. on Sunday at the Mullins Center. The Minutewomen will play four of their last six regular season games at home, as they look to make a run at the Atlantic 10 tournament in March.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko knows that her team must execute on both sides of the court if they want to come out with a win.

"They [Saint Joseph's] don't have a lot in their arsenal," Dacko said, "but what they do, they do well. They play defense really hard. They're hard-nosed kids. They have some leadership on the floor, and they're playing with confidence. So again, they're coming to us. We have to be able to play defense. It's all about us playing defense, and us putting the ball in the basket."

Saint Joseph's is in sixth place in the A-10, and is looking to improve on its 5-4 record on the road this season. The Hawks are led by junior guard Ayahna Cornish and freshman center Hillary Klimowicz. Cornish is the team's leading scoring with 12.4 points per game. Klimowicz is ninth in the A-10 in rebounding with 7.1 boards per game and leads the A-10 in blocks with 49 on the season.

The Minutewomen will have to be on the top of their game offensively if they want to move up in the standings. Saint Joseph's is second in the conference in scoring defense, allowing only 55 points per game.

UMass has looked like a much-improved team as of late, and some of the credit can be given to senior Patryeja Gulak. Gulak has stepped up her game ever since she was moved into the starting lineup five games ago. She has averaged 7.6 points per game and 5.6 rebounds per game, all while shooting 56 percent from the field.

Although Gulak got off to a slow start this season, she has made quite an impact since being named a starter.

"She has post presence," Dacko said. "She's big, she gives a big target. She can get rebounds for us, and she can post really deep in the paint. We have to get her the ball. She's been doing a good job."

The Minutewomen have to hope that they have turned the corner on their early season struggles. And if that's the case, Dacko believes it is not a question as to whether or not they will be in the tournament, but it is what seed they will head to Philadelphia with.

"We have to now try to position ourselves to not only get in the tournament, but fight for a good seed," Dacko said. "It's in our hands now."

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Monday, February 6, 2006 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 71

High costs of housing threaten some students

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

A campus-wide e-mail requesting student input on housing rates at the University of Massachusetts has raised charges of classism and unfair rate increases from many students.

Construction costs for the new North Residential Area, slated to open in fall 2006, will total $92 million. Although $25 million will be covered by central funds, student residents will have to bear the remaining debt and operating costs through a new price structure for on-campus housing.

"We know we need to generate 'X' amount of revenue," Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano told the Republican newspaper. "It's not only paying for the new housing. It also helps us continue our renovation plans for the other 41 residence halls."

The double room rate at the UMass is currently $3,405 per year. Depending on which new pricing option is selected, the rate for a double room will increase at least $382 over the next two years, and potentially rise as much as $820.

The new apartments, which will include four single bedrooms, two full baths, a full kitchen, a common room and air conditioning, are the first housing constructed at UMass since 1972 and "mirror what peer institutions are offering and reflect the expressed desires of our own students," according to an e-mail sent to all undergraduates by Gargano on Jan. 13.

The e-mail outlined three different pricing proposals for on-campus housing, which were developed by the budget office and housing staff.

Van Meter Hall in the Central Residential Area at UMass Amherst.

UMass student Kevin Junker worries that higher housing costs could lead to a more segregated campus.

The first option would charge all on-campus students the same amount, whether they live in a single, a double, or a new apartment. Apartment residents would be chosen through a lottery.

Under the second option, students living in apartments would foot the entire bill for the new dorms. But under the third option, 2 percent of revenue from single and shared rooms would help repay the debt on the new apartments.

Under all options, Sylvan Residential Area will no longer be less expensive than other living areas.

If Option 1 is chosen, students living in regular dorm rooms will face a steep rise in housing costs while reaping none of the benefits of the new dorms.

"Why should a student living with faulty washers and dryers and unreliable elevators be paying for the brand new laundry facilities and other amenities enjoyed by someone else?" said sophomore Kelley Doore.

The eight-month rent for a single or double dorm room would increase $820 to $4,225 each year by 2008, while the nine-month lease on the apartments would cost $4,754.

According to the UMass Housing Services' Web site, "The price of a shared room would rise dramatically in this scenario while the cost of a single room or apartment would be below market value."

Students are also worried that a sharp increase in the cost of a double room could price working-class students out of UMass.

"It would go against what this school is supposed to be, which is an accessible, affordable, egalitarian education. This is supposed to be a place that anyone can go to," said sophomore Alexander Kahn.

Students also fear that the potentially high cost of living in North under Options 2 and 3 would foster economic segregation and classism on campus.

Option 2 will place rates for North at $9,199 per year by 2008, over $1,000 per month, while a double room will cost $3,787; under Option 3, apartments will cost $8,175 per year in 2008 and double rooms will cost $3,865.

"If they do Option 2, they're just going to create a more segregated campus rather than a more diverse campus, because wealthier students will just be living in North," said junior Kevin Junker. "That's really the complete opposite of what the University's trying to accomplish."

Kahn agreed. "Different priced housing — that's something that schools like BU have, and we hear Gargano talk a lot about school spirit and things like that, so should we really be emulating the elitist housing price structures of schools like that?" he said.

In response to the charge that the new apartments could potentially price working-class students out of the University, Ed Blaguszewski, director of news and information at UMass, noted that the North apartments will

See HOUSING on page 4

Rome takes a stand on Carroll

ROME (AP) — A poster showing an American journalist kidnapped in Iraq was hung from Rome's city hall Sunday in a sign of hope and solidarity.

The poster of Jill Carroll wearing a black head scarf will remain on the city hall building atop Capitoline Hill until she is released, city officials said. Carroll was a graduate of the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

The image was lowered from a balcony overlooking the city hall piazza with no fanfare. In recent months, posters of other men and women kidnapped in Iraq or elsewhere have hung from the same spot.

"As it did for other similar and hateful kidnappings, the city of Rome intends in this way to give its contribution in hopes of an immediate and positive solution to the event," a statement from the mayor's office said.

Carroll, a 28-year-old freelance reporter for the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor, was seized in Baghdad on Jan. 7.

Her kidnappers, a previously unknown group identified as The Revenge Brigade, have threatened to kill her unless all Iraqi female detainees are released. She was shown in a video broadcast Jan. 30, wearing an Islamic veil and weeping.

Carroll also worked for the Italian news agency ANSA.

—Associated Press

Former Daily Collegian editor and freelance journalist Jill Carroll is still held captive in Iraq.

UMass prof unlocks Milky Way mystery

By David Humphreys
Collegian Correspondent

Using the mysterious 'dark matter,' University of Massachusetts Amherst astronomer Martin D. Weinberg, along with associates at the University of California Berkeley, might have found the answer to a question which has puzzled astronomers for many decades: What causes the apparent warp in the Milky Way galaxy?

Because Earth is on an arm of the galaxy, this bulge can be seen relatively easily while looking toward the center of the Milky Way.

Beginning 35 years ago, dark matter was first theorized by measuring the acceleration of stars towards the outer expanses of our galaxy. The first astronomers concluded that from the unaccounted-for, rapid acceleration of these stars that another force, one made of matter too dark to see, must be active in the Milky Way. One conclusion drawn from this discovery is that a whopping 80 percent of all matter in our galaxy must consist of this unknown substance. Only 20 percent of all matter would be the everyday matter we can see, such as planets and stars.

One theory presented to explain various forces caused by this immense source of matter is the Modified Newtonian Dynamics (MOND) theory. According to Mordehai Milgrom, creator of the MOND theory, Newton's Second Law (Force = Mass x Acceleration) does not always work satisfactorily when the acceleration speeds are extremely minute.

Although this may account for some of the properties of the galaxy, Weinberg believes that MOND will find difficulty in explaining the obvious bulge in the Milky Way.

One possible explanation for the warp would be the Magellanic Clouds. These two satellite galaxies orbit the Milky Way disk but only account for 2 percent of the disk's total mass. In the 1970s, explained Weinberg, these Magellanic Clouds were proven not to exert enough gravity to have a significant force on the galactic disk.

"Without a dark matter halo, the only thing the gas disk can feel is direct gravity from the Magellanic Clouds," Weinberg said.

Instead, Weinberg used the theory of a halo of dark matter surrounding the Milky Way, in combination with the Magellanic Clouds, to explain the seemingly spherical shape of our galaxy.

Using data produced by Leo Blitz, and other colleagues at UC Berkeley, Weinstein and this team created a computer model of the orbit of both Large and Small Magellanic Clouds. Their final outcome of this simulation was "very surprising," said Blitz.

What the model showed was that, as the clouds passed through the halo of dark matter, they resonated three specific notes (all of which are about 3 million octaves below middle C). These notes caused 3 distinct vibrations in this hydrogen-based disk.

The resonances can be seen as a sign that there is a type of matter in an area previously thought to be empty space. This empty space, if filled with dark matter, could be, according the model made by Weinberg and Blitz, 20 times more massive than all visible matter in our galaxy.

"Our simulation is still not a perfect fit," Weinberg commented, "but it has a lot of the character of the actual data."

Using data received during this study, Weinberg plans to analyze and hopefully determine the exact shape of the dark matter halo surrounding the Milky Way.

An upcoming volume of the "Astrophysical Journal" will contain more information regarding this study.

Mass. hate crime suspect killed by cops

By Noah Trister
Associated Press

GASSVILLE, Ark. — The teenager suspected of a hatchet-and-gun attack in a Massachusetts gay bar and in the killing of two people in Arkansas, including a policeman, died Sunday of wounds suffered in a gun battle with officers, authorities said.

Jacob D. Robida, 18, died at 3:38 a.m. Sunday at Cox-South Hospital in Springfield, Mo., said hospital spokesman Randy Berger.

Robida, a high school dropout who friends said glorified Nazism, was shot twice in the head in a shootout with police Saturday after he killed a Gassville police officer and a woman in his car, authorities said.

Two days earlier, he allegedly went on a rampage at the Puzzles Lounge in New Bedford, Mass., that injured three men, one critically. Police labeled that attack a hate crime.

"I wish he would have lived and gone on trial," said Dan Sheterom, 51, who lives above Puzzles Lounge and frequents the tavern. "I would have liked to have seen if the commonwealth here would have taken it up to the federal government as a hate crime."

After Thursday's attack, police say Robida drove off and picked up 33-year-old Jennifer Rena Bailey at her home in Charleston, W.Va.

"Apparently she's had a prior relationship with this guy and had been corresponding with him," said West Virginia State Police Sgt. C.J. Ellyson.

They were driving through the northern Arkansas town of Gassville when Officer Jim Sell pulled them over for a traffic violation Saturday. Sell, 56, was shot twice, said Bristol, Mass., District Attorney Paul Walsh Jr.

Witness Maryann Hoyne said she saw the officer's squad car sitting bumper to bumper with Robida's car, and heard three gunshots. She saw Sell on the ground as Robida got back into his car and drove off, she said.

Robida returned a moment later to retrieve his gun, which he had left beside the officer, said Hoyne, manager of the Brass Door Motel in Gassville.

About 25 miles away, Robida drove over spike strips set out by state troopers and continued driving with two punctured tires into downtown Norfork, where he smashed into several parked vehicles to avoid a police barricade.

"When he wrecked he started firing at our officer and a state police officer, and the officers returned fire," said Baxter County Sheriff John Montgomery.

The teen shot Bailey before he was wounded in the shootout with police, Walsh said. State police wouldn't confirm Walsh's account and said ballistics tests would determine how the woman died.

Jacob Robida died early Sunday after a shootout with police. Police believe he went on a rampage at a New Bedford gas bar before killing two people in Arkansas.

One victim of the Massachusetts attack said he was "elated" the teen had been stopped. Bob Perry was released from a Boston hospital Friday. He had a black eye, a five-inch gash on his right cheek and a bullet hole in his back.

Another victim remained hospitalized, and officials would not disclose the location of the third.

Before Robida's death, Massachusetts police had said he would be charged with attempted murder, assault and civil rights violations in the attack. In Arkansas, killing a police officer is punishable by death.

Robida's friends said he had, at times, glorified Nazism and bore a swastika tattoo, but had not previously expressed prejudice toward homosexuals.

Rep. Barney Frank, the openly gay congressman whose district includes New Bedford, said the community has a history of tolerance.

"This is not some general problem with the people of New Bedford," Frank said. "This is one disturbed 18-year-old."

Al Lewis of 'The Munsters' dies at 82

By Larry McShane
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Al Lewis, the cigar-chomping patriarch of "The Munsters" whose work as a basketball scout, restaurateur and political candidate never eclipsed his role as Grandpa from the television sitcom, died after years of failing health. He was 82.

The actor was widely reported to have been born in 1910, but his son Ted Lewis said Saturday that his father was born in 1923.

Lewis, with his wife at his bedside, passed away Friday night, said Bernard White, program director at WBAI-FM, where the actor hosted a weekly radio program. White made the announcement on the air during the Saturday slot where Lewis usually appeared.

"To say that we will miss his generous, cantankerous, engaging spirit is a profound understatement," White said.

Lewis, sporting a somewhat cheesy Dracula outfit, became a pop culture icon playing the irascible father-in-law to Fred Gwynne's ever-bumbling Herman Munster on the 1964-66 television show. He was also one of the stars of another classic TV comedy, playing Officer Leo Schnauzer on "Car 54, Where Are You?"

But Lewis' life off the small screen ranged far beyond his acting antics. A former ballplayer at Thomas Jefferson High School, he achieved notoriety as a basketball talent scout familiar to coaching greats like Jerry Tarkanian and Red Auerbach.

He operated a successful Greenwich Village restaurant, Grandpa's, where he was a regular presence — chatting with customers, posing for pictures, signing autographs.

In 1998, a ponytailed Lewis ran as the Green Party candidate against incumbent Gov. George Pataki. Lewis campaigned against what he said were draconian drug laws and

See LEWIS on page 4

Al Lewis, best known for his role on TV's "The Munsters," died on Saturday.

ARTS & LIVING
'A NEW WORLD' ON SCREEN
Colin Farrell shines as John Smith.
PAGE 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
2006 IN FULL SWING
Even though classes stopped, the news didn't.
PAGE 5

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy. Wind, H37°
TONIGHT Partly Cloudy. Wind, L24°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H36°, L18°

SPORTS
UMASS ROCKS THE MULLINS
The Minutemen upset No. 3 Boston College 3-2 Friday night.
PAGE 12

We believe in sandy feet,
beach bonfires and
lifelong memories.
We believe in vacations.*

Enter our vacation
sweepstakes at pwc.com/freevacation

Your life.
You can bring it with you.

*connectedthinking

PRICEWATERHOUSECOOPERS

* Sweepstakes: Void in Puerto Rico & where prohibited. Open to U.S. legal residents, 18 & older as of 2/6/06. Ends 3/31/06. Approximate retail value of all prizes: $25,000. Limit one entry per person. For complete official rules, go to pwc.com/freevacation. Sponsor: PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. Alternative Means of Obtaining Entry: Send a postcard with your name, address, telephone number, date of birth and the words "PwC Vacation Sweepstakes" to PwC Vacation Sweepstakes, P.O. Box 1450, Minneapolis, MN 55440-1450. Limit one entry per postcard. Postcard entries must be received by 3/31/06. Alternative Means of Obtaining Entry: Send a postcard with your name, address, telephone number, date of birth and the words "PwC Vacation Sweepstakes" to PwC Vacation Sweepstakes, P.O. Box 1450, Minneapolis, MN 55440-1450. Limit one entry per postcard. Postcard entries must be received by 3/31/06. Alternative Means of Obtain Corporate Employees.

Campus Perspectives

Did the New Alcohol Policies Affect Your Weekend?

No, it didn't at all.

Tom Casey

Senior Communication Major

The alcohol policy didn't affect my weekend at all. To be honest, it didn't seem to affect the campus at all. The policy is to ensure the safty of the students, so I hope it will do that.

Candice Watch

Sophomore
Psychology Major

Since I'm 21, I should be allowed to decorate my room with cases or my shot glasses.

Mike Anderson

Junior
Exercise Science

The new policy didn't affect my weekend.

Jillian Salladay

Sophmore
Undeclared

We just had to get smarter.

Jon Ruiz

Freshman
Undeclared

The new alcohol policy did not affect my weekend. I feel it's unnecessary. If you are smart about it, you won't get in trouble. Don't party in the dorms, it's lame anyway.

Elena Janice

Junior
Civil and Environmental Engineering Major

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael A. Busack
Managing Editor Eric Athas
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Katie Huston
Advertising Manager Karrs O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egavian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Ian Jones
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Kristen LaCasse
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Morgan-ann Rousseau
Asst. Arts & Living Alex Butler
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Belliveau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Caristi
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Sports Rob Greenfield
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1904 and the Daily Weekly Collegian in 1906. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian reserves the right to refuse any advertising. Rates and information can be found on our website. Offices are open Mondays through Fridays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Katie Huston
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Eric Athas
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Melody Natal
PRODUCTION STAFF
Lauren Egavian, Michael A. Busack

At least 1,000 die when ferry sinks off Egyptian coast

By Mariam Fam
Associated Press

SAFAGA, Egypt — The series of tragic errors that apparently claimed more than 1,000 lives on an Egyptian ferry escalated when the crew decided to push across the Red Sea despite the fire burning in the aging vessel's parking bay, survivors said Saturday.

The Al-Salaam Boccaccio 98 had sailed only about 20 miles from the Saudi shore, but its crew instead tried to reach Egypt's shores 110 miles away. Only 376 survivors had been rescued by late Saturday.

"We told the crew, 'Let's turn back, let's call for help,' but they refused and said everything was under control," said passenger Ahmed Abdel Wahab, 30, an Egyptian who works in Saudi Arabia.

Passengers began panicking, and crew members locked up some women in their cabins, Wahab and another survivor said, though many others being treated in Safaga hospitals Saturday said that was not true.

As the blaze grew out of control, passengers not locked in their rooms moved to one side of the 35-year-old vessel. An explosion was heard, and high winds helped push the unbalanced ship over. The ship quickly sank with more than 1,400 passengers and crew and 220 cars aboard.

News reports on Saturday said the ship's captain and some of the crew fled their drowning vessel in one of the first lifeboats to launch.

Despite the fire, the ship had man-

See SHIPWRECK on page 4

Nation mourns civil rights leader Coretta Scott King

By Shannon McCaffrey
Associated Press

ATLANTA — When Janann Ransom arrived at Georgia's Capitol, about 1,400 people had already lined up in a cold, gusty wind to pay tribute to civil rights leader Coretta Scott King. But Ransom was undeterred.

"She's worth it," Ransom said. "She stood in line for me, her and her husband, when I couldn't."

Thousands of mourners poured into the Georgia Capitol rotunda Saturday to pay tribute to the widow of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., the first woman and the first black person to lie in honor in a statehouse that was once a seat of segregation.

The governor's office estimated that 42,000 people passed briskly within about 5 feet of the open casket in the marble rotunda, where King lay in her pink suit. Gloria Mavins, 52, of Orangeburg, S.C., said she was deeply moved.

"I felt like I wanted to bow down right there and just thank her," Mavins said.

The bronze casket had been carried through the streets of Atlanta on a horse-drawn carriage before being ushered into the Capitol by an honor guard of the Georgia State Patrol. The crowd outside cheered and threw roses as the casket went by.

"It was beautiful," said Robert Washington, 40, just after the glass-walled carriage arrived at the Capitol steps.

Georgia's flag, which Mrs. King helped change to remove the Confederate Cross, flew at half staff.

Gov. Sonny Perdue and his wife, Mary, escorted the casket into the statehouse, a sharp contrast to the official snub afforded Martin Luther King Jr. nearly four decades ago by segregationist Gov. Lester Maddox.

"Coretta Scott King was a gracious and courageous woman, an inspiration to millions and one of the most influential civil rights leaders of our time," Perdue said during a brief ceremony. "She was absolutely an anchor and support for her husband."

King's four children — Yolanda, Dexter, Martin Luther King III and Bernice — spent a few minutes at the open casket before the doors were thrown open to the public. Yolanda King stroked her mother's face, and she and Bernice King wiped away tears.

"While we claim her, she was their mama," Perdue said of the King children. "It's hard to give up your mama."

King, the "first lady of the civil rights movement," died Monday at age 78.

A soloist sang the hymn "Blessed Assurance" which echoed in the cavernous marble hall.

Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin, the first black woman to lead the city, said she owed her career to King. "I would not be here without her," Franklin said.

The largely black crowd came pushing strollers, leaning on walkers and dressed in military camouflage. Some made the sign of the cross as they moved past the casket.

Raymond Dutrieuille of Duluth, Ga. came with his wife, Nena, and 2-year-old son Raylin, "to experience part of history."

Coretta Scott King died last Monday after of cancer.

Some had traveled far. Chris Thomas, 50, came from New Haven, Conn., to see the procession. Connie Havis, 43, and her friend Caprice Wofford, 39, drove down from Chattanooga, Tenn.

"She looked beautiful," Havis said.

In 1968, then-Gov. Maddox ignored Martin Luther King Jr.'s death and refused to authorize a public tribute. He was outraged at the idea of state flags, then dominated by the Confederate Cross, flying at half-staff in tribute to a black man.

But immediately after Coretta Scott King died, the state flag was ordered lowered by Perdue.

Coretta Scott King died in Mexico at an alternative medicine clinic, where doctors said she was battling advanced ovarian cancer. She also had been recovering from a serious stroke and heart attack. In January, she made her first public appearance in a year on the eve of her late husband's birthday.

THE
BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
(30 years of service and counting)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog t

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!

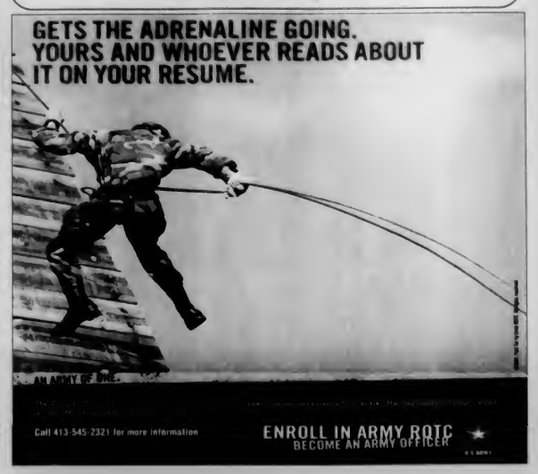
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN



Spring Semester 2006 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions. (Or if you have special circumstances, see us.)

6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for meetings •Feb. 6th (Mon) •Feb. 8th (Wed)
Feb. 7th (Tues) meeting will be held in room 168C of the Campus Center

•Assignment match (after ONE) Thurs. Feb. 9th at Hollywood (about 1 commute)
•To help those organizations YOU (or a friend) most passionate about, and the issues

Volunteer, while earning credit!

GETS THE ADRENALINE GOING.
YOURS AND WHOEVER READS ABOUT IT ON YOUR RESUME.

Call 413-545-2321 for more information

ENROLL IN ARMY ROTC
BECOME AN ARMY OFFICER

Reilly tries to shake off embarrassment at local caucuses

AUBURN (AP) — The two Democratic candidates for governor schmoozed with party loyalists gathered at hundreds of caucuses Saturday, trying to shake off a bruising week during which both campaigns were dogged by embarrassing tales of personal financial troubles.

Attorney General Thomas Reilly, whose hand-picked running mate state Rep. Marie St. Fleur dropped her bid amid revelations of unpaid taxes and student loans, tried to forge ahead, despite criticism that he failed to conduct a background check of St. Fleur.

His second stop of the day was a Democratic caucus in Auburn, where he gave a brief stump speech and shook hands with the small group of Democrats activists.

"I've been getting a great reception. People realize this is the first round of a 15-round fight," Reilly said.

Fellow gubernatorial hopeful Deval Patrick was hoping to put his own revelations behind him.

On Wednesday, as St. Fleur's troubles tumbled into view, Patrick disclosed that he fell behind in his federal taxes more than a decade ago, triggering an Internal Revenue Service lien of $8,778 on his property. The lien was paid off.

Patrick, greeting Democrats at a caucus in Reading, said he hoped voters wouldn't hold that against him.

"Voters are going to make judgments about the candidates' judgment, and also the candidates' vision, and also the candidates' leadership" he said. "Discontent with the Republicans is not going to be enough for a Democratic candidate to win."

Both campaigns tried to downplay expectations, each portraying their candidates as the underdog.

Both candidates easily met their goal for Saturday, which was to garner the support of a minimum of 15 percent delegates needed to get their name on the Democratic primary ballot in November, said state party chairman Philip W. Johnston.

Officials did not have exact tallies, but Johnston said about 35,000 people came out Saturday.

"We were very pleased with the turnout, which was significantly higher than anticipated," said Johnston, who was expecting 10 to 15 thousand less.

The turnout was down from the 50,000 who came out for the last governor's race four years ago, when there were more candidates seeking office.

The caucuses also gave Democratic loyalists a chance to hash out the events of the past week.

Patrick supporters were quick to fault Reilly for making a snap decision to ask St. Fleur to run with him as lieutenant governor without taking the time to see if there was anything in her past that could embarrass the ticket.

—Associated Press

CHRISTY WASHBURN/COLLEGIAN

Attorney General Thomas Reilly had one embarrassing week.

Relatives of shipwreck victims beg for more information aged to get within about 55 miles of the Egyptian port of Hurghada, according to official accounts.

SHIPWRECK from page 3

At the port of Safaga — the ship's original destination — relatives and friends of passengers begged authorities for information. When there was none, some banged on the iron gates trying to storm the docks.

Riot police with truncheons pushed the frantic crowd away from the port compound. Angry relatives threw stones, and some police could be seen hurling them back.

Shaaban el-Qott, 55, from Qena, Egypt, was looking for his cousin. He had been waiting at the port since Friday morning and spent the night on the street.

"No one is telling us anything. All I want to know if he's dead or alive. We rely on God. May God destroy Hosni Mubarak!" el-Qott shouted to a reporter Saturday, referring to the Egyptian president. "This government was supposed to throw this ship away and get a new one."

The rescue effort got off to a slow start. Initial offers of help were rejected, and two days after the ship set sail from Duhab, Saudi Arabia, just 376 survivors had been found. The ship's captain was reported missing.

Egyptian officials initially rejected a British offer to divert a warship to the scene and a U.S. offer to send a P3-Orion maritime naval patrol aircraft. Egypt reversed itself, but in the end only the Orion — which can search underwater from the air — was sent.

Four Egyptian rescue ships reached the scene Friday afternoon, about 10 hours after the ferry was believed to have capsized.

Many survivors complained that crew members discouraged them from putting on life jackets and said they did nothing to put lifeboats in service when it became obvious the ship would sink.

"It was like watching the movie Titanic," said Sayed Abdul Hakim, a 32-year-old painter who worked in Kuwait. "None of the crew brought down life boats or even told us how to use them. I swam for three hours. Then I spotted a rubber boat and I climbed in. I stayed there for 18 hours. I felt I was a dead man."

Another survivor, Nabil Taghyan, 27, said he saw the captain and crew flee in lifeboats.

"The captain took the first speed boat, even though he should go last," Taghyan told The New York Times, according to its online edition Saturday.

The tragedy struck a deep core of discontent among Egyptians, who are suffering from a considerable economic downturn and increased unemployment.

"Had the government made any job opportunities available at home, these people wouldn't have been forced to go abroad in the first place," said Moustafa Zayed, 24, whose father worked as a contractor in Saudi Arabia and was on the ship. "Had he stayed (in Egypt) we wouldn't have had money to buy food."

Tens of thousands of Egyptians work in Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf countries — many of them from impoverished families in southern Egypt who spend years abroad to earn money. They often travel by ship to and from Saudi Arabia.

Some on board the ferry were believed to be Muslim pilgrims who had overstayed their visas after last month's hajj pilgrimage to work in the kingdom.

Mubarak flew to Hurghada, about 40 miles farther north, on Saturday and visited survivors in two hospitals. Television pictures of the visit, which normally would have carried sound of Mubarak's conversations, were silent.

During the visit, Mubarak ordered that the families of each victim be paid $5,200 in compensation and the survivors $2,600 each.

In a televised address, the president said, "We pray that God almighty may count (the victims) among his martyrs."

A group of nearly 140 survivors came ashore at Hurghada shortly before dawn Saturday. Wrapped in blankets, they walked down a rescue ship's ramp, some of them barefoot and shivering, and boarded buses for a hospital.

Wahab, a martial arts instructor, said he spent 20 hours in the sea, sometimes holding on to a barrel from the ship and later taking a lifejacket from a dead body.

Ahmed Elew, an Egyptian in his 20s, said he went to the ship's crew to report the fire and they ordered him to help put it out. At one point there was an explosion, he said.

When the ship began sinking, Elew said he jumped into the water and swam for several hours. He said he saw one overloaded lifeboat capsize but managed to stay afloat long enough to find another.

"Around me people were dying and sinking," he said. "Who is responsible for this? Somebody did not do their job right. These people must be held accountable."

'Grandpa' Al Lewis remembered

LEWIS from page 1

the death penalty, while going to court in a losing battle to have his name appear on the ballot as "Grandpa Al Lewis."

He didn't defeat Pataki, but managed to collect more than 52,000 votes.

Lewis was born Albert Meister in upstate New York before his family moved to Brooklyn, where the 6-foot-1 teen began a lifelong love affair with basketball. He later became a vaudeville and circus performer, but his career didn't take off until television did the same.

Lewis, as Officer Schnauzer, played opposite Gwynne's Officer Francis Muldoon in "Car 54, Where Are You?" — a comedy about a Bronx police precinct that aired from 1961-63. One year later, the duo appeared together in "The Munsters," taking up residence at the fictional 1313 Mockingbird Lane.

The series, about a family of clueless creatures plunked down in middle America, was a success and ran through 1966. It forever locked Lewis in as the memorably twisted character; decades later, strangers would greet him on the street with shouts of "Grandpa!"

Unlike some television stars, Lewis never complained about getting typecast and made appearances in character for decades.

"Why would I mind?" he asked in a 1997 interview. "It pays my mortgage."

Lewis rarely slowed down, opening his restaurant and hosting his WBAI radio program. At one point during the '90s, he was a frequent guest on the Howard Stern radio show, once sending the shock jock diving for the delay button by leading an undeniably obscene chant against the Federal Communications Commission.

He also popped up in a number of movies, including the acclaimed "They Shoot Horses, Don't They?" and "Married to the Mob." Lewis reprised his role of Schnauzer in the movie remake of "Car 54," and appeared as a guest star on television shows such as "Taxi," "Green Acres" and "Lost in Space."

Al Lewis ran for Governor of New York in 1998.

But in 2003, Lewis was hospitalized for an angioplasty. Complications during surgery led to an emergency bypass and the amputation of his right leg below the knee and all the toes on his left foot. Lewis spent the next month in a coma.

A year later, he was back offering his recollections of a seminal punk band on the DVD "Ramones Raw." He is survived by his wife, Karen Ingenthron-Lewis, three sons and four grandchildren.

Students face housing costs

HOUSING from page 1

only represent 7 percent of available beds on campus, and that the majority of students will be living in student housing that is priced "quite low compared to peer institutions."

A November 2005 survey of 14 public colleges in the Northeast found that the University of Massachusetts Amherst had the second-lowest housing rate, Blaguszewski said.

The University of Maine was nominally less expensive, at $3,390 per year, while housing at the University of Rhode Island costs $5,066 per year. However, true costs are variable because local surcharges and other fees apply, said Blaguszewski.

Students have also charged that the decision to build the new dorms was not well thought-out.

"We wouldn't need these dorms if UMass didn't over-enroll. Along the same lines as over-enrolling, this allows the University to make even more money," said Kahn.

Blaguszewski said that the new apartments were constructed as a response to student demand for this type of living option, as determined through a series of campus focus groups.

"We know there is a market for them," Blaguszewski said. "We also know the location of these units is far more convenient than off-campus housing, and the amenities they will possess will be state-of-the-art. Based on both the responses from UMass Amherst students and the national campus demand for this type of housing, we anticipate sufficient student interest."

However, many students who were excited at the prospect of living in North say they will seek off-campus housing instead if Option 2 or 3 is chosen.

"Option 2 is completely ludicrous because no one's going to pay that much money for an apartment when they can pay probably less than half of [that] for a regular apartment somewhere else. Location is important, but it's not that important," said Junker.

Sophomore Ashley Pratte was excited about the prospect of living in North next year, but said if Option 2 or 3 is chosen she'll look elsewhere for housing. "It'll be a lot cheaper to live off campus. I can find a place with a kitchen and a single bedroom," she said.

Many feel there is no good solution to the problem. "Depending on the way in which they charge students for living in the dorms, it's either going to make UMass cost more or it's going to create a class structure within the residential living areas," said senior April Wiggin. "Either way, it's going to defeat the purpose of UMass being an affordable state school."

"We really should be discussing covering the cost of making the other dorms more suitable places to live, but I feel the North issue has erased all hope of that," Doore said.

In the e-mail, Gargano asked for student input to be submitted by Jan. 20.

He told the Republican that the responses were mixed, but seemed to be split between Option 2, under which apartment renters will cover the full cost of the debt, and Option 3, the 2 percent option.

The campus will present a recommended price structure to the president and board of trustees at a meeting on Feb. 15.

UMass student Kelley Doore thinks "Option 1" would be unfair to students who remain in the dorms.

Start the New Year with a New Look!
It's time to highlight that dull hair!
Our stylists will help you select a hair style and color designed specifically for your hair texture, facial features and lifestyle.
SAVE $20 Luxury Facial Treatment
FREE 7th Dimensional Color Highlight SAVE $25
FREE Deep Conditioning Treatment with Color Service
Styles by Deborah & Co. HAIR SALON & SPA
65 University Drive, Amherst 549-9110
Paul Mitchell Signature Salon

FUN, FUN, FUN! BARTEND
BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL
Student Discount!
1-800-357-3210 218 Memorial Ave, West Springfield, MA
www.bostonbartender.com

STSTRAVEL.COM
Your America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK
Don't Get Left Behind! BOOK TODAY!
STS STUDENT TRAVEL SERVICES
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

OUR TOP 10 GRADUATE MAJORS:
MBA
Physician Assistant
Interactive Communications
Teaching
Biomedical Sciences
Molecular/Cell Biology
Journalism
Nursing
Accounting
Computer Information Systems
MASTERING THE ART OF TEACHING
Sheila Wycinowski, Director of Curriculum and Staff Development at Amity High School, explains, "Basically we look to hire Quinnipiac students. They have a clear understanding of lesson planning and classroom management and the balance between them." She also characterizes Quinnipiac students as articulate, creative, able to encourage higher-level thinking in students, and able to incorporate technology into their teaching.
QUINNIPIAC U:
RAVE REVIEWS FOR OUR MBA
The Quinnipiac University School of Business MBA program continues to prepare business professionals for the realities of management in global, technology-driven work environments in specializations such as:
• MBA WITH CONCENTRATIONS IN ACCOUNTING, CIS, FINANCE, INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS, MANAGEMENT, MARKETING
• MBA – CHARTERED FINANCIAL ANALYST® TRACK
• MBA IN HEALTHCARE MANAGEMENT
>> YOUR NEXT MOVE
Quinnipiac University offers graduate programs in 17 distinct disciplines. Whether you are interested in our AACSB nationally accredited business program, the master of arts in teaching (MAT) program or one of the Northeast's most highly regarded journalism and interactive communications programs, all have been designed to thoroughly prepare you for a professional career. For more information, call 1-800-462-1944 or visit www.quinnipiac.edu
QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY
Hamden, Connecticut

MAJOR BLOWOUT SALE!
ONE DAY ONLY!
BLUESDAY, Feb. 7th
blue Ticket
MADE FOR STUDENTS & YOUNG TRAVELERS
EXCLUSIVE TO STA TRAVEL
London R/T air from $99
Rome R/T air from $150
Amsterdam R/T air from $110
Paris R/T air from $110
Frankfurt R/T air from $130
London to Paris from $20 on Eurostar
It's Got Your Back.
Prices subject to change and availability. Taxes and other fees are not included. All prices good on 2/7 only. All fares except Eurostar are valid for departure through 5/26 and are out of Boston, MA. Eurostar price is one way. CST #1017980-40
Call or come in Today!
U of M Campus Center, Rm. 224
(413) 256.1261
STA TRAVEL www.statravel.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
EDITORIAL OPINION
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2006
"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire
EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Peace is close to impossible'

Matt Giancola

Well, we have made it through another abnormally long winter vacation. Those last few weeks when all of our friends have already disappeared back to their schools really seem to drag on forever. Working 40-hour weeks to pay for the always-increasing college bill doesn't help the time go by as fast as I'd like. The month wasn't a complete bore, though. Some interesting things happened here and there.

Thanks in large part to the right-wing, Christmas was saved, yet again, from the forces of destruction. I was able to open my presents free from persecution. Fox News anchor John Gibson's book, "The War on Christmas: How the Liberal Plot to Ban the Sacred Christian Holiday Is Worse Than You Thought" seems a bit dated now, doesn't it? Sorry, John.

In January, the Senate began its questioning of Judge Alito. Alito is the newest Justice of the Supreme Court. For someone addicted to C-SPAN and its sequel, C-SPAN2, I was disappointed that I could not watch more of the hearings. Though he has great knowledge of constitutional law, I was distressed to see his comments regarding abortion.

In the mid-'80s, working under the Reagan administration, he wrote most emphatically that "the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion." In the hearings, however, he testified that Americans do have a right to privacy. The fifth and fourteenth Amendments show that the founders believed that individuals should have a right not to be disturbed by the government.

What disturbs me even more, however, is his view of executive authority. He wrote that the president should be able to interpret congressional bills sent to his desk for his signature. President Bush, upon receiving the bill banning torture outright, declared that he retained the authority to go above the law in order to protect the "American people from further terrorist attacks." Bush is effectively casting himself as superior to the Constitution. For more than 200 years, the law has been king of the land. Are those days over?

The president's father nominated Justice Souter, and he was touted to be a wonderful conservative judge. He is now known to be one of the more liberal judges on the court, much to the chagrin of Republicans yearning for the Supreme Court to return the nation to the days of the 1930s. Though I would have voted "no" to appointing Alito to the high court, I certainly hope that he will, as he said in his remarks, decide cases based on the law, and not on his ideology. In fact, in his first vote ever, on the very day he was sworn in, he voted with the liberal wing of the court on a capital punishment case. So far, he is holding his promise.

In keeping with the president's march towards imperialism, we also found out that his administration has secretly been spying on Americans. He declares that the program only targets calls made by terrorists; however, anti–war groups in Baltimore and Florida have been spied on as well.

In a recent Washington Post story, government officials have claimed that thousands of Americans have had their communications inspected and cleared. Bush cites past presidents who have done the same thing. Unfortunately for Bush, those presidents got a warrant after the search. The only president who unilaterally took action without a warrant was President Nixon, and, well, there's a reason Bush doesn't cite him.

> The only president who unilaterally took action without a warrant was President Nixon, and, well, there's a reason Bush doesn't cite him.

Towards the end of vacation, Palestine held parliamentary elections, and as it turns out, the terrorist organization Hamas won a majority of seats. Hamas takes the position that Israel must be destroyed, and that they will not recognize them. Hamas is also very good at providing Palestinians health care and other government benefits.

President Bush came out and very sensibly said that the United States will not give any more aid to Palestine unless Hamas renounces its anti-Israel policies. Americans should not be forced to fund terrorists.

How wonderful would it be, though, to have a terrorist organization renounce its past violence, become peaceful and help create a better world, all through the democratic process? The world needs to heavily pressure Hamas to adopt the model of the IRA and abandon its violent wing. Until then, the road to peace is close to impossible.

Oh, there were many other stories, but many are just beginning. Sen. Arlen Specter has scheduled hearings to look into whether or not the president broke the law. The possible threat of nuclear weapons in Iran holds the world's attention, as does the continuing war in Iraq. In November, Congressional elections will determine how Americans want to move forward. Currently, 51 percent would prefer the Democrats to take control of Congress. Whatever happens, 2006 is shaping up to be a very interesting year.

Matt Giancola is a Collegian columnist.

What made us the way we are?

Jackie Hai

Last spring, Matt Barnwell — winner of the 2005 NSNCFF College Columnist Contest and then-senior at the University of Georgia — penned an editorial that asked us, "Will apathy define our generation?" In it, Barnwell drew attention to the perception that the young people of America today, well, really don't care all that much about what's going on in the real world.

Many of us prefer the latest trends over the latest issues, reality TV over the evening news and parties with music and booze over parties with platforms and politicians. While this isn't true for everybody in our generation, the number for whom it is true is high enough that our demographic as a whole is being viewed this way.

Which begs the question: just what made us the way we are?

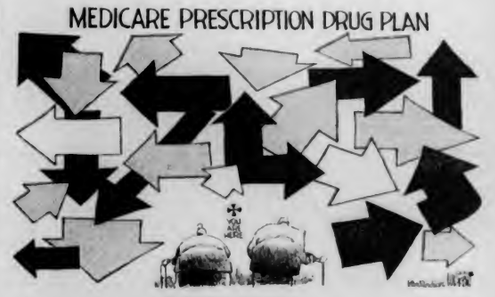
I think we can trace the problem to a few sources. One is that we are, for the most part, a generation of plenty raised in a material culture where the road to happiness is paved with money. Kids in well-off families have their every want and desire fulfilled by their parents' checkbooks, while kids who aren't tend to devote themselves to the pursuit of wealth so that they too can have what everyone else has.

Flashing advertisements and dreams of iPods, plasma televisions, hot sports cars, expensive jewelry and designer jeans fill our horizons. We are short-sighted of seeing anything else beyond our private bubbles of what we want next and how we're going to get it.

Second — and this is tied into the first source — mass media has brainwashed us. In the drive for profit, major networks put up for consumption not what we ought to see, but what they think we want to see. In a self-fulfilling cycle of life imitating art and art imitating life, the daily lineup on television that we so eagerly take in promotes sexuality, violence and the ever-present need to conform to social expectations. Reality makeover shows? You too can be made "Barbie and Ken"-perfect, loved by all, if you pay attention and follow all these rules.

The Internet is a vast portal to information from around the world, but rarely do we use it for purposes deeper than a tool for procrastination. We chat with and e-mail friends, pore over Facebook, play online games and laugh at ourselves on sites like Collegeh Humor. In short, the media distracts us, makes sure we're glued to our seats for hours on end, keeps us obsessed with the superficial and builds a soothing comfort zone for our minds.

> In a self-fulfilling cycle of life imitating art and art imitating life, the daily lineup on television that we so eagerly take in promotes sexuality, violence and the ever-present need to conform to social expectations.



Finally, what I see a lot of among us is simply a case of disillusionment. We seem to have lost faith in our country's political process, and it's not really that surprising. Almost any college-aged student reading this right now will have spent the entirety of their adolescence and young-adulthood under the shadow of the Bush administration. Stop and think about that for a moment. To put it another way: I was in the middle of eighth grade when Dubya was first sworn into office, and three-fourths of the current undergrad student body here will have graduated by the time he ships out.

We've grown up in an era where getting the majority of votes doesn't mean you've won the election, but having friends in the right places does. Where it's OK to throw aside the rest of the world's rules and attack a sovereign nation, just because whoever has the most guns says so. Where speaking out against the government's actions gets you branded as unpatriotic at best, a terrorist sympathizer at worst. Is it any wonder that America's youth have taken one look at what the adults are doing, thrown up their hands and said, "Screw this, we don't want any part of it"?

Still, it should be said that these are only reasons, not excuses, for our apathy. Like it or not, one day, we're all going to wake up, look around, and come to the nasty realization that the world has been handed down to us.

As for now? Even if we're not ready to make big changes yet, we still need to just give a damn. It'd be a start, at least.

Jackie Hai is a Collegian columnist.

Corrupted ballot counting

Chris Eckel

Remember Nomar Garciaparra, shortstop for the Red Sox once upon a time? He played in the All-Star Game every year, but in 1999 a fan thought he could use a little extra help to get there. The fan, a computer engineer, created a program that voted for "Nomah" almost 40,000 times at the Major League Baseball Web site. Unfortunately for Sox fans, Major League Baseball caught on, and the votes were quickly discounted since they were illegally cast.

Now Massachusetts has another ballot stuffing controversy on its hands. According to several sources, the group behind the ballot initiative to make gay marriage constitutionally illegal in this state is engaging in a bit of risky business. Now, I won't pretend to speak absolute fact here, for there are several variations on a theme. However, many citizens have revealed that they were duped into signing the initiative through sleight-of-hand techniques from professional signature gatherers hired from Arno Political Consultants, a company out of California with a rather sordid history.

Several accounts have been given of varying methods around the classic bait-and-switch technique, and it is possible that some or all of them are true. Now, I would never declare Fox 25 News to be an unimpeachable news source, but if one uses a search engine, he/she could quite easily find a rather indisputable video of a woman revealing how she illicitly collected signatures.

Of course, blaming those who oppose gay marriage for endorsing these fraudulent tactics would be unfair; as of yet, there is no clear proof to show that the leadership of such organizations as the Massachusetts Family Institute or VoteOnMarriage.org encouraged such behavior. However, that doesn't mean that they are in the clear. At best, allying oneself with a group such as Arno, an organization with a long record of questionable signature collection tactics, shows poor judgment.

However, that doesn't tell us anything new. Dr. Roberto Miranda, co-chairman of VoteOnMarriage.org, while giving a speech titled "Master Plan to Reclaim the State of Massachusetts for Jesus Christ," asked his audience: "Is it exaggerated to see prophetic significance in the fact that on September 11, 2001, Boston served as the point of departure for the deadly forces that spread so much destruction and havoc in this nation and all over the world? What took place at the material level is now being carried out at the moral and spiritual level, as the virus of homosexuality and gay married [sic] begins to spread dramatically all over the nation and perhaps the world."

> Yes, Roberto, it is an exaggeration and a fallacy to compare terrorism to gay marriage. Terrorists kill people. Married people generally either create or foster new life.

I have several thoughts on that line of reasoning. Yes, Roberto, it is an exaggeration and a fallacy to compare terrorism to gay marriage. Terrorists kill people. Married people generally either create or foster new life. As a matter of fact, I strongly suspect those terrorists you rail against share at least one trait with you: they don't much care for gay marriage either.

Secondly, the last guy I recall who had the chutzpah to use a phrase like "Master Plan" in his speeches was Adolf Hitler. He wasn't much keen on saving the world, for Jesus or for anyone else, but rather had a fetish for destroying it. Lastly, the fact that you have somewhere, somehow been awarded a doctorate makes me question the state of higher education in the world.

Now, don't get me wrong, I know that most people opposing gay marriage don't share Roberto's views, just as most Muslims don't agree with Osama Bin Laden's version of Islam, or that most Christians don't agree with Pat Robertson's recent comments. I should know; I'm a lifelong, every-Sunday Christian who thinks that he is a complete jacka. I just wonder why a man of such questionable aptitude has been placed in such a position of power.

Furthermore, I completely respect the opinion of anyone who opposes gay marriage, and I'll good-naturedly debate the issue with anyone who cares to do so, but what isn't debatable is that some severe troubles have arisen from this story.

Several have said that they felt so betrayed by having their signatures fraudulently collected that they will never again sign a petition. Considering that the petition is the most accessible way for average citizens to engage in their government, such abstinence would be a shame. Furthermore, although it has not yet been fully investigated, it appears that some laws may have been broken.

So in the face of public rage and suspicion, why hasn't more governmental action been taken? Let's remember, folks: Major League Baseball, the same organization that really only began to examine the problem of steroids once Congress threatened to intervene, quickly and efficiently investigated a voting scam. When they found evidence of impropriety, they took quick, decisive action against ballot stuffing. Is it really too much to ask that the government in the state of Massachusetts do the same?

Chris Eckel is a Collegian columnist.

WRITE FOR ED/OP!
EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

MASSPIRG APPROVES COVERAGE ON WAL-MART

The Collegian's recent coverage of the debate over the development of a Wal-Mart Super Center in Hadley has thus far been commendable. Any reader who has followed this coverage with any sort of consistency is by now aware of the growing anxiety among Hadley residents over this project, which threatens to harm local flora and fauna, increase traffic and create more safety hazards for pedestrians.

As an intern at MassPIRG, I've also been witness to the outrage of students who fear that the interests of town residents will be overlooked in favor of special interests and big business. Today less than 10 MassPIRG volunteers collected more than 300 petition signatures opposing the development of the Wal-Mart Super Center. These were collected in less than four hours.

We're happy with our numbers, but we also realize it takes more than signatures and outrage to combat special interests. We've got the manpower; now it's time to take it to the next level. We at MassPIRG encourage all students against the development of the Wal-Mart Super Center to become informed on this issue and turn their outrage into positive action.

To this point, those behind the Wal-Mart Super Center have been less than honest in their development plans. They failed to point out in their letter of intent that they would be building on wetland areas, have yet to construct the required relocation plans for the wetlands they will be displacing and have not conducted an adequate endangered species survey.

If UMass students and Hadley residents are serious about making sure the Hadley Wal-Mart Super Center is never built, we must work together and stay on task. While beefing up on zoning laws and wetland construction restrictions may not be as compelling as labor rights or fair trade issues, chances are it will be our ability to outsmart and outmaneuver these developers that will keep the Wal-Mart Super Center out of Hadley.

We at MassPIRG will continue to fight on this issue, and we welcome anyone willing to help to attend one of our 5 p.m. meetings on Mon. in the Campus Center. Check the directory by the elevator; you'll find us.

David Fonseca
UMass student

DON'T EXPECT MUCH FROM BUSH

Sen. Harry Reid (D-NV) hit the nail on the head when he questioned President Bush's credibility following his State of the Union speech Wednesday. Indeed, the president's call for American energy independence rings hollow.

Until he develops actual policies, don't expect much. The Department of Energy estimates the amount of oil we get from the Middle East has increased from 54 percent of our supply to 65 percent.

According to Reuters, "One day after President Bush vowed to reduce America's dependence on Middle East oil by cutting imports from there, 75 percent by 2025, his energy secretary and national economic adviser said Wednesday that the president didn't mean it literally."

The only way we're going to move towards a clean energy future is by making a real investment in clean energy, not spewing empty rhetoric. It's obvious we can't trust our leaders on their own.

Fortunately, over 600 UMass students have signed on to the Campus Climate Challenge, a campaign to reduce the campus global warming pollution close to zero as quickly as possible by working with the administration and getting students involved.

If we continue to pressure decision-makers to develop and utilize clean technology, we have a great shot at turning the problems of the previous generation into solutions for the future.

Kate Gilbert
MassPIRG member

LOMBARDI SHOULD SHOW STUDENTS RESPECT

I applaud the Daily Collegian for its coverage of the financial struggles facing UMass students, but I have to wonder what Chancellor John Lombardi's problem is.

He says, "Tuition in public universities is low when the state pays most of the expenses, and high when the state pays less of the expenses. As state funding for higher education institutions declines, tuition and fees rise."

Well, duh.

Instead of lecturing us about a process any high school graduate understands, why doesn't Lombardi show UMass students some respect?

As an employee of UMass, and a highly paid one at that, Lombardi needs to put some effort into solving the problem of inadequate state funding instead of accepting it as a given.

We need an advocate in the chancellor's office who, instead of allowing the campus's budget to be balanced on the backs of young people, actively lobbies the state to fulfill its responsibility to adequately fund UMass.

In a democracy, accessible higher education is the right of all people, not just those who can afford UMass' skyrocketing tuition.

Perhaps the next time the Daily Collegian discusses the finances of UMass students with the chancellor, he can share with us what he is doing to improve the situation.

Will Fischer
UMass graduate student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Love from another world

"The New World"
Directed by Terrence Malick
Starring Colin Farrell & Q'Orianka Kilcher
New Line
Rated PG-13
135 mins.
Grade A-

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Staff

Terence Malick's "The New World," like its predecessor "The Thin Red Line," takes on the ambience of an illuminated manuscript. The film seems to lack an overture and intermission, and is best viewed in a theater draped in velvet and lit by wall sconces. While watching "The New World," I was reminded of an acquaintance of mine whom, as a youth, received a pair of patent leather dancing shoes to use for a performance, and then threw them in dirt because he found them to be revoltingly glossy.

"The New World" tells the story of Pocahontas, a story many claim to know — although historians cannot agree on the story's details, as it was shrouded in myth almost immediately after the fact. Malick presents the version commonly agreed upon, and embellishes the rough edges with romanticism. He tells the story of Pocahontas's life as an American Indian princess who was among the first of her people to encounter and interact with European settlers, in an era when they were regarded as simple benign travelers. She rescues one settler, John Smith, from execution and proceeds to fall in love with him, although viewers get the impression it's less true love than feelings of love brought on by the surrounding circumstances. The two struggle to maintain their relationship even as Pocahontas' people realize that Smith's people are not as benign as previously thought. When Smith is assigned to chart Jamestown's surrounding area, he arranges for Pocahontas to be told that he perished during the journey.

The events that follow could obviously be regarded as a microcosm of the changing of America, the native peoples of the region being forced to conform to European standards or pay the harshest of penalties. While Malick does not confront the obvious directly, he implicitly allows the audience to come to that conclusion.

Malick has an uncanny ability to cast an aura around his films that makes them watchable. The mise-en-scène of "The New World" casts a spell that engulfs the viewer and taps into his subconscious. As a result, the film feels enigmatic and unreachable. This mystical quality helps achieve the meaningfulness of the era, encapsulating the feeling of wonderment that both the settlers and the natives must have felt when they came across an entirely different people with wildly different cultures. But this style of narration does not sit very well with what the audience knows will occur after the events depicted in the film.

It is possible that Malick intended for his film to be a celebration of a moment in time, a span of only a few years where it seemed possible that the Europeans and the American Indians could live in harmony. The immaculate imagery, the music that radiates innocence and the overall feeling of peace would make sense if that was his intention.

Still, it's hard to watch this film and forget the ultimate fate of the people involved, a movie topic for which Malick's pristine directing style would be anything but well suited. "The New World," as it is, is masterful filmmaking, so much so that it seems almost too well-made. If Malick wanted the style of the film to reflect its content, and thus interweave the two to make a solid statement, he should have tossed it in dirt.

It is obvious that Malick has labored endlessly to make this film, the script of which he wrote 25 years ago, into a timeless epic. He maintains his reputation of making films that are eerily and inimitably perfect. He should, by all means, be forgiven for his film's excessive gold leaf.

Coldplay cuddles up to crowd at rockin' show in Oakland

By Lauren Sloat
Daily Californian (U.C. Berkeley)

BERKELEY, Calif. — This concert is going to be fu--ing amazing," singer Chris Martin warned at the start of his set Tuesday night at the Oakland Arena. Amazing it was — but in some surprising ways. Forget Coldplay the band — today we have Coldplay the cult.

Gone are the days of yore when the band could front even the illusion of intimacy at venues like the Fillmore. Today, they sell out stadiums — and they've got those stadiums literally meowing and reaching out to their new musical messiah. Say what you will about Coldplay's negotiable status as one of today's most overrated bands, but as they opened with "Square One" and waves of blue, green and red washed over the captivated arena, it was impossible not to feel just a little warm and tingly.

Most amazing about the show was Martin's propensity for bizarre and somewhat alarming stage choreography. Like a delightful little sea-monkey, Martin skipped and contorted across a stage covered in gold glitter that had leaked from large yellow balloons. (Yellow, get it? Get it?!)

Imagine, if you will, a British man with a Justin Timberlake haircut circa 1998 frolicking and two-stepping as if he were staving off a urinary tract infection. Add to this imagery an all-black outfit complemented by nimble white shoes. Caressing the lighting display, prowling like a cat and spooning one of his fellow bandmates on the stage floor are only three examples of his seemingly endless supply of disturbing dance flourishes. To his credit, Martin acknowledged his own strangeness.

"I hope you appreciate all this choreography! For English people, choreography is fu--ing difficult — that was like the moonwalk right there," he reasoned.

There was also something serious going on with the show's stage displays. At one point, the backdrop screen started with an image of the universe and narrowed in deeper and deeper with each frame until finally, much like the children aboard Ms. Frizzle's Magic School Bus, one had the sensation of actually being inside a man's skin-cell tissue. The next most disturbing image was that of a bear that, throughout the duration of "Talk," was shown meandering uneasily back and forth across his depressing cell. Is this supposed to be some profound metaphor — say, of so-called "bears" entrapped like lemmings inside a concert venue?

Now for the question everybody has asked at least once: Do all of Coldplay's songs sound the same? Yes. Does this mitigate their awesomeness? No, and here's why: It's very rare to come across a band whose music can serve as the entire soundtrack to nearly any situation. One music-savvy acquaintance swears that Joy Division's "Love Will Tear Us Apart" is the last great example of this phenomenon, but I hereby nominate Coldplay to the same curious classification. Any song penned by the mystical Martin seems somehow capable of providing the perfect dramatic backdrop to everything from sex to murder. As similar as their songs may sound, they've found something rare and are sticking with it.

Playing favorites new and old, the band struck a chord for at least 300 couples who got to sing along to "their" song — whether it be "The Scientist," "Fix You" or "Don't Panic." They also played rarity "How You See the World," previously only heard in Japan and on a charity compilation album. What garnered the most applause and excitement, however, was their cover of Johnny Cash's "Ring of Fire." For the song, the band huddled together down and center stage, affecting a more personal connection with the crowd, which responded with the loudest cheers of the evening.

If Coldplay is a new cult, at least they pay homage to the classics. When it comes down to it, maybe Chris Martin can only really write the same song over and over again, but if he's only got one song, at least it's a "fu--ing amazing" one.

COURTESY PHOTO/LIVE 365

Since the four members of the band Coldplay met in 1996, the band's success has grown in large numbers. The quartet is currently touring the U.S. in support of their latest album, X and Y.

Matisyahu proves to groove

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

As one WBRU disc jockey recently put it, "If you had told me five years ago that I'd be jamming to a Hasidic Reggae-Superstar, I'd have slapped you across the face." But lo and behold, the powerful rhythms and jiggity-jagga's of Matisyahu's soulful rhymes has listeners across the country grooving.

Many would probably recognize Matisyahu's 2005 hit song "King Without a Crown," which gained some ample popularity on the radio.

Matisyahu's new studio album, "Youth," will be in stores March 7. The album features 11 new songs, including some live favorites like "Fire of Heaven / Altar of Earth (Fire's Burning)," "Jerusalem," "Ancient Lullaby (Mist Risin')," and the title track, "Youth."

The musician emerged with his debut album "Shake Off the Dust...Arise," in 2004, and struck music lovers with his exceptional talent and unique image. The man is doused from head to toe in a traditional black suit and broad-brimmed black hat. His untamed beard and cheerful "rabbi-like" curls finish off his style. But what defines him is his voice.

Matisyahu's lyrical capabilities have the potential to capture a huge fan-base. Distinguishing his music is the sheer poeticism, integrity and beauty that haunt each note — not to mention the inspirational messages layered in the lyrics.

In September 2004, Matisyahu and his band performed under a sunny sky in the center of Amherst. The musician and his crew mixed up their performance with some chilled-out tunes and speakers who advocated the importance of faith and community. Relaxed students lounged barefoot and smoked hookahs as little yarmulke-wearing toddlers scampered about. But when Matisyahu summoned his vocals in a passionate song of chanting, the crowd couldn't stay seated, and bare feet met grass. The display was less a song, and more a statement without words which echoed up our spines.

Now, in 2006, it is that same tenacity of feeling and rhythm that's propelled Matisyahu into radio sensation and national tours.

Collecting his inspiration from artists like Bob Marley, Sizzla, Capleton and Nas, the music sounds like a collaboration of them all, but twisted with a distinct touch of Hasidic flow.

In the band, Matisyahu shines with his vocal and "beatbox" skills, Jonah David is on the drums, Aaron Dugan plays guitar and Josh Werner jams the bass.

Matisyahu was born with the name Matthew Miller in West Chester, Penn. At first he rebelled against his traditional Jewish upbringing, and adopted a "dreadhead" hippie persona. At age 14, however, he began to embrace his heritage, and soon after he visited Israel. He renamed himself Matisyahu at age 19, after a Lubavitch rabbi introduced him to the strict Lubavitch Hasidic sect of Judaism.

Clearly, Matisyahu's music doesn't only appeal to conservative Jews. Fans seem impartial about the music's relation to religion. But spirituality is definitely a pillar of its appeal. The music industry might consider it a phenomenon to see such an incredible mix of spirituality and music, coming into the mainstream. Granted, we have had to tolerate a fair share of POD and Creed after they became popular years ago. But Matisyahu's breed of spiritual music doesn't cling to the cliché of a tough-guy-gone-good persona.

His music delivers a new style to popular sound with his originality of lyrics and natural talent. Unlike some songs of other mainstream "religious rock groups," Matisyahu's songs don't cloak their religious themes in vague word choice that grant the other popular religious rockers the flexibility to appeal both to religious fans and those who really never knew about any religious affiliation in the music.

What's more is that his image is honest, and uniquely so. It isn't tacked on by publicity campaigns trying to step up the interest of every consumer out there. Fans are gaining respect for the up-and-coming reggae superstar along with a true interest in his sound.

Matisyahu will perform at this year's Coachella Valley Music and Arts Festival on Sunday, April 30. He'll also perform at the 2006 Bonnaroo Music Festival, which will be held from June 16-18.

The up-and-coming reggae superstar Matisyahu is riveting music lovers with his original mix of enchanting lyrical ability and beatbox rhythms.

Generation gap apparent during Super Bowl Halftime Show

By Mark Humphrey
Daily Bruin (U.C.L.A.)

LOS ANGELES — A lot of people go their whole lives trying to fathom the extraordinary disconnect that occurs between generations of parents and children with respect to many things, most notably musical preferences. Recently, however, one object has provided us with a symbolic answer.

That object is the right nipple of one Ms. Janet Damita Jo Jackson.

Yes, I'm aware that this is a tired subject and no, this is not going to be a treatise on how one woman's nipple is a touchstone in a culture war. Instead, I find it fascinating that the fallout from the Super Bowl XXXVIII halftime show has managed to illustrate why parents and children just don't "get" each other.

The Super Bowl halftime show is hardly an extravaganza of incredible music. Typically, it's the home of cookie-cutter tripe (witness the Super Bowl XXXV halftime excretion of N*Sync, Britney Spears and Aerosmith), but Nipple-Gate has changed all that in a rather odd way.

Ms. Jackson's fashion faux pas has made the NFL positively frightened to have a halftime show that could be seen as objectionable by anyone, for fear of incurring the wrath of the FCC and its fines (though why monstrous organizations like the NFL and the broadcast networks are so frightened of fines that rarely climb north of $1 million remains a mystery).

Now, the NFL has an interesting conundrum to deal with. Much of the music that American youth listen to is seen as inappropriate — and the youth is precisely the market the NFL is desperately trying to attract. This audience wouldn't mind seeing the Black Eyed Peas rock out to "My Humps" in front of over a billion people.

Now, imagine you're the NFL. You pretty much can't book any of the acts popular among teens and 20-somethings because of decency concerns, but you still desperately want to attract as many viewers as you can. So what's the answer?

You bring in established older acts that everybody loves.

The NFL's plan to counter the networks' decency concerns is to bring in "safe" older acts that the American parents (i.e. baby boomers) are OK with. The intriguing thing about this, however, is that these "safe" acts are the same ones that the NFL would have been horrified to put in front of viewers 40 years ago.

Last year, Paul McCartney performed at Super Bowl XXXIX, and this year the Rolling Stones will grace the biggest football game of the year with its presence. Now, they're both influential artists who show no signs of slowing down, but I can't help but think how ironic it is that they are now obscenity-free artists who won't anger the FCC.

What many people have forgotten or fail to realize is that at the time of Super Bowl I, the Beatles and the Rolling Stones were the devil's music to moms and dads. To our parents' parents, these groups inspired as much confusion and outrage as artists such as Marilyn Manson

See SUPER BOWL on page 8

COURTESY STATICUNPLUGGED.NET

Super Bowl XXXVII's halftime show sparked much controversy when Janet Jackson's breast was exposed during a performance with former N*Sync frontman Justin Timberlake.

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF TOUR GUIDES

1. Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2. Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3. Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.
4. Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse from February 6th - 10th, 2006. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 10th, 2006

Write for Arts! 545-1361

Super Bowl acts a matter of taste between parents and kids

SUPER BOWL from page 6

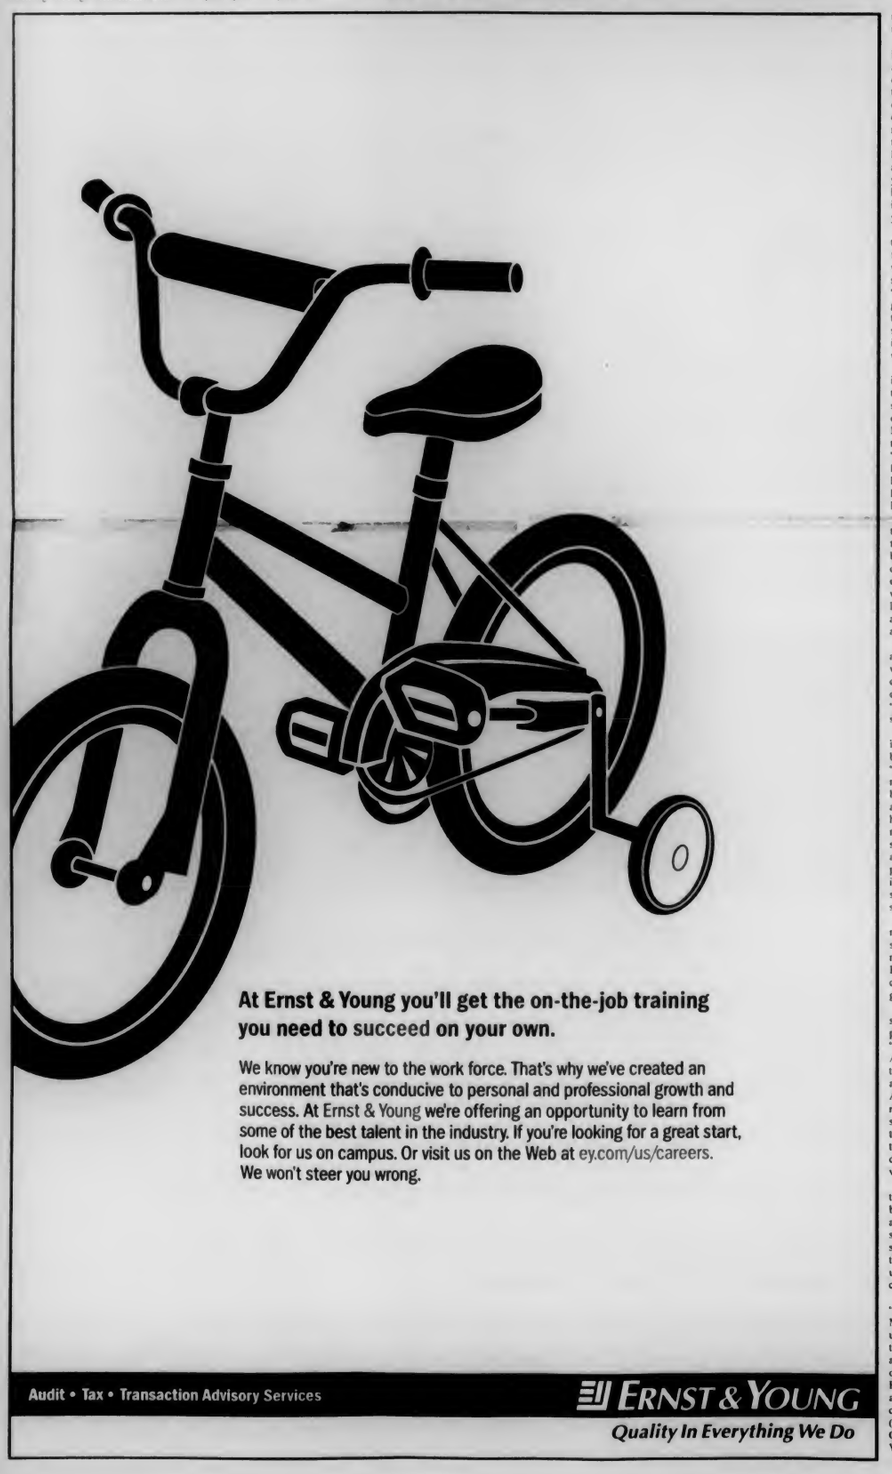
inspired among ours.

But our parents are fine with the Rolling Stones and The Beatles, because these groups have been around them their entire lives. They've watched the bands over the years and have, for the most part, always identified with what they had to say.

Yet as our parents grew up, stopped railing against The Man, and eventually kicked him out and took his place, a funny thing happened: What became acceptable changed, and what was considered to be "the devil's music" shifted.

The NFL is placing the Stones and McCartney in this position over controversial pop and hip-hop artists because our parents run organizations like the NFL. The people in charge of these groups grew up listening to these artists. They see nothing wrong with them, and based on the stuff their kids listen to, the messages these artists get across are comparatively tame.

The inherent irony is amusing and troubling. After all, the Stones and the Beatles are two of rock 'n' roll's greatest pioneers, synonymous with playing music as a way of expressing oneself.



It's almost tragic that now, by reaching so many people over the past 40 years, they've reached a point of acceptance to the extent they have. In fact, they've become the soundtrack to The Man's show.

Then again, this pretty much guarantees that the halftime show at Super Bowl LXXX will consist of a set by rock icon Marilyn Manson and a headlining performance by Eminem — because you and I will find the brand of neo-electrogaze-core porn-rock played in the brain-embedded iPods of our children completely unacceptable.

COURTESY JIM SPELLMAN/NFL

In what some say was a response to Janet Jackson's wardrobe malfuntion, Paul McCartney was asked to perform at the 2005 Super Bowl halftime show.

TV exec preserves 'Grey' matter

By Chuck Barney
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Tight-lipped coaches for the Pittsburgh Steelers and Seattle Seahawks would never, in their right minds, consider revealing key pieces of their Super Bowl game plans, so why should "Grey's Anatomy" executive producer Shonda Rhimes?

When a reporter asked her to divulge "just a general description" of Sunday's big post-Super Bowl episode, the woman who created one of television's most lusciously entertaining dramas doesn't exactly bubble over with details.

"Something happens and bad things follow," she teased, refusing to budge any further.

This kind of deft side-stepping is typical for Rhimes, who operates under a shroud of anti-spoilers secrecy and has been known to pass out memos to her cast and crew warning them to clam up, or else. So if you're looking for revelatory insights into the love triangle involving Meredith (Ellen Pompeo), Derek (Patrick Dempsey) and Addison (Kate Walsh), or if you're wondering what the future holds for the oversexed surgical interns of Seattle Grace Hospital, you've come to the wrong place.

"I grew up watching a lot of television, and one of the things I feel strongly about is not knowing what's going to happen on an episode before you see it," she said. "It's crazy. Why tell people what's going to happen rather than getting them to watch it and see for themselves? To me, the show is more interesting because no one knows what's going to happen next."

So far, the strategy is working. "Grey's Anatomy" is one of those warm-and-fuzzy television success stories that seem to pop out of nowhere. When it debuted last March, the series was only intended to be a temporary place-holder for "Boston Legal" on Sunday nights. But taking advantage of the hefty lead-in audience of "Desperate Housewives," it attracted 16 million viewers to its premiere.

That spot "Legal" enjoyed off to another time slot, and ever since, the "Grey's Anatomy" fan base has been swelling. The medical drama currently ranks No. 9 in total viewers, and ABC hopes that number will climb even higher after millions of post-game fans sample its addictive blend of comedy, drama and soap.

"We feel like it's going to be a huge part of our future, so we wanted to give it every boost we could," said ABC entertainment chief Steve McPherson on why "Grey's Anatomy" was awarded the showcase position.

Whenever a series hits big, there is an urge to search out clues by breaking down its DNA. Although "Grey's Anatomy" is labeled a medical drama, it in no way can be confused in style and tone with an "ER" or a "House." It mainly hinges on five first-year surgical residences — three of whom are strong and distinctive women — and floats along at its own breezy pace. Another vital cog: It's a show in which ever-changing relationships take precedence over brain surgery.

"I can feel it when there's too much medical and not enough personal (in the scripts) and that's the most important balance to keep," Rhimes insisted. "When the medical overtakes the personal, we're going down the wrong path."

And then there's the diversity factor. Unlike so many of prime time's white-washed shows, "Grey's Anatomy" features African-American and Asian doctors and a Latina character will arrive soon. Rhimes, the lone African-American woman running a broadcast network drama series, said she and her collaborators made a choice from the start to bring in "all kinds" of actors during the casting process and not worry about skin color.

"Casting is really important to the show's success, not just because they're phenomenal actors and bring so much to the roles," she said. "But also just because someone can look at the show and think, there's no longer anything unusual about having half your cast be people of color."

And although the narration for "Grey's Anatomy" comes from Meredith Grey's perspective, it is undeniably an ensemble production, with subplots centering on, among other things, the pregnancy of tough-as-nails resident Miranda Bailey (Chandra Wilson), known as The Nazi, and the dysfunctional coupling of doctors Christina Yang (Golden Globe winner Sandra Oh) and Preston Burke (Isaiah Washington).

UM perfect at Mullins

BASKETBALL from page 12

immediately took a pass down low and went right at Harris, drawing a foul.

Lasme, who said the knee was fine after the game, clearly got the better of the duel, as he finished with 12 points, nine rebounds and five blocks, while Harris went scoreless in just four minutes, as Baron benched him for the entire second half.

"Stephane Lasme had an incredible game," Ford said. "He made some big post moves for us at crucial times."

Despite the boost that Lasme's return gave the team, and the considerable home court advantage, UMass wasn't able to keep the Rams down. There were nine lead changes and nine ties in the game, while neither team led by more than seven points all night.

URI took its biggest lead (47-40) with 12:25 remaining on a Robinson 3-pointer. Life responded on the next trip with a deep three, and the teams traded baskets for the next five minutes.

UMass stepped up its defense down the stretch, holding URI without a field goal over the last 5:24.

NOTES: Dana Dingle, a member of the 1996 Final Four team, was in attendance and received a warm welcome from the crowd when his presence was announced. Dingle addressed the team prior to the game.

Karen Winokur/Collegian

Junior guard James Life had 19 points in UMass' 63-61 win over URI Saturday night.

Karen Winokur/Collegian

Sophomore forward Pam Rosanio had six points in the Minutewomen's 63-53 win over Saint Joseph's yesterday at the Mullins Center. Check out tomorrow's Collegian for a complete recap of the game.

Minutemen show toughness in critical victory over URI

GREENFIELD from page 12

important for us tonight."

Saturday's mental exam came late in the second half when the Minutemen were struggling on the offensive end. They were down two points, then four points, then two points again. Several possessions came and went with no scoring and UMass continued to miss what Ford called "point-blank shots."

But with 3:43 left in the game and the Minutemen down four points, UMass started to click.

Life gave the ball to Lasme on the block. The 6-foot-8 shot blocker used a drop-step to get into the paint and, with unusual touch for a man of his size, gently laid the ball into the net to bring his team within two points, 55-53.

After a defensive stop, Life was fouled and hit two free throws in the bonus to tie the game. On the next URI trip, Lasme altered Dawan Robinson's shot, grabbed the rebound and kicked it to Chris Lowe; Lowe pushed it ahead to Life on the perimeter, who fired a 3-pointer that lipped out and dropped into the hands of Rashaun Freeman. The junior lefty was fouled on the put-back and hit both free-throws to give UMass its first lead of the night.

It was all irrelevant from there — win or lose, the Minutemen proved their mental worth by hanging tough in a game that they could have allowed to escape their grasp.

"It was important for us to bounce back [from the Temple loss]," Freeman said. "I knew it was an important game because if you go on a losing streak you have to get one [win]."

UMass isn't a great basketball team. It has a long way to go before it can make a dent in the bumpers of George Washington and Xavier. But all of the Minutemen's flaws, faults and fumbles are forgivable if they play like they did on Saturday. UMass played with energy, intensity, heart, toughness and a sense of urgency — all qualities that were absent against Temple.

Now, if the team that stormed the court on Saturday would show up every game, Travis Ford's job would be a lot easier, and he'd have a lot fewer question marks.

–Rob Greenfield is a Collegian Columnist.

Woods holds off Els in playoff

By Stephen Wade
Associated Press

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates — For Tiger Woods, one close shave deserved another. Now he's 2-0 for the year.

Woods won the Dubai Desert Classic over Ernie Els on Sunday, forcing a one-hole playoff against the defending champion with birdies on the last two holes of regulation to go 19 under.

On the playoff hole, the 18th, Woods reached the back of the green in two. Els put his drive into a grove of palm trees, and then hit his second shot into the water protecting the green to end it.

Woods finished with a par and Els declined to putt out after missing his par attempt.

"Somehow I got lucky," Woods said. "Today it was very fortunate because I didn't really have it, but the other guys didn't run away either."

Woods, who shaved the goatee he'd been wearing before rallying Saturday to grab a share of the lead, won his first tournament of the year last weekend in the Buick Invitational in San Diego, also in a playoff.

It was his first event after a six-week break, the longest of his career.

Sunday's victory was Woods' 57th worldwide — 47 of them on the U.S. PGA Tour. It was also the 10th country in which he has won an official tournament. Along with titles in the United States and the United Arab Emirates, he has won in Thailand, Germany, Spain, Britain, Canada, Ireland, Japan and Malaysia.

The long vacation hasn't hurt, and neither did a 20-hour flight across 12 time zones to reach the Middle East.

This was Woods' third attempt to win on this desert course on the Arabian peninsula. Five years ago, he led after the third round but lost on the 72nd hole to Dane Thomas Bjorn, dumping a shot into the water hazard on 18. Two years ago, he watched Florida neighbor Mark O'Meara win.

Els and Woods were tied at 19-under 269 after regulation. Richard Green shot a 68 to finish 18 under and Miguel Angel Jimenez (69) and Anders Hansen (71) came in at 17-under 271. Retief Goosen shot 71 for a 16-under 272.

Els, a three-time champion in Dubai, shot a closing 5-under 67. Woods, who was tied for the lead with Anders Hansen after three rounds, closed with a 69 to go with rounds of 67-66-67.

"I cannot complain," said Els, who is coming back from knee surgery last year. "After all the hassle I had with the leg to come back ... and to almost win is fine."

Woods is nearly impossible to beat in playoffs. He's 13-1 worldwide in official events, including a 4-0 playoff record overseas. His only loss was in 1998 to Billy Mayfair in the Nissan Open.

For Woods, it was tough to get going Sunday.

He struggled with his driver and hooked drives badly on Nos. 2, 6 and 8 — each time into sandy areas under palm trees. He saved par twice — with a bunker shot to inches on No. 8, and with a 10-foot putt on the second — but failed to recover on No. 6, missing a 20-foot par putt.

The turnaround hole was the 14th. Woods hit his drive into a rocky bank surrounding a pond. He pitched his second over jagged stones into the fairway, left his approach 20 feet short — and then holed the par-saving putt.

"It was his and hope, really," said Woods, who stayed two behind Els with the save.

www.dailyc

THE HARP
413-548-6900
163 Sunderland Rd.
N. Amherst

The Top Ten Reasons to go to
The Harp

1. No one will pick a fight with you...or your boyfriend.
2. Where red-headed sluts and sugar daddies come together.
3. Giant Deck & Pavilion: at our bar, if you're outside it's cuz' you WANNA be.
4. The best live bands & NEVER a cover charge.
5. Super draft beer selection/great specials.
6. Our kitchen is bitchin' (Open 7 days a week til' midnight!)
7. Trivia Night! Trivia Night! Trivia Night! (Every Tuesday!)
8. Use our FREE Wireless internet: Homework munchies & beer, what could be better? (OCMP accepted)
9. The place to chill, talk, and NEVER wait in line.
10. Visit the hottest staff at the coolest bar.

* By Liz and Becky, disclaimer by Management.

"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
www.theharp.net

Save $$ on Textbooks at the Jeffery Amherst College Store

All These Courses and More at Discounted Prices:

Astronomy	101-2	The Solar System
Astronomy	114	Stars & Galaxies
Biology	101	Introductory to Biology
Biology	102	Intro to Animal Biology
Biology	285	Cell & Molecular Biology
Chemistry	101	General Chemistry
Chemistry	110	General Chemistry
Chemistry	262	Organic Chemistry-non majors
Chemistry	111	General Chemistry I
Chemistry	112	General Chemistry II
Chemistry	261	Organic Chemistry
CMP Science	105	Computer Literacy
ECE	232	Hardware Organization & Design
Economics	104 A-F	Intro to Macroeconomics
Economics	709	Political Economy II
Exer Science	100	Intro to Exercise Science
FOMGT	304	Information for Tech Finance
FOMGT	320	Investments
Geo Sciences	102	The Human Landscape
Geo Sciences	103	Intro Oceanography
HRTA	240	Hotel Operations
Italian	120	Elementary Italian II
Math	113	Math-Elem Teachers I
Math	121	Linear Methods & Probability
MICBIO	310	General Microbiology
Nutrition	130	Nutrition for a healthy lifestyle
Physics	100	Conceptual Physics
Physics	120	Big Bang to Black Hole
Physics	132	Intro to Physics II
POLISCI	111	Comparative Politics
POLISCI	121-B	World Politics
Psychology	305	Educattional Psychology
Psychology	320	Learn & Think
Psychology	380	Abnormal Psychology
Psychology	100 sec 1-3	Intro to Psychology
Psychology	335	Behavioral Neuroendocrinology
Spanish	110	Spanish
Spanish	120	Spanish
Spanish	240	Intermediate Spanish II
Spanish	246	Intensive Intermediate Spanish
Statistics	111	Elementary Statistics
W&FCONSV	261	Wildlife Conservation

Jeffery Amherst College Store
26 South Prospect Street, Amherst 253-3870
(behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in downtown Amherst)

Big weekend for Mass Attack

HOCKEY from page 12

Exactly one minute and thirty-one seconds later, the Eagles once again sliced the lead to one goal. This time it came on senior Chris Collins' 100th collegiate point. Quick initially saved a shot from Boyle, but left the rebound out front. Stephen Gionta tried to shoot the puck in, but the freshman also stoned him. Collins, who was trailing the play on the left side, got the rebound and netted the puck past an out of position Quick, who was still on the left side of the net.

Davis' crucial tripping penalty came at the 17:43 mark and put the Minutemen down a man. When the Eagles gained control of the puck, BC head coach Jerry York pulled Schneider in favor of an extra attacker to put his team at a 6-on-4 advantage.

Despite his youth, Quick didn't bow to the pressure of the moment. With the noise level thundering inside the Mullins Center the rookie made several nice saves to seal the victory and a fine performance in net.

"We had a chance late in the game. With the 6-on-4 you're hoping to get good fortunes to get the game into overtime," York said afterward. "We answered the bell a few times but we couldn't answer it one more time to get it tied up."

Quick turned away 47 of 49 shots on the night, including several that were highlight reel quality.

"I was really confident about Jon tonight," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "He played great and made some fabulous saves."

After skating to a scoreless first, senior captain Stephen Werner got things going for the Maroon and White in the second period. BC turned the puck over in the neutral zone and Werner scooped it up and took off for the Eagles' zone. When he reached the right point, he let go of an uncontested slap shot that beat Schneider and found the net. The goal was reviewed for several minutes to make sure it did in fact cross the goal line and it was determined it did.

Four minutes later, at the 8:12 mark of the second, freshman forward Cory Quirk doubled the UMass advantage with his sixth goal of the season. Fellow freshman Alex Berry chased down a loose puck low in the BC zone and threw it in on Schneider, who left the rebound out front for sophomore P.J. Fenton. Schneider also turned away a Fenton shot, but the third time was the charm for UMass as Quirk stuffed the puck home for the 2-0 advantage.

"It was clearly an exciting hockey game for our club," Cahoon said of his second career victory over the Eagles as a coach. "It was a much-needed game in front of a good crowd and a much-needed game in front of a terrific opponent."

The Minutemen then rode their high horse into Lowell on Saturday night in hopes of turning around their recent misfortunes against the River Hawks. Entering the weekend, UMass hadn't defeated its sister school in the past four meetings.

The Maroon and White put Lowell in an early hole with a 2-0 advantage after the first period of play.

Just 33 seconds into the contest, sophomore defender David Leaderer handed a game misconduct and a five minute major for a hit from behind.

Fenton kicked off the scoring with a power play goal at the 4:52 mark. It was just his second goal of the season and his first in exactly three months when he netted a score against Providence on Nov. 4.

With Grant Farrell in the box for holding, junior Mark Matheson sent the puck across the ice at the blue line, where senior captain Marvin Degon unloaded a rocketing one-timer. Fenton got his stick on the puck to redirect it past UML goalie Peter Vetri. The goal was initially awarded to Degon, but upon further review it was credited to Fenton.

Then with just over two minutes left in the period, Davis netted his eighth career goal to double the UMass advantage. Davis collected a loose puck just outside the blue line and skated up the right side on Vetri. The freshman then ripped an uncontested shot that snuck by Vetri for the score.

The two sides traded goals in the second period when UML cut the lead to one goal and the Minutemen came right back to raise it to two scores again.

River Hawks captain Bobby Robins beat UMass goaltender Gabe Winer with a wrister right out in front, then sophomore Mike Kostka netted the Maroon and White's third goal with a one-timer after UML's Mark Roebothan was given a game misconduct and a five minute major for a hit from behind.

The theme on the weekend for the Minutemen was stellar goaltending. On Saturday Winer stopped 16 shots through the first two periods and 21 overall on the night.

"All along we've felt that we've had good goaltending, and obviously goaltenders get into rhythms and get out of rhythms, and when they're both in rhythm it makes for a much more positive experience for everybody," Cahoon said.

Again, for the second night in a row, the game got interesting in the third period. With just over four minutes to go in the contest Werner netted his second goal of the weekend to put the visitors up by a decisive 4-1 margin. Junior Chris Capraro slatted into the UML zone and dropped the puck off to Werner, who took a wrist shot that deflected off Vetri and into the net.

Two minutes later a big fight broke out in front of the UMass net that involved just about every player who was on the ice for each team.

It all started when Winer took offense to a UML player who, he felt, got a bit too close when he covered up the puck. Winer tackled the UML player, and members from both teams ended up getting into it all over the UMass zone.

Eventually, after about five-to-seven minutes, the referee and linesmen were able to separate the sides and deliberate over whom would be receiving what penalties. After about 10 minutes they handed out 18 penalties that accounted for 116 penalty minutes, eight hitting after the whistle penalties, eight game misconducts and two game disqualifications.

The recipients of the game disqualifications, Winer and Elias Godoy, were not only kicked out of Saturday's game; they are also ineligible to participate in their team's next game. That means that BU can count on facing Jon Quick on Friday night in Boston.

After both sides settled down, Brad King scored a power play goal for the River Hawks and Fenton sealed the win with his second goal of the night on an empty net with a minute remaining in the game.

"To be able to jump somebody in the standings this late in the season, you can't even talk about how important it is," Degon said of the fact that UMass passed the River Hawks in the league standings with their two victories this weekend.

"What a difference a week makes. It's such a fine line between being swept out and being able to pick up some points. These were obviously some very good points for us," Cahoon said. "We'll enjoy this for a day. Then we'll prepare to play a couple of games on the road, and in this league that makes it all the more difficult."

Junior forward Matt Anderson had an assist in the Minutemen's 3-2 win over No. 3 Boston College on Friday night at the Mullins Center.

Quick's play carries Minutemen to upset bid after another great centering pass, blocked a tough wrister from Nathan Gerbe and locked down the cage when Gionta and Brian Boyle were stationed in the crease trying to knock home a loose puck.

QUICK from page 12

"It helps your confidence when you get in there and you see a lot of rubber," Quick said of the action packed first period. "It helps you get focused on the game when you see a lot of shots in the beginning instead of just seeing a couple shots and you get no action for a little bit."

He kept it going in the second period, first shutting the door on Harrold's point-blank opportunity six minutes into the frame and then getting his right leg on Gionta's short-handed breakaway bid about seven minutes after that.

Then, as the intensity picked up in the third period, Quick put the finishing touches on his masterpiece. Chris Davis was whistled for tripping with 2:17 to play in the game, giving the Eagles a power-play opportunity.

With 1:32 remaining, BC coach Jerry York pulled goalie Cory Schneider, so the Eagles had a six-on-four attack for 75 seconds with a chance to send the game into overtime.

It should have been an overwhelming couple of minutes for any goaltender, especially a freshman, but Quick remained calm and kept things in perspective.

"Whatever I had been doing throughout the whole game was working well," Quick said. "I just stuck with my game. I knew that as soon as they got control of the puck with less than two minutes that they were going to pull their goalie. So they pulled him and I was ready for the six-on-four. I knew it was coming. It wasn't a surprise, and I just stuck to my game."

Gionta had the best chance to tie things up when he got the puck at the left point with 27 seconds left. The senior — who scored the game-winning overtime goal in Game 1 of last year's first-round matchup between BC and UMass in the Hockey East playoffs — was denied for one final time.

"I thought Jon Quick was very, very good in goal," York said. "We saw him in the recruiting process, and we thought he was an excellent goaltender. He certainly played that way [Friday] night.

"A hot goalie can be the difference. Certainly, Quick was the No. 1 star of the game, and he played very well."

Despite Quick's recent struggles in game situations, he had been playing well enough in practice to earn enough faith from UMass coach Don Cahoon to get the nod in net.

"I just wanted to see a little bit more of that high level of play out of him before I stuck him into a game," Cahoon said. "Any game was going to be a tough game. This was an especially tough game. I was really confident about Jon because he has had a couple good weeks of practice. I knew his rhythm was back, his timing was back and his focus was back. I was not surprised. I knew he was ready."

And after 47 impressive saves, the UMass faithful felt the same sentiment, counting down the final seconds as if they were in Times Square on New Year's Eve.

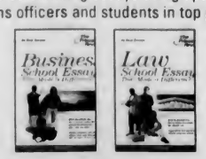
"It's actually kind of funny," Quick said with a laugh. "I heard the crowd counting down, 'Three, two, one.' They were so loud that I didn't even hear the horn go off. When they got to 'One,' I threw my arms in the air, but I didn't hear the horn go off so I got nervous.

"I looked around to make sure the game was over. I didn't know at first, but everything worked out."

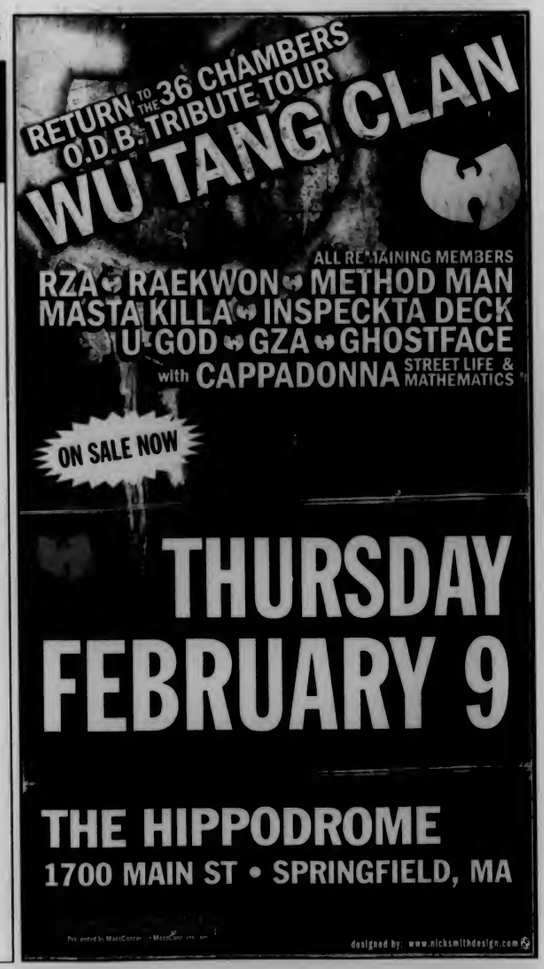
An understatement? Well, yeah.

But Quick made his real statement on the ice — where it mattered more than anything.

FIND YOUR REACH SCHOOL AND MAKE IT A REALITY.



Do your research.
Get the inside scoop from current students and administrators.



Master the tests.
Learn proven test-taking strategies and build on key skills with practice exams.

Stand out.
Write outstanding essays using tips from admissions officers and students in top programs.

Getting in is achievable with the right tools.
Available at bookstores everywhere.
www.PrincetonReview.com
The Princeton Review

Franco the Clarinetting Navy Bean By Rain Stanford

Elsie Hooper By Robert D. Krzykowski

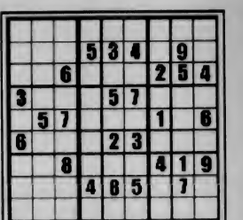
Jack Dogg By Xavier Rhodes

Meanwhile PJ and Stacy step at a next step in the outskirts on their way to their long awaited canoe trip!

The Family Monster By Josh Shalek

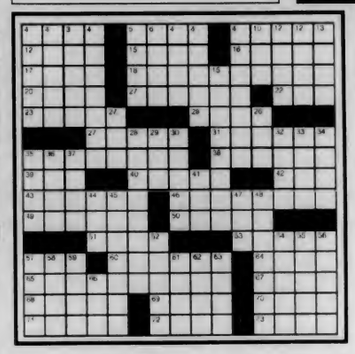
The Zoo By Gabe Strine

Quote of the Day



"True friends stab you in the front."

—Oscar Wilde



ACROSS
1 Flabby
5 Little demons
9 Stitched
14 Louisville's river
15 Winter Below
16 Create text
17 Rather and Quayle
18 Loyalty
20 Trajectories
21 Barking dog
22 Surprised exclamations
23 Respectful Hindu title
25 Statuesque
27 Mother of pearl
31 Repeat again and again
35 Betrayal
38 More nervous
39 Dander
40 ... time's a charm
42 Slot-filler
43 Easter event
46 Poetic pairs
48 Noisy rapper
50 Hide house
51 Follow closely
53 Re-mark prices
57 Make things happen
60 Find secondary connections
64 Radio enthusiast
65 Spicy topping
67 Bar mitzvah dance
68 Spooky
69 Tie tie
70 Author Bagnold
71 Process parts
72 Desires
73 Expels

DOWN
1 Fountain buys
2 "Lovey Childs" author
3 Grapbeak, e.g.
4 Step in salad preparation
5 Brit's indignant comment
6 Manly
7 Influence
8 Enjoyed a siesta
9 Formed eddies
10 Time worth noting
11 Booze
12 Impress clearly
13 Poor grades
19 Ravin' to go
24 Drinks counter
26 Part of a tour
28 Cliques
29 Collegiate cheer
30 Decree
32 Quote, as an example
33 Miami team
34 Crystal balls, e.g.
35 Taylor and Torn
36 Neighbor of Iraq
37 Fiddling emperor
41 Canapé spread
44 Expertise
45 So-and-sos
46 Affectionately
47 Peril of myth
48 Bloodsuckers
52 Line an unsound boat
54 Rib-eye alternative
55 Condor's digs
56 Students with dogs
57 Poker bullets
58 Guitarist Atkins
59 Make weary
61 Sand ridge
62 PC image
63 Hanno holidays
66 Kind of service

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

Sudoku brought to you by andiamo
256 • FOOD
www.andiamo.cc

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Cornrows are so not a good look for you.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't drink any caffeinated beverages today.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
That shade of pink really brings out your eyes.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
This will be the year you will join the Mile High club.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Maybe you should lay off the pizza for a few days.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
That is definitely not water in that mug over there.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You should probably go buy books at some point.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You have more socks then you will ever be able to wear.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Don't worry about that toe. If it doesn't heal you can just cut it off.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You can go ahead and take that name tag off now.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You need to layer at least three polo shirts today.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Those new sneakers won't stay white for long.

Chicago Pizzaria
Yes, we Deliver!
Don't be afraid to share the largest calzone
Large Pizza with two toppings
FREE 2 lt. Coke

Hours
Sun-Wed 3pm-2am
Thurs-Sat 3pm-3am
To order Delivery or Pick-Up Contact
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing St. Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, Ma. 01002

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Can you lead? Prove it with Army ROTC FREE MONEY for school Because we can! www.umass.edu/armyrotc

Apartment for Rent

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherst-lincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Childcare

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part-time Spring – full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email: fjmooney@msn.com

Employment

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 800-766-7174

Rent us your Ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Employment

Spring & Summer Help Needed: Excellent Earning Potential working outdoors providing exterior carpenter ant treatments to residential customers. Reliable vehicle required (mileage compensation paid). Must be 18 years or older and certified with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by passing the Core Applicator Exam (information, all necessary study materials and payment of exam fees will by provided for qualified individuals). Apply in Person. No Phone Calls Please. Minuteman Pest Control 90 Conz Street, Northampton, MA 01060 (across from Hampshire Gazette Building)

Employment

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288 / email: fjmooney@msn.com

Summer Jobs Apply to be a raft guide this summer at Zoar Outdoor. Applicants should be great with people and possess a can-do attitude. Outdoor recreation experience a plus. Training on weekends in March. Application deadline: Feb. 7th, call 413-339-4010 or see www.zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE

Furniture

Full Platform Bed 413-695-2957

Instruction

Pioneer Valley Boxing School. Go to www.westernmassboxing.com

Miscellaneous

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.ATHENASHN.com/Goddess/910

Room for Rent

Great Sunrise/sunset bedroom available 'til May. Overlooking UMass Agricultural Center / Stadium. Walk to campus. Renovated 3 bedroom apt. $300/month (413) 665-7313

Travel

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1988 Hottest Destinations – Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $159 www.sunsplashtours.com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen rock the Mullins

Hockey starts weekend with huge upset of No. 3 Boston College

BY JON PELLANI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Coming down the stretch run in the Hockey East schedule, every game is becoming increasingly more important for the Massachusetts hockey team (11-15-0, 8-11-0 HEA), and the Minutemen showed this weekend that they are up to the task of hanging with the leaders of the conference.

For the first time in the past 11 contests, the Minutemen were able to gain a victory over No. 3 Boston College (17-6-2, 15-4-1 HEA) with a 3-2 win Friday night at the Mullins Center in front of 7,132 fans — the largest crowd this season and the second largest all-time at the Mullins Center for a hockey game. The Maroon and White then kept its good fortunes going with a 5-2 win over the River Hawks of UMass-Lowell (10-16-1, 7-12-1 HEA) Saturday night at the Tsongas Arena.

This weekend the Minutemen will hit the road for both games as they take on one of the hottest teams in the nation Friday night at Agganis Arena against Boston University (15-8-2, 13-6-1 HEA), then travel to Providence, R.I. Saturday to take on Providence College (14-10-2, 11-6-2 HEA). Both games are slated to start at 7 p.m.

With the four league points the Minutemen gained this weekend they leapfrogged the River Hawks in the standings to move up to seventh place and put some cushion between themselves and the final spot in the conference tournament.

On Friday night the action started to really heat up in the third period when both teams traded goals and a critical Chris Davis penalty set the stage for a dramatic final two minutes of play.

The Mass Attack was already ahead 2-0 entering the period, but BC forward Brian Boyle cut the lead in half with his power play goal at the 7:51 mark. With UMass junior Kevin Jarman in the box for hooking, Peter Harrold centered the puck from the right point to Boyle. He then deflected the puck high past freshman Jon Quick to make it a 2-1 game.

No more than two minutes later senior Jamie Solon got the Minutemen's lead back up to two scores with his career-best sixth goal of the season. The play began when junior captain Matt Anderson centered the puck from the low right boards. The puck found Solon, who was camped out at the right post, and he sent a beautiful one-timer past netminder Cory Schneider.

"[It was an] unbelievable pass," Solon said of the Anderson dish. "I just found a seam and we actually made eye contact when he was going for the puck. He made eye contact with me and I knew just where to go."

See HOCKEY on page 10

KAREN WINCHESTER/COLLEGIAN

Clockwise from top left: Jon Quick, Jamie Solon, Stephen Werner and Cory Quirk played key roles in the Minutemen's 3-2 upset win over No. 3 Boston College Friday night at the Mullins Center.

Quick saves the day between the pipes

BY JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Jon Quick looked immortal on Friday night.

He hadn't seen the ice since Jan. 13, when the Massachusetts hockey team was brushed aside, 6-2, by UMass Lowell, and he hadn't been a winner since Nov. 22 at Vermont.

But there he was, sitting center stage in front of the second largest crowd the Mullins Center had ever seen for a hockey game and playing against a group of players who were one week removed from being the top-ranked team in the country.

And while all 7,132 of those fans were on their feet and screaming, the Eagles were busy mounting a furious, last-minute, six-on-four attack in the UMass zone, doing anything they could to break through the freshman netminder who proved to be impenetrable.

Boston College has had its nights against UMass in the past few years — in virtually every sport, especially hockey.

But not this night; not on Feb. 3, 2006.

For once, this was a night that belonged to the Minutemen, and it definitely belonged to Jon Quick.

He made 47 saves in the 3-2 victory: 20 in the first period, eight in the second and 19 in the third. Not many of those were cupcakes, either.

About eight minutes into the game, Stephen Gionta was leading a two-on-one into the UMass zone with Chris Collins. Gionta made the centering pass to Collins, the national leader in goals and points per game, and Quick appeared to be caught out of position.

Didn't matter.

Quick made a sprawling save to his right to keep Collins' shot out of the net, and the game remained scoreless.

"He stayed up and went down at the right times," Collins said. "Sometimes, we tried to shoot five-hole, and he would drop and catch it right in his stomach. He played real well. We just couldn't find any openings in him."

Just 90 seconds later, BC defenseman Peter Harrold had a good look from the right point, and he let go of a laser of a wrist shot at Quick's five-hole, which was denied.

Quick continued to make big save after big save in the first period. He stopped Tim Kunes'

See QUICK on page 10

Home sweet home

BY DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a disastrous thee-game road trip, during which the Massachusetts men's basketball team failed to win a game, it appeared that the Minutemen's season was headed down the drain.

Turns out all the Minutemen needed was some home cooking, as they returned to the Mullins Center on Saturday night and beat Rhode Island 63-61 in front of 6,902 fans. Spurred on by the energetic crowd with a packed student section, the Minutemen played inspired basketball while improving their record to 8-0 at home this year.

The role the crowd played in the win did not go unnoticed by UMass coach Travis Ford or his players, as Ford addressed the fans as they were leaving, thanking them for their support. The players showed their appreciation more directly, as Rashaun Freeman led his teammates into the student section where they were mobbed by fans.

While Freeman clearly recognized the fans' contributions to the win, it was his performance that had the greatest effect on the outcome. The junior forward scored 21 points and pulled down a season-high 15 rebounds. Freeman was especially active on the offensive glass, as he pulled down eight of UMass' 16 offensive boards.

"The first time [Freeman] touched the basketball, I turned to my assistant Steve Middleton and said, 'He's ready to play.' He had a different look in his eye," Ford said. "I was excited to see the energy and focus that he played with."

The Minutemen (10-9, 5-4 Atlantic 10) will look to extend their home winning streak to 13 on Wednesday at 7 p.m. when La Salle comes to Amherst.

It seemed on Saturday night that some of the energy from the previous night's hockey game, which saw UMass knock off No. 3 Boston College, was still in the Mullins Center, as the Maroon and White came out with an intensity that had been lacking in recent games.

UMass won the opening tap, and James Life immediately launched a 3-pointer. While Life missed the shot, it was clear that the Maroon and White were going to be aggressive.

Life didn't have his best shooting night (6-of-16 from the field), but the passionate junior guard came through with numerous big shots and finished with 19 points and six rebounds.

No shot was bigger than the leaner Life hit with 53 seconds left to give UMass a 63-59 lead. Life drew a foul on the play but didn't convert the free throw. UMass struggled all night from the charity stripe, making just 20 of 35 attempts.

After Life's clutch hoop, URI's Dawan Robinson, who led the Rams with 15 points, drew a foul and knocked down both freebies to close the gap to two. With 40 seconds left, URI coach Jim Baron decided not to foul, and the decision paid off, as UMass was slow to get into an offensive set and committed a shot clock violation.

With 5:4 seconds remaining, Robinson drove the length of the floor, but his jumper from the foul line rimmed out, and UMass was able to escape with the much needed victory.

Saturday's game was reminiscent of the meeting between the teams in Rhode Island two weeks ago, which the Rams won 58-55 on Robinson's last-second 3-pointer.

Both games were physical battles between evenly matched teams. Saturday's game was especially physical, as the teams combined for 49 fouls and one very hard intentional foul.

With 6:31 remaining in the first half, Stephane Lasme stole a pass at the top of the key and raced the other way for a seemingly easy dunk. But URI's Darrell Harris drilled Lasme with a cheap shot from behind as Lasme took off for the dunk.

Lasme left the game after injuring his knee on the play, but returned two minutes later to a loud ovation from the crowd. Lasme

See BASKETBALL on page 9

KAREN WINCHESTER/COLLEGIAN

Junior center Rashaun Freeman was dominant in the Minutemen's 63-61 win over URI on Saturday. Freeman had 21 points and 15 rebounds.

UMass gets much needed win

The Minutemen needed this one.

For those of you who didn't catch the UMass/Temple game on CN8 last week, it was ugly — one of those game tapes that you just throw away.

But Travis Ford and company had a chance to rebound on Saturday night.

The Jan. 25 meeting with Rhode Island ended bitterly for the Minutemen, who fought back from a 53-45 deficit with just over a minute to go only to see URI's Dawan Robinson bury them with a 3-pointer in the waning seconds.

Rob Greenfield

On Saturday, the Rams came to Amherst. The student section was full — a rarity these days — and at times (like when Rams forward Darrell Harris threw a cheap shot at Stephane Lasme on a breakaway, drawing an intentional foul call) the hollow Mullins Center came alive.

Rashaun Freeman played with fiery purpose: he drew an and-one early in the game on a layup from the left side, pounding his chest as he hit the floor, getting the Minutemen, and the eager crowd, energized.

James Life, indignant after the foul against Lasme, played spirited and determined basketball for the majority of the game.

The intensity was fun to watch. There was a sense of meaning to this game and everyone in the building knew it.

"We got one to bounce our way," Ford said after the game. "It was obviously a hard-fought game. We had some guys step up."

A game like this — the sequel to the ignominy against Temple — is the ultimate test of perseverance. It displays the ability, or lack thereof, to mentally recover after a psychologically demoralizing game.

And the loss against the Owls was as demoralizing as they come. The Minutemen were flat, turned the ball over with stunning regularity and didn't start putting up a fight until, as Ford put it, the game was over. It was crucial for the team to leave the disappointment and humiliation in Philadelphia.

"[URI] was a must-win game for us," Ford said. "We needed to win psychologically. I had a lot of question marks about our team in the last couple of games. I was anxious to get on the court to see where we're at. Psychologically and mentally it was a good game for us to get going."

Psychologically, mentally — these are important words for the Minutemen right now. Ford doesn't seem to know which team will show up, the one that got smashed by Temple or the one that battled and grinded Rhode Island into a loss.

"We've just been struggling," Ford said. "They got a little bit of the monkey off their shoulders just because we've struggled. Getting a win was very

See GREENFIELD on page 9

Mixed results for UM ski teams

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After sweeping the slalom portion of the Brown Carnival last week, the Massachusetts ski teams finished the giant slalom event Saturday with mixed results.

The women won their third straight event Saturday, sweeping the Brown Carnival. Sophomore Eliza Hawkins had another outstanding performance for the women, placing first overall. In fact, she was so far ahead of the field that her time would have placed eighth in the men's division, although men generally have much faster times than women. Seniors Caitlin Doughty and Shaleighne Collins also had strong performances, and helped push the Minutewomen into first.

The men's team, however, struggled Saturday, finishing fifth overall. The Minutemen's top two skiers, junior Rush Hawkins and sophomore Jason Small, both fell during their runs and did not finish, leaving UMass well behind in the standings.

"All we had to do was finish, and none of us finished," Hawkins said.

"You make a lot of mistakes in these types of races. I guess it was just our turn to make them [Saturday]," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said. "Other teams have made mistakes in that past that we capitalized on; today it was the other way around."

Hawkins had a particularly disastrous fall on the slopes Saturday, breaking both of his skis and boots on the way down. It was the first giant slalom event in more than two years in which Hawkins did not finish either first or second.

"He fell hard," Rouleau said. "You'd have to be going at least 50 miles per hour to break your skis like that."

There were a few bright spots for the team, however. Senior Pat Bachant had his best finish this season, placing fifth overall. This event was unique — instead of scoring the best five of eight men for each team, the best three of five were scored, with two squads for each team.

Freshman Alex Zahoruiko led the men's second team, which was the fastest "B" team for any school. He was followed by Paul Lewenberg and James Green.

"Paul, Alex and Jimmy really saved the team today," Hawkins said.

Zahoruiko's recent success has not gone unnoticed by Rouleau.

"[Alex] has become our new go-to guy for the fifth slot. He's found himself a new role. You usually don't see a freshman rise to that level," he said.

Updated ECSC points standings were not available. However, Rouleau said Saturday that it is likely the women will either climb to a tie for first place with Boston College or remain one point out, while the men have likely slipped from third to fourth place in the standings.

This weekend the Maroon and White will travel to Ascutney for the Boston College Carnival. The teams will compete in the slalom on Saturday, followed by the giant slalom on Sunday.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY · EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2006 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 72

Long lines slow students at Textbook Annex

Keeping with tradition, hundreds of students endured long lines at the Textbook Annex yesterday on the University of Massachusetts campus.

The drawn out wait has become somewhat of a rite of passage for students, who rush to the University's only textbook store during the first week of the semester.

At 2:30 p.m. on Monday, a line stretched from the cash registers down the aisles and nearly to the back of the warehouse. Despite the lines, the Annex had a number of cash registers open — nearly 20 in all — to service students and, hopefully, reduce customer wait-time.

Alicia Atkinson, a sophomore, thanks her iPod for keeping her mind off the wait.

"I had my iPod to keep me company," Atkinson said. "[The line] was pretty much all the way to the back of the store."

Like Atkinson, senior Yin Chen waited in line for about 15 minutes on Monday afternoon.

"Everything is okay, except the line," Chen said. "Since I was a freshman, the line has always been long, so I got used to it."

Even though some of the books he needed weren't in stock, freshman John Maynard says "standing in line isn't so bad."

"The lines were circling around," Maynard said. "[But] I was able to get to returns in five minutes, and get out in two."

Students wait in long lines at the Textbook Annex yesterday. The Annex was forced to put extra cashiers on registers to handle the rush of students buying textbooks.

The story hasn't been much different at other textbook stores around Amherst. Lines could be seen stretching to the back of Food for Thought Books on North Pleasant Street on Thursday and Friday.

By 5:45 p.m. yesterday, business had dropped off at the Annex with only a few dozen customers remaining.

With the first week of the semester completed, textbook retailers expect business to slow down dramatically.

"Next week, this place will be dead," said a cashier at the Annex.

Dan O'Brien

Professor discusses situation in Israel

BY CALEB LYONS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The current situation in Israel looks uncertain for all parties involved, with changes of power and unforeseeable mishaps occurring all within a very short period of time. The situation has one University of Massachusetts professor making use of his own background on the issues at hand to hypothesize what's happening in what's widely regarded as "the Holy Land."

David Mednicoff, an assistant professor in UMass' Center for Public Policy and Legal Studies department, says that while he is hesitant to mention his own personal views regarding the current Israeli and Palestinian situation, he has professional opinions about the issue as a specialist in both Middle-Eastern politics and law.

Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, had a massive stroke last month, which left his vice minister, Ehud Olmert, as the acting prime minister. This unexpected incident subsequently left a hole in the peace process that Sharon was attempting to forge with the Palestinian government and created uncertainty.

Additionally, on Jan. 25, the newly formed Palestinian state, which resides in the recently abandoned Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank, had its first democratic election. The result of the U.S.-sponsored event ended in controversy when Hamas — a group recognized as terrorists by Israel, the United States, Australia, Canada and the European Union — defeated the Fatah party.

Hamas is a Muslim-fundamentalist organization that has taken responsibility for the vast majority of Israel's suicide bombings, all in their stated quest to restore the country to their ownership and to destroy the current Israeli government.

"We're seeing an important generation shift [in leadership]," Mednicoff said regarding the change in both governments. "This is a change from leaders who primarily come from a military background to a generation of younger leaders who ... have potentially different attitudes.

"Hamas' victory is at least as much about domestic Palestinian issues as it is about Palestinians' attitude towards Israel," Mednicoff said. The previous leader of Palestinians, the Fatah party, was infamous for its corruption and misappropriation of funds. For example, under the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) leader Yasar Arafat, funds that were to go towards schools and hospitals were used by Arafat to purchase new cars

See ISRAEL on page 2

Springfield clinic works to cure HIV/AIDS

BY EVA PICCOZZI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SPRINGFIELD — Dr. Claudia Martorell has 450 patients waiting for her to discover the cure for AIDS. It is a feat that not every 33-year-old woman has the opportunity or competence to attempt, but it is one that Martorell believes is possible.

Tucked away along a hallway of identical offices, the Community Research Initiative (CRI) is conducting exclusive trial-and-error studies on patients infected with HIV/AIDS.

In 2005, the HIV pandemic affected over three million people, which means there are now 40 million people living with HIV/AIDS. The Human Immunodeficiency Virus, which was first recognized in 1981, has become one of the biggest social, economic, and health challenge in the world. The disease claims 8,000 lives every day and five people die every minute worldwide. According to Harvard Pilgrim Health Care, the number of people living with HIV/AIDS increases each year in Massachusetts. There are currently an estimated 22,000 to 24,000 individuals living with HIV/AIDS in the Commonwealth.

For the past 16 years, the CRI has participated in some of the most promising HIV medication research being conducted in the world. CRI serves as the only independent, non-profit, community-based organization in New England solely dedicated to HIV clinical research, treatment, education and financial assistance for approved drug treatments and health insurance coverage. With records indicating that the Springfield community has the highest rate of infection in the Commonwealth, the location of the CRI aims to provide the latest critical treatment information to all people living with AIDS, including women, racial minorities and others who have been traditionally underserved.

Martorell, a board-certified Infectious Disease physician, with a master's degree in Public Health and a fellowship in Minority Health Policy from Harvard University, was recently announced as the new associate director of research for CRI in Western Massachusetts. She will be taking the leadership role left by the late Dr. Anne Morris, who dedicated her life to improving health care disparities. Morris was one of the first physicians to recognize HIV in the 1970s and continued her practice by reaching out to the Hispanic community affected by the disease, providing counseling and treatment.

According to Martorell, the Community Research Initiative receives sponsorship from pharmaceutical companies that need cutting-edge medication for HIV/AIDS to be tested before approval for large scale distribution. Martorell says she has 100 study trial patients at this point who have voluntarily enrolled with CRI. Some, referred by their doctors, have not responded to previous forms of medication and are left with no options. After consenting to become a study trial patient, an individualized assessment is tracked.

"If we have a patient who is suffering from neuropathy, extreme pain caused by side effects from their previous HIV medication, we will offer them one of our trials to see if it helps," said Martorell. The study coordinator then makes detailed observations of the individual's reaction to the drug. From there, cases are compiled with studies nationwide to prove which drugs are fully or partially working and what factors depend upon a person's acceptance or resistance to the medication.

"Many of the medications for HIV available and many that will soon

See CLINIC on page 2

Assistant Professor David Mednicoff, shown above in Marrakech, Morocco, recently discussed the conflict of Israel and Palestine.

Telling note was left by gay bar shooting suspect

BY RAY HENRY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW BEDFORD — The teenager suspected of attacking three men at a gay bar and killing an Arkansas police officer and a female companion left a note indicating he planned "something violent," authorities said Monday.

Jacob D. Robida, 18, was fatally wounded when he opened fire on officers at a roadblock following a high-speed chase through the Arkansas hills Saturday. He was shot twice in the head and died at a hospital the following day.

In New Bedford, where police say Robida attacked patrons at Puzzles Lounge with a hatchet early Thursday and then opened fire with a handgun, detectives found what they considered a troubling message in Robida's room, Bristol County District Attorney Paul Walsh Jr. said Monday.

"We didn't interpret it necessarily as a suicide note, but it was certainly the note of a desperate man who had some plans to continue doing something violent," Walsh said.

The content of the note was not released.

Robida's mother told police her son had come home after the attack around 1 a.m. with his head bleeding. Police found a sock and paper towels with brownish-red substances on it. It was unclear whether he left the note before or after the attack.

In addition to the message, police found an apparently homemade poster with a Nazi swastika and anti-Semitic writings, as well as a makeshift coffin, Walsh said. He said the significance of the coffin isn't known.

A police report released Monday said investigators also found weapons, including 85 rounds of ammunition, a Samurai sword, one knife and two knife sheaths in Robida's room. A knife without a sheath was found

See ROBIDA on page 2

Bush's budget plans bring Capitol controversy

BY ANDREW TAYLOR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — As soon as President Bush's budget plan for next year arrived on Capitol Hill, lawmakers pounced on it.

"Scandalous," cried one, who said he's already a "nay" vote because of cuts to education and health. "I am disappointed and even surprised," squealed another, recoiling from proposed cuts in Medicare and Medicaid.

And those were just the Republicans — Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Olympia Snowe of Maine.

Bush's remarkably austere budget plan is indeed filled with political land mines and flush with difficult choices.

The document unveiled Monday clamps down on domestic programs favored by lawmakers and calls for politically perilous curbs to farm subsidies and Medicare that promise to bog down in a Congress already poisoned by election-year politics.

"It's a heavy lift," admitted Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H. "There's no question it's going to be a challenge."

Despite the sacrifices called for in education, Amtrak, community development and local law enforcement grants, health research, and many other programs frozen or cut under his plan, Bush's $2.77 trillion blueprint forecasts a record $423 billion deficit for the current year and improves upon that figure in 2007 largely by lowballing cost estimates for the war in Iraq.

Bush gives a generous 6.9 percent budget increase to the Pentagon — which would receive a record $439 billion before accounting for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and wants Congress to pass a $3 billion or 14 percent increase in foreign aid.

His proposal projects $70 billion in new funds to execute the war in Iraq through the end of September, which will come in a detailed request later this month and bring total war funding for 2006 to $120 billion. Another $80 billion is allocated for next year.

"My administration has focused the nation's resources on our highest priority — protecting our citizens and our homeland," Bush said in his budget message.

The White House also said that it will request another $18 billion or so in hurricane relief in the next few days.

At the same time, Bush proposes to kill or dramatically slash 141 programs for savings of almost $15 billion. Congress is likely to reject many of the cuts, such as a proposal to kill the Commodity Supplemental Food Program which provides food aid to the very poor.

Major initiatives like making Bush's landmark tax cuts permanent and providing $52 billion in health care tax breaks through 2011 face challenges of their own. Every year, Bush has called for making his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts permanent. Congress has yet to do so.

Most of Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010. Extending them would cost $120 billion in 2011 and $1.2 trillion from 2012-2016.

The White House credits Bush's tax cuts for fueling economic growth and surging tax revenues despite high fuel prices, last year's devastating hurricanes and the recession and terrorist attacks of 2001.

"Those tax cuts are essential toward sustaining the good economic growth we have now," said White House Budget Director Joshua Bolten. "The most important thing we can do with our federal budget is keep a good, strong, growing economy that's generating jobs."

The budget plan projects deficits on a downward trajectory, especially when measured against the size of the economy and meets, at least on paper, Bush's 2004 promise to cut the deficit in half. Then, Bush projected a $521 billion deficit for that year and promised to cut this

See BUDGET on page 2

President Bush, shown above reading over paperwork in the Oval Office, recently released his budget plan to Congress, garnering immediate controversy from both Democrats and Republicans.

ARTS & LIVING
STATE RADIO IN NOHO
State Radio comes to Pearl Street to release a new album.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
BIAS QUESTIONED
Collegian accused of compromising its journalistic integrity.
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Sunny, 11/36°
TONIGHT Clear, 1/15°
TOMORROW Partly Sunny, 11/33°, L/13°

SPORTS
UMASS KEEPS ROLLING
The Minutemen stayed on the winning track Sunday against St. Joe's.
PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Eric Athas
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Katie Huston
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Ian Jones
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Kristen LaCasse
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Coots
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Morgan-Ann Rousseau
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Alex Butler
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Carsiti
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT SPORTS Rob Greenfield
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Tucker Merrick

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALMA LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCIENCE IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1904 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN OWNED BY ITS STAFF SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Julie Teece
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Tiffany Van Langen, Jesse Sussman

Due to drug research, HIV no longer a 'death sentence'

CLINIC from page 1

be approved in the future were studied right here," said Martorell. "In the 1980s, HIV was considered a death sentence, but now, because of this type of drug research, HIV is a disease that can be treated and controlled," said Martorell.

Martorell says that her background in public health minority policy helps her to work with the patients in Springfield. One issue that requires attention is educating discordant couples, in which one partner has HIV and the other does not.

Martorell is passionate about informing low-income community members living with HIV/AIDS about the availability of these trial drugs. "There is this perception that it is difficult to enroll minorities in research. I disagree with that; I feel that it is an access issue," said Martorell.

One of the barriers that concerns Martorell about why the low-income HIV/AIDS population is not getting treatment is because of lack of transportation. "Patients can't get here on time for their appointments. They reschedule a lot or cancel appointments," she said.

Martorell praises the success of the late Dr. Anne Morris, who was highly successful enrolling minorities into counseling and treatment programs. "She was very involved. She listened and understood and didn't judge the patients, and that is so important when you care for people from different cultures," she said.

As a Puerto Rican woman, Martorell described the stigma related to HIV/AIDS in the Puerto Rican culture. "As doctors, you have to be sensitive, you can't just see your patients in your office for five minutes," said Martorell. Privacy and trust are issues that she points to as reasons why Hispanics might be less inclined to seek counsel. She described how the Hispanic community remains in the dark about services such as Community Research Initiative or other smaller community-based organizations because of the language barrier. "When a Spanish-speaking patient has a non-Spanish-speaking provider, a lot gets lost, and with a translator, there is a confidentiality issue," she said.

Since Martorell's initiation as associate director for research, she has started going to the different community-based centers, arranging to meet with case managers to increase awareness of the availability of Trial Studies at the Community Research Initiative. "A large percentage of the population doesn't know about the existence of our program. We need to publicize more for the Spanish-speaking population," said Martorell.

COURTESY CRINE.ORG

Dr. Claudia Martorell works to find a cure for HIV and AIDS at the Community Research Initiative in Springfield.

President's budget predicts trillion dollar deficit

BUDGET from page 1

KRT

President Bush talks with Senator Arlen Specter (R-Penn), shown on the right. Specter called Bush's budget plan "scandalous."

half by 2009.

Bush projects a 2009 deficit of $208 billion, but that depends on Congress accepting all of his spending cut proposals. His budget also leaves out the long-term costs of occupying Iraq and Afghanistan, which are impossible to predict with certainty.

With the increases for the Pentagon, this year's Iraq and Afghanistan war costs, and new tax cuts for health care, the budget shows that deficits over the five years ending in 2011 would total nearly $1.2 trillion.

Democrats charged that the real picture is worse and that Bush was understating future deficits by leaving out major items such as the long-term costs of the Iraq war and permanently fixing the alternative minimum so it doesn't hit more middle-class families.

"It explodes deficits, but then conceals them by providing only five years of numbers and leaving out large costs," said Sen. Kent Conrad of North Dakota, senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee. "The result will be more debt passed on to our children."

For mandatory programs providing fixed benefits such as Medicare, farm subsidies and Medicaid and whose spending rises each year as if on autopilot, Bush is proposing $65 billion in savings over the next five years, much of it from the rapidly growing Medicare program for the elderly.

The proposal would reduce spending on Medicare over the next five years by $36 billion, or less than 2 percent. Most of the reductions would come from smaller inflation adjustments for hospitals, nursing homes, home health care providers and hospices. More higher-income seniors would see increased premiums.

Bush's Medicare plan largely follows the recommendations of a bipartisan Medicare advisory panel, but the cuts nonetheless generated howls of outrage from Democrats and industry groups.

"Hospitals already are stretching scarce resources to respond to the daily challenges of providing care to all who come through our doors," said Dick Davidson, president of the American Hospital Association. "Cuts to these resources will have a negative impact on the availability of care for the patients and communities we serve."

Congress already rejected many of Bush's budget cut proposals when it sent him a $39 billion deficit cut package last week, but they showed up again in his 2007 blueprint. For example, Bush again asked for a 5 percent cut in crop payments to farmers and tighter eligibility for food stamps.

The president may find more success in tamping down domestic agency operating budgets that take up about one-sixth of the federal pie. Last year, Bush successfully forced Congress to narrowly cut such spending and his 2007 plan proposes a more than 1 percent cut in domestic agency operating budgets.

Those cuts are magnified since the budget proposes $3 billion in new fees next year to finance new spending elsewhere. Once again, better-off veterans are again being asked to make higher co-payments for prescription drugs and pay a new $250 annual enrollment fee for their medical care. Congress has rejected both three years in a row.

A new proposal to raise fees on some better-off military retirees enrolled in the Pentagon's Tricare program isn't likely to fare much better. Also back is a proposed new $5 fee on each way of air travel to pay $1.6 billion of the cost for airport screenings. That, too, was rejected by Congress last year.

Professor says Palestinians are ready for 'a new generation' for himself, his family and his associates.

ISRAEL from page 1

"[The Palestinians] are sort of fed up with their previous generation," Mednicoff said. "It's not Fatah as an organization, it's that the people who have been in Fatah that represent a generation with a different socialization from many contemporary Palestinians. ... There has been a sense [in the Middle East] that it was time for a new generation to come into power, and this recent election represents that."

Mednicoff also acknowledged the new theory that, in taking a democratic office, Hamas will have to moderate their views in order to cater to the people.

"The theory of many comparative political scientists like me is that when radical groups who have been out of the political process are voted into politics, they do have to moderate their views.

"In general I think that it's likely [that they will moderate]; however we haven't seen how this works in practice a lot because usually outside powers haven't allowed radical powers to come to office in Arab elections," Mednicoff explained. "So we haven't seen this type of event enough to be sure that will be what will happen."

The state of Israel is now facing a split in its upcoming primary election between the conservative Likkud party, currently led by President Binyamin Netanyahu, and Kadima, the off-shoot of Likkud created by Sharon as a middle ground between it and the liberal Labour party. In the recent weeks, Olmert has carried on Sharon's Kadima agenda, but the people remain split largely.

"Kadima is likely to prevail," Mednicoff said about this situation. "[but] should something happen after Hamas' victory — a strong attack or a sense that [Hamas] really represents a threat — there could be a shift towards the Likkud. All three Israeli parties have candidates who represent a new generation in Israeli politics."

Mednicoff said that, with most Americans not being directly involved in the conflict in Israel, it's difficult for them to see the big picture.

"For outsiders looking at this stuff it's easy to say that Hamas' victory is all about what Palestinians think about Israel ... but the truth there is similar to the truth here where elections tend to more about local leaders and what's happening domestically."

Mednicoff went on to explain that in politics, seemingly different countries share concerns.

"People could say [when they look at our elections] that the result of the election in 2004 was a clear vote on American foreign policy on Iraq, when that's not true. It's the same thing with Palestinians and Israelis."

Police continue investigation of Massachusetts gay bar shooting outside of Puzzles.

ROBIDA from page 1

They also found two bumper stickers in Robida's room, which read: "I dress this way to scare your kids" and "My day is not complete until I've terrified a complete stranger," the report said.

Police were trying to determine whether Robida had any accomplices in New Bedford or elsewhere, though evidence suggests he acted alone, Walsh said.

After the New Bedford attack, which police labeled a hate crime, Robida surfaced Saturday in Arkansas, where he killed Gassville police officer Jim Sell at a traffic stop, setting off a 20-mile chase that ended in a gun battle when Robida allegedly shot and killed his passenger, 33-year-old Jennifer Rena Bailey.

Robida lived in West Virginia with Bailey, a mother of three boys, from sometime in 2004 to February 2005, West Virginia State Police Sgt. C.J. Ellyson said Monday.

Three of Robida's friends from a home page the teen created on the Web site MySpace.com told The Associated Press that Bailey was Robida's ex-girlfriend. Police said they were checking e-mails and Internet correspondence between the two and had seized Bailey's computer.

"We're trying to trace down their steps and find out when they hooked up, if she invited him over willingly or if she was abducted. We're trying to answer the unanswered questions," Ellyson said.

"Her mother was aware of the relationship between them. The mother was under the impression the daughter had ended the relationship," he said.

Autopsies of Robida, Bailey and Sell were expected to be completed Monday and the results would be given to investigators, J.R. Howard, director of the Arkansas State Crime Lab, said.

Walsh said he has sent four investigators to assist authorities in Arkansas and two more to West Virginia to assist in the investigation.

Police in Massachusetts are also trying to determine where Robida got his handgun, a Ruger firearm. In Massachusetts, handgun owners must be at least 21 years old.

Walsh said he feared Robida's arrest could have been even bloodier, particularly if he had been confronted in a public place. New Bedford authorities had issued public warnings that they considered Robida armed, dangerous and possible suicidal.

"I really thought he was going to take five or six people with him," Walsh said. "My fear was that he'd shoot up the works."

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF TOUR GUIDES

1. Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2. Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3. Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.
4. Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse from February 6th - 10th, 2006. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 10th, 2006

www.dailycollegian.com

Amherst police log

Police investigate cases of stolen laptop computers

Friday February 3

Police were called in to assist the University of Massachusetts Police at Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity house, 57 Olympia Drive, at 10:19 p.m., where it was reported that a female had overdosed on drugs. The woman in question was found at the scene, conscious and breathing. Questioning revealed that she had smoked marijuana 20 minutes prior to the call and had an adverse reaction.

Saturday February 4

Police were called back to Sigma Phi Epsilon, 57 Olympia Drive, at 3:15 a.m. after receiving a report of larceny. A huskily-built, 5-foot-10-inch while male reportedly stole a laptop from the house. When police responded, the laptop was found in the back of the house. The police believe that the suspects fled the scene in a red or orange VW bug.

Police were called to 18 Lilac Lane at 12:50 p.m. in response to a vandalism report. Michelle Crowe, 50, of 326 West Pomeroy Ln., Amherst, was then charged with destruction of less than $250 of property to her ex-husband's house door the previous night.

Sunday February 5

Police responded to a report of a breaking and entering of a motor vehicle at 3:15 p.m. The owner, a resident of 187 Pelham Road, reported that parts of his 1993 Honda AEX, including the windows, were broken. The owner also reported that his laptop, which was in the car at the time of the break-in, was stolen. The responding officer found that the car was unlocked.

Police were called to Langley Realty Trust, 175 Chestnut Street, at 11:49 a.m. to a report of breaking and entering of a motor vehicle. The red 1994 Plymouth Sundance was broken into through the rear passenger window, which had been smashed, sometime after 9 p.m. the previous night. Seven CDs were reportedly stolen from the car.

Police were called to The Monkey Bar/La Galleria, 63 North Pleasant Street, at 1:46 p.m. The female caller believed a rophy was slipped into her drink after she reportedly blacked out after one sip. At press time, the incident was still being investigated.

Police responded to a report of an assault at Puffton Village, 1040 North Pleasant Street, at 3:01 p.m. The incident involved a fight between two female friends, in which both verbal and physical abuse reportedly occurred. No charges were filed by either party.

-Compiled by John Fenuccio

Israeli government tries to keep relations with Palestine steady

By Laurie Copans
Associated Press

TEL AVIV, Israel — Israel does not want to hurt the standing of Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas and will maintain ties with him, at least until Hamas takes control, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Monday.

The Islamic militants won parliament elections earlier this month, and Abbas has said he will likely ask Hamas to form the next government, but that government may not be in place before early April.

Olmert's comments suggested that in the transition period, Israeli-Palestinian relations will remain on a steady course. The Israeli leader spoke a day after Israel decided to transfer $54 million in tax money to the Palestinian Authority, after several days of delay and internal debate.

"I have no interest in harming Palestinian Authority chairman Abu Mazen as long as he doesn't cooperate with Hamas and as long as the Palestinian government isn't led by Hamas," Olmert told an economic conference, referring to Abbas by his widely known name.

Abbas, a moderate, was elected Palestinian Authority president a year ago, and will continue to hold that post, despite the change of government. Olmert did not say whether Israel would change its relationship with Abbas once Hamas takes power, or what he would consider cooperation between Abbas and Hamas.

Israel's decision to transfer the taxes also indicated that Olmert is trying to avoid crises during the transition period. Israel collects the taxes and customs duties on behalf of the Palestinians under a long-standing economic accord, and has in the past withheld them from time to time for political reasons.

Israel had delayed the transfer of January taxes last week, on grounds that Hamas, which has killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings, could use the money to pay for attacks. But in deciding Sunday to release the money, Israel's Cabinet stated that payments might be frozen after Hamas forms the next Palestinian government.

Olmert said in his speech that further transfers would not be automatic, but open to review.

The transfer of the money is crucial to the functioning of the Palestinian Authority. Halting the payments would deepen the government's financial crisis, and could expand the social chaos in the West Bank and Gaza Strip if the government is forced to order widescale layoffs.

At the same time, Israel's withholding of the money could add to the growing international pressure on Hamas to renounce violence and recognize Israel before it takes power.

Western powers, who inject about $900 million in aid to the Palestinian economy each year, have said they would not fund a Hamas-led Palestinian government otherwise.

A Hamas government might not be formed before the beginning of April, or several days after Israel's March 28 election.

The new Palestinian parliament meets for the first time on Feb. 16. After that gathering, Abbas has up to two weeks to decide whom to ask to form the next government. Once he assigns the task, the party forming the government — presumably Hamas — would have up to five weeks to complete the job.

With Israel imposing conditions on the monthly tax transfers, Hamas might have an interest in delaying the formation of its government as much as possible, to give it more time to come up with alternate sources of funding. Senior Hamas leaders have embarked on a tour of Arab and Muslim nations to try to enlist their financial support.

Since its Jan. 25 sweep of the Palestinian parliamentary elections, Hamas has refused to renounce its violent ideology or recognize Israel's right to exist, though a leading Hamas official has held out the possibility of a long-term truce if Israel reciprocates.

In the West Bank, meanwhile, an Israeli army patrol came under fire near the Kalandia checkpoint and one soldier was injured, the army said.

In Cairo on Sunday, a top Hamas official said the militant group would abide by Palestinians' past agreements with Israel — but also cautioned that no deal is eternal and Hamas would reject any it believes illogical or unfair.

Moussa Abu Marzouk, the right-hand man to Hamas' political leader Khaled Mashaal, spoke as Hamas leaders from Syria and Palestinian areas gathered in Cairo to discuss the Palestinian election outcome and the future Hamas government.

"There is no authority that inherits another authority without abiding by the agreements already made," Marzouk said, quickly adding, "If the agreements contradict logic and rights, there are legal measures to be taken. ... There are no eternal agreements."

Israel's release of the Palestinian tax money coincided with a wave of Israeli airstrikes in Gaza that killed five militants, including two of Islamic Jihad's top rocket makers. The army said the strikes were meant to deter rocket fire from Gaza, which wounded a baby and two adults in southern Israel on Friday.

An Islamic Jihad military commander in Gaza, Khaled Dadouh, threatened retaliation.

"We gave instructions to all our activists in the West Bank and Gaza to strike the enemy everywhere. There is no border and no limit to our response," he said.

Protests over prophet cartoons spark violence in Afghanistan

AP

Iranian students protest in front of the Austrian embassy yesterday during another demonstration against the publication of cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad.

By Amir Shah
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — Afghan troops opened fire on demonstrators Monday, leaving at least four people dead, while Iranian police used tear gas to disperse hundreds of protesters hurling stones and firebombs at the Danish Embassy in Tehran as anger mounted over the publication of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad.

Police had encircled the walled brick villa housing the Danish mission in the Iranian capital, but the crowd of about 400 protesters ignored orders to break up, only running into a nearby park after tear gas was fired. Earlier in the day, 200 student demonstrators threw stones at the Austrian Embassy, breaking some windows and starting small fires.

The worst of the violence in Afghanistan was outside Bagram, the main U.S. base, with Afghan police firing on some 2,000 protesters as they tried to break into the heavily guarded facility, said Kabir Ahmed, the local government chief.

Two demonstrators were killed and 13 people, including eight police, were injured, he said. No U.S. troops were involved in the clashes, the military said.

Afghan police also fired on protesters in the central city of Mihtarlam after a man in the crowd shot at them and others threw stones and knives, Interior Ministry spokesman Dad Mohammed Rasa said. Two protesters were killed, and three other people were wounded, including two police, officials said. The demonstrators burned tires and threw stones at government offices.

The unrest spread to East Africa as police in Somalia fired in the air to disperse stone-throwing protesters, triggering a stampede in which a teenager was killed and raising to six the number of deaths in protests related to the publication of the series of cartoons satirizing Islam's most revered figure.

At least nine people were injured in the melee outside the Danish Embassy in Iran, which lasted about an hour.

Two trees inside the compound — which was believed to have been evacuated earlier — were set on fire by the firebombs. The embassy gate was burned as was a police booth along the wall protecting the building. The mob, which included about 100 women, burned a Danish flag and chanted "God is great," but they failed to breach the police cordon.

Also Monday, 200 members of Iran's parliament issued a statement warning that those who published the cartoons should remember the case of Salman Rushdie — the British author against whom the late Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini issued a death warrant for his novel "The Satanic Verses." Lebanon, meanwhile, apologized to Denmark a day after thousands of rampaging Muslim demonstrators set fire to the building housing the Danish mission in Beirut to protest the caricatures. At least one person died, 30 were injured and about 200 people were detained in Sunday's violence, including Syrians, Palestinians and Lebanese, officials said.

The Beirut violence came a day after violent protests in neighboring Syria, including the burning of the Danish and Norwegian missions. The United States accused the Syrian government of backing the protests in Lebanon and Syria, an accusation also made by anti-Syrian Lebanese politicians.

Washington condemned the violence and urged governments to take steps to cool tensions over the 12 caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad that were first published in Denmark's Jyllands-Posten in September and recently reprinted in European and other media.

The drawings — including one depicting the prophet wearing a turban shaped as a bomb with a burning fuse — have touched a raw nerve in part because Islamic law is interpreted to forbid any illustrations of the Prophet Muhammad for fear they could lead to idolatry.

"We understand fully why people, why Muslims, find the cartoons offensive," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. "Those who disagree with the views that were expressed, certainly have the right to condemn them but they should be peaceful."

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, as he entered the opening session a three-day U.N. Environment Program in Dubai, United Arab Emirates, implied publication of the caricatures had been a matter of poor judgment, but added: "In don't think that it justifies the attacks on innocents. I would appeal to all concerned, all people of authority and influence, to engage in dialogue and bring this to an end."

The European Union issued stern reminders to 18 Muslim countries that they are obliged under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations to protect foreign embassies, and Austria said it had expressed concern for the safety of diplomatic missions to the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

The prime ministers of Spain and Turkey issued a Christian-Muslim appeal for calm, saying "we shall all be the losers if we fail to immediately defuse this situation."

But Turkey's Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul said media freedoms cannot be limitless and that hostility against Muslims was replacing anti-Semitism in the West.

The protesters in Afghanistan threw stones at the U.S. base and smashed a guard post. Some of those in the crowd then shot at the base with assault rifles, prompting the police to return fire, Ahmed said.

U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Mike Cody, said American troops did not fire on the crowd and security was left to the Afghan police.

About 200 protesters also tried to break down the gate of a the Danish government's diplomatic mission office in the capital, Kabul, but failed, said police who were guarding the building.

The protesters then threw stones at the mission and beat some officers guarding it, as well as some guards at a nearby house used by Belgian diplomats.

Police wielding batons and rifle butts dispersed demonstrators walking toward the presidential palace. An Associated Press reporter saw at least three protesters bleeding from injuries, and at least seven more who were arrested and driven away in a police vehicle.

"Long live Islam! We are Muslims! We don't let anyone insult our prophet!" chanted the demonstrators, many of whom appeared to be teenagers. They also chanted, "Down with America!" and slogans against the Afghan and U.S. presidents.

Some protesters moved toward the main American base in city and threw stones that smashed windows of a guard house. Police watched but did not intervene.

U.S. soldiers later arrested two photographers outside the base and checked the memory discs of an AP photographer, but did not arrest him. Cody said he had no details about the matter.

Thousands of other Afghans demonstrated peacefully in at least five other cities.

DO YOU LIKE FUN?
COME WRITE FOR NEWS!!!

Save $$ on Textbooks at the Jeffery Amherst College Store

All These Courses and More at Discounted Prices:

Astronomy	101-2	The Solar System
Astronomy	114	Stars & Galaxies
Biology	101	Introductory to Biology
Biology	102	Intro to Animal Biology
Biology	285	Cell & Molecular Biology
Chemistry	101	General Chemistry
Chemistry	110	General Chemistry
Chemistry	262	Organic Chemistry -non majors
Chemistry	111	General Chemistry I
Chemistry	112	General Chemistry II
Chemistry	261	Organic Chemistry
CMP Science	105	Computer Literacy
ECE	232	Hardware Organization & Design
Economics	104 A-F	Intro to Macroeconomics
Economics	709	Political Economy II
Exer Science	100	Intro to Exercise Science
FOMGT	304	Information for Tech Finance
FOMGT	320	Investments
Geo Sciences	102	The Human Landscape
Geo Sciences	103	Intro Oceanography
HRTA	240	Hotel Operations
Italian	120	Elementary Italian II
Math	113	Math-Elem Teachers I
Math	121	Linear Methods & Probability
MICBIO	310	General Microbiology
Nutrition	130	Nutrition for a healthy lifestyle
Physics	100	Conceptual Physics
Physics	120	Big Bang to Black Hole
Physics	132	Intro to Physics II
POLISCI	111	Comparative Politics
POLISCI	121-B	World Politics
Psychology	305	Educational Psychology
Psychology	320	Learn & Think
Psychology	380	Abnormal Psychology
Psychology	100 sec 1-3	Intro to Psychology
Psychology	335	Behavioral Neuroendocrinology
Spanish	110	Spanish
Spanish	120	Spanish
Spanish	240	Intermediate Spanish II
Spanish	246	Intensive Intermediate Spanish
Statistics	111	Elementary Statistics
W&FCONSV	261	Wildlife Conservation

Jeffery Amherst College Store
26 South Prospect Street, Amherst 253-3870
(behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in downtown Amherst)

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2006

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Collegian content not affected by SGA loan or supervision

In a recent special meeting of the Student Government Association, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian was given a much-needed bridge loan to accommodate financing over the next semester. The loan will have to be paid in full by the end of the semester.

First and foremost, the Daily Collegian strives to be a source of unbiased student news. Some have the false impression that the SGA's action to fund the Collegian's loan will allow them to in some way control any actions of the Collegian – this is not true.

Both bodies, however, realize that this is a concern that should be addressed in order to assure our readers and our students that journalistic integrity will be maintained.

In a telephone interview with SGA President Pavel Payano yesterday, he said that he believes "the SGA also benefits by having the Collegian remain independent.

"We will not be deciding the content of the Collegian," he continued.

Payano also added that members of the SGA have even written a formal bylaw proposal that will state that the Collegian, or any campus media group, will be protected by "freedom of the press with accordance to the Constitution of the United States."

The SGA is planning to meet with members of the Collegian in an advisory role. The weekly oversight meetings will help the Collegian determine mistakes, fix inaccuracies, and ultimately help us to grow as a better business and tool for the student body.

In the more than 100 years the Collegian has existed, managers of the paper have worked through good times and bad to defend our right to write not what is popular, but what is fair and honest. In a democracy, it is necessary to have the free press to act as a watchdog over government. We at the Collegian feel obligated to provide these same services at our university. The SGA understands this need.

Collegian Editor-in-Chief Michael Busack addressed such issues during the SGA meeting, saying an effect on content would no longer be a loan, but instead a business deal. It was made clear that the SGA could have no control over Collegian subject matter, or editorial opinions, because this would compromise the service that the Collegian provides.

Perhaps supervision was not the best term to describe the Collegian's loan meetings with the SGA. "Financial advising" would have been better suited. As business mangers, we are not without flaws at the Collegian. And a daunting fact about our paper is that it is a real business. We face business problems not unlike those of any other business that are not run by students. It would be unfair to our readers if we did not make sure that our serious financial situation is addressed by knowledgeable minds to make sure that the future of the Collegian is strong.

Unsigned editorials represent the opinion of The Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Is Collegian under supervision?

David B. Lawrence

If the Bush administration bought out the New York Times, then set up weekly meetings to supervise the running of the paper, would you continue to read it? Would you trust the articles about the Bush administration? Of course not — a newspaper supervised by the government it reports on lacks journalistic integrity.

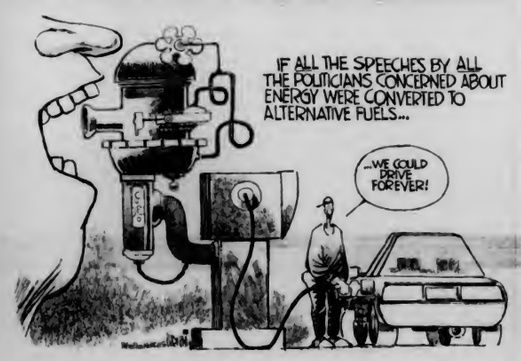
You should know, then, that the Daily Collegian is now under the supervision of the Student Government Association.

The SGA voted last Wednesday to approve a $130,000 loan to the Daily Collegian to cover its operating expenses. The loan is to be paid back in full at the end of this semester. In addition to providing the loan, the notion (quoting from Matt Belliveau's article) "also included a provision that SGA leaders will meet with Collegian business managers in order to supervise the paper's spending." Yes, you read correctly, the SGA will be supervising the Daily Collegian.

Foul. Flag on the play. The student government can't buy supervisory control of the Daily Collegian if the paper is to retain its journalistic integrity. An intermediate loan can be fairly harmless, so long as no control or appearance of control comes with it. However, the weekly oversight meetings must not occur. The Daily Collegian is the voice of the students and the avenue by which they learn about SGA and administrative affairs. There are often controversial interactions between the SGA and the administration, and if they are to be seen as being fairly reported, the Daily Collegian cannot be controlled by the SGA.

President Pavel Payano seems to be pleased with the new SGA supervision of the Daily Collegian. He told the paper, "It's important to know that we're also going to be ensuring that the money will be well spent with the weekly meetings." Unfortunately, whether or not these oversight meetings are strictly business doesn't matter. Any kind of oversight will give the perception that the paper has been tainted. What Payano should have said is, "It's important to know that we are NOT also going to be ensuring that money will be well spent, so people can trust the Collegian's reporting."

> As a paper reportnig on the SGA, it is imperative that the Daily Collegian not be perceived as under SGA control to any extent. To meet these conflicting roles, the SGA should have approached giving these loans with utmost care and regard for perception and the paper's journalistic integrity.



Because this is a college campus and a college newspaper, not a for-profit enterprise like the New York Times, the standards are a bit different. One of the SGA's most important roles is to dole out money to RSOs, and as an RSO, the Daily Collegian is no exception. The loan was and is needed, and the SGA is the appropriate body from which to secure it.

However, the Daily Collegian is also a newspaper that serves as the primary source of reports on SGA activities. As a paper reporting on the SGA, it is imperative that the Daily Collegian not be perceived as under SGA control to any extent. To meet these conflicting roles, the SGA should have approached giving these loans with utmost care and regard for perception and the paper's journalistic integrity. The way to do that is to make the entire process completely transparent, and to approve a loan with absolutely no strings or oversight attached. The Student Government has unfortunately done just the opposite, applying a supervisory body to the process that significantly increases the risk and perception of bias and interference.

There are several things the SGA can do to fix this problem. The supervisory meetings could be made public, with minutes published or otherwise available for review. Better yet, they could be completely abandoned, as there is little need for them. The Daily Collegian has been handling its finances just fine for decades, it certainly does not need help from the SGA.

The third option is to do nothing and hope that most students won't notice the changes. Those of us who have can just stop reading.

David B. Lawrence is a Collegian columnist.

Funding our own repression

Mike Sances

When the Nation magazine disclosed the presence of an FBI agent on the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus last September, many students were shocked and outraged by an apparent infringement on civil liberties. After all, what possible security purpose could have been served with this mysterious agent snooping around our school?

The only problem — quickly pointed out by Uri Strauss, president of the UMass Graduate Student Senate — was that the whole story was déjà vu. That the FBI has had an established presence at UMass has been public knowledge since November 2002, when it was announced, openly, that the campus police would be working with something called the Pioneer Valley Joint Terrorism Task Force.

As part of this Task Force, an officer of the UMass police department, Det. Barry Flanders, would be reporting to the FBI office in Springfield twice a week — though the head of the Springfield FBI office told the Boston Globe (Jan. 9, 2003) that Flanders is "essentially working full time" for the Feds. While the UMPD pays his salary, Flanders reportedly answers only to the Bureau.

Naturally, then, figuring out what Flanders does to earn the $41,359 we're paying him annually is a little tricky. All we really know for sure is that one of his first acts as UMPD-FBI liaison in Oct. 2002 was to pay a surprise visit to Musaddak J. Alhabeeb, an associate professor of economics, and to interrogate him regarding a tip he had received involving the professor's allegedly "anti-American views" (Boston Globe, Nov. 24, 2002).

The five-minute interview between Alhabeeb and the police — which the Iraqi-born professor described at the time as "polite" but "uncomfortable" — sparked a firestorm of protest. Emergency panel discussions were convened, demonstrations were held protesting the FBI and the USA PATRIOT Act, the Student Government Association promised an "anti-Patriot Act" resolution, and the Western Massachusetts ACLU announced the filing of a Freedom of Information Request into the FBI's activities at UMass and at campuses around the country.

Then, suddenly, the issue faded out of consciousness. So, by the time the Nation "revealed" the FBI's presence on campus last September, it was as if the whole story had started over from the beginning — except that now, Flanders, the so-called FBI agent, had gained the benefit of anonymity.

But while we might have forgotten about them, they most certainly have not forgotten about us. Flanders, who didn't respond to an e-mail requesting an interview, is still here; if you look him up on the UMass Web site's People Finder service, you'll find that his e-mail is bflander@admin.umass.edu and that his office is listed in Dickinson Hall, though who knows if he actually spends any time there.

> . . . As a cursory look at the FBI's sordid history reveals, being spied on should be the least of our worries. At the same time, those who believe that obedience to the law protects them from the state are in need of a serious reality check.

It might seem pertinent to bring up the issue of the FBI at UMass in light of the recent developments regarding the White House's surveillance program, which uses the National Security Agency to listen in on the phone conversations of Americans suspected of communicating with foreigners who have possible involvement with terrorism. But in fact, as a cursory look at the FBI's sordid history reveals, being spied on should be the least of our worries. At the same time, those who believe that obedience to the law protects them from the state are in need of a serious reality check.

Since this is Black History Month, let's start with the FBI's record toward Martin Luther King. After giving his famous "I Have a Dream" speech in 1963, "The Bureau's Domestic Intelligence Division concluded that this 'demagogic speech' established Dr. King as the 'most dangerous and effective Negro leader in the country.'"

I'm quoting from the Church Committee report uncovering the FBI's counterintelligence programs of the 1960s, known as COINTELPRO. Named for Sen. Frank Church of Idaho, the 1976 Congressional report describes King as "the target of an intensive campaign by the Federal Bureau of Investigation to 'neutralize' him as an effective civil rights leader. In the words of the man in charge of the FBI's 'war' against Dr. King, 'No holds were barred.'"

King and other black groups who dared lift their heads in demand of some dignity bore the worst of the FBI's harassment and repression during this era. But any dissident group was fair game for COINTELPRO, whose major tactics, according to the Church Committee report, included "anonymous attempts to break up marriages, disrupt meetings, ostracize persons from their professions, and provoke target groups into rivalries that might result in deaths."

So are we really comfortable having an FBI agent on our campus, in light of that organization's history, both locally and nationally? Are we comfortable paying for our own surveillance, our own repression?

Judging from the recent lack of protest, the answer to both of these questions must be yes. But the next time an innocent member of our community is interrogated regarding their allegedly "anti-American views" — whatever that means, anyway — just don't say we didn't warn you.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

Why apologize for expressions?

World Perspectives

Ben Duffy

They were just cartoons. No one could have known that they would spark so much violence thousands of miles away.

In September 2005, the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten published 12 cartoons that were mildly derisive of Islam. Some Muslims found the cartoons offensive, because they insulted Islam and because they consider any visual depiction of Muhammad to be blasphemous.

The controversy has come to a head in the last few days. In Lebanon, rampaging Muslims torched a Maronite Catholic Church and the Danish General Council. In Syria, protestors ransacked and burned the Danish embassy to the ground. Death threats have been made against the 12 cartoonists who made the original images. Eleven Muslim nations have called for an apology from the Danish government, and a promise to punish the paper and not to allow similar cartoons printed ever again. Consumer boycotts of Danish goods have been organized in several Islamic nations. A French newspaper editor was fired for reprinting the cartoons, and a Jordanian editor was arrested for the same offense.

> Their constitution prohibits censorship, stating, 'Any person shall be at liberty to publish his ideas in print, in writing, and in speech ... Censorship and other preventative measures shall never again be introduced.' But this is contradicted by more recent 'hate-speech' laws that provide a general protection against any speech that a religious group finds 'threatening, insulting, or degrading.'

Syria's state-run newspaper, Al-Thawra, has declared, "It is unjustifiable under any kind of personal freedoms to allow a person or a group to insult the beliefs of millions of Muslims." The terrorist group, Islamic Army of Iraq, according to the Indian Express Group, proclaimed in an Internet statement, "The Islamic Army in Iraq also declares that all countries whose newspapers printed the insulting and disgraceful pictures are legitimate targets and our response will be... tremendous." They threatened to kidnap Danes and "cut them into as many pieces as the number of newspapers that printed the cartoons."

Danish law is rather ambiguous on this issue. Their constitution prohibits censorship, stating, "Any person shall be at liberty to publish his ideas in print, in writing, and in speech ... Censorship and other preventive measures shall never again be introduced." But this is contradicted by more recent "hate-speech" laws that provide a general protection against any speech that a religious group finds "threatening, insulting, or degrading." Clearly, "hate speech" laws are incompatible with free speech, as I have always maintained.

Thus far, the Danes have stuck to their guns, as they should. The Norwegian government rolled over (the cartoons were republished in Norway) and apologized for the cartoons. Their foreign minister wrote, "Freedom of expression is one of the pillars of Norwegian society ... At the same time our laws and our international obligations enforce restrictions for incitement to hatred or hateful expressions." What's to apologize for? Allowing a newspaper to print without government intrusion?

The Danes have the better idea. While Jyllands-Posten editor Carsten Juste issued a conciliatory letter in response to the controversy, the Danish government has refused to take responsibility for the cartoons. A free press doesn't have to answer to the government, and vice versa. The Danish government is not responsible for the cartoons simply because they refused to censor them. I wish all leaders had this type of courage.

This is why we fight the War on Terror. Sometimes it all seems too big and abstract for most liberals to grasp. They thought that it would be a short-lived campaign to capture one man — bin Laden — and then it would all be over. But it's bigger than that.

It's not a war on Islam, but it is a war on this sort of bullying jihadism. It's a war on people who burn down embassies because they want to punish a country for not censoring a mildly offensive cartoon. It's a clash of civilizations — the liberal West against the totalitarian elements of the Islamic World. Sadly, we may be so liberal that we won't stand up and fight. We'll act like the government of Norway and give away our freedoms in order to make the jihadists like us, a fruitless pursuit if ever there was one.

This is an idea that liberals will snicker at, but I'll say it anyway. They hate our freedom. George W. Bush has said that on a number of occasions, and he's usually jeered at by left-leaning critics. The real reason they hate us, according to the left, is because we're an imperial "hyper-power" that has "humiliated" the Arab world. So I guess I have to ask those left-leaning critics if they still think Bush is so crazy. Are you sure it isn't freedom they hate?

"If they hate freedom so much, why don't they attack Sweden?" is the often-repeated mantra. Lefties like Michael Moore have said that a thousand times, and then one day the words came out of the mouth of Osama bin Laden himself. In a propaganda tape released just before the 2004 election (in which bin Laden urged Americans to vote for Kerry), the madman himself said, "[This is] contrary to Bush's claim that we hate freedom.

If so, then let him explain to us why we don't strike for example — Sweden? And we know that freedom-haters don't possess defiant spirits like those of the 19; may Allah have mercy on them. No, we fight because we are free men who don't sleep under oppression. We want to restore freedom to our nation, just as you lay waste to our nation. So shall we lay waste to your's." Does anyone really believe that? The Left does.

So if bin Laden doesn't hate freedom, why does that Bush moron keep saying such terrible things about him? It must be because he's trying to whip up those flag-waving idiots in Arkansas.

Sweden thinks they're safe because they've stayed on Osama's good side. I find something incredibly cowardly about that. I don't want to be on Osama's good side. But if they had printed the cartoons like Denmark and Norway, they would be under the same attack right now from the same people. They don't hate freedom, eh? Don't be so sure.

Ben Duffy is a World Perspectives columnist currently abroad in Germany.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2006

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

State Radio returns to Pearl Street with new record

By Ian Jones
Collegian Staff

When Dispatch broke up in 2003, Chad Stokes formed the band State Radio with bassist Chuck Fay of Princes of Babylon and drummer Brian Sayers. Since then, State Radio has put out several records, including their latest album, "Us Against the Crown," released today. Like their previous records, this one draws on a variety of styles, from reggae-inspired tracks like "Gunship Politico" and "Rushian" to rock songs like "Mr. Larkin" and "The Diner Song."

"It's under alternative," Stokes said in an interview with the Daily Collegian. "We tend to switch it up a bit. When people ask what we play, I tell them it's rock with a little bit of reggae. We're hard to classify in some ways, but you could say that about a lot of bands."

"Us Against the Crown" is strong, although at points it seems different from their other albums. Stokes explained, "We'd never really worked with a producer before." He said he felt that the three songs they recorded with the producer — "Man in the Hall," Right Me Up" and "Riddle in Londontown" — seem "a little too clean" to him. Clean or not, the album still sounds like a solid State Radio release, due in part to the philosophy behind its recording. On the album's sound, Stokes said, "We've been playing these songs live for a year and a half, and we just wanted to get them down on tape. There was no master plan."

Many University of Massachusetts students remember last semester's appearance by Cindy Sheehan, after which State Radio played. It's hard to listen to State Radio without addressing their politics, and this album is no different. Stokes says that his political influences "range from Robert F. Kennedy to Che Guevara, although they worked with different disciplines." He really wants to "encourage people to think for themselves and not to believe what they read or what their parents believe, but to come up with their own thoughts ... and their own solutions," Stokes said.

It's hard to be a political band without being preachy, but State Radio manages to pull it off. Instead of simply putting his opinions out there, Stokes' goal is to get people to come up with solutions where they are hard to find; to address, for example, "what's going on in Iraq, or in Sudan." As Stokes puts it, "We're trying to inspire."

Tomorrow, State Radio will be giving a sold out acoustic show at the Peace Abbey in Sherborn, the town in which Stokes grew up.

"We've never done a show there, but it constantly needs help to stay alive, in the sense that it doesn't turn a profit. It's a sanctuary for peace and progressive thinking," he said.

The Peace Abbey was also where Stokes was first introduced to Staff Sgt. Camilo Mejia of the Florida National Guard, who, according to Stokes, "was in the Reserves, was done with his tours of duty and was asked to come back. He filed to be a conscientious objector, his request was denied and he was put in jail. ... He was let out in February [2005]." His story is told on "Us Against the Crown" in the song "Camilo."

On Thursday, State Radio will be appearing at Pearl Street with Half Way Drawn and the Brakes to promote the release of "Us Against the Crown." State Radio shows are hard to classify, ranging from energetic to subdued, but they're worth seeing, whether you're a new listener or an old fan.

State Radio
Pearl Street
Northampton
Thurs. Feb. 9
8:30 p.m.
$10/$13

State Radio
"Us Against the Crown"
Ruff Shod

New romantic comedy urges audience to try 'Something New'

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

Hollywood is no stranger to on-screen interracial relationships. There's been everything from the intense and confrontational "Jungle Fever" to the silly and asinine "Guess Who." "Something New," however, deals with the issue in a way that we haven't seen before. The film's statement reaches out directly to black women who prefer black men, as the main character does, and makes an argument for trying "something new."

"Something New"
Directed by Sanaa Hamri
Starring Sanaa Lathan Simon Baker
Focus Features
Rated PG-13
99 mins.
Grade B-

In "Something New," Sanaa Latham plays Kenya, a successful black senior manager at Baison, Bailey, and Becks who is trying to make partner. Kenya's life is lacking in the love department. She power-walks every morning, sees a couple kissing and looks on with envious eyes. She has a living room composed entirely of beige and wears suits even on Saturdays. Kenya needs "a good brother," as she describes it. But she gets more than she bargained for when her friend Lea sets her up on a blind date to which she reluctantly agrees. The man, a likeable fellow named Brian, played by Simon Baker, is white. She cuts the date short quickly and forgets about it. He's a landscape architect and when they are subsequently introduced at a party, a friend insists Kenya have Brian redo her backyard. She acquiesces but plays it as coldly as can be. Brian persistent nonetheless and when they eventually get together, they are troubled by the issue of race. Their relationship is ultimately tested severely by the introduction of Blair Underwood — Mark — who plays the perfect black man.

In Kenya and Brian's relationship, they discuss race and find that it isn't always easy for them to agree. At one point, Kenya says of her job, "You have to work twice as hard to prove yourself equal." Brian asks, "You sure you're not just being paranoid?" As Kenya and Brian learn to mediate these differing opinions, it becomes clear to Kenya that these conversations are what she loves about being with Brian.

"Something New" is about breaking out of your set of preconceived notions about how your life should be, and living life as, in Kenya's words, "an adventure." Kenya, who prefers black men, detests the color red and is wound a little too tight, needs "something new" to make herself happy. Brian describes her beige living room as "safe" and says, "Color brings energy, excites the senses." So Kenya allows Brian to paint her toenails red. The issue of color — beige versus red — is an important part of the film. There's an awkward moment when screenwriter Kriss Turner has to get in Kenya's dislike of the accolor red. It doesn't work, but the basic idea of using color to show her character change works fine.

The direction by first-time director Sanna Hamri is very skillful. Almost every shot in the first 20 minutes of the film is a moving shot, even when filming Kenya and three friends sitting around a table in a restaurant. It gives the film an effortless gliding quality that draws us into the story. As the film continues, it bespeaks a director with an unusual savvy for making a film look good and feel fluid.

The best part about the film is that, for the most part, the characters feel real. On the minus side, the film is only mildly amusing and virtually never laugh-out-loud funny. As the film winds to a close, there's the all-too-familiar clichéd romantic comedy scene where Kenya decides she really loves Brian. "Where are you going in such a rush?" someone asks her. "To get Brian back!" she exclaims. In another film we might overlook the cliché, but here it is such a drastic change in tone, it jumps out at us. The only good news is that, unlike in every other romantic comedy, she's not going to the airport.

Blair Underwood and Sanaa Lathan star in Sanaa Hamri's "Something New," a romantic comedy that analyzes interracial relationships.

'King of Comedy' D.L. Hughley speaks of family and friends

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Comedian D.L. Hughley lit up the stage at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center on Saturday. Pacing his material from observations about the past year, racial differences and jokes inspired by talking to the audience, it almost appeared as if Hughley made up a lot of his comedy on the spot.

Regardless of when he wrote the material, Hughley was a success and proved why Spike Lee labeled him as one of the "Original Kings of Comedy," a notion Hughley still has not come to accept.

"The night I met Richard Pryor, I felt like the biggest liar on stage, since he was the real king of comedy," Hughley said backstage after the show in an interview with the Daily Collegian.

Many comedians say that the late Pryor was the best comedian ever to perform on stage. But growing up, Hughley had a different favorite comedian: Robin Harris. Hughley said he did not even know he wanted to become a comedian.

"At first I just wanted to be something. I wasn't sure of what, but as soon as I picked up the mic, I knew I found it," Hughley said.

Before he met his future wife LaDonna, Hughley received very little family support, since becoming a successful comedian is rare and becoming a successful African-American comedian is even rarer.

"When I was growing up, my family didn't really talk about future plans. They just wanted me to be successful and be able to support myself," Hughley said.

But now that he is a success, things have changed. Since having his own show on ABC, Hughley has a new show, "Weekends at the D.L." on Comedy Central. He also has a second show in the works, this one for NBC, called "Studio 7."

"Studio 7" is going to be a comedy show about the behind-the-scenes of "Saturday Night Live." The concept of the show was developed by "West Wing" writer Aaron Sorkin. Sorkin's main idea of the show is to be similar to the style of the one-season flop show "Sports Night."

"Anyone who has seen 'Soul Plane' knows I can't act, so when it comes to this new project I'm attempting to learn. I typically don't act, unless it's for a project I dig," Hughley said.

Fans of "Weekends at the D.L." do not have to worry about its temporary hiatus. Hughley said he will continue to work on the show while he works on "Studio 7." At press time, Comedy Central did not respond for comment about future plans for "Weekends at the D.L."

While Hughley is set to appear on TV much more frequently again, he is still a comedian at heart.

"I love stand up. I love the crowd... I don't care about the size of the hall, as long as I have a good crowd. I love it," Hughley said.

When asked about Massachusetts native Dane Cook, Hughley spoke highly of him. "I'm proud of Dane; his act is emotive and authentic. We recently performed together at a festival down in Miami, it was great," he said.

Hughley remains in touch with the other three "Kings of Comedy": Steve Harvey, Cedric the Entertainer and Bernie Mac. He doesn't know when or if they will all work together again.

"What we did for that movie and tour was unique and special. Nothing tops that, it is the highlight of my professional career," he said.

Hughley did not back down when he was asked about the controversy that rapper Kanye West has made for himself and civil right groups across the country.

"At first I respected what Kanye said, you could tell by looking at him he was nervous. But now I'm not sure, I can't tell what he and Jesus have in common. Controversy is turning into his image."

Comedian D.L. Hughley performed at UMass on Saturday, drawing on observations of last year and commentary on various members of the audience.

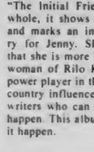
New Music Tuesdays

"Art is making something out of nothing and selling it." – Frank Zappa

Week of 2/7 to 2/14

Jenny Lewis with the Watson Twins 8/10

Rabbit Fur Coat
Team Love Records



Jenny Lewis has made her mark on the music world as the front-woman of Rilo Kiley, but in solo effort, she really does strike out on her own. In the first seconds of the album, Jenny demands attention from her audience with the gospel-infused vocals, "Run Devil Run" is a short opener, but sets the stage for 11 more songs. Each track is harmonic and hopeful. Jenny's voice has a country twang that makes us forget about her days as a childhood actress, in such films as "Troop Beverly Hills" and "Big Girls Don't Cry... They Get Even," and makes us remember that she has another way to leave her legacy on the world, through her lyrical and distinctly country-infused tracks about love, being happy and living life together.

The three standout tracks come up in a row. The first is "You Are What You Love." This song is dancey in its melody as it proclaims, "You are what you love/and not what loves you back." The backing vocals by the Watson Twins offer both musical and lyrical affirmation of the song's theme of believing that loving yourself is most important. The title track, "Rabbit Fur Coat," features a slowly strummed melody paired with a sentimental story setup. It tells a tale of giving up who one is to have riches to make life comfortable. She wonders if that is really what will make one happy. Jenny even pokes fun at her own hypocrisy when she sings, "I sing songs about the deficit/but when I sell out and leave Omaha/what will I get?/A mansion house and a rabbit fur coat."

The charming part of the album comes at the end of the trifecta of memorable tracks with a cover of the Traveling Wilbury's "Handle With Care." Along with Death Cab for Cutie front-man Ben Gibbard and Conor Oberst of Bright Eyes, Jenny leads her own "dream team" of indie-superheroes. Jenny sings the first verse and then Gibbard takes over the vocals once the chorus arrives. Oberst gets his own verse and executes it in normal Bright Eyes fashion. All three performers join together for the last recitation of "handle me with care." One could hold this line-up to a similar type of greatness as the original band consisting of George Harrison, Bob Dylan, Tom Petty, Jeff Lynne and Roy Orbinson exhibited, but in a less not-so-famous style.

The album ends with a short reprise of "Happy," featuring fun snapping sounds. It serves as a blissful end to an album that is nothing short of a greatly charming country record. At times, it is reminiscent of the early Rilo Kiley recordings on "The Initial Friend" EP. As a whole, it shows more maturity and marks an important victory for Jenny. She has proved that she is more than the front-woman of Rilo Kiley; she is a power player in the scene of alt-country influenced singer-songwriters who can really make it happen. This album really made it happen.

The Elected 9/10

Sun, Sun, Sun
Sub Pop

The Elected's sophomore release signifies a departure from their sad, country-filled debut album, "Me First" (Sub Pop), into a new realm of happier campfire pop. "Sun, Sun, Sun" exhibits signs of honoring the Midwestern spirit while moving beyond what is seen as typical. Some tracks are more rock than country; other tracks are more simple-sounding than standout hits. But as a whole, the album makes its mark as an adorable reminder of the importance of simplicity in a world where things are often more complicated than one would wish.

The album opens with the sounds of birds chirping away. Then the harmonic vocals of Blake Sennette and Daniel Brummel, with special guest Stacey Dupree of Eisley, come in as country-infused instruments, such as lap steel, banjo and trumpet, play in the background. Called "Clouds Parting (8:14 AM)," it appeals to the senses and conveys the image of a refreshing new day with dew-covered trees and sunshine galore.

Each song helps to widen the same consistent image. "Old Times" sets the bar up high and there is charming allure in every part of the song. The beat is kept with a tambourine as Blake sings, "Be like old times/and love would feel brand new." It is very nostalgic of him. Even though the exact location of these "old times" is never specified, one can guess that it is one where letterman sweaters and first dates reigned supreme. "Beautiful Rainbow" is subtle, but deadly. It is a love song with quiet guitar and even quieter vocals. Only a simple shaker keeps a low pulse throughout the song. The lyrics describe a rainbow and the sentiment attached with feeling hope after seeing something beautiful. Sometimes, the most beautiful events happen only after one thinks there is nothing left, and this is just the type of event that Blake hopes to experience: a beautiful rainbow after a violent storm. "The Bank and Trust" describes moving around in order to keep from fully selling out. The way the lap steel guitar is infused into the vocals helps to create a perfect amount of country sound.

"Did Me Good" marks a departure from the campfire song formula of the rest of the disc. It starts with an electric guitar solo and then about 20 seconds into the song, lead singer Blake lets out an emotional cry to "do me good" that is reminiscent of the cries of the soulful singers of the past. He exhibits a rock-star persona once again during "Biggest Star," when he screams out, "Honey, I can't lose."

This album demonstrates so much charm that it is almost magical. It yields no bad feelings, only ones of knee-tapping, hand-holding, campfire bliss. Blake has outdone himself. He has put his television characters far behind him, so that we see no remains of the obnoxious Joey-the-Rat (of "Boy Meets World" fame) or camper kid Pinsky (of "Salute Your Shorts.") All we see is a guy who created superb, country-infused music with his band, The Elected.

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Want to write for Arts and Living?

Call the office at 545-1361

Skin Care Center
Pioneer Valley Dermatology
www.pioneervalleyderm.com

Call for a Consultation & Book your Appointment Today!
413.549.7400

Prepare for Spring Break NOW!

- Electrology
- Microdermabrasion
- Laser Hair Removal
- Glycolic Peels & Beta - Lift Peels
- All Procedures Available For Men and Women of All Skin Tones & Types

Shelly Danton R.E.

Richard Wyatt, M.D., Ph.D.
29-B Cottage St.
Amherst (past Bertucci's)

Dr. Wyatt is available during laser procedures

Alumni Association
University of Massachusetts Amherst

"Leaders in the Making" Scholarship

SOPHOMORE & JUNIOR
$2,000 SCHOLARSHIPS

The "Leaders in the Making" Scholarship was created by the Alumni Association to support the academic and career pursuits of promising sophomores and juniors. Students from diverse campus populations whose records suggest that they will develop into alumni with admirable leadership qualities upon graduation are encouraged to apply.

Four recipients will be selected by the Alumni Association Student Programs and Services Committee based on their application and will be awarded $2,000 towards their Fall 2006 tuition bill and fees.

This multi-part application must be completed in its entirety and returned to the Alumni Association no later than 5 p.m. on Friday, February 24, 2006 for consideration. No exceptions will be allowed.

Applications are available for pick up in Memorial Hall or at www.UMassAlumni.com/students.

North Carolina returns to Top 25

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

UConn forward Rudy Gay has led the Huskies to a No.1 ranking this season. He joins several teammates as pro prospects.

North Carolina rejoined the Top 25 in The Associated Press college basketball poll Monday after a two-week absence while the top five teams remained the same.

Connecticut, which beat two ranked teams last week, was a runaway No. 1 for the third straight week. The Huskies (20-1), who beat Pittsburgh and Indiana last week, received 68 first-place votes and 1,796 points from the national media panel.

Duke (21-1), which beat Boston College 83-81 and Florida State 97-96 in overtime, held second and was No. 1 on three ballots, receiving 1,723 points. Memphis (21-2), Villanova (17-2) and Gonzaga (18-3) were third through fifth. Villanova received the other first-place vote.

Texas and Florida each moved up one place to sixth and seventh, respectively, while George Washington and West Virginia were Nos. 8 and 9, an improvement of two spots for both.

Illinois, whose 33-game home winning streak was snapped by Penn State on Saturday, dropped from sixth to 10th, the Illini's lowest ranking in two months.

Tennessee jumped up two places to 11th and was followed by Michigan State, UCLA, Pittsburgh, Georgetown, North Carolina State, Boston College, Iowa, Ohio State and Oklahoma. The last five ranked teams were Washington, Michigan, North Carolina, Indiana and Northern Iowa.

North Carolina (14-5) was the lone newcomer to the poll. The Tar Heels had been ranked for seven straight weeks before falling out last month following a loss to Virginia and a one-point win over Florida State. The defending national champions returned to the rankings having won four of their last five games, including victories last week over Maryland and Clemson.

The Tar Heels weren't ranked in the preseason poll after losing their top seven scorers from the team that beat Illinois in April to win the school's fourth national championship.

LSU (15-6) dropped out after a one-week run following a 67-62 loss at Alabama. The Tigers also had a quick stop in the poll earlier in the season, again falling from the rankings after one week.

Iowa (18-5) had the week's biggest jump, moving from 23rd to No. 18 after beating Purdue 77-68 and Michigan 94-66. The Hawkeyes are alone atop the Big Ten standings with a 7-2 record.

Pittsburgh and Washington both fell five places.

The 14th-ranked Panthers (17-3) lost 80-76 to Connecticut and 61-58 to Georgetown last week and have dropped three of their last five with all the losses coming on the road.

Washington (16-5) fell to 21st after losing 77-64 to Washington State on Saturday, the Huskies' third straight Pac-10 loss. This is Washington's lowest ranking since entering the poll at No. 25 in the second week of the regular season. The Huskies were ranked as high as seventh last month.

There are seven games between ranked teams this week, and West Virginia and Ohio State are in two each.

Duke at North Carolina is the first of the double-ranked games Tuesday. West Virginia is at Pittsburgh and Ohio State is at Michigan on Thursday.

On Saturday, Iowa is at Indiana and UCLA visits Washington. On Sunday, West Virginia is at Georgetown and Illinois is at Ohio State.

Successful ride for the Bus

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

DETROIT — As grand exits go, it wasn't much.

The Bus didn't win the Super Bowl for the Pittsburgh Steelers in the final game of his career. He didn't even have a lot to do with it, until he was given the ball to grind up some yards and run down the clock toward the end.

Don't believe for a minute, though, that this wasn't Jerome Bettis' game.

He ran onto the field alone because his teammates wanted to give him one final tribute. He walked off it for the last time as a champion, beloved in two cities.

And he did what most athletes never can — walk away on top.

"I think the Bus' last stop is here in Detroit," Bettis said.

It was quite a ride. Bettis wasn't the same back who punished defenders in the NFL for 13 years, but he didn't need to be on this team.

His role wasn't so much to run as it was to lead. He came back for another year because quarterback Ben Roethlisberger promised him a trip to Detroit, and once he got here he made them all feel at home.

His teammates wanted to win one for Pittsburgh, one for Bill Cowher, one for the thumb and one for themselves.

They never lost sight, though, of the one they wanted to win so badly for big No. 36.

"It was all for Jerome," Most Valuable Player Hines Ward said. "We were going to fight for him."

The night between the end zones was largely forgettable, though Bettis helped Roethlisberger score the Steelers' first touchdown with a block late in the second quarter. He wasn't the best running back on the field, not even the second best.

Bettis didn't even play during the first quarter, and ended the game with just 43 yards on 14 carries. He wasn't a starter, but he was the only Steeler on the field for a few moments as his teammates let him savor his final run out of the tunnel by himself.

"Joey Porter told me, 'It's only right that you lead us out there. It's your home. You need to bring us in,'" Bettis said. "I was in awe. They wanted me to bring them in and I brought them in. It was incredible. It gave me a moment I'll never forget."

Bettis responded by trying to give the Steelers something they would never forget. He invited teammates on, sprinting onto the field to congratulate them after big plays and giving them words of encouragement when things went bad.

When it was over, Bettis finally had his Super Bowl championship, the only thing missing from what will surely be a Hall of Fame resume. He celebrated on the field, while his mother — who had never missed a game since Bettis began playing football — cried and his dad celebrated in a luxury suite above.

Detroit celebrated with them, perhaps hopeful that this was a good omen of things to come in a city that so desperately wants to improve itself. It was almost as if a city whose own team is woeful had somehow claimed a title of sorts of its own.

Minutewomen rolling

W. HOOPS from page 10

The Hawks did not have the lead for long, however.

Freshman Stefanie Gerardot answered by getting to the line and hitting a pair of free throws to give the Minutewomen a 46-45 lead with 6:32 left in the game.

The Maroon and White never looked back, and forced Saint Joseph's to intentionally foul during the last few minutes of play. During that stretch, UMass went 15-for-16 from the line to seal the deal and take a 63-53 win.

The Minutewomen finished the game shooting 46 percent from the field and 82 percent from the free-throw line.

While the Minutewomen are used to getting high-scoring games from Rosanio and Mills, the rest of the team knows that they all have to help out if they want to be victorious.

"We were just focusing on finishing inside and finishing our free throws," T. Tatham said. "It just came to us. It wasn't really a matter of them [Rosanio and Mills] not scoring, it was just us stepping up. It was natural. I was just playing with the flow of the game."

UM turns in solid performance

TRACK from page 10

gained 10 points for UMass.

Callahan won contributed her fair share of points, placing first in the triple jump with a mark of 37 1/4. She also ran a time of 8.93, good enough for fourth place.

DeRosa continued her dominance of long distance events by cruising to victory in the mile with a time of 5:13.67.

Miranda won the long jump with a mark of 17-5 1/4. She also placed in the top-five in two other events.

Budd established her seniority by winning the 500-meter run by almost two seconds, finishing in 1:17.67.

With all of these stellar performances building the team's confidence, Lafreniere feels that the team is really coming together and she is excited about the expected improvements in the spring track season, which starts up on March 1.

"We want to build on all these performances," Lafreniere said. "That's just one more step towards the outdoor season for us."

Olympic skater gains confidence

By Salvatore Zanca
Associated Press

Evgeni Plushenko was a shy, insecure, almost brooding skater four years ago when he entered the Salt Lake City Olympics as a co-favorite.

The 19-year-old Russian didn't win gold.

Now he is 23 — married, relaxed, joking, more sure of himself. And he enters the Turin Olympics as the solid favorite.

Times have changed since 2002, when Plushenko was a no-show at the European championships, shied away from speaking English, admitted only reluctantly that he was married and did not share greetings with reporters.

After his fifth win at the European Championships last month, Plushenko was asked whether he called his wife at home in St. Petersburg.

"She congratulated me," he said, laughing and speaking with confidence. "I already spoke with my friends, with my mom. They said 'Hi' to all of you."

Plushenko has been in the spotlight since age 14, when he won the 1996 world junior title. Already with a reputation as a terrific jumper, he completed his first quad that year.

Still, he was raw. His programs were outlandish and flamboyant, and his skating suffered for it; he always appeared as if he were rushing to the next jump.

In 2002 he skated to a medley of Michael Jackson for the short program in disco silver and black. (Now he wears black and skates to the opera "Tosca.")

In the fall of 1998, Plushenko was among the first to do a quad-triple combination. And the following year, while others were still struggling with solo quad jumps, he one-upped himself with a quad-triple-double.

He won bronze at the 1998 world championships at 15, when he was the replacement for Nagano Olympic champion Ilya Kulik, who skipped the worlds. Alexei Yagudin won the world gold that year at Minneapolis and a not-so-friendly rivalry was born that would eventually take its toll. Yagudin was outgoing while Plushenko seemed reserved.

Yagudin was originally a Alexei Mishin student, but left when he felt Mishin was favoring Plushenko. Yagudin ended up with Tatiana Tarasova and won the 2002 gold medal while Plushenko, after falling on the quad in the short program, took the silver.

And there was ill will.

Who can forget the catfight that erupted when Mishin tried to claim a part of the success of Yagudin's 2002 Olympics gold?

"For four years, so much [garbage] was thrown in my face, saying that I'm not such a good skater from that side," Yagudin said, pointing to Mishin and Plushenko.

Now there is a begrudging respect for Plushenko from Yagudin, who retired from competition after he won gold.

"I skated against him for a long time and we pushed each other to improve. I think he really deserves to win this gold medal, he has done a lot for men's figure skating," Yagudin said.

Yagudin and Plushenko traded world and European titles over the years. Yagudin ended with four worlds and three Europeans; Plushenko has three and five, respectively.

But Yagudin has the Olympic gold from 2002 — and he thinks the 2006 gold is destined to Plushenko, barring illness or injury.

"I definitely think Evgeni is really a heavy favorite going into the Olympics," Yagudin said. "The only one person who can be close to Evgeni is the Swiss guy, Lambiel. My opinion is 99 percent it is Evgeni going to win, and it's good."

Since 2002, a healthy Plushenko was never beaten, losing only the 2004 European championships to France's Brian Joubert and the 2005 worlds to Stephane Lambiel, when he was plagued by hip and back problems.

He also had an operation last summer to repair a groin injury.

WE'RE LOOKING FOR A FEW EXCEPTIONAL STUDENTS.

At Quinnipiac University School of Law, you'll find everything you need to succeed. From a challenging yet supportive academic environment to faculty members who will become intellectual colleagues. From live client clinics to real-world externships. Plus annual merit scholarships ranging from $5,000 to full tuition. For more information, visit http://law.quinnipiac.edu or call 1-800-462-1944.

- Outstanding faculty
- Rigorous academic programs
- Six concentrations
- Extensive experiential learning opportunities
- Student faculty ratio 15:1

Criminal | Dispute Resolution | Family | Health | Intellectual Property | Tax

Quinnipiac University School of Law
Hamden, Connecticut

Back Forward Stop Refresh Home AutoFill Print Mail
Address: @www.SunraiseInc.com

Screen Printed T's
*White T's ONLY
24 minimum
1 Color, 1 side
Standard Ink
Max Size 10x13
Screen $20

Apparel Unlimited
SCREEN PRINTERS
322 Russell Street
Hadley, MA 01035
322 Russell St.
Hadley, MA 01035
413-586-7133
www.SunraiseInc.com

$5
Your Design or Logo!
*Exp. 2.28.06

Shopping for a Health Club?
Do your homework first!
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS CLUB
Has it ALL for you!

JOIN FOR THE
"WINTER SPECIAL"
15 WEEKS $209
$377 COUPLE $188
WWW.HAMPFIT.COM

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club

WHAT DO YOU GET?
Full Sized Indoor Pool • Aqua Aerobics
Cybex Nautilus Circuit • Cybex Free Weights
Full Court Basketball • Volleyball • Indoor Tennis
Cardio • Saunas • Indoor Cycling
Jacuzzi • Yoga, Pilates • Aerobics/Step/Bosu

COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL WITH JERRY
MONDAY & THURSDAY 6-8 PM

NO INITIATION FEE OR LONG-TERM CONTRACT NECESSARY

90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill) Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10PM MON-FRI • 8AM-9PM SAT & SUN

Crisp joins Red Sox

By HOWARD ULMAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — New Boston center fielder Coco Crisp avoided arbitration by agreeing Monday to a $2.75 million, one-year contract with the Red Sox, who also announced their $3 million deal with free-agent shortstop Alex Gonzalez.

The 26-year-old Crisp was traded to Boston last month after Johnny Damon agreed to sign with the New York Yankees. He inherits Damon's center field job and leadoff position in a lineup expected to include five new starters, four acquired after last season.

Crisp hit .300 with 16 homers and 69 RBIs for Cleveland last year, while Damon batted .316 with 10 homers and 75 RBIs.

The switch-hitting Crisp had asked for $3.05 million in arbitration and the Red Sox had offered $2.35 million, making the settlement at the midpoint. He made $364,900 last year, his fourth season in the majors.

Crisp also would get an additional $25,000 if he makes 625 plate appearances. The Red Sox offered Damon a $40 million, four-year deal but he chose the Yankees' $52 million, four-year offer.

Boston obtained Crisp on Jan. 27 along with reliever David Riske and catcher Josh Bard for reliever Guillermo Mota, third base prospect Andy Marte, minor league catcher Kelly Shoppach, a player to be named and cash.

The Red Sox avoided needing any arbitration hearings. Pitcher Josh Beckett, acquired from Florida during the offseason, agreed Saturday to a one-year deal worth $4,325,000. Bronson Arroyo earlier got an $11.25 million, three-year contract.

To make room for Gonzalez, the Red Sox designated first baseman Roberto Petagine for assignment. Gonzalez hit .264 with five homers and 45 RBIs last season, down from 23 homers and 79 RBIs the previous year, when he hit .232.

JUSTIN BAIR/BOSTON HERALD/KRT JOURNAL

Centerfielder Coco Crisp signed a one-year, $2.75 million contract with the Red Sox. He hit .300 for Cleveland last season.

Ward takes place among greats

By Joe Kay
Associated Press

DETROIT — Ben Roethlisberger's pass floated right toward his hands. Hines Ward made sure he got both feet down in the end zone, then started closing his fingers around the ball.

Remarkably, he dropped it.

No excuses. The Pittsburgh Steelers' top receiver flat-out dropped it.

"The great ones don't miss balls in the Super Bowl," Ward said. "And I want to be considered one of the great ones."

Before this Super Bowl ended, Ward would get more chances to prove he deserves to be counted among the greats. And, he wouldn't bumble those chances away.

Ward completed an MVP performance Sunday by catching a 43-yard touchdown pass from receiver Antwaan Randle El, a trick play that became the decisive play in the Steelers' 21-10 victory over the Seattle Seahawks.

Pittsburgh's Lynn Swann won the Super Bowl MVP in 1976 for making one big catch after another against Dallas, including a diving grab of a tipped ball that makes all of the Super Bowl highlight reels.

Ward's game wasn't nearly as memorable – that end zone drop was just his most glaring mistake – but it was good enough to win the MVP award in a ragged game that came down to two big plays.

"To be named MVP is a great honor, but I still left some plays out on the field," Ward said. "I could have had an even better day."

Same for Roethlisberger, who at age 23 became the youngest quarterback to win a Super Bowl even though he finished with the worst passer rating by any winning quarterback – 22.6. Play after play, he played down to his age.

Jerome Bettis, Detroit's favorite son, gained only 43 yards in what turned out to be his final game, a nondescript performance by one of football's most unforgettable runners.

In fact, the entire Pittsburgh offense had little to crow about, other than two plays that were enough to bring coach Bill Cowher his first championship.

The first was some old-fashioned rust-belt offense: hand the ball off and clear a path. Pulling left guard Alan Faneca opened a huge hole for Willie Parker on the second play of the second half, setting up a 75-yard touchdown run that was the longest in Super Bowl history.

"It was a great play when it was called," Parker said. "They called it at the right time, and Faneca just paved the way."

That play alone could have been enough – should have been enough. But Roethlisberger wasn't up to it, throwing an interception near the goal line with a chance to put it away.

The Steelers would need one more score. And Ward would get it by teaming with the Steelers' most versatile player.

Randle El was the X-factor in Super Bowl XL, the college quarterback turned receiver who can catch the ball, run with it or throw it. He had already thrown a 51-yard touchdown pass this season in a victory over Cleveland.

Offensive coordinator Ken Whisenhunt decided to include the same play in his Super Bowl playbook, and Pittsburgh waited for the perfect time to call it.

The Steelers were conservative all game, getting away from the air-it-out approach that helped them win three playoffs games on the road. The last thing the Seahawks expected was a trick play with everything in the balance.

"When we called it, my eyes lit up and I had to try to not give it away," Randle El said.

Parker took a pitchout from Roethlisberger, who then turned himself into a blocker. Randle El got the ball from Parker and ran to his right, making it look like a reverse. The Seahawks fell for it.

Ward ran down the field and right past the duped safeties, who were convinced it was a run. By the time they figured out what was happening, Ward had run by them.

This one was easy.

"Certainly this is a team that uses guys like me," Randle El said. "That's what we do, use all the versatility we have on this team to get it done."

It was the first Super Bowl touchdown pass thrown by a receiver, taking its place on the list of title game trickery. Dallas closed out a 27-10 win over Denver in 1978 with Robert Newhouse's 29-yard option pass to Golden Richards.

Road wins rewarding for Steelers

STEELERS from page 10

"It was 'Just tell us where we're going next, just send us off to another team,'" Cowher said Monday. "I think the guys thrived on that. With all due respect to Heinz Field, we just kept going off [on the road]."

Cowher and his players felt something special building weeks ago, and so could Hall of Famer Greene, who now works in their personnel department. When Greene had lunch with Cowher on Saturday, he looked at the coach and said, "You guys got it, don't you?"

Cowher replied the team was in a zone. It's a zone they didn't leave even during some rough times against the Seahawks that included two interceptions thrown by Roethlisberger.

"We had a chance to make history, and that motivated me a little more," center Jeff Hartings said. "You can make history by going 16-0 and winning the Super Bowl and we did the opposite. We made history by winning as a sixth seed." They did so after Cowher recited some American history.

To motivate his players when they were 7-5 and the playoffs were in doubt, Cowher related – and here's a never-before-used coaching ploy – Christopher Columbus' journey to America in 1492 and how many told him it was an impossible trip.

"There's a lot of people telling you that you can't do it but, you know what, that doesn't mean you don't go try," Cowher said. "Don't let your journey be defined by history, let your journey make history."

Bettis took his place in NFL history by retiring as the league's No. 5 career rusher after finally winning a Super Bowl in his 13th season, and in his hometown of Detroit. What is still to be seen is how Bettis' departure affects the team's locker room – "This is the closest team we've ever had," Cowher said – and this team's future.

The core components are relatively young, which should make the Steelers contenders for years: the 23-year-old Roethlisberger, the youngest QB to win a Super Bowl; Willie Parker, the running back who starred for a Super Bowl champion after not starting in college; Super Bowl MVP receiver Hines Ward; All-Pro guard Alan Faneca; safety Troy Polamalu; nose tackle Casey Hampton; linebackers Joey Porter and James Farrior.

"This will make coach Cowher even hungrier," defensive end Aaron Smith said. "He will enjoy this, but come next season he'll be even hungrier to get back here."

There will be the inevitable changes created by free agency. Eleven players can become unrestricted free agents, including Antwaan Randle El, who threw the first Super Bowl touchdown pass by a wide receiver; defensive end Kimo von Oelhoffen, cornerback Deshea Townsend, safety Chris Hope, backup quarterback Charlie Batch and running back Verron Haynes. Starting cornerback Ike Taylor is a restricted free agent.

And while Cowher cited Columbus to inspire his team, maybe he also should have quoted Robert Frost's poem "The Road Not Taken."

Frost wrote: "I took the road less traveled by, and that has made all the difference."

The Steelers took the road less traveled, too, and what a difference it made.

JOSHUA HANEL/AP-A PRESS

Bill Cowher raises the Lombardi trophy after 14 years at the helm in Pittsburgh, quieting doubters who claimed he could not win the big game.

Second-year quarterback Ben Roethlisberger celebrates his late-game touchdown. His 22.6 quarterback rating was the worst in Super Bowl history.

TE FOR SPO
SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.C

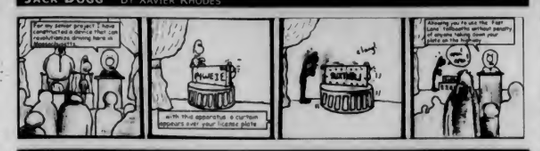
STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Dance Stuff
Starting a dance class?
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs
220 N. Pleasant Street
253.5201

Photos available at www.eaglecrestmanagement.com
Need a house or condo for the 2005-2006 school year?
Eagle Crest
Property Management
73 Main St. Amherst, 01002
Call or stop by today
256-3442

Does Your Group Need Money?
The UMass Amherst Alumni Association helps RSO's and other student organizations to fund projects that will improve and enhance student life.
Awards are limited to $2,000 per applicant group per academic year.
Visit UMassAlumni.com for an application and grant guidelines today!
For more information call the Alumni Association at 545-2317.

THE BOLTWOOD PROJECT™
(36 years of service – and counting!)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)
REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2006 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for meetings •Feb. 6th (Mon) •Feb. 8th (Wed)
Feb. 7th (Tues) meeting will be held in room 168C of the Campus Center
*Assignment notification ONLY. Hours, Feb. 9th at Bolkwood table CC Concourse.
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!



FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN By Rainy Stanford

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

JACK DOGG By Xavier Rhodes

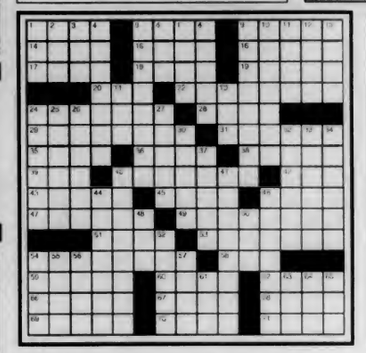
THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Love is or it ain't. Thin love ain't love at all."

—Toni Morrison



ACROSS
1 Pub missile
5 Clenched hand
9 Climb
14 Felipe or Moises
15 Italian eight
16 Polite
17 Tamiess cat
18 Plant anchor
19 Bikini for one
20 Wind dir.
22 Arrest papers
24 Follows secretly
28 Set down
29 Wide view
31 Looked at furtively
35 St. crossers
36 Wealthy
38 One bound in servitude
39 "Leaving New York" group
40 Competitor
42 Decay
43 Shoot from cover
45 Employ
46 Arthur or Veronica
47 Accompany
49 Lowers in dignity
51 Travel paper
53 Inflatable life jacket
54 Lack of punctuality
58 Plaything
59 Ignited
60 Pueblo people
62 Give off
66 Declaims violently
67 Returned call?
68 Went by car
69 Heavy cloth
70 External layer
71 Former ugly duckling

DOWN
1 Hoover or Grand Coulee
2 Auburn U's state
3 Howard or Ely
4 Formal suits
5 Alert ahead of time
6 Simpson judge
7 Put away
8 Wreck beyond repair
9 Most alarming
10 Stronghold
11 Bard's river
12 Light, happy tune
13 Building extensions
21 Negative connector
23 Rhythmic pater
24 Meager
25 Places of refuge
26 Listless and weak
27 Cough drop brothers
30 Unpleasantly pungent
32 March
33 Calls forth
34 Hare
37 Saraglio
40 Uncanny state
41 Denial
44 Indolence
46 Attorneys
48 Half an African fly?
50 Antique auto
52 Fire residue
54 Clarified fat
55 Long way off
56 Singer Turner
57 Hit hard
61 Greek letter
63 Hay storage
64 Actress Lupino
65 Sawbuck

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEMP! Wireless Internet
Irish Pub
FEBRUARY SPECIAL!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
TONIGHT · Trivia Night!
Trivia Night!
Trivia Night!
WED · Cold Duck Complex
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. · N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You have an unknown palette for dog biscuits.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Do the most random activity offered to you this weekend.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
People with shaved heads look crazy, but they're not... You can take 'em.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Today is your day. Today you are going to fly.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
You are the Eggman, not the Walrus. Coo Coo Ka Choo.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Do a selfless act for others to make yourself feel better.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Have the fish, you'll be pleasantly surprised.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You seriously need to see T2: Judgment Day. That movie freakin' rocks!

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
If you carry it in the open, he will come (and arrest you.)

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You're selfish, embrace this fact, and "do you."

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Learn a new trick, it shall be your salvation later in life my child.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
To overcome the spider's curse, simply quote a bible verse.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Be and do something bigger than yourself in college Learn, Lead, and Succeed Army ROTC www.umass.edu/armyrotc

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherst-lincolnrealty.com 253-7879

CHILDCARE

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part-time Spring – full time

CHILDCARE

Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email: fjmoonev@msn.com

EMPLOYMENT

Needed NVIVO tutor. Call 253-0691

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 800-766-7174

Rent us your Ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

Spring & Summer Help Needed: Excellent Earning Potential working outdoors providing exterior carpenter ant treatments to residential customers. Reliable vehicle required (mileage compensation paid). Must be 18 years or older and certified with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by passing the Core Applicator Exam (information, all necessary study materials and payment of exam fees will by provided for qualified individuals). Apply in Person. No Phone Calls

EMPLOYMENT

Please. Minuteman Pest Control 90 Conz Street, Northampton, MA 01060 (across from Hampshire Gazette Building)

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288 / email: fjmoonev@msn.com

INSTRUCTION

Pioneer Valley Boxing School. Go to www.westernmassboxing.com

MISCELLANEOUS

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.athenashn.com/goddess/910

ROOM FOR RENT

Great Sunrise/sunset bedroom available 'til May. Overlooking UMass Agricultural Center / Stadium. Walk to campus. Renovated 3 bedroom apt. $200/month (413) 665-7313

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1988 Hottest Destinations – Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $159 www.sunsplashtours.com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Collegian Advertising: Open 9am - 3:30pm M-F Campus Center Basement (413) 545-3500

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

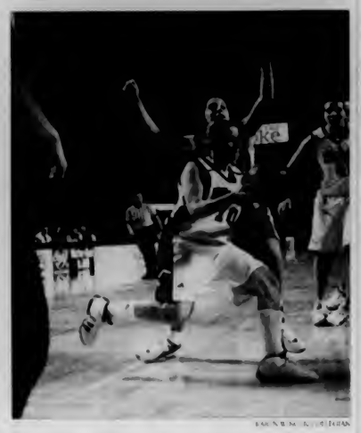
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2006 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UM keeps on rolling

By DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The wins keep on coming for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, as it defeated Saint Joseph's (15-7 7-4 A-10) 63-53 Sunday afternoon at the Mullins Center. Seniors Katie Nelson and Patrycja Gulak had career days as the Minutewomen notched their fifth win their last six games.

UMass (8-14 5-6 A-10) will be back in action when they take on Fordham at 2 p.m. Sunday at the Mullins Center.



Nelson and Gulak led the Minutewomen in scoring with 15 points each, while junior Tamara Tatham tallied 14 points of her own. Nelson hit three first-half 3-pointers to break the all-time record of 179, which was previously held by Beth Kuzmeski.

Nelson was all over the stat sheets on Sunday, tallying her first career double-double while dishing out a career-high 10 assists.

"I was just trying to relax and put my shots in," Nelson said after the win. "It was a great day all around. I have to do as much as I can to help my team. I'm going to give the assists to my teammates, and they are going to put the ball in the basket."

UMass' two leading scorers, sophomores Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills combined for just 11 points, but UMass coach Marnie Dacko was pleased that she could rely on other players to carry some of the load.

"I was very happy that we came out of the gates ready to go," Dacko said. "We managed to get scoring out of Patrycja [Gulak], Tamara [Tatham] and Katie [Nelson]. Pam [Rosanio] and Kate [Mills] didn't have a great scoring game, so it was really good for us that other people stepped up."

KARIN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt senior Katie Nelson tallied her first career double-double in Sunday's game against St. Joe's, scoring 15 points and adding 10 assists.

UMass began the game with back-to-back baskets from T. Tatham and Gulak. The Minutewomen continued their strong first half by taking a 19-6 lead nearly eight minutes into the game.

UMass shot 65 percent from the field in the first half and had a 36-31 lead after the first 20 minutes of play and never lost the lead.

Saint Joseph's had a more impressive showing in the second half, as it battled back and tied the game at 44-44 with back-to-back 3-pointers. The Hawks then took their first lead of the game when Faith Schutte hit a free throw with less than nine minutes remaining in regulation.

See W HOOPS on page 7

Ford thanks fans for support

By ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It was a different weekend at the Mullins Center.

The Massachusetts hockey team stunned the No. 3 Boston College Eagles on Friday night with a 3-2 score and gave the Massachusetts men's basketball team the leftover fan enthusiasm on Saturday. Students filled the student sections and everything was primed for a college basketball atmosphere.

The Minutemen defeated Rhode Island by two points in a nail-biter, and the rematch between the conference rivals yielded some quirky moments on the side.

SPECIAL THANKS

As the clock wound down on Saturday's game and Minuteman victory seemed certain, UMass coach Travis Ford walked along the sideline to shake URI coach Jim Baron's hand. But after the greeting he made a bee-line for press row and took the arena microphone.

"We couldn't have done it without you," Ford said to the exiting crowd. "We needed this one."

In the same sequence, junior captains Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme showed their appreciation to the student fans, burrowing their way into the mob of students behind one of the baskets, high-fiving enthused UMass fans ... Walk-on freshman Nana Ampim, after receiving minimal playing time so far this season, made an appearance in the Minuteman lineup just before half-time of Saturday game. The London native was assigned to guard URI's leading scorer, Dawan Robinson and fared well against one of the more lethal offensive players in the league.

"It's been talked about for a while," Ford said about Ampim receiving more playing time. "He is the best defender on our team. I've definitely thought about [putting him in] before."

DINGLE ALL THE WAY

Former UMass forward Dana Dingle was on hand to see the Minutemen on Saturday. He sat behind the UMass bench and when his attendance was announced over the public address system, he received a standing ovation from the 6,902 fans in the building. Dingle started 107 of 113 games for UMass from his sophomore year in 1993 to his graduation in 1996. He scored 1,043 points in his four-year career, and ranks first all-time in games played for the Minutemen with 137.

MULLINS MAGIC

UMass just doesn't lose at home. It is as simple as that. The Minutemen are a different team when they're in Amherst. Although their road record is a brutal 2-9, the Minutemen have broken even thus far because of their continued success at home. UMass is going for its 13th straight victory at the Mullins Center tomorrow night against La Salle and is 8-0 this season when playing in front of friendly fans. The team's current home winning streak is the longest active streak in the Atlantic 10 and the 10th longest active streak in the nation.

FAN-TASTIC

UMass, despite a mediocre 10-9 overall record, is averaging 4,888 fans per home game. The Mullins Center holds almost 10,000 people and has not filled this many seats since the 2001-02 season when the average attendance was 5,292.

SIGNS OF LIFE

Junior James Life is averaging 16.3 points over the last four games and was bombs-away from 3-point land against URI on Sunday, scoring 19 points that were punctuated by a clutch leaner with just over a minute left in the game.

KARIN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Junior James Life dropped 19 points on Rhode Island in Saturday night's rematch. It was his second straight game with 19 points.

UMass bounces back on slopes

By JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Nearly a month after the University of Connecticut Carnival's giant slalom took place, the second half of the carnival, the slalom, was finally held in Cranmore, New Hampshire.

The Massachusetts men's ski team bounced back from a disappointing Saturday to place second in Sunday's slalom event.

The next event for both the men and women will be the Boston College Carnival slalom this Saturday, followed by the giant slalom on Sunday.

With their best skier (Rush Hawkins) not on the slopes, the men raced into second place overall on Sunday behind strong performances by sophomore Jason Small, seniors Pat Bachant and Patrick Hofer.

Small placed first individually, his second victory of the season. Bachant and Hofer followed, as both finished in the top ten.

"[Jason] has been skiing great all season for us. If I mess up he always takes over for me and does well," junior Rush Hawkins said.

Hawkins did not compete in the event after falling hard in Saturday's giant slalom at the Brown Carnival. He damaged his equipment during the fall and injured his shin, forcing him to sit out Sunday's competition.

"I put my boots on and tried to go out for a practice run, and it just wasn't going to happen," Hawkins said of his leg injury.

He injured both shins entering the giant slalom portion of the UConn Carnival over a month ago, but was able to ski to victory. A month later, an entirely new, more severe injury to one of his shins kept him out of the postponed slalom portion of the event.

The women's team had two skiers in the top ten on Sunday, as Eliza Hawkins finished second individually, and Shaleighne Collins also had a top ten finish, her fourth of the season.

Senior Caitlin Doughty, a regular top ten finisher for the Minutewomen, crashed Sunday, injuring her left knee. She was taken to the hospital that day, where it was discovered she strained two ligaments in her knee.

Doughty was released from the hospital the same day and an MRI is scheduled later this week.

After the weekend's races, both the men and women maintained their place in the top three of the ECSC standings. UMass remains the only school with both a men's and women's team in the top three of the conference standings.

The men are currently third behind Colby-Sawyer and Plymouth State, while the women are a close second to frontrunner Boston College.

Sunday marked the third event this season that defending national champion Rush Hawkins has either failed to finish or compete. Despite Hawkins placing first in every event he has finished, teammate Jason Small is now the front runner for the season's individual ECSC championship.

With two first place and three second place finishes, Small has failed to finish in only one race this season. Saturday's Brown Carnival giant slalom, where he fell during his second run.

Because the league deducts points for unfinished races, Small has pulled ahead of Hawkins in the season's individual standings following the weekend's results.

Strong showing for track teams

By DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams went to Kingston, R.I., Friday for the Rhode Island Mega Meet. Both teams placed third — the men out of six teams, the women out of five.

The final results for the men were UNH with 181 total points, URI (174), UMass (141.5), Brown University (64), Central Connecticut State University (34), Quinnipiac University (30) and the University of Hartford (25.5).

UMass had three first-place finishers in senior James Godinho, sophomore Sean Caliechio and senior Jonathan Korhonen.

Godinho finished the 800-meter run with a time of 1 minute, 57.28 seconds, Caliechio won the shot put event with a mark of 15.08 meters, which he achieved on his last throw, and Korhonen took the 3000-meter run with a time of 8:33.20.

Minuteman Erik Hoagland also had a very productive day, placing second in both the long jump and triple jump, as well as finishing fifth in the 55-meter dash.

He recorded marks of 7.01 meters and 13.29 meters, while running a time of 6.61 in the 55-meter dash.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien mentioned that whether it was sprints, hurdles, jumps, distance runs or throwing events, he felt his team gave a "good performance across the board."

"I thought the team performed very well," O'Brien said. "We had a lot of enthusiasm. We had some good efforts on all the events."

He noticed that not only did his team's performance improve, but the spirit and execution also increased.

The results for the women were URI (206 points), Brown (183), UMass (122), Quinnipiac (52), Central Connecticut State (45.5) and Hartford (32).

"I thought the meet went fairly well," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "We lost to Brown and URI. We're not at their level at this point in time. So that was not surprising."

However, the Minutewomen had plenty of solid performances to finish runner-up to two of the Atlantic-10 conference juggernauts.

Freshman Jordan Veney continued to be red-hot for the Maroon and White, breaking the UMass indoor shot put record for the second time this season.

With a mark of 44 feet, .5 inches, she passed her own record of 43-3 3/4 that she set on Jan. 27 at the Boston Reebok Indoor Games.

Veney also took third in the weight throw with a distance of 44-11.

Other girls who placed first in their events were sophomores Kristen Bakanowski, Kay Callahan and Christina DeRosa, freshman Dionise Miranda and senior Elisabeth Budd.

Though sick all week long, Bakanowski won yet another pole-vault event, this time with a height of 11-5 1/4. The win

See TRACK on page 7

Super Bowl commercials turn violent, draw praise from viewers

By SETH SUTEL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Cartoon-ish violence ruled the day at the annual knockdown competition among advertisers Sunday, as Bud Light, Diet Pepsi, Michelob and Sprint all used physical gags to hawk their wares at the Super Bowl, the most-watched television broadcast of the year.

Borrowing inspiration from Buster Keaton, advertisers used mauling bears, flying dinosaurs and even action movie star Jackie Chan to wow viewers with sight gags.

Others went against the grain, such as soap brand Dove, which sent a tender message about self-esteem among teenage girls, and Toyota, which celebrated a bilingual father and son who switch easily between Spanish and English.

In a spot that was reminiscent of the classic short film "Bambi Meets Godzilla," a hapless caveman is squished under the foot of a giant dinosaur, a final insult after being fired for not using FedEx to deliver an important parcel. Never mind that FedEx hasn't been invented yet.

Michelob Ultra Amber harkened back to a classic Super Bowl spot featuring Terry Tate as an "office linebacker." A game of touch football goes awry when a petite female player is floored by a vicious tackle, but she gets her due later in a bar with a decidedly late hit.

Bruce Vanden Bergh, professor of advertising at Michigan State University, spent Super Bowl Sunday with more than a dozen other faculty watching and rating the commercials while ignoring the football part of the broadcast entirely. One of the standouts for his group was the FedEx spot featuring the caveman, which they found "very creative, and very original."

Bud Light, one of the biggest heavyweights of the Super Bowl every year, had an interesting multi-part ad featuring a guy who cleverly disguises his fridge stocked with beer from his thirsty friends with a secret revolving door that places the fridge in his neighbors' apartment. Hilarity ensues when the neighboring kids start worshipping the "magic fridge."

Diet Pepsi got into the act as well with a stunt movie gag starring Jackie Chan and a can of Diet Pepsi. Everything seems to be going fine with the movie shoot until Diet Pepsi's stunt double, a hapless can of rival Diet Coke, is squashed.

Sprint, meanwhile, scored laughs with a goofy spot featuring a guy in a locker room who touts the "crime deterrent" ability of his mobile phone –by hurling straight at the head of another guy after tempting him to try to steal his wallet.

A spot for Dove soap also resonated with viewers, sending a serious message about improving self-esteem among teenage girls – not the usual Super Bowl fare.

That spot was a favorite among a group of 35 business students at the Kellogg School of Management in Evanston, Ill. Tim Calkins, a professor of marketing at the school who organized the panel to rate and discuss the ads, said his group found the Dove ad the "most distinctive" of the ones they saw.

"It was unusual, but one that really resonated," Calkins said. "This was a message that was very serious, but it really worked with the panel."

Steelers take long road to success

By ALAN ROBINSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — The Pittsburgh Steelers owned the easy road to the Super Bowl all those years they squandered home-field advantage, all those years coach Bill Cowher's teams couldn't stand up to the pressure, the moment, the challenge.

Maybe this is what was needed to bring out the best in a team that often was among the NFL's top teams, but never played like it when it counted most: the toughest road to a Super Bowl championship.

No team had won three road playoff games and then the Super Bowl, much less by beating the top three teams in its conference and the best from the opposing conference. Making the challenge even greater, the Steelers had to win their final four regular-season games just to reach the playoffs.

"It feels so much better to do something people say you can't do," linebacker Joey Porter said after the Steelers won their first Super Bowl in 26 years by beating the Seattle Seahawks 21-10 Sunday night. "There's no better feeling than that. We will always be remembered for the way we did it."

After going from 15-1 a year ago to an underachieving 11-5 during a regular season marked by injuries — quarterback Ben Roethlisberger was out four weeks with two knee problems — and a three-game losing streak, the Steelers fit a career's worth of highlights into a month's worth of playoffs.

By doing so, those four AFC championship game losses and one Super Bowl defeat since January 1995 finally began to fade into the past, along with the perception the Steelers and their coach couldn't win the big one.

Even Terry Bradshaw, Joe Greene, Franco Harris and Lynn Swann, stars of the Steelers' four Super Bowl champions of the 1970s, never put together anything like this championship run of a lifetime.

The Steelers rallied from 10 points down to win at Cincinnati, helped by an early injury to Bengals star quarterback Carson Palmer. They beat Super Bowl favorite Indianapolis 21-18 in a stunning upset that will be long remembered for Jerome Bettis' late-game fumble that nearly turned a certain victory into a historic defeat, and the Roethlisberger tackle that made certain it didn't.

That victory carried them to a 34-17 AFC championship game win at Denver. Then, after a bye week that drained some of their momentum after they won seven games in seven weeks, they shook off Roethlisberger's first pour game in two months and a sluggish start to beat the Seahawks.

See STEELERS on page 8

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY · EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2006 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 73

UMass to propose a 3.4 percent tuition hike

By MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts President Jack Wilson will submit a tuition fee hike of 3.4 percent tomorrow at the UMass administration and finance committee meeting.

If the committee recommends the proposal, the full Board of Trustees will vote on it the following Wednesday.

In response, the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts has drafted two motions that, if accepted, would have a dramatic effect on the admission and tuition policies of the school.

The SGA, led by student trustee Valerie Louis, is working with the Graduate Student Senate, the Graduate Employee Organization and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy to present two motions to the Board of Trustees during their meeting in February.

One motion, hoping to put a stop to the increasing tuition fees, calls for mandatory fee-freezes at all five campuses. The proposed freeze would prevent the Board of Trustees from raising mandatory undergraduate student fees for the 2006-07 academic years.

According to a report conducted by the Undergraduate Student Charges Fact Sheet, the cost of mandatory fees for an in-state undergraduate to attend UMass has increased nearly 100 percent within the last five years.

SGA leaders were also angered by last year's fee increase, which came after Board of Trustees spokesman Robert Connolly told the Associated Press that he was confident that students wouldn't have to pay for more funding gaps.

"We feel comfortable that we can run the ship with this amount of fee revenue," Connolly told the AP.

According to a recent USA Today survey, UMass Amherst is the fifth most expensive of the country's 67 public flagship schools. Without room and board, the average UMass student pays $9,278.

A Boston Globe report printed in December, 2005 found that the percentage of UMass students drawn from the lowest income categories recorded on financial aid documents had been reduced by half over the last five years.

The "fee-freeze" motion will be presented at the Feb. 9 BOT Administration and Finance subcommittee meeting at 8 a.m.

UMass Chancellor John Lombardi blamed the tuition hike on the decrease in state funding.

"Tuition in public universities is low when the state pays most of the expenses, and high when the state pays less of the expenses. As state funding for higher education institutions declines, tuition and fees rise," said Lombardi.

SGA members are also concerned with building a student body that more adequately represents the population of youths graduating from Massachusetts' high schools in racial and socially economic terms.

SGA leaders have pointed to statistics showing that certain segments of the population, particularly African-Americans and Latinos and Latinas, are underrepresented at the UMass flagship campus.

According to statistics compiled by the Department of Education, African-Americans and Latinos make up 7.3 percent of the entering class at UMass, although they made up over 17 percent of the 12th grade population in Massachusetts in the 2004-05 academic years.

SGA President Pavel Payano and other SGA members will travel to UMass Dartmouth in order to present their "fee-freeze" motion, hoping to prevent the administrations newest tuition hike.

Film examines the struggle of the black athlete

By RYAN RICHARDSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Athleticism can often be trivialized in academic environments. Monday night's screening of the HBO documentary "The Journey of the African-American Athlete" sought to emphasize the role that black athletes played in the struggle for civil rights and equality both on and off the field.

Professor Stephen Jefferson was unable to attend the event as originally scheduled, so the open discussion portion of the event was canceled, and turnout for the event was low.

"Since the Super Bowl was yesterday, we thought that this would be a good thing to show," said Maria Gomes, a junior who works at the Sylvan Cultural Center. Gomes wished that attendance would have been higher and expressed hope that Professor Jefferson could reschedule the discussion for a later time.

The film, narrated by Samuel L. Jackson, follows the struggle of black athletes in America as they attempt to gain recognition for their talent and compete on the same level and in the same leagues as whites. Journey draws upon the familiar stories of iconic black athletes who broke color barriers and came to stand as symbols of American excellence abroad at a time when they were still treated as second class citizens at home. The film points out how black athletes came to be accepted by white America and helped to pave the way for further civil rights reform and equality.

The film also looked into the question of how black athletes used their position as celebrities in order to discuss racial issues like the Jim Crow laws and prejudice. Many black athletes like Bill Russell rose to the occasion and others like Jim Brown used their money and celebrity status to fan the flames of entrepreneurship in the African-American community. It closed by looking at how strongly America has embraced its black male athletes with endorsement deals and near superhuman status in the case of Michael Jordan.

As of this time, it is unclear if the discussion will be rescheduled for later on during the month as Professor Jefferson and the sponsors of the event were not available for comment.

Resident immunologist to lead development of new vaccine

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

HADLEY — The University of Massachusetts announced yesterday that it will lead a global effort to develop vaccines and tests for infectious animal diseases that threaten food supplies, such as mad cow disease and avian influenza, through funding by the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA).

UMass veterinary immunologist Cynthia Baldwin will lead the project, which was announced during a press conference at the Hadley Farm, just outside campus.

"Many diseases, in addition to being a health threat, have the potential to endanger global food supplies and national economies," said Joseph Jen, USDA undersecretary for research, education and economics. "UMass Amherst took the lead in recognizing the need to coordinate an international effort — it will produce critical tools that can be used immediately by scientists in their research areas." The USDA is funding the initiative with a $2.1 million grant to develop these biological tools, known as reagents, according to the UMass News Office.

The U.S. Veterinary Immune Reagent Network will coordinate the research, which will focus on economically important livestock, such as cattle, poultry, horses, swine, catfish and salmonids. More than 40 scientists from universities, USDA labs and the industry will participate in the research.

While the general public is most familiar with publicized diseases such as mad cow and bird flu, less well-known illnesses like infectious bursal disease in poultry cost the U.S economy millions of dollars each year. To combat diseases that are of greatest concern to industry and agriculture, the network will consult with an international advisory board of scientists and industry stakeholders, including representatives from groups such as the Catfish Farmers of America and National Milk Producers Federation, according to the UMass News Office.

FOCUS WILL BE ON SIX ECONOMICALLY IMPORTANT SPECIES

CATFISH

The leading aquaculture in the U.S., catfish has reached an annual value of $425 million in 2003. About 45 percent of inventory losses on catfish fingerling farms are attributable to various infectious diseases, according to the USDA.

CATTLE

The $78 billion U.S. beef industry is still feeling the effects of the mad cow disease outbreaks in the nation that occurred in June 2005 and December 2003. Besides mad cow, other diseases of concern include Johne's disease, a chronic wasting disease brought on by bacterium related to tuberculosis, which causes serious production loss in cattle, sheep and other ruminants.

HORSES

Diseases caused by parasites and infections are still a serious threat to the equines, a multi-billion dollar industry. The impacts of these diseases have resulted in outbreaks of equine herpesvirus-mediated neurological diseases, which caused the death of a number of horses and prompted quarantines at racetracks and training facilities, to outbreaks of equine influenza and strangles, resulting in significant interruptions in horse-related activities.

POULTRY

Marek's disease, respiratory diseases, infectious bursal disease (Gumboro) and coccidiosis are all major poultry diseases that result in loss of productivity. Increasing regulations and bans on the use of anticoccidial drugs and the increasing costs of developing new drugs underscore the need for developing novel approaches and alternative control strategies for many poultry diseases, said Ed Blagoszewski, UMass spokesperson.

SALMONIDS

Salmonids are plagued by a variety of pathogens that result in severe losses for the American aquaculture industry and for wild and hatchery stocks. Major ailments include bacterial kidney disease, a chronic infection that can be difficult to control and virtually impossible to cure.

SWINE

Disease caused by porcine reproductive and respiratory syndrome virus (PRRSV) is the major threat to swine operations today. It appeared in the U.S. in 1987. While the total cost to the industry is difficult to assess, estimates suggest the financial impact of PRRSV is likely to exceed $500 million annually.

War costs, defense budget rising

By LOLITA C. BALDOR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The military must continue to change in order to defend the nation against enemy terrorists who could acquire a nuclear weapon or launch an anthrax attack against a major U.S. city, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Tuesday.

"No nation, no matter how powerful, has the resources or capability to defend everywhere, at every time, against every conceivable type of attack," said Rumsfeld in remarks prepared for delivery to the Senate Armed Services Committee. "The only way to protect the American people, therefore, is to provide our military with as wide a range of capabilities, rather than preparing to confront any one particular threat."

He defended Pentagon plans to cut back initial funding for National Guard troops and restructure their units, saying the Guard must be reorganized so that it is better able to play a key role in homeland security.

"Change is hard at any time, but the changes are essential because we are at war," Rumsfeld said in his prepared remarks. "The recent demands on the force — and the threats our country faces in the global war on terror — have made these long overdue changes even more urgently needed. And this is an historic opportunity to get it right."

His comments were aimed at addressing concerns expressed by members of Congress about whether the Pentagon is spending enough on troop levels and equipment that is damaged and destroyed in Iraq and Afghanistan. Rumsfeld also outlined the Pentagon's plans to continue to transform the military into a more agile, flexible fighting force, better able to face elusive and determined terrorists in the 21st century.

Under the current 2006 budget, the Army received $5.286 billion to pay for 350,000 Guard troops. In the proposed 2007 budget, which begins Oct. 1, the Army would receive $5.253 billion to fund only the current number of Guard troops, about 333,000.

But defense officials have said that if recruitment goes up, the Army will find the money to pay for as many soldiers as the Guard can recruit, up to a maximum of 350,000.

Rumsfeld said the Pentagon's proposed $439.3 billion budget will help pay for the military's transformation into a more flexible fighting force. Transformation includes large spending increases in special operations forces, unmanned vehicles, foreign language skills and gathering intelligence.

The new plan includes White House estimates that the country's two overseas wars and its homeland defense could cost as much as $10 billion a month this year — nearly 50 percent more than last year, the White House estimates.

Three students arrested on multiple drug charges

Amherst detectives, along with Massachusetts State Police, arrested three individuals at 10:15 a.m. Friday, on multiple charges including drug possession.

Conally A. Kight, 22, of 46 Archer Street, Wrentham, Mass along with Christopher C. Adair, 22, and Christopher J. Gorham, 23, of 224 Belchertown Rd., Amherst, were arrested Friday for possession of a class D substance (Marijuana). Adair was additionally charged with possession of a Class C substance, (psilocybin mushrooms) and possession of a Class B substance (MDMA, Ecstasy), with intent to distribute.

Police assigned to the Northwestern District Attorney's office executed a search warrant of the residence. The warrant issued follows a two-month on-going investigation from both state and local law enforcement agencies into the illegal sale of illicit drugs, according to a press release from Amherst police.

While this involves Umass students, all three individuals were arraigned Friday in Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley. The case currently remains under investigation as the investigation evolves.

While the University of Massachusetts is aware of its social atmosphere it's also taken steps to improve the image of the University. Recently implemented alcohol reform programs include, among others, banishment of drinking games along with limiting the amount of people and alcohol in a room at any given time.

Illegal drugs are also a concern for the University, where within the last year it's seen numerous busts as well as robberies concerning illegal drugs. The University currently has strict alcohol and drug programs involving substance abuse assessment, individual and group counseling, referral and referral and multi-session alcohol education programs for UMass students.

John Fenwick/Collegian Staff

National Guard to drop by one-third in Iraq, Afghanistan

By LOLITA C. BALDOR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The National Guard and Reserves will play a much smaller role next year in Iraq and Afghanistan, dropping to less than one-fifth of overall U.S. forces there, the nation's top military officer told senators Tuesday.

In response to repeated questions about the strain on reserve forces on the front lines, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that Guard and Reserves will make up just 19 percent of the forces deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan over the next year.

Currently they make up about 30 percent of U.S. forces in those countries, Pace said. That means the planned reduction would lower the reserves' proportion of total American forces in Iraq and Afghanistan by about one-third.

There are now about 138,000 American troops in Iraq and 19,000 more in Afghanistan.

The planned reduction in reserves comes as Bush administration officials have been saying they hope to reduce the numbers of U.S. troops in Iraq this year, assuming the Iraqi government and its forces can take a wider role in the war and keeping order.

The Bush administration has been under pressure to bring more American troops home. A study commissioned by the Pentagon said last month that the wear and tear of the U.S. deployment in Iraq was beginning to wear down the Army and questioned how much longer it could continue operating there at full effectiveness.

Reserve forces have made up as much as 40 percent of U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan. The number of Army National Guard soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan peaked at 69,416 last September, with most in Iraq.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the top Army officer, told the senators that heavy use of the Guard and Reserve has given the Army time to reorganize and prepare for its regular troops to take on a broader role beginning in March.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, meanwhile, told the panel that continued corruption in Iraq could damage efforts to create a democracy there and it is up to the Iraqis to seize control and take more responsibility for their country.

"It's true that violence, corruption and criminality continue to pose challenges in Iraq" and are "so corrosive of democracy," he said.

"It's critically important that it be attacked and that the new leadership in that country be measured against their commitment to attack corruption," he added.

Rumsfeld provided no specific examples. But there have been recent allegations that some revenue from Iraq's slowly rebuilding oil industry have been siphoned to help finance the insurgency there.

Rumsfeld added that "our awareness of corruption is increasing," because coalition officials are doing more to investigate those problems within the government.

Committee chairman John Warner, R-Va., said the next six months would be critical in Iraq and will be key to the eventual withdrawal of U.S. troops and coalition forces. He said increasing problems with corruption in Iraq make it more difficult for coalition forces.

Rumsfeld faced criticism from one committee member who said the $439.3 billion defense budget for 2007 that President Bush proposed on Monday is not responsible because it doesn't reflect the billions of dollars that will be spent on Iraq and Afghanistan.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., also questioned whether the U.S. will be able to sustain necessary troop levels in Iraq, where difficult conditions are wearing down both people and equipment. A report conducted for the Pentagon drew a similar conclusion last month.

Bush proposed an initial payment of $50 billion for those wars next year, compared with $120 billion the administration says will be needed this year.

ARTS & LIVING

SORRY, WRONG NUMBER

'Stranger' demonstrates why not to produce films based on urban legends.

PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION

DANISH NOT LAUGHING

Student feels that the Danish political cartoons are causing too many to over react.

PAGE 4

WEATHER

TODAY Partly Cloudy, H33

TONIGHT Partly Cloudy, L13

TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H34°, L16

SPORTS

UMASS FACES LA SALLE

Minutemen look to avenge early loss to the Explorers.

PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael A. Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Eric Athas
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Katie Huston
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerrs O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Ian Jones
COPIES EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Kristen LaCasse
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Morgan-Ann Rousseau
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Alex Butler
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Carnei
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT SPORTS Rob Greenfield
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Tucker Merrick

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALPHA LIT., BECAME THE COLLEGE SCROLL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE 130 WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN MEMBER OF SPMS SINCE JAN. 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500 M-F 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Eric Athas
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Ian Jones
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Ginny Nichen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Sean Duram, Chris Martin

Four U.S. presidents join thousands at Coretta King's funeral

By Errin Haines
Associated Press

LITHONIA, Ga. — Four U.S. presidents joined senators, celebrities and an estimated 10,000 mourners Tuesday saying goodbye to Coretta Scott King, praised by President Bush as "one of the most admired Americans of our time."

The crowd stood as King's four children walked into New Birth Missionary Baptist Church with Bush and former presidents Clinton, Bush and Carter.

"I've come today to offer the sympathy of our entire nation at the passing of a woman who worked to make our nation whole," President Bush told the crowd.

"Coretta Scott King not only secured her husband's legacy, she built her own. Having loved a leader, she became a leader, and when she spoke, Americans listened closely," he said.

Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin said King spoke out, not just against racism, but against "the senselessness of war and the solutions for poverty."

"She sang for liberation, she sang for those who had no earthly reason to sing a song," with a voice that was heard "from the tin-top roofs of Soweto to the bomb shelters of Baghdad," Franklin said.

"The last stanza and highest note of Coretta King's freedom song remains to be sung," the mayor said. "She's gathered us here today from all walks of life and all persuasions to lift our voices in a song of freedom, equality, social and economic justice, not just for our own sake but for the sake of the children the world over."

King, who carried on her husband's dream of equality for nearly 40 years after the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s death, died Jan. 30 at the age of 78 after battling ovarian cancer and the effects of a stroke.

The four presidents, poet Maya Angelou and the Kings' children were among at least 39 people scheduled to speak during the funeral. Stevie Wonder, Michael Bolton, and Bebe and Cece Winans were slated to perform.

Delivering the eulogy fell to Kings' youngest child, Bernice, a minister at the megachurch. She was 5 when her father was assassinated in 1968 and is perhaps best remembered for the photographs of her lying in her black-veiled mother's lap during her father's funeral.

Outside the suburban church Tuesday morning, the lines to get into the funeral and to attend the final viewing of King's body started forming before 3 a.m.

"There's one word to describe going to go see Coretta — historic. It's good to finally see her at peace," said Robert Jackson, a 34-year-old financial consultant from Atlanta whose 10-year-old daughter, Ebony, persuaded him to take her to the church.

More than 160,000 mourners have waited in long lines to pay their respects at public viewings since King's body was returned to Georgia — on Monday at Ebenezer Baptist Church, where her husband preached in the 1960s, at New Birth Missionary Baptist Church on Tuesday morning, and during the weekend at the Georgia Capitol, where King became the first woman and the first black person to lie in honor there.

Egyptian government says it was not told of sinking ferry for hours

By Steven R. Hurst
Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — Egypt's presidential spokesman said Tuesday the owners of the Red Sea ferry that sank last week, drowning about 1,000 people, did not inform the government of the disaster for nearly six hours.

Suleiman Awad emerged from a Cabinet session chaired by President Hosni Mubarak to say the government first heard from owner Al Salam Maritime Transport Co. that the ship was in danger at 7 a.m. Friday and was feared sunk at 7:45 a.m.

By most accounts, the Al-Salaam Boccaccio 98 sank no later than 2 a.m., five hours earlier. Other reports say the ship sank at 1 a.m., which would have made the delay in notification at least six hours. The public did not learn of the disaster for several more hours after the government was notified.

"What really happened was that the port authority was first informed at 7 a.m. by the ship's owners that they had lost contact with the ferry," Awad said. "Forty-five minutes later, the company told port officials the ship may have sunk."

Awad said the rescue center was notified "one minute later" and a plane was over the scene of the sinking by 8 a.m.

"It was followed by another rescue plane and ships of the Egyptian fleet," he said.

The ferry set sail from Dubah, Saudi Arabia, on Thursday night, carrying more than 1,400 passengers and crew. Fierce winds whipped up a sandstorm as the vessel left port for the 130-mile crossing to Safaga.

Less than two hours into the voyage — with the ship about 40 miles off the Saudi coast — a fire broke out in the vehicle parking bay. The captain, apparently thinking the blaze had been extinguished, pressed on for Egypt, but the fire rekindled and raged out of control.

police log

Springfield man,19, caught with bottle containing marijuana

Wednesday February 1
9:14 p.m.
Wilson H. Boone, 19, of 97 Florida Street in Springfield, Mass., was arrested on charges of possession of Class D drug. An officer on duty asked for assistance after observing Boone concealing a bottle under the inner layer of his jacket pocket. When asked about the item in his pocket, Boone responded "nothing," but did comply when asked to show the bottle, which contained a green, leafy substance believed to be marijuana.

11:35 p.m.
Wanderly A. Fonseca, 21, of 294 Potwine Lane in Amherst, Mass., was arrested during a traffic stop in Lot 22. Fonseca was charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

Friday February 3
1:35 a.m.
Herbert Levy, 18, of 50 Meadow Street Unit 32 in Amherst, and Christopher Alonzo Gray, 21, of 30 Gate House Road in Amherst, were arrested on charges of Assault and Battery with a Dangerous Weapon (shod foot). Police responded to a disturbance call outside of John Adams dormitory, where officers found one individual with a four-inch laceration above his left eye. Witnesses reported that the victim had been kicked while on the ground. The victim was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital, in Northampton, for treatment. The shoes of Levy and Gray were taken as evidence with the case.

1:38 p.m.
Andrew A. White, 19, of 336 Arbor Street in Lunenburg, and Darren J. Kress, 19, of 71 Cummings Street in Attleboro, were both arrested on charges of person under 21 in possession of alcohol. An officer observed the two parties in Lot 43 handling 60 12-ounce cans of beer and two 750-milliliter bottles of wine in plain view.

Saturday February 4
8:30 p.m.
Byron Johnson, 19, of 52 Cedar Street in Taunton, was arrested on charges of possession of both a Class D and a Class E drug, and Felicia Abelino Santos, 19, of 109 Partridge Circle in Taunton, was arrested on charges of possession of Class D drug. Two officers on duty observed that a vehicle had pulled into Lot 50 outside of the Prince and Crampton dormitories and the two occupants of the vehicle were passing a cigarette-like object back and forth. The officers believed that the continuous lighting of the object was a method consistent with marijuana use. Johnson and Santos, the passenger, were asked to step out of the vehicle, and subsequently searched the vehicle. Johnson was found to be in possession of Adderall. Additional marijuana was found in the front of the vehicle, while paraphernalia was found inside the car and in the ashtray.

Sunday February 5
1:30 a.m.
Jorge J. Fajardo, 21, of Mamaroneck, N.Y., was arrested on charges of a marked lane violation and operating under the influence of liquor. An officer on patrol noticed Fajardo's vehicle weave back and forth over the double yellow line on Commonwealth Avenue three times, and when stopped the officer detected the odor of alcohol on his breath when he spoke. Fajardo was subsequently given a field sobriety test, and put under arrest upon failure.

-Compiled by Brendan Hall

THE BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
(36 years of service - and counting!)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!

••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN

Spring Semester 2006 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for meetings •Feb. 6th (Mon) •Feb. 8th (Wed)
Feb. 7th (Tues) meeting will be held in room 168C of the Campus Center
• Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Feb. 9th @ Hollywood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. Y'll, (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!

Volunteer, while earning credit!

Skin Care Center
Pioneer Valley Dermatology
www.pioneervalleyderm.com

Call for a Consultation & Book your Appointment Today!
413-549-7400

Shelly Damon, R.E.

Prepare for Spring Break NOW!
- Electrology
- Microdermabrasion
- Laser Hair Removal
- Glycolic Peels & Beta - Lift Peels
- All Procedures Available For Men and Women of All Skin Tones & Types

Richard Wyatt, M.D., Ph.D.
29-B Cottage St.
Amherst (past Bertucci's)

Dr Wyatt is available during laser procedures

Save $$ on Textbooks at the Jeffery Amherst College Store

All These Courses and More at Discounted Prices:

Astronomy	101-2	The Solar System
Astronomy	114	Stars & Galaxies
Biology	101	Introductory to Biology
Biology	102	Intro to Animal Biology
Biology	285	Cell & Molecular Biology
Chemistry	101	General Chemistry
Chemistry	110	General Chemistry
Chemistry	262	Organic Chemistry-non majors
Chemistry	111	General Chemistry I
Chemistry	112	General Chemistry II
Chemistry	261	Organic Chemistry
CMP Science	105	Computer Literacy
ECT	232	Hardware Organization & Design
Economics	104 A-F	Intro to Macroeconomics
Economics	709	Political Economy II
Exer Science	100	Intro to Exercise Science
FOMGT	304	Information for Tech Finance
FOMGT	320	Investments
Geo Sciences	102	The Human Landscape
Geo Sciences	103	Intro Oceanography
HRTA	240	Hotel Operations
Italian	120	Elementary Italian II
Math	113	Math-Elem Teachers I
Math	121	Linear Methods & Probability
MICBIO	310	General Microbiology
Nutrition	130	Nutrition for a healthy lifestyle
Physics	100	Conceptual Physics
Physics	120	Big Bang to Black Hole
Physics	132	Intro to Physics II
POLISCI	111	Comparative Politics
POLISCI	121-B	World Politics
Psychology	305	Educational Psychology
Psychology	320	Learn & Think
Psychology	380	Abnormal Psychology
Psychology	100 sec 1-3	Intro to Psychology
Psychology	335	Behavioral Neuroendocrinology
Spanish	110	Spanish
Spanish	120	Spanish
Spanish	240	Intermediate Spanish II
Spanish	246	Intensive Intermediate Spanish
Statistics	111	Elementary Statistics
W&FCONSV	261	Wildlife Conservation

Jeffery Amherst College Store
26 South Prospect Street, Amherst 253-3870
(behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in downtown Amherst)

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2006 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Huge overreaction unjustified

Andrew Freeman

I will always remember the first truly hateful cartoon I saw. It was a political cartoon by Patrick Oliphant, published April 9, 2001 during the height of a standoff between China and the United States. An American spy plane had landed in China after colliding with a Chinese aircraft, and the crew was being held by the Chinese government.

The cartoon depicted Uncle Sam, representing America, at a Chinese restaurant, where a short, buck-toothed, Chinese waiter dumps "crispy fried cat gizzards with noodles" over him. The waiter then starts stomping and demands an apology, screaming "Apologize Lotten Amellican" and driving Uncle Sam from the restaurant.

The political cartoon is one of the last refuges open to racist and hateful thought. In writing, Oliphant's despicable sentiment would have never been published, but as a picture, it is regarded as satire and not taken quite seriously. The editorial standards for cartoons are extremely low, and the consequences can be catastrophic.

On Sept. 30 of last year, Denmark's largest daily newspaper, the Jyllands-Posten, published a series of 12 political cartoons as part of an effort to test the limits of self-censorship. The subject of the cartoons was the Prophet Muhammad, founder of Islam. These cartoons have inflamed the Middle East and Muslim world and sparked violent protests, including the burning of Danish embassies in Syria and Lebanon over this past weekend. Muslim governments took diplomatic action against Denmark, seeking censorship of the Jyllands-Posten, while their citizens boycott Danish products.

Attacking the Danish government and businesses over the actions of one organization is unjust and unwarranted and is the same sort of collective punishment that Muslims condemn when committed by Israel against the Palestinians.

At least part of the reason for this controversy is that, according to Muslim tradition, the representation of Allah or the Prophet Muhammad is prohibited. Arabia was dominated by idol worshipping during Muhammad's lifetime and the prophet denounced this practice, preaching the existence of one God to the exclusion of all others. Graphic representations of Muhammad are forbidden, for fear that they would lead to idol worship. For this reason, historically, Islamic art has largely avoided portraying people, focusing on abstract or geometric images. Thus, the very idea that Muhammad would be drawn is offensive to some Muslims.

Moreover, several of the political cartoons associate Muhammad and Islam with terrorism. One shows Muhammad as a bearded, disembodied head wearing a turban that is drawn as a bomb. Another by Jens Julius, has Muhammad in heaven, declaring to a line of people who have blown themselves up, "Stop, stop, we have run out of virgins." A cartoon by Rasmus Sand Hoyer shows Muhammad as a hairy, sword-wielding figure flanked by two women in burqas and his eyes are covered by a black line. The piece is called "Censorship."

These images are extremely offensive, portraying Muhammad as a terrorist, a wild and violent man, while disregarding his spiritual importance to over a billion people. They go beyond mere irreverence or satire and into the realm of denigration. Some of the other cartoons are relatively innocuous, such as those sending up the whole exercise. One shows a turban-wearing Dane with a stick-figure drawing titled "Muhammad" – on the Dane's turban is an orange that says "PR Stunt."

As inappropriate as some of the cartoons are, their offensiveness does not justify the massive overreaction that has occurred. Attacking the Danish government and businesses over the actions of one organization is unjust and unwarranted, and is the same sort of collective punishment that Muslims condemn when committed by Israel against the Palestinians. Moreover, the worst of the cartoons are tame in comparison to those in Arab media, which regularly depict Jews as demons, Nazis or child-killers.

The crisis is continuing to grow, as opportunists in both the Muslim world and in the west seek to capitalize on it. Anti-Muslim bigots equate Islam with Islamic terrorism, cloaking their arguments as defense of "free speech" while hoping to push us deeper into conflict with the Muslim world. Anti-western demagogues call for jihad against the west, distracting their people from their oppressive governments and self-destructive goals.

None of this needs to happen. There is nothing inevitable about conflict between Muslims and non-Muslims. We in the west need to show greater sensitivity to Islam, to differentiate the majority of its practitioners from its violent fanatics, rather than painting both with the same brush.

Editors and journalists in particular should take care to not confuse hate speech with free speech, and not to endorse it. Muslims have to confront the forces that are dragging down their societies and realize that this violence will not achieve anything meaningful, beyond exchanging one tyrant for another. Together, we need to defuse the tensions that are drawing our nations into total war, and end the conflicts that have proliferated, because the alternative will destroy us all.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist

Firm believer of free press

World Perspectives

Asif Khan

The world is stunned by the many protests taking place throughout the world because of the caricatures published in a Danish newspaper about the Prophet Mohammed, showing him wearing a time bomb-shaped turban on his head. Another one shows him as a knife-wielding Bedouin flanked by two women shrouded in black.

The cartoons have since been reprinted in other European publications, in France, Norway and Italy. As a result, many violent protests have broken out in many parts of the world. The Danish and Norwegian embassies were torched in Syria, and similar attempts have been made in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

The Danish Prime Minister is holding steady to his word by not apologizing and claiming that this is the product of his country's free press, and even though it might have offended Muslims, it is part of a democratic society to have a free functioning press. The Norwegian magazine which published the same caricatures also expressed its regrets for causing offense, but stopped short of issuing an apology.

Now the question remains, is this really just an issue of freedom of the press, and should the press be allowed to run without any checks by the people or the government? After all, we do not let governments run as they please in a democratic society. There are many checks and balances on all chapters of the state and federal government.

It is forbidden to cry "fire" in a crowded theater. It is also frowned upon to make racist remarks or to demean a group of people in the press. So why is it OK to offend a billion of the world's people, who already feel under attack from the west, just to prove a point that your country has a free press?

It is common knowledge that Muslims consider any images of Mohammed as blasphemous, especially ones that portray him as a terrorist. Relations between Europe and its Muslim populations are already very tense and on the verge of a full-scale breakout. The recent riots in France are a testament to this fact.

I am a firm believer in the free press, but not when it offends and angers someone to the extent of violent behavior and harmful actions, and if the rules were the same for criticism on all groups, then I would not have an issue with this.

I am a firm believer in the free press but not when it offends and angers someone to the extent of violent behavior and harmful actions, and if the rules were the same for criticism on all groups, then I would not have an issue with this.

But, that is not the case. One rarely ever sees such depictions of Moses or Jesus, and even when Afghanistan was being attacked, and then Iraq after that, I do not remember seeing any caricatures of Jesus in the Muslim press as an oil hungry despot out to wage a crusade on the Muslim world.

Many newscasters and interviewers on the news channels have brought up the fact that there are many anti-Semitic trends in the Arab press, so why are they so angry when it comes to their religion? That is not entirely true, as again, they are combining anti-Israeli with anti-Semitic. The Arabs are a Semitic people as well, and to call them anti-Semitic would be to call them self-loathing, which I can safely say, most Arabs are not.

The Arab countries have had a rough history with Israel, and it should not be surprising to find articles or caricatures criticizing Israel: not Jews of the world, but Israelis. The same was apparent, and still is, in the American press when it comes to Iraqis and Afghans currently, and French, Russians and East Asians in the past.

Many Muslims, including myself, are now realizing that whenever it comes to criticizing or offending Muslims, the western press is quick to use the "freedom of press" reason. At the same time, a lot of news on corruption, shady trade deals and unconditional support for foreign attacks and wars goes unreported. Freedom of the press is an all-encompassing phenomenon, and it is not supposed to be used for specific targets. If criticisms and commentaries have to be made, then they should be about everything, not only what might be in the current government's interest.

The caricatures did not even serve an intelligent or critical purpose. I did not look at them and think about the current world situation differently. For me, they represented the sheer ignorance and bias common in many parts of the west about Islam since the beginning of the religion many centuries ago.

The images echoed a class I took last year on perceptions of Islam in early European philosophy. Sadly, it is apparent that not much has changed, and instead of understanding the second biggest religion in their continent, many Europeans are shaming it and its followers.

Asif Khan is a World Perspectives columnist who is currently abroad in Buenos Aires, Argentina.

President should not wiretap

John Gruenenfelder

As a nation of laws, we have the expectation that the president will be the champion of those laws. Instead, now that the information about domestic wiretapping is all over the news, the White House has come out in force to play down the issue. Of all the dubious acts President Bush has presided over since being elected, this is one of the most disturbing and one of the most likely to be found illegal.

Quite unlike Nixon's wiretapping of rivals, Bush's program rests upon the pillar of national security. Because of this, condemnation has been slow in coming, and very little has been from his allies. Security cannot be a defense, however, so the administration has brought forth a number of items to support the president's claim that this program is within his authority.

The administration contends that Article II of the Constitution grants the president this authority implicitly. Furthermore, they contend that the War Powers Act passed by Congress also endorses this activity. Congress, for its part, was quick to dismiss this notion, saying that this was never their intention. To be sure, they do not want to be on that sinking ship, but it was nice to see them cry foul so rapidly.

On Monday, the Congressional hearings on this matter began. The first witness was Alberto Gonzales, the Attorney General. It was rather disheartening to see him offer testimony as it seemed like he was simply reading a series of statements prepared for him by the White House. As a political appointee of the president, I'm sure he is beholden to a certain degree, but he is also the chief law enforcement officer of this country. In that regard, his performance was quite distressing.

Even with the excuses covered, the heart of the matter is still whether what the president did was lawful or not. Most people are not against eavesdropping altogether, and most would probably find it warranted in times such as these. The legality of wiretapping in general is not being debated; the Supreme Court has found it acceptable in numerous cases. What is troubling is this specific case and only because the administration saw fit to ignore the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Security cannot be a defense, however, so the administration has brought forth a number of items to support the president's claim that this program is within his authority.

It is entirely possible that the existing law was unsuitable for what the administration wanted to do. Such a case can be caused by only two things. One is that the law is outdated and must be changed to meet the current needs. The other is that the law is fine and the administration's acts were illegal.

Since FISA was passed in 1978 the state of communications technology has certainly changed a great deal. Despite this, until now FISA has sufficed well enough, which suggests that the law is comprehensive in the activities that it does and does not cover.

Back in the summers of 1999 and 2000, I had an internship with the National Security Agency. The job was primarily focused on research, and as a student I was about as far from spy work as you could get. But it was a great opportunity to speak with people who actually had careers with the NSA. In our discussions, one fact which came up repeatedly was that under no circumstances would the NSA ever spy on a U.S. citizen.

At the time, I did not think too much about the emphasis people placed on that rule, though it certainly seemed like a good idea, but as this new story broke, and it became evident that it was employees from within the agency who had become troubled and had leaked the information, I began to think back to the people I had worked with. Though I was not born yet, many of the people I spoke to had been with the agency when the trouble with Nixon and Hoover occurred. To them, that stain on their profession was still very much real.

So the rank and file among the NSA are upset enough to leak about a top secret program, and many citizens and politicians are equally upset about this subterfuge. To add to that, in mid-January, the FBI released information saying that nearly every lead given to them by the NSA from this surveillance program led nowhere and was wasting time that could be better spent catching real criminals.

Hopefully this issue will not fade like so many before it. The government has a duty to protect the people of this country, and sometimes that involves covert surveillance, but as a nation built on a solid foundation of laws we must adhere to those in all activities. It is this foundation which gives us oversight for when the government oversteps its bounds. Pretending like the Constitution grants you power to stomp on other parts of the Constitution is definitely not how you follow the law.

John Gruenenfelder is a Collegian columnist

THE COLLEGIAN IS LOOKING FOR ED/OP COLUMNISTS!
Come down to the Collegian newsroom in the Campus Center basement to apply!

Celebrity lives are not news

Adam Sutton

Ever have one of those classes where you leave feeling ready to throw a desk through the window? Well, I had one on Thursday.

In my journalism class, the topic of celebrity news arose and the class had a short discussion on its role as a distraction from the truly important issues facing our country. The professor implied that this type of "journalism" is pushed on the citizens of our beautiful republic and distracts attention from major issues like the economy, war, corruption and small countries vowing our destruction.

I could not agree more. That crap is everywhere you look on TV, at the supermarket or on the radio. Its existence makes me physically ill. But its existence – and spread – is because our citizens actually buy into it.

I raised my hand to point out that people must want this type of news because they pay for it, keeping it alive and well. They don't change the channel and they don't stop buying the magazines. People want distractions. My comment was met with an "it's sad you think that way" look on the professor's face and an "interesting theory" rebuttal.

"Oh, the advertising and marketing are so wide spread and strong that buying," is to deny power over your own mind. It's being compliant and it's a filthy cop-out.

I probably shouldn't have been angered by this dismissal, but I was. I felt as if this woman were legitimizing peoples' passive consumption of this filth by placing the blame for its proliferation on some grand media-distraction conspiracy.

Interesting theory? What was I to assume here? Is this professor implying these entertainment news companies are fueled by something other than Americans money? What is it? Government subsidized distraction? No.

This type of journalism exists because Americans buy into it. It raises ratings. It sells magazines. It makes money. To accept any other explanation is to deny the forces of capitalism. If no one bought it, then no one would sell it.

Brad and Angelina are not our only distraction, either. There's football, beer, reality television, music, drugs, the National Inquirer, video games and the list trails on.

None of these things keep us informed on current events or warn us who might want to fly a plan into our house. They make us happy.

If Americans stopped buying Entertainment Weekly or stopped watching "American Idol" and Major League Baseball, then those things would disappear. It's capitalism. You vote with your money.

To say, "Oh, the advertising and marketing are so widespread and strong that buying is irresistible," is to deny power over your own mind. It's being compliant and it's a filthy copout.

To say, "Oh, I'm only one person and me buying one magazine doesn't help this industry," is an even filthier copout. It is that kind of thinking that keeps bulls alive.

Want to be better informed? Want to curb the number of distractions in America? Good. The first step is realizing that it's your fault you don't know what is going on. Then, cut down on your list of distractions.

Shut off the television and read a newspaper. Read a few newspapers. Know who owns that newspaper. Get online and read a foreign newspaper.

Sure, more distractions appear as the greed heads conjure up new ideas, but if you want to be informed, simply recognize them as trash and don't buy in.

Adam Sutton is a U Mass Student.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2006 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

SORRY, WRONG NUMBER

By Peter Freiman
Collegian Staff

A film may excel for many reasons: nuanced acting, superb artistic design, complex and fascinating characters. Occasionally, a movie deserves praise simply for its innovative and riveting concept. The success of modern classics such as "Memento" and "Being John Malkovich" can be partly attributed to their plots and narrative structures, which can be described without exaggeration as revolutionary.

Take, for example, Simon West's "When a Stranger Calls." A teenage girl is hired to babysit two innocent children. Everything seems normal until she receives bizarre phone calls. The calls grow increasingly threatening until the teen realizes the threats are far greater than that of someone who can access her solely over the telephone. She must then utilize all of her brains and energy to keep herself and her young charges alive.

"Stranger" is a remake of a 1979 film of the same name, which is of course based on the urban legend of the babysitter who receives threatening calls. The greatest service this movie can do is broadcast a message to Hollywood: It's ill advised to produce feature films based on urban legends. "Stranger" demonstrates the two main reasons this is so.

First off, one of the reasons urban legends are passed from person to person is that they are simple – a person recounting the story visually would take less than a minute or two to do so. "When a Stranger Calls" lasts 83 minutes. Thus, a solid portion of the film consists of the babysitter worriedly waiting for the next call as she paces through her client's fabulous art-deco home. (There hasn't been a horror movie this celebratory of interior design since the 2001 remake of "Thirteen Ghosts.")

Second, urban legends are structured in such a manner that there is only one moment of shock – its punchline, if you will – and the story leading up to that moment is simply background information that is necessary to understand the ending. In keeping with this structure, nearly all of "Stranger" is a setup for the climax, which all of the film's heart rate-accelerating scenes have been compacted into. It's like adapting an episode of "The Twilight Zone" into a movie, with the first two acts comprised of nothing but the set-up for the third, and an extended sequence of attempting to set things in order after the "It's a cookbook!" moment.

Third, urban legends are so simplistic that they lack explanations for the motivations for the characters. The motivations of the protagonists in "When a Stranger Calls" are obvious, but what of the villain? In the cat-and-mouse dynamic, the cat must, like the appetite in its metaphorical counterpart, have a reason for its misdeeds. The stalker's just plain crazy? That's excusable, as long as he has some basis for his crimes, no matter how bizarre (see Buffalo Bill in "Silence of the Lambs"). The explanation for the villain in "Stranger" is meager at best, and has the feel that it was hastily added in when the filmmakers realized the audience would be expecting it.

The fourth, and most obvious reason: Everyone has heard the legend before. One can't expect the twist from the original legend to have much impact in its cinematic adaptation. Since the viewer already knows the major revelation in "When a Stranger Calls," all of the babysitter's misconceptions about her situation (Is the stalker watching her from outside? Will closing the curtains help?) are transformed into dramatic irony.

"When a Stranger Calls" can be used as an example in a lecture to the film industry of pitfalls to avoid when coming up with a new concept for a movie. As for the film's target audience, viewers might be better off seeing a movie about a woman who tries to dry off her dog in a microwave.

"When a Stranger Calls"
Directed by Simon West
Starring Camilla Belle, Tommy Flanagan
Sony Pictures
Rated PG-13
83 mins
Grade D

Shakespeare's poetic resolution to love

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

"Love is not love / Which alters when it alteration finds, / Or bends with the remover to remove: / O no! It is an ever-fixed mark / That looks on tempests and is never shaken"
William Shakespeare.

I have a friend who just broke up with a guy after three years, and it's only now that she's seeing an ugly side of his personality which she never thought he would have. But sometimes we start to notice personality traits after some time that, let's face it, we just don't like. Nobody's expected to be perfect, everyone has their flaws. Should you simply ignore it and pretend like whatever is going on that doesn't suit your tastes doesn't exist?

The best thing to do when this happens is talk it out. Communication is the key to everything, and a hurdle for most people, because guys and girls have such different communication styles. It's really important, at this time, to be open and to not be defensive. Listen to what the other person is saying. It's easy to have some kind of mini am-I-really-that-awful crisis, because we assume that this person knows us the best, and that what they say has to be the truth. Newsflash: Nobody will ever know you as well as you know yourself. After you've heard what your partner has to say, if you value the relationship, try to change your behaviors to make the other person a little happier, and hopefully they're doing the same for you.

But there comes a time when either there's so much that they seem to want to change that it's natural to wonder if the person you're trying to work things out with would be better suited to a different person. This is when it's important to ask yourself if what your loved one is asking you is something that won't be too difficult to alter, or if the subtext to what they're saying is, "I think I went out with the wrong person." If it seems like that, it may be best to reconsider the relationship. Never change so much of yourself for someone else that you turn out not to be the person they chose to go out with in the beginning. Love is not a hand that holds you down. The person should be like a good teammate, giving you props for good things, and slapping you on the butt (if you're into that kind of thing) while saying, "it's okay, you'll get 'em next time" for the not-as-good things.

Let's go back to the epitaph at the beginning of this column. "Love is not love which alters when alteration finds or bends with the remover to remove." This roughly means that if it's real love, the feelings shouldn't change too much when it finds that the other person is changing. The second part, "or bends with the remover to remove" essentially means that nobody should bend over backwards trying to change themselves, or trying to change someone else, to make someone else (or yourself) happy. Love is accepting, versatile. "O no! It is an ever-fixed mark that looks on tempests and is never shaken" means that love should be there, the glue that holds a relationship together through the rough patches. If a person questions the love for another person during the rough patches (which everyone will have), then it changes the whole dynamic of the difficulties of the relationship. It changes the dynamic from "this is a problem" to "us being together might be a problem." Sounds depressing, but it can be avoided. By three small words.

"I love you." The small phrase that has been stressing guys out for decades. But if you're already past the point of saying I love you, don't stop saying it simply because something about the current situation is difficult for the both of you. The words should remind both people why you're together in the first place. Saying I love you is not like going to Blockbuster. You can't simply change your mind about love like you can about what DVD to rent. It's not about what you're in the mood for that particular day.

'Betty Boop' animator Waldman passes away

NEW YORK (AP) - Animator Myron Waldman, who originated Betty Boop's dog, helped create two Oscar-nominated cartoons and put Superman and Raggedy Ann on the screen, died Saturday. He was 97.

Waldman died of congestive heart failure at New Island Hospital in Bethpage, said Rosalie Waldman, his wife of 57 years.

He was instrumental in the animation of Betty Boop, Popeye, Casper, Raggedy Ann and Andy, and the original Superman cartoon series, said Jerry Gladstone, president of American Royal Arts of Boca Raton, Fla., which represented Waldman's work.

Waldman was the last surviving head animator of the Max Fleischer Studios, a leader in the fledgling cartoon field of the 1920s which then became rivals to Walt Disney in the 1930s with its Betty Boop and Popeye the Sailor series.

Hired at Fleischer in 1930, Waldman worked on a popular series in which audiences were invited to "follow the bouncing ball" and sing along with lyrics on the screen. While at Fleischer, Waldman also originated the design for Pudgy, Betty Boop's little dog.

Two of his Fleischer cartoons, "Educated Fish," 1937, and "Hunky and Spunky," 1938, earned Academy Award nominations.

Waldman also remained a key role in the animation of Superman and Popeye, and became the principal animator of "Raggedy Ann and Raggedy Andy, based on the Johnny Gruelle children's stories.

After World War II, Waldman joined Paramount's Famous Cartoon Studios, where he was instrumental in the character design of Casper, redesigning Seymour Reit's original drawing to the image known today.

UMass to host film festival

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

This spring the UMass television station UVC-TV 19 will be hosting the first Annual UMass Five College Film Festival. All undergraduate students of the Five Colleges are eligible to enter their films by Feb. 24 along with a submission form and a small entry fee ($5-$15 depending on the film's length).

Film entries will be separated into three distinct stylistic categories: Narrative, Documentary and Experimental. In addition, there will be separate awards for other categories that include: Most Outstanding Overall Film, Best Narrative Film, Best Documentary Film, Best Experimental Film, Best Film by a UMass Undergraduate, Best Short Film, Students-Choice Award and Best Film by a Graduate Student (if any college). However, films may not win multiple awards.

A group of experienced film professors and critics will judge the films according to the overall cinematography, story and plot, character development, originality and the use of sound or music in each entry. According to the station, all of the judges have agreed to perform their task fairly and judiciously.

In addition, any former graduate of the Five Colleges can submit works which were completed during their undergraduate career, as part of the regular submission process.

Graduate students will have their work judged against other graduate student-films, but will not be judged against any films submitted by undergraduate students.

The festival screenings will be held March 9, 7 p.m. – 10 p.m. in Campus Center Room 101 at UMass Amherst.

However, not all films that are entered in the festival are guaranteed to be shown during the screening. Depending on the number of entries the event receives, it might be difficult to fit in all films. Therefore only select films may be aired as part of the screening on March 9. All award-winning films will be screened.

Some students who enter their film into the UMass Film Festival might be delighted to know that the UVC-TV 19 station could air the festival films as part of its regular programming. So one night, as you're click-clicking away on the remote, you might just come across your own movie.

All films accepted into the UMass Film Festival will be replayed as part of a Film Festival Highlight Reel in rotation on UVC-TV 19, HSCN Channel 19 on the UMass Amherst campus television network.

Some guidelines that students should know about entering their unique works of art into the festival, are regarding explicit content. The station reserves a firm policy that the television station has the right to not air any material that might be deemed as inappropriate by the staff, or the film judges. Artistic expression and poetic license go hand-in-hand, which makes it likely that most entries will be aired, unless the material is unnecessarily offensive or obscene beyond a good reason. That means keep the late-night home video co-produced by you and your girl/boyfriend at home – under the bed – and enjoy it in private.

Unless of course it does not include gratuitous scenes of nudity or sexual activity, extremely inappropriate or offensive language, or obscene or gory violence (the former I can understand, but the latter…let's hope not).

If a film submission does contain material of this graphic nature, students can make a note of it and attach it to the entry, so the judges aren't traumatized without warning. Given the right conditions, a submission might be deemed acceptable for entry if the judges don't find it too extreme.

If students don't employ their own symphony or write their own film score, they can use copyrighted music in their films, and it will not be held against them. Students should still credit the music, and tell UVC-TV 19 about it ahead of time.

Coming back to that small fee. Films under or up to 15 minutes costs $5 to enter, and films over 15 Minutes are $15 to enter. That's probably the hardest part about entering, the rest of the process is painless – students can download application forms from the UVC TV 19 website (www.umass.edu/uvctv19) or just pick one up at 216 Student Union Building – the station's studio. Film entries can be produced on a DVD or a VHS.

Most people can't deny they've always drooled over the idea of making their own movie. There are so many films out there that intrigue us, bewilder us and open our eyes to a kinetic art that we'd never stop to think it is actually quenching our creative thirsts for artistic exposure. So now given the chance, why not craft something yourself and be exposed to your own creativity?

CBS shuffles Grammys telecast

By David Bianculli
New York Daily News

Even though the Grammy Awards take place tonight, certain elements of the CBS telecast are still being shuffled and added, according to executive producer Ken Ehrlich.

Among the latest additions are Jay-Z and Linkin Park, teaming on "Numb/Encore," and perhaps two performances by Paul McCartney, his first-ever on the Grammys.

"You may see him in another part of the show," Ehrlich said, "in addition to his performance" (the one keyed to his Grammy-nominated album, "Chaos and Creation in the Backyard").

As reported earlier, Wednesday's 48th annual Grammy Awards will open with Madonna doing a duet with the animated characters who make up the music-video face of the group Gorillaz. It will be staged so that the interplay between Madonna and the Gorillaz characters can be seen not just by viewers at home, but by those in attendance at the Staples Center in Los Angeles, Ehrlich said.

"If you're sitting in that house, you really believe that those animated characters are real," Ehrlich insisted. "It's based on a 150-year-old magic illusion, called Pepper's ghost, which has to do with projection, reflection and a transparent kind of scrim material."

It's opening the show, Ehrlich explained, for the same reason Madonna's song "Hung Up" is being paired with "Feel Good Inc." by Gorillaz in the first place. "They were made for each other," he said. "They're both great dance records."

That mixture of old and new guard, an Ehrlich trademark, has kept the audience for the CBS broadcast trending younger, even as the show itself has lost viewers overall. Ehrlich credits the revised nomination procedures with part of that, for making the nominees more vital overall, but also with the Grammys' reach-and-clout among several generations of artists.

"We all want to be contemporary," he said. "We all want to feel as current as we are timeless."

That's why, two years ago, Prince and Beyonce stopped the show with their incendiary duet, a performance that would be, perhaps [illegible] and a historic moment.

Last year it was Kanye West and Melissa Etheridge [illegible] Joplin. Wednesday night, [illegible] will perform again, along with John Legend, Will Lyon and Mariah [illegible] a salute to pioneering [illegible] and the Family Stone. Rock [illegible] Stone will appear [illegible] though Ehrlich is [illegible]

Bruce Springsteen, [illegible] Carey, Kanye West and James [illegible] are performing as well. Mariah [illegible] Herbie Hancock and [illegible] Aguilera, who'll do Linda Ronstadt's "A Song for You" from Ronstadt's "Possibilities" album [illegible]

"I would suspect," Ehrlich said, "that 95 percent of the people that are watching the Grammys have never heard this track. So, teaming it with the Grammys, after [illegible] it, it wouldn't surprise me if the album get real big."

Fortune brings unsteady enthusiasm to INXS' venture

By Ross Raihala
Kaimin Review

Guitarist Tim Farriss knew his band INXS was taking a risk by choosing its new lead singer with the help of a TV reality series.

"Oh, yes, it was fraught with danger," Farriss said during a phone interview from Los Angeles. "It could have gone horribly wrong.

"And the first week was horrific. We're not television stars, even though we broke this band in the U.S. through music videos. We weren't used to long dialogues and public speaking in front of 36 cameras and 15 producers and directors. We were just dying to get up there and play. It was kind of like our initiation, a baptism of fire."

While "Rock Star: INXS" wasn't a huge hit in the ratings, and it raised plenty of eyebrows among fans of the late Michael Hutchence, the band emerged from the show with a new vocalist (JD Fortune), album ("Switch") and sold-out tour.

"It feels great," Farriss said of the tour, which kicked off Jan. 18 in Vancouver, British Columbia. "We have a new, young singer who is busting his balls every night. You've got to respect the guy for that — he's got so much enthusiasm, and he's so keen to impress, it's overwhelming. It's even kind of beautiful."

Fortune was all of 4 years old when Farriss and his brothers Andrew (keyboard, guitar) and Jon (drums) first formed INXS with Kirk Pengilly (guitar, saxophone), Gary Beers (bass) and the charismatic Hutchence up front.

After finding success in their native Australia in the early '80s, INXS went global with such huge-selling albums as "Listen Like Thieves" and "Kick." The band had trouble maintaining that momentum into the '90s, though, and it all ground to a halt with Hutchence's suicide in 1997.

The surviving members took an extended break, then started performing live once again, with a rotating roster of vocalists including Jimmy Barnes, Terence Trent D'Arby and Jon Stevens.

"The problem was that the people we worked with already had careers," said Farriss. "It was always sort of us and them. We wanted to be a real band again."

So Farriss and company approached "Survivor" producer Mark Burnett with the concept that eventually became "Rock Star: INXS," which aired over the summer on CBS.

While Andrew Farriss was convinced he wanted a female up front (eight of the fifteen contestants were women) the band decided to let the television audience guide the way. Each week, viewers voted for their favorites, and the band eliminated one of the three would-be rockers with the lowest number of votes.

"At the end of the day, most of our (early) favorites were the ones we started eliminating first," said Farriss. "Different people rose and fell throughout the show — that was what made it so interesting."

In the end, Fortune wasn't the only one to leave "Rock Star: INXS" with newfound celebrity. Runner-up Marty Casey and his band, the Lovehammers, are the opening act for the current INXS tour. Fellow contestants Suzie McNeil and Deanna Johnston contributed vocals to INXS' new disc, "Switch." And Jordis Unga is in the studio working on her debut solo album for Epic Records.

"Jordis blew us away from the get-go," Farriss said. "She's going to have a great career. She just clearly wasn't right for our band, to quote myself.

"Marty Casey is a classic example of somebody who benefited from being on the show and taking our advice. We wanted to be really honest, but our philosophy was to never put anyone down. We wanted to raise people up and hopefully help start a few careers."

For now, Farriss has turned the attention back to his own career.

"You know, JD has a lot of catching up to do, and his learning curve is a daunting task for anyone," he said. "But already a week into the tour, he was a different person. I take my hat off to him. It's like we're all part of a band that's trying to break through together."

1980's band INXS took a risk that proved successful when they added new frontman and lead singer, Jason Fortune.

The Daily Collegian
Serving FRESH News When You Want It.
www.DailyCollegian.com

STSTRAVEL.COM
Cancun Acapulco Jamaica Bahamas Florida
Spring Break
Don't Get Left Behind! BOOK TODAY!
STS Student Travel Services
1-800 648-4849 www.ststravel.com

ALUMNI
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST 1863
"Leaders in the Making" Scholarship

SOPHOMORE & JUNIOR $2,000 SCHOLARSHIPS

The "Leaders in the Making" Scholarship was created by the Alumni Association to support the academic and career pursuits of promising sophomores and juniors. Students from diverse campus populations whose records suggest that they will develop into alumni with admirable leadership qualities upon graduation are encouraged to apply.

Four recipients will be selected by the Alumni Association Student Programs and Services Committee based on their application and will be awarded $2,000 towards their Fall 2006 tuition bill and fees.

This multi-part application must be completed in its entireity and returned to the Alumni Association no later than 5 p.m. on Friday, February 24, 2006 for consideration. No exceptions will be allowed.

Applications are available for pick up in Memorial Hall or at www.UMassAlumni.com/students.

Chance or Purpose?
The Argument for Intelligent Design in Biology

Dr. Michael Behe, author of Darwin's Black Box: the Biochemical Challenge to Evolution.

Questions and answers to follow presentation

Thursday, February 9th at 8:00 pm
Bartlett 65

The VERITAS FORUM

Sponsored by The Ark, [illegible] in Action, Campus Crusade [illegible] FOCUS, Intervarsity Missionary [illegible] NAVs Christian Fellowship and the Veritas Forum.

www.umasscru.com or www.veritas.org

Minutemen seek momentum

MEN'S HOOPS from page 8

know this, and they know to try and play to UMass' strengths.

"What is most important is that we rebound the ball well," Freeman said. "We battled URI on the rebounding side, and that's what we need to do. If we can do that, then we can knock down some shots and play some defense."

"We have 6-foot-9 [Freeman], 6-foot-8 [Lasme] and 6-foot-6 [Viggiano] in the front court," Ford said. "We know we have to play to our strengths. Offensive rebounding is very important for our team right now."

In the press room after the UMass victory against the Rams on Saturday, Ford admitted that there were "question marks" about this year's team. The Minutemen didn't come to play at Temple, and they were buried from the beginning in the first La Salle meeting. UMass tried to climb back in the game (getting to within three points), but the hole was too deep to climb out of.

Ford is optimistic about tonight's game and knows that mental preparation is key to coming away with a win.

"It's a mental game this time of year," he said. "Is your team going to be ready to go? In the URI game I saw something that I hadn't seen in a while."

He's talking about intensity. Freeman's body language when he took the court and his authoritative dribble when he first touched the ball queued Ford in to what kind of night it was going to be. Now that intensity needs to be recreated.

"I think everybody is going to change the way they play [for tonight's game]," Freeman said. "I don't think we wanted it [in the first game against La Salle]. We didn't come out the way we did in the URI game."

To beat La Salle, a team needs to stop, or at least contain, Steven Smith. He leads the Atlantic 10 in scoring with 19.5 points per game and torched the Minutemen for 24 points and nine rebounds in Game 1 of the 2006 season series.

"He played well against us," Ford said. "He hit 3-pointers, posted up, put the ball on the floor and rebounded. One thing he's trying to do is show the scouts that he can play on the perimeter. He's the best player I've seen in the league thus far."

Senior captain Jeff Viggiano will provide necessary leadership for UMass down the stretch. The Minutemen play No. 6 George Washington next Wednesday.

Professional insider impressed with Lasme

DUGGAN from page 8

Villanueva has in his rookie season this year with the Toronto Raptors. The scout said that UConn coach Jim Calhoun makes scouting his players difficult because of his frequent substitutions and his "my way or the highway style."

A player who has increased his draft stock since that December meeting is senior Hilton Armstrong. Against UMass, Armstrong was limited to just three points, as he too was subject to Calhoun's strict policy of benching players with two fouls in the first half.

While the scout was unimpressed that night, Armstrong has played well recently, and his 4.0 blocks per game are in the top 10 in the nation (though he is still behind Lasme's 4.4 per game).

The standout for UConn against UMass was senior guard Rashad Anderson. Anderson scored 15 points, on a scorching 6-of-8 shooting, including 3-of-4 from downtown. While his game is somewhat limited, the scout predicted that Anderson would be a second-round pick, saying that with shooters being so hard to come by, Anderson would not be passed up.

The other NBA prospects for UConn were nonfactors in the UMass game. Senior guard Denham Brown had a poor shooting night and his NBA hopes are dimming after a promising start to his career.

Junior point guard Marcus Williams did not play in the game as he was still serving his suspension for his involvement in laptop-gate. The scout said Williams has NBA ability, but clearly after his off-court issues there are character questions.

While we touched on a number of the top players in the country, the most noteworthy was J.J. Redick from Duke. The very mention of Redick's name invariably sparks debates between basketball fans about his NBA potential. Apparently scouts are no different, as he has been forecasted to go anywhere from the top-3 in the draft to the middle of the first round.

The scout said that he was skeptical of Redick because of some of his shortcomings – not a strong defensive player, lack of size, etc. – but came away from watching him feeling like he would be a good NBA player.

No one can deny Redick's shooting ability, and while he certainly won't be scoring 27.8 points per game in the NBA, the fact that he has put up such gaudy numbers this year against top competition night in and night out makes the scout believe that he will be able to score at the next level. The scout also said that Redick's competitive drive sets him apart from other top players, such as Gay.

The scout said that he doesn't believe Redick will be a franchise player, but if he ends up in the right situation, he'll be a very good pro.

So that's the view of the college basketball landscape through one scout's eyes. And even if he was way off, and Redick is a bust and Armstrong becomes a stud, it was still pretty cool to get inside the head of NBA scout for a few hours.

If nothing else, it beat having the UConn fight song blasting in my ears all night.

Dan Duggan is a Collegian columnist

Hoop legend speaks

JORDAN from page 8

Garden. "People got mad at me for playing hard every minute I was on the basketball court and it so happened that I scored a lot of points on their team."

Bryant has often said that he fashions his game after the 10-time NBA scoring leader. Jordan said he can see some similarities.

"You see him playing with any of the elite guys in the league ... he's going to guard them defensively and he will beg for them to guard him on the other end. That's my approach. I would do the same thing."

He stopped himself before declaring the Los Angeles Lakers star the top player in the league, but came close.

"If I had to pick the best player in the game, he certainly is up there right now," Jordan said. "It seems as though he's got the edge over anybody in that position, if not in the league right now."

Back in the city where he was born, Jordan said he wouldn't give an opinion on why the Knicks are struggling this season because "someone would take my opinion and use it as the Bible."

But then he gave one anyway.

"Everybody goes through up and down times in the season," Jordan said. "They haven't been able to find the right mix."

Jordan would like to see the NBA tinker with its new rule on when players can be drafted. Now, they have to wait one year after high school — he wants it to be two, so they get past their teens.

"I think from an educational and maturity standpoint it should have been at least 20," he said. "That way they get at least two years of college. Colleges get the chance to teach and educate them about the game of basketball and life and it trickles down."

"There's no way that an 18-year-old kid is going to be mature enough to handle some of the business things that they have to deal with on a professional level," he said. "Sure you have your obvious examples of a LeBron [James] and Carmelo [Anthony]. But for every one of those, you can think of four or five who missed the boat and made the wrong decision and now they can't find their way," he said.

Basketball legend Michael Jordan shared his thoughts on Kobe Bryant, the NBA age limit and who he thinks is the best player in basketball.

Michael Jordan, in his characteristic tongue-out drive to the basket, goes past a young Tracy McGrady.

Nelson takes leadership role, heats up from three-point land

W.HOOPS from page 8

The Minutewomen have received the most out of Nelson since her breakout game against Richmond on Jan. 19. She had a season-high 18 points, and was 4-for-5 from behind the arc in the game that has been labeled as the team's "turning point."

Nelson had a tremendous game on Sunday as well, and UMass coach Marnie Dacko is extremely proud of the way her point guard has performed during their stretch run.

"Katie can stick the ball," Dacko said. She can shoot it at all spots. She kills us at practice everyday. I was really happy to see that she broke the record. She shoots very well at practice everyday, so I was happy for her to bust out in a game. More importantly, her 10 assists were great for our team."

Sunday could have been a day to celebrate Nelson's personal achievement. It could have been a day to honor an athlete that had just marked her name in the record books. Instead, it was just another win for Nelson and the rest of the Minutewomen. And winning is something that has been happening very often as of late for UMass.

Early on, it was about them lacking an identity. It was about them lacking a leader on the floor. But now, the Minutewomen are gelling at the right time, and Nelson has taken it upon herself to assume the leadership role that is expected from all seniors.

"I'm trying to [be a leader]," Nelson said. "I was asked about being a senior, and if you feel you have the end of your career coming up, you want to go out with a bang. I wouldn't really put it that way. I want to do as much as I can. It's my last chance, obviously, and although we had a slow start, I think we can go out with a bang as a team."

Nelson broke a school record on Sunday, but she has never lost focus on her team's goals. As a fifth-year senior, Nelson has her sights set on the postseason, and she knows that this is her last ride.

"We're putting it all together," Nelson said. "We have our confidence. We never gave up. We knew we were a better team than we showed early in the season. Everybody's putting in the extra effort.

We're putting it together the best that we can right now, but we still have to make some improvements. Hopefully we can get some more wins in the next five games, then go into the A-10 tournament with a bye and then go to the NCAA's. That's our goal."

Nelson, after suffering a season-ending ACL tear during her sophomore year, has recovered to play two solid seasons for coach Marnie Dacko.

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF

TOUR GUIDES

1. Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2. Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3. Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.
4. Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST

To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse from February 6th - 10th, 2006. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 10th, 2006

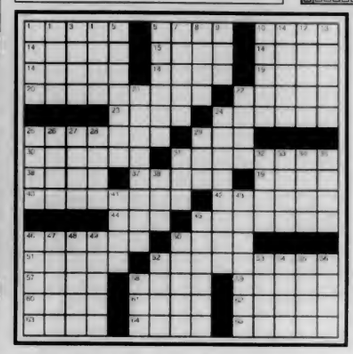
FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN By Rainy Stanford

LABRAT By Richard Martelly

ELSIE HOOPER By Richard D. Kryzkowski

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shaley

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe



ACROSS
1 Fire remnant
6 Small valley
10 Uses a laser weapon
14 Irritate
15 Mixed bag
16 Black, in verse
17 Ocean specs
18 Extended family
19 Ode
20 Basic nature
22 Goods transporter
23 Former Curtain
24 Chin beard
25 Bar-code reader
29 Charged particle
30 Touch tenderly
31 Put in
36 St. crossers
37 Pommes
39 Clinton's canal
40 Evaluate anew
42 Pay no heed to 44 Psyrnia
45 Radar gun's target
46 Bemoan
50 Normandy town
51 Wanted poster word
52 Quivered convulsively
57 Muscle spasms
58 Coalition
59 Wear away
60 __ and now
61 Do a fall chore
62 Mature
63 Organic compound
64 Declare
65 Perfume attire

DOWN
1 Long narrative poem
2 Netting
3 Actor Lugosi
4 Of all time
5 Sewer
6 Zhivago or Spock
7 Comic Woody
8 Anemias for one
9 Long, long time
10 Serengeti equine
11 Concerning
12 __ de Leon
13 Plumber's helper
21 Moon shape
22 Sound quality
24 Spread rumors
25 Battle souvenir
26 Bioactive bits
27 Length x width
28 Scottish headland
29 Bank gyms
31 Election winners
32 Actress Russo
33 Walked heavily
34 Leprechaun land
35 Forest denizen
38 Ballpark fig
41 -culottes
43 Male and female
45 Place setting item
46 Wood-shaping machine
47 Unworthy being
48 Small-scale
49 Tripod for plant-rope
50 Reduce an erasure
52 Eastern European
53 Idle or Slaltz
54 Hemp cord
55 Utopia
56 Fender blemish
58 Bikini part

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
Irish Pub
SPEED Wireless Internet
OCAMP & All Credit Cards accepted
FEBRUARY SPECIAL!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
TONIGHT! COLD DUCK COMPLEX
THURS. TURBINE
FRI IRISH SEISUN
SAT HI - 8 - US
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Yoga
Drop In Anytime Only $10!
Buy a Semester Package
1 Class/week $80 2 classes/week $150
Spring Classes (Feb 6 - May 17)
Mon / Wed Tues / Thurs
Power Yoga Yoga Basics
T'ai Chi
Tuesdays 7:30 - 8:30 pm
(Feb 7 - May 9) $100
Learn this ancient Chinese system of physical exercise for health, vitality, longevity and self-defense
To Register
Campus Recreation • Boyden 215
545-0022 • www.umass.edu/umm

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You should do that reading now. It definitely will not get done this weekend.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Try not to get blown over today walking around campus.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Shopping online is one of your greatest downfalls in life.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You will have a dream about Greek Gods tonight.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Crutches are only fun if you aren't injured.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
If your ears are tingling someone is gossiping about you.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Maybe you should check your e-mail at some point this month.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Call your mother before she forgets about you.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
There is a strong possibility you will be hopped up on drugs today.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You will lose that necklace before the day is over.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
That fish of yours isn't looking so hot anymore.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Don't pick up that magazine. You will regret it tomorrow.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Well I might be an outlaw, darlin', but you're the one stealing my heart."

—Thelma and Louise

Visit The Amherst Brewing Company mount snow
Promo Wednesday Nights
Win Lift Passes, Equipment & Merchandise.
Join This ABC Bartender at... mount snow
Special Valentine's Day Menu (Tuesday, Feb. 14th)
Get more info about our menu and calendar of events at amherstbrewing.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

TANNING SPECIAL! 25% off all purchases including packages & tanning products! Go to Beach Club Tanning on Monday Feb. 13th and ask for the "Hockey Special" Every purchase helps send the women's ice hockey team to the National Tournament in Missouri!

Will you know how to use your degree? Let us teach you LEADERSHIP, ARMY ROTC www.umass.edu/armyrotc

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in the basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

CHILDCARE

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part-time Spring – full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email: fjmooney@msn.com

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your Ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837

Become a Summer Orientation Counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/student_jobs/Orientation_position/ The application deadline is February 15th.

Needed NVIVO tutor. Call 253-0691

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 800-766-7174

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Spring & Summer Help Needed: Excellent Earning Potential working outdoors providing exterior carpenter ant treatments to residential customers. Reliable vehicle required (mileage compensation paid). Must be 18 years or older and certified with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by passing the Core Applicator Exam (information, all necessary study materials and payment of exam fees will by provided for qualified individuals). Apply in Person. No Phone Calls Please. Minuteman Pest Control 90 Conz Street, Northampton, MA 01060 (across from Hampshire Gazette Building)

EMPLOYMENT

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288 / email: fjmooney@msn.com

MISCELLANEOUS

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.ATHENASHN.com/Goddess/910

ROOM FOR RENT

Great Sunrise/sunset bedroom available 'til May. Overlooking UMass Agricultural Center / Stadium. Walk to campus. Renovated 3 bedroom apt. $200/month (413) 665-7313

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1985 Hottest Destinations – Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $150 www.sunsplashtours.com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299 Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code 3J www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2006 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass gets another shot at La Salle

Minutemen look to avenge early loss to Explorers

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The last time the Massachusetts men's basketball team (10-9 5-4 A-10) faced the La Salle Explorers (13-7 5-4 A-10), junior captains Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme turned in immense performances – Lasme went for 13 points and 12 boards, Freeman had 11 and 10 – but the Minutemen lost 69-61 to an Explorer team on a four-game losing streak.

It's been about revenge – getting it and receiving it – since then.

The Minutemen pounded Temple 60-34 in the first meeting on Jan. 21, then Temple returned the favor with a 76-47 lashing in Philadelphia.

UMass lost a heartbreaker at Rhode Island, 58-55, on a 3-pointer from Dawan Robinson with under three seconds to go; then UMass evened the score with a win in similar fashion, downing the Rams 63-61 in front a raucous student crowd at the Mullins Center on Saturday night.

Now, it's a rematch with La Salle. The Explorers visit the Mullins Center tonight at 7 p.m., where the Minutemen are a perfect 8-0 this season. And both UMass coach Travis Ford and Freeman maintain that the first effort against La Salle was not their best.

"We didn't bring the effort," Freeman said. "[La Salle's] record didn't do them justice because they've been in every game they've lost. It wasn't like they were a bad team. They've been up on everybody and ended up losing the lead. We didn't think they were a bad team.

"I know I'm going to put forth the effort on Wednesday and for the rest of the games that we have," he added. "I need to bring that energy and have that mentality. I want my team to follow my lead and that's what Coach [Ford] always said."

Junior James Life has lit up the competition in the last two games, scoring 19 points in both contests. The sharpshooter is averaging 16.3 points per game over the last four games.

UMass rebounded extremely well against URI, and it made a significant difference in the outcome of the game. The Rams had obvious trouble containing both Freeman and Lasme on the offensive boards, and second-chance opportunities can devastate an opponent. Freeman, Ford and the team

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 6

Pro scout gives insight to future draft prospects

Dan Duggan

This is a column that I planned on writing two months ago, after UMass played UConn, but shortly after the game the semester ended and the Collegian shut down production for winter break so it never came to fruition.

Seeing as how this story is not particularly timely, I figured I'd dust it off and break it out now, because I think readers who follow college basketball will find it interesting.

At the UConn game, which took place at a packed Hartford Civic Center on Dec. 8, I found myself seated in the nether regions of press row. Apparently with such media luminaries as Andy Katz, Sean McDonough, Bill Rafferty and Jay Bilas in the house, my Daily Collegian credential lost some of its luster.

The prime seats on press row at every game start at half court and work out down the sideline and occasionally to the baseline. For this game I was seated along the baseline, which can be bad – or very bad – depending on which end of the court the band is on. Luckily for me I didn't have to withstand two hours of drums and trombones blaring in my ear, as the UConn band was mercifully located on the opposite side of the floor.

The real benefit of my seating assignment is that I was seated next to the NBA scouts who were in attendance. Typically at games, I'm seated next to some fan who got a courtside seat from the athletic department or radio announcers – either way there isn't a whole lot of conversing.

But given the opportunity to sit next to an NBA scout for two hours, I figured it would be pretty interesting to pick his brain about the players on the floor that night, other top players in college basketball and just basketball in general.

While I don't think I'd be violating any confidentiality with the scout I spoke with by revealing what team he worked for, I'll just refer to him as a scout from an Eastern Conference team (and it wasn't the Celtics).

As much as UMass fans may hope, the scouts were there exclusively to scout the Huskies. UConn has six players who are considered to be NBA-caliber (big surprise, they're No. 1 in the country) and the scouts were there to help form their opinions which will play a major role in who gets selected in the NBA Draft in June.

Before getting to the scout's opinions on the UConn players, I want to put to rest any lingering concerns UMass fans have about junior Rashaun Freeman potentially leaving for the pros after this year. By no means am I knocking Freeman, who is having another typically solid season, but he isn't even on the radar of NBA scouts.

When I asked the scout before the game if he was looking at any UMass players, his response was, "This kid No. 1 is supposed to be pretty good, right?"

While the scout clearly had heard something about Freeman, if he was seriously thinking that Freeman would get drafted, he probably would have at least known his name.

Interestingly, the scout was more impressed with Freeman's frontcourt mate, junior Stephane Lasme. While Lasme had a relatively quiet game (six points, five rebounds and three blocks) the scout was impressed with his block totals from earlier in the season, and felt that he had the athleticism to play in the league if he got stronger and developed his offensive game more.

The other Minuteman that caught the scout's eye was senior Jeff Viggiano. The scout liked the toughness that Viggiano played with and the surprising athleticism he displayed on a few plays en route to 17 points. That said, the scout wasn't encouraging Viggiano to put down the books in the last semester of his college career in anticipation of an NBA career, but as a basketball enthusiast he appreciated the way Viggiano played.

While it's safe to say that no UMass player will hear his name called on draft night, there were still plenty of players on the floor at the Civic Center who will. (If you're a diehard Minuteman fan, and hate everything and anything related to UConn, this would be the place to stop reading.)

The biggest draw to the game for the scouts was UConn sophomore forward Rudy Gay. While Gay's freakish athletic ability is unquestioned, the main concern the scout had with Gay's play was that he seemed to turn it on and off too frequently, satisfied to coast through the game for stretches rather than playing with a killer instinct from start to finish.

The scout compared Gay to last year's second pick Marvin Williams, who is having an underwhelming rookie campaign with the Atlanta Hawks. Like Williams with North Carolina last year, the scout wasn't convinced that Gay has what it takes to be the go-to guy because he is surrounded by so much talent.

That said, by the end of the game, the scout gave Gay his due, as he took over the game midway through the second half. "I didn't want to like him," the scout said, "but the kid is good."

The other Husky that the scout pegged as a lottery pick was junior forward Josh Boone. Boone finished the game with 13 points and 10 rebounds, all of which came in the second half, as he played just three minutes in the first half after picking up two early fouls.

The scout believes that Boone could blossom in the NBA in the same way that former Husky Charlie

See DUGGAN on page 6

Nelson breaks record, leads UM

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Heading into the Atlantic 10 battle against Saint Joseph's (15-7 7-4 A-10) on Sunday, there was a good chance that the 438 fans in attendance at the Mullins Center could witness a record-breaking moment. Senior Katie Nelson needed just three more 3-pointers to break Beth Kuzmeski's all-time record of 179.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (8-14 5-6 A-10) was looking for its fifth win in six games, and even though Nelson had an idea that she was closing in on Kuzmeski's record, the redshirt senior was able to stay focused on the task at hand – winning ballgames.

"I knew a few days ago," Nelson said humbly after she led her team to a 63-53 win over the Hawks. "Someone told me how close I was. I didn't realize I was that close. I knew I only needed three baskets, and I was trying to keep it out of my head as much as I could because I know if I thought about it, it was going to mess me up. I just tried to relax and do what I needed to do to help my team win the game."

And she did just that, scoring 15 points and a career-high 10 assists to notch her first career double-double.

Nelson began her day on a good note, knocking down her first 3-pointer less than five minutes into the game to give her team a 13-6 lead. She continued her solid first-half performance by burying yet another shot from behind the arc with 4:28 left in the half.

She was 2-for-2 from 3-point range at that instance, and you just knew that another one was on its way. A little more than three minutes after her last attempt, Nelson went for the school record, and did not disappoint. She knocked down her third 3-pointer of the game, and number 180 of her career, making her one of the greatest 3-point shooters in school history.

While the point guard from Maryland was aware of the record, she was not going to let that conduct the flow of the game.

"I was just trying to relax and I put my shots in, which is a nice change," Nelson said. "I had a good game a couple weeks ago, but I would like to add some consistency to my shooting."

Redshirt senior Katie Nelson broke the record for total 3-pointers with three shots from beyond the arc in Sunday's game against conference rival Saint Joseph's. She's hit 180 threes in her career.

See W HOOPS on page 6

Jordan shares thoughts on Bryant scoring craze

By Kristie Rieken
Associated Press

NEW YORK – When it comes to scoring points, Michael Jordan is an expert.

So he couldn't help but delight in Kobe Bryant putting up 81 and a New York high schooler going wild for 113.

Still, Jordan insisted things would have been a bit different if he'd been guarding Bryant.

"If I was on the other side, there's no way I would have been in at the end of that game without six fouls," Jordan said Tuesday. "I don't know if I could have given up 81 points and not fouled out of the game."

Bryant's total in a come-from-behind victory over Toronto last month was the second-highest in NBA history.

Epiphanny Prince set a national girls' record last week in a game that was a rout from the start. Some complained her performance in such a one-sided contest was an example of poor sportsmanship.

"I can't fault the young lady for scoring 113 points when she goes out each and every minute to play the game hard," Jordan said. "If you're going to fault anybody, fault the coach for not taking her out of the game."

The former Chicago Bulls star was in town to announce the players for his high school showcase, the Jordan All-American Classic, set for April 22 at Madison Square Garden.

Jordan was so impressed by Prince – one of the top prep players in the nation – he's contemplating adding a girls' event next year.

"I think that she's going to innovate this game," he said. "I think we should give women an opportunity to be recognized."

Jordan, whose NBA career-high was 69, couldn't remember a specific time when people got on him about scoring too much. But he knows there were probably many occasions like that.

"I imagine you guys were mad at me a lot in New York," Jordan joked, in a lobby adjacent to the Ex-Bull Michael Jordan won nine scoring titles and six championship rings during his 17 years in the National Basketball Association. He finished his career with the Washington Wizards.

See JORDAN on page 6

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Thursday, February 9, 2006 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 74

Select Board chooses new Town Manager

By Mike Sances
Collegian Staff

Amherst's Select Board has completed the intensive search for a new Town Manager, voting unanimously on Jan. 30 for Laurence Shaffer, town administrator for Vernon, Conn.

Shaffer, 57, was chosen over Richard White, formerly town manager for Lexington, and John Musante, Amherst's finance director.

"I was very impressed with the whole process," Shaffer said Wednesday. "Frankly, I'd never been through an interview process that was that extensive. But, at the end of the process I actually felt energized. I actually felt at the end that I was really beginning to enjoy it."

In a prepared statement, Select Board member Gerald Weiss praised Shaffer for his "combination of grant experience, successful environmental and economic initiatives, experiences with universities, experience with poverty and with college communities." Other Board members cited Shaffer's sense of humor and his cordiality as influences for their votes.

Assuming contract negotiations between Shaffer and the town go smoothly, Shaffer will start on July 1, becoming the fourth town manager in Amherst's history. Since Barry Del Castilho, town manager for the past 23 years, is set to retire on March 31, a temporary manager must be appointed for the intermediate months.

Appointed by the five-member Select Board, the town manager is charged with executing and administrating the policies outlined by the Board, which is elected directly by Amherst voters, and which had accepted feedback from townspeople throughout the search for a new manager. Under the Amherst Town Government Act, Shaffer's contract could be for up to 5 years, though it may be renewed.

One reason Shaffer gave for his interest in the position was Amherst's status as a college town, something he had experienced working for Oneonta, N.Y., home to Hartwick College and the State University College at Oneonta; Keene, New Hampshire, home to Keene State College; and Durham, New Hampshire, home to the University of New Hampshire. In fact, the only town Shaffer has worked for that has not been home to a university has been Vernon.

"There is a distinct quality to those communities that are the homes of higher educational institutions," Shaffer said. "I think it has a lot to do with the energy of the student body," he said, adding that college towns are "more likely to have a strong, lively downtown" and a "very active cultural community."

While acknowledging that it was not uncommon in college towns for the university and town communities to remain distinct, he predicted that he would be reaching out to UMass Chancellor John Lombardi and would do whatever he could to build bridges between the town and UMass, as well as the two private universities, Hampshire and Amherst.

See MANAGER on page 2

SGA upset over possible tuition increase

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The Board of Trustees rejected a motion that would have prevented a tuition hike of 3.2 percent at the University of Massachusetts yesterday.

The motion, which was created by the Student Government Association Senate of UMass, attempted to stop the fifth increase in tuition costs at the University within the last five years.

SGA President Pavel Payano voiced his displeasure with the Trustee's ruling at the Senate meeting last night.

"I'm angry," said Payano. "One of the board members was quoted last year as saying that last year's hikes were 'all we need'. Obviously it wasn't."

SGA leaders will also present a second motion today that ask the Board of Trustees to consider altering the university admission policies to build a student body that more adequately represents the population of youths graduating from Massachusetts's high schools in racial and socially economic terms.

SGA leaders have pointed to certain statistics that show certain segments of the population, African-Americans and Latinos, being underrepresented by the UMass flagship campus.

According to statistics compiled by the Department of Education, African-Americans and Latinos, although they made up over 17 percent of the 12th grade population in Massachusetts in the 2004-05 academic year, only made up 7.3 percent of the entering class.

"We feel this motion has particularly strong appeal to legislators and community leaders in underrepresented districts across the state and these leaders can bring strong pressure upon the Board," said Misby Lieblum, secretary of Public Policy and Relations for the SGA.

"We're just looking for the Board of Trustees to examine this topic and maybe create a consul to discuss it," said Payano. "If this college is supposed to represent Massachusetts, it should represent the people in its state. If the University thinks they're already making an attempt, they're wrong, because nothing seems to have been done.

"Even if it doesn't pass, we at least have members of the Trustees Board talking about this," said Payano.

SGA Chairman of Public Policy and Relations Eric Robbie also announced the launch of the new SGA Web site that can be accessed by going to umass.edu and typing in "SGA" in the search menu.

Misby Lieblum, the Secretary of Public Policy and Relations for the Student Government Association, makes a presentation to her peers at the SGA meeting last night.

"I think the Web site will be a useful tool for students and SGA members," said Robbie. "It'll allow students a chance to know and understand what we're doing."

Robbie added that the Web site is an unfinished product and is looking for student suggestions on how to improve the page.

The SGA plans to hold a "Rally Against Privatization" on Feb. 13 at 12 p.m. on Student Union steps.

The rally is in response to the University's new alcohol policies, the increase in housing fees and the addition of mandatory all-freshman housing.

Senators also voted to allocate $2,150 to Campus Design and Copy, a Registered Student Organization.

"This is one organization that helps every RSO around campus," Chair Peter Barros.

Senators also voted unanimously to allocate $800 to the RSO Students for a Free Tibet and $1958.75 to "Casa Dominicana" which, along with the SGA, will sponsor the play "Platanos & Collard Greens" on Feb. 15 at 8 p.m. in the Bowker Auditorium.

Parisians hold rally in support of Jill Carroll

The Christian Science Monitor newspaper, employer of kidnapped American journalist and University of Massachusetts graduate Jill Carroll, reported that a rally was held in Paris yesterday in support of Carroll, who is being held captive in Iraq.

Thirty white balloons were released at the Eiffel Tower to mark the number of days the journalist was taken hostage by a group of terrorists. Carroll has actually been held for 32 days, but "the sentiment is what counts," the Monitor wrote.

People in attendance included French actress Juliette Binoche, former French hostage Florence Aubenas and the group Reporters Without Borders. The demonstration was held at the Trocadero Esplanade overlooking the Seine River. Several banners that said "Free Jill Carroll" were displayed.

"The impressive show of solidarity that was maintained for Ms. Aubenas all the time she was a hostage should now be repeated for Ms. Carroll, and for Iraqi journalists Reem Zeid and Marwan Khazaal, of whom there has been no news since they were kidnapped on Feb. 1," said Reporters Without Borders Secretary-General Robert Ménard in an interview with the Monitor.

Thirty-seven journalists have been kidnapped in Iraq since the beginning of the war in 2003, but only five have been killed.

Carroll was kidnapped Jan. 7 in Baghdad, Iraq where she was supposed to interview a Sunni politician. Her interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, was killed in an ambush when Carroll was abducted.

—Dan O'Brien

French actress, Juliette Binoche, was among those offering support for Jill Carroll at a rally in Paris.

'99 Questions' teaches students about race relations

By Sreejoy Nambiar
Collegian Correspondent

Students were entertained and educated by the comedic one-man theatrics of Mark Cryer last week, despite the fact that his performance handled the touchy subject of race.

Cryer, a theatre professor at Hamilton College in New York, performed his play, "99 Questions You've Always Wanted to Ask an African-American, But Were Too Afraid to Ask..." at the Campus Center auditorium.

The performance relieved the tension involved with discussing race by poking fun at stereotypes through a cast of interesting characters, all played by Cryer. The characters answered stereotypical questions frequently asked about black culture. His characters answer questions such as, "What is nappy hair?" and "Do black people sunburn?" as well as more controversial questions about the common use of the "N word" and the size of a black man's "you know what." The characters range from the very brash and straightforward cab driver "Barak" to the sassy and outspoken hairdresser "Shaniqua." Other characters represented the thoughts of the "black professional" and the "average white guy."

Cryer says he created the show to increase race conversations between whites and blacks and to erase stereotypes held against black culture. "[The show] is information for whites and affirmation for blacks," he said.

University of Massachusetts junior Lawrence Waters agrees that racial stereotypes give a false perception of what blacks are really like.

"They see images on TV and think we have a thuggish look," Walters said. "They think we can't act proper in public and we're all the same."

UMass has had its share of racial controversy in the past couple of years, most notably the "KKK" caricature issue that plagued some members of the Student Government Association last year. Student Director of the Malcolm X Center Stacy Bernardeau expected the show would help race relations on campus.

"There's not much integration between white and black people and they need to be more supportive of each other," Bernardeau said.

Many students said that both sides can learn from each other by attending performances such as "99 Questions." Graduate student Paul Frisoli didn't have any expectations about the play, but learned that a different culture is not necessarily a worse culture.

"Some white people view black culture as deviant because it is different," Frisoli said.

"The show was an interesting look at culture and gave a better way to understand it," Frisoli said.

Jenise Holloway, also a graduate student, said that the show could help black people better respond to questions from others about black culture.

"It helps take a third-person look at a situation," Holloway said. "Before you react, just stop and observe and explain without mocking or getting angry," she said.

Freshman theatre major Jonalis Carrasquillo feels that "99 Questions" and sketches like it are positive and show black people in a brighter light.

"This shows that black people aren't ignorant, we're not all the same, and we're more intelligent than you think," Carrasquillo said.

This is Cryer's fourth year performing this play across the country, and in Europe. He has performed in Baton Rouge, Atlanta, Pittsburgh, Charleston, S.C., and Syracuse. He got the idea for the play from a friend who went around with a camera asking people if they had questions they wanted answered about black culture. Cryer says that he has performed every show thus far without conflict.

Mark Cryer performs in his one-man, comedy sketch, "99 Questions You've Always Wanted to Ask an African-American, but Were Too Afraid to Ask..." in the Campus Center Auditorium last week. Cryer's performance sought to increase communication about race relations.

Sentence reduced for guilty Ware man

A Ware man, who pled guilty to charges stemming from an incident in October 2004 in which he brutalized three students at the University of Massachusetts, got his jail sentenced reduced on Tuesday, according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Roger Menard Jr., 20, pleaded guilty to three counts of assault and battery and one count of disorderly conduct in December 2005 for his part in an assault that resulted in one UMass student having 12 metal plates surgically inserted into his face.

Menard was originally sentenced to three years and six months in jail for his role in the assaults. However, his defense attorney, David Mintz, argued in court over the past month that his client's sentence should be reduced because co-defendant Timothy Lamorey was sentenced to only three years in jail for more serious charges.

Assistant Northwestern District Attorney Michael Cahillane opposed the sentence reduction due to Menard's criminal record. Cahillane also called Menard the "ringleader" of the fight.

Menard's probation of four years after he is released from jail will still remain the same, the Gazette reported.

The Northampton District Court log reported that Menard has since been in trouble with the law since his conviction in December. On Jan. 13, he pleaded innocent to a charge of possession of a class B drug (Ether, 02?). His case is continued to Feb. 10.

—Dan O'Brien

ARTS
FASHION WEEK
New York City showcases 2006s fall fashions.
PAGE 7

EDITORIAL/OPINION
'PRIVATIZATION' OF UMASS
One columnist looks at the socioeconomic changes taking place at UMass.
PAGE 5

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy, H32°
TONIGHT Mostly Clear, L16
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H34°, L20°

SPORTS
EXPLORERS TOO MUCH FOR UMASS
The Minutemen lost 65-44 to La salle last night at the Mullins Center.
PAGE 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Eric Athas
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Katie Huston
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egovian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Ian Jones
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Kristen LaCasse
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Herbi
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Girasson
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Morgan-Ann Rousseau
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Alex Butler
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellivau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT SPORTS Rob Greenfield
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Tucker Merrick

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1934 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1996. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick Belanger
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Elizabeth Caristi
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Tiffany Van Langen, Ginny Niehen

Kerry Healey announces gubernatorial campaign

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey officially announced her campaign for governor Wednesday, vowing to fight for lower taxes and education reforms and pledging to take on what she called the "tax and spend" mind-set of Democratic lawmakers.

In a 25-minute speech to a crowd of supporters at Boston's Omni Parker House, Healey portrayed herself as a hardworking public official who rose from modest means, working throughout high school and college to help pay her tuition.

Healey, a Republican who is hoping to become the first woman elected governor in Massachusetts, appealed to Democratic and independent voters in the speech, never once mentioning her party affiliation.

"The next governor must stand up to the tax-and-spend attitude of the Democratic Legislature," Healey, 45, told the partisan crowd. "And let's have no illusions. That mind-set is alive and well under the Golden Dome."

The speech was light on specifics. Healey said she would oppose a House plan to impose a payroll tax on businesses to pay for an expansion of health care in Massachusetts. She said she would work to create more housing and to cut the state income tax rate to five percent.

She also said she would push to raise the legal age at which young people can leave high school from 16 to 18.

"To allow 16-year-olds to end their education is to sentence them to a life of disappointment, poverty or even jail," she said.

Healey is looking to take over the corner office from Mitt Romney, who announced late last year that he would not run for re-election in part to mull a possible presidential run in 2008. Healey was elected lieutenant governor in 2002 as Romney's running mate.

Massachusetts Democratic Party Chairman Phil Johnson said the state has fared poorly under the Romney-Healey administration, losing population, failing to create enough new jobs and watching housing costs soar.

"With a record like this, Kerry Healey should be joining Mitt Romney on his exodus from the state rather than announcing her candidacy for governor today," he said in a statement.

Romney issued a statement of support for Healey, calling her "a strong and reliable ally in the effort to maintain fiscal discipline on Beacon Hill."

There are two declared candidates for governor on the Democratic side.

Attorney General Thomas Reilly and Deval Patrick, former chief of civil rights for the U.S. Justice Department during the Clinton administration.

Healey's announcement comes as no surprise. She said she intended to seek the office if Romney opted not to seek re-election. Even before his formal announcement, Healey was ramping up fundraising.

Healey is the first Republican candidate to announce for governor. One possible GOP challenger, former Massachusetts Turnpike Board Member Christy Mihos has not yet decided whether he plans to run as a Republican or an independent.

Republicans have held the state's

See HEALEY on page 4

COURTESY COUNCIL.COM

Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, shown above, has declared herself as a candidate for Massachusetts governor in the next election.

Grueling search for Town Manager ends

MANAGER from page 1

The unanimity of the January 30 vote by the Select Board, as well as its length — only two minutes — seemed to have surprised many, including the Select Board members themselves, in comparison with the lengthy and at times grueling interview process. It has also caused some members of the community to express suspicion.

In an e-mail to the Collegian, Larry Kelley, a Governor's appointee who was one of the major figures behind last year's campaign to replace the current local government with a Mayor and a Council, called the unanimous selection of Shaffer "incredible and unfathomable." Reached by phone on Monday, Kelley claimed there were indications that Select Board members may have violated the Open Meeting Law, which requires all government business to be conducted transparently, and which explicitly forbids conducting official business via e-mail.

Seeking to explain the unanimous, swift decision to pick Shaffer, Select Board member and UMass professor of mathematics Rob Kusner said Monday that the vote was "not surprising, if you think about it, because we had a common body of material and experience in interviewing [Shaffer] and the vast preponderance of the evidence strongly substantiated Mr. Shaffer's qualifications and suitability for the town manager position."

Indeed, even Kelley conceded that Shaffer, while not his own first choice, was highly qualified for the position. "This may be one of those few cases where the ends justify the means," he said, referring to his charge that the Open Meeting Law may have been violated during the selection process.

But, he added, "Just barely."

Flynn will take over as new Springfield police commissioner

By Adam Goldlick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — State Secretary of Public Safety Edward Flynn will take control of this cash-strapped city's police department within six weeks and acknowledged Wednesday that his appointment has touched off angry criticism from the police department's unionized officers.

Casting himself as a crime fighter who rose through the ranks but hasn't lost touch with his city cop sensibilities, Flynn said he'll do his best to forge a good relationship with the department's rank and file.

"I've walked a beat, I've answered calls in a cruiser, I've worked plain clothes anti-crime. I've investigated cases. I've paid my dues," Flynn said. "I know this work and I'm empathetic to the cause of the cops. What I ask of them is what I accord them — the benefit of the doubt. I'm here to help them succeed."

Flynn signed a five-year, $155,000 annual contract Monday to be Springfield's police commissioner. His appointment was announced at a City Hall news conference that was moved from a large hearing room to the mayor's office after about a dozen union members showed up carrying signs criticizing Gov. Mitt Romney, who attended the event.

Tom Scanlon, president of the Springfield police officer's union, said workers were upset with the secrecy of the nationwide search for a commissioner.

The decision to hire Flynn was made by Mayor Charles Ryan, city council president Jose Tosado and Phil Puccia, executive director of the Romney-appointed control board overseeing Springfield's finances. Candidates were kept under wraps to protect them from any fallout they might face in their current positions, Ryan said.

"This should've been an open process where the public could have interacted with the finalists," Scanlon said. "This is not well received by the membership. This nationwide search was a farce."

Flynn, 57, was named secretary of the Executive Office of Public Safety by Romney in 2003. He also is chief adviser to the governor on homeland security. Romney said he will announce a replacement for Flynn in a few weeks.

"I'm not really losing him because he's coming to work in one of the critical cities in our state," Romney said. "It is a city that has enormous challenges which is exactly what Secretary Flynn looks forward to."

Springfield, the state's third-largest city, had the highest murder rate and the highest rate of violent crime among Massachusetts cities in 2004, according to FBI statistics.

The city is also facing dire financial problems. It now has a $6.5 million budget deficit that could swell to $70 million by 2012 if it does not settle contracts with several of its unions — including the police union.

To deal with the budget crisis, the state Legislature gave oversight of the city's budget to the five-member financial control board in July 2004.

After the board ordered a review of the police department, a private consultant said then-police Chief Paula Meara's management style was "dysfunctional." The city gave her a $300,000 buyout last June and changed city's top police job from a chief to a commissioner, freeing the position from civil service requirements.

William J. Fitchet, a Springfield deputy chief, has been interim head of the department since July 1 and was favored by many rank-and-file officers to keep the job.

Fitchet did not return a phone call to The Associated Press.

After Wednesday's news conference, Scanlon met behind closed doors for about 30 minutes with Flynn.

"He's trying to establish a relationship and we're going to give him the opportunity," the union leader said. "But he faces an uphill battle."

Flynn said he understood the grumblings coming from the department he's about to take over.

"There's three constants in a cop's life," he said. "The job stinks, morale's never been worse and the chief's a jerk. That's true in every single police department in the free world. We've got to get beyond that and focus on the fact that this community desperately needs its cops."

Flynn has been involved with Springfield policing since the summer, when he oversaw state police patrols in the city to help crack down on crime.

As Secretary of Public Safety, Flynn has managed the Massachusetts State Police, the Department of Correction, the National Guard, the Department of Fire Services and the Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency.

He's also served as police chief in Braintree and Arlington County, Va., and ran the police department in Chelsea when that city suffered a budget crisis in the early 1990s.

"The good challenge of having difficult finances is that you have to police smart," Flynn said. "You're not in a position to spend your way out of problems. You've got to come up with good strategies that are tightly connected to the community's needs."

"All Students Welcome"
2006 2006

ALANA CAREER FAIR
Resume & Business Attire

February 15, 2006
5:00-7:30 pm
Campus Center Auditorium

BCP
Bilingual Collegiate Program
545-1968

Career Services
545-2224

CCEBMS
Community for the Collegiate Education of Black And Other Minority Students 544-0031

DiMES
Diversity in Management Education Services
545-5610

NASSS
Native American Student Support Services
577-0980

UALRC
United Asia Learning Resource Center
545-1844

"A WORLD OF OPPORTUNITIES"

Tired of the Dorms?
IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE
Lincoln Real Estate
25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2006

GETS THE ADRENALINE GOING. YOURS AND WHOEVER READS ABOUT IT ON YOUR RESUME.

AN ARMY OF ONE.
Call 413-545-2321 for more information
ENROLL IN ARMY ROTC
BECOME AN ARMY OFFICER

Financial aid open to drug convicts

By Bridget Matellaro
Daily Illini (U. Illinois)

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — Congress altered the Higher Education Act on Feb. 1, enabling some college students with drug convictions to obtain financial aid more easily. While the change allows some students with past offenses to receive aid, those convicted while attending college will have their aid repealed or suspended.

Thomas Angell, campaign director for the Students for Sensible Drug Policy, a national non-profit organization, said the alteration is a step forward, but work still needs to be done.

"This is definitely a victory, but we remain concerned with the tens of thousands of students who are stripped from aid and can't attend school because they don't have enough money," Angell said.

More than 175,000 financial aid applications have been disqualified since the government began asking about drug convictions in 2000, according to the U.S. Department of Education. This number, Angell said, does not take into account the students who did not apply, for fear of rejection.

"Students may be eligible, but they might think they aren't," Angell said. "There is no way to tell how many this is really affecting."

Congress passed the Higher Education Act in 1965 under President Lyndon Johnson. Its goal was to "expand postsecondary education ... and to increase the affordability of postsecondary education for moderate-income families."

In 1998, Rep. Mark Souder (R-Ind.) suggested amending the Act to make it harder for students with drug convictions to get aid. He said repealing or suspending financial aid from applicants with drug convictions would discourage students from using or selling drugs and encourage abusers to get treatment. He also said the change would put taxpayers' money to better use.

Earlier this year, however, Souder requested the new changes for the law, saying that the Department of Education was misinterpreting the amendment in a "draconian" way.

In January, the Advisory Committee on Student Financial Assistance, a group created by Congress, said the drug conviction question on the financial aid application was irrelevant and should be removed. However, no changes have been made.

"I think that it should be removed," said Tina Kerins, sophomore in Business. "Bad decisions should not be held accountable for future opportunities."

Conversely, Katelyn Johnson, sophomore in LAS, feels the question is essential in determining aid. "I think for most students with a drug conviction, school doesn't necessarily come first," she said. "Financial aid can be spent on those that do put school first."

Students for Sensible Drug Policy believes that the drug provision hurts the U.S. economy and does nothing to discourage drug use.

"This law increases drug abuse by blocking access to education," Angell said. "Studies show that the more educated a person is, the less likely they are to engage in drug abuse. By cutting them off, the government is increasing their chances."

Romney files bill to prepare MA for avian flu

By Anika Clark
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney announced yesterday at the Governor's Summit on Pandemic Preparedness the filing of a bill that dedicates $36.5 million to preparing Massachusetts for a potential avian flu pandemic, which experts predict could lead to as many as 20,000 deaths.

"We'll be as prepared as humanly possible. I'm convinced it's an investment we should make," the Governor said. "This proposal will allow us to respond to any kind of emergency, whether it's a pandemic, or man-made or a natural disaster."

According to the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, if a bird flu pandemic does occur, the state could see 2 million infections, 80,000 hospitalizations and 20,000 deaths within six to eight weeks.

"This is a vicious killer," Michael Leavitt, secretary of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, said, adding that while no one knows if the avian flu will become a worldwide epidemic, but "the warning signs are there."

During the summit, Leavitt estimated that an outbreak anywhere in the world would hit U.S. shores within 30 days.

"If it is present anywhere, there is danger everywhere," Leavitt said.

The bird flu shows genetic similarities to the 1918 "Spanish flu" that killed millions of people worldwide, including 45,000 people in Massachusetts, he said.

Romney explained that the bill would provide state hospitals with 5,000 additional beds, ventilators and stockpiles of supplies, medications and food.

"Our planning will be done on a regional basis," he said, explaining that he divided Massachusetts into five emergency preparedness regions.

Currently, hospitals in the Southeastern portion of the state would be least capable to accommodate a surge of patients, he said, whereas the Greater Boston area has excess capacity.

In addition to Romney's hospital initiatives, the Governor included a series of flu-planning checklists for businesses, state and local governments and faith-based and community organizations.

The state is also working to develop a database of potential medical volunteers and has devised plans to help Massachusetts agencies continue to operate if an epidemic were to occur.

In the event of an Avian flu outbreak, the Governor suggested measures people can take to protect themselves, such as accumulating stockpiles of canned and dried goods in their homes.

Citizens serious about preparedness should set aside an extra day's worth of food each week because in the event of a pandemic, "our grocery stores would quickly have their shelves empty," Romney said.

While stressing the importance of preparing for a flu pandemic, Romney said he is still optimistic that it will not happen in the near future.

Leavitt, however, pointed out that three pandemics occurred in the 20th century alone.

"Pandemics are a fact of life," he said, before discussing the 1918 flu outbreak that killed approximately 500,000 Americans.

"That fire soon became an inferno," Leavitt said. "My friends, this is not a Stephen King novel. It happened."

Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney (R), shown above, has filed a bill to help increase the preparedness of Massachusetts for a possible outbreak of the avian flu.

Republican party gains new young, student members

By Tim Scorbato
Northern Star (Northern Illinois U.)

DEKALB, Ill. — Along with more young people embracing Christian values, so is the Republican party increasing its ranks. Popular opinion suggests the effects of emotionally-charged debates over gay rights, gambling and abortion are leading to a more conservatively-minded country. State Rep. Bob Pritchard (R-Hinckley) and others commented on how this development affects the legislative process.

He said Illinois has a wide range of views. In order to represent the best interests of the people, one must look at the long-term welfare of Illinois.

In other cases, personal religious beliefs may be what is in the best interest of the people, he said.

For example, the Christian belief of family corresponds with the survival of Illinois, Pritchard said. Illinois is based on family units. He feels it's when an individual is raised in a stressful and unbalanced environment, with the lack of a loving unit, that problems occur in society.

With the issue of same-sex marriage, a public servant must predict how this will affect the balance of the family unit. He asked whether it is possible for a same-sex married couple to bring the same amount of balance to their child and family as a heterosexual married couple could.

Another example is the issue of gambling. Gov. Rod Blagojevich proposed a state-sponsored gambling game, Keno, to raise money for school construction.

The Research 2000 Illinois Poll stated 66 percent of Republicans oppose the proposal.

There is opposition because the game, along with other electronic gambling games, is flashy and sucks consumers into spending hard-earned money, Pritchard said.

Such growing conservative values may scare away important moderate Republican votes, he said, but he has not noticed any strong changes in moderate voting in the Republican Party.

Even within the political structure it's hard to categorically cast people.

Moderates listen to the people and think through social issues just as the rest of the party does, Pritchard said.

Aaron Funfsinn, a junior political science major, only sees a win-win situation out of the pairing.

"Any losses the Republicans may have received from their conservative views outweigh the losses the Democrats received for shunning those views," he said.

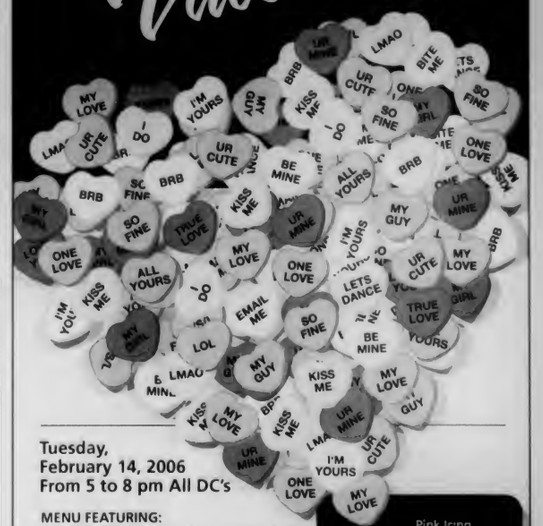
The growing religious community among today's American youth will vote for the more conservative candidate, Funfsinn predicts.

According to a 2005 survey by Leadership Network and The Hartford Institute for Religion Research, U.S. Protestant mega churches also draw in large amounts of younger crowds.

The weekly attendance of these mega churches has doubled in the past five years because of more active youth groups.

Eric Biersmith, right, helps Villanova University students register to vote. Polls show that more students, like Biersmith, are voting Republican.

Knowles Flower Shop
Attention Students!



Make your Valentine's memorable with gorgeous roses, chocolates, stuffed bears, balloons and Spring flowers!

172 North Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01002
(413) 253-3805
www.knowlesflower.com

Shopping for a Health Club?
Do your homework first!
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS CLUB
Has it ALL for you!
"WINTER SPECIAL"
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
WHAT DO YOU GET?
Full Sized Indoor Pool • Aqua Aerobics
Cybex Nautilus Circuit • Cybex Free Weights
Full Court Basketball • Volleyball • Indoor Tennis
Cardio • Saunas • Indoor Cycling
Jacuzzi • Yoga/Pilates • Aeroblics/Step/Bosu
COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL WITH JERRY MONDAY & THURSDAY 6-8 PM
NO INITIATION FEE OR LONG-TERM CONTRACT NECESSARY
90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill) Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10PM MON-FRI • 8AM-9PM SAT & SUN

Be My Valentine

Tuesday, February 14, 2006
From 5 to 8 pm All DC's
MENU FEATURING:
Seafood Bisque, Prime Rib, Chicken Sofia
Buffalo Portabella Mushroom,
Chocolate Cake/Raspberry Mousse
Frost Your Own Heart Shaped Cookies
Pink Icing
White Icing
Chocolate Icing
Heart Sprinkles
Enter Our Raffle Today!
1st Prize
Godiva Chocolates
Two 2nd Prizes
Assorted Chocolate Truffles
from our very own UMass Bake Shop
DRAWINGS TO BE HELD MONDAY, 2/13/06
DINING SERVICES
www.umass.edu/diningservices

Republicans seek to keep hold of office

HEALEY from page 2

top political office since former Gov. William Weld won election in 1990.

A key strategy to Weld's win was his decision to name a running mate, Paul Cellucci, well before the September primary elections.

Republicans have followed that model in every election since, even though under Massachusetts election law candidates for governor and lieutenant governor run separately in the primary. Romney and Healey ran as a ticket well ahead of the 2002 GOP primary.

Healey said she will continue that tradition by naming a running mate.

Reilly's attempt to name a running mate collapsed last week when his pick, Democratic Boston state Rep. Marie St. Fleur, dropped out amid a storm of revelations about unpaid taxes and student loans. Reilly said he would not choose another running mate.

After attending Harvard, Kerry Murphy headed to Trinity College in Dublin, Ireland, where she received a doctorate in political science and law. She married Sean Healey, a fellow Harvard grad who also went to Trinity on a Rotary scholarship, before working from 1986 to 1997 at Abt Associates Inc., a Cambridge consulting firm.

Kerry Healey was chairman of the Massachusetts Republican Party when she was tapped by Romney. In the administration, Healey has served as the point-person on criminal justice issues and as the top liaison to cities and towns.

The couple lives with their two children in the Prides Crossing section of Beverly, one of the state's wealthiest neighborhoods.

Last year, an asset management firm led by Healey's husband returned $1.2 million in tax credits it received as a part of a state program designed to lure firms to blighted areas. Sean Healey received the break for moving his company, Affiliated Managers Group, to Prides Crossing.

Mules carry ballots as Haitians begin voting

By Stevenson Jacobs
Associated Press

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — Guarded by U.N. troops, mules carrying sacks of ballots trotted down from mountain villages Wednesday as authorities began the slow process of collecting and tabulating election results.

Scores of U.N. peacekeepers patrolled quiet streets of the capital, Port-au-Prince, as Haitians eagerly awaited the returns from Tuesday's vote, the first since a bloody uprising ousted former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide two years ago.

The polls, guarded by the 9,000-strong U.N. force, were fraught with delays early in the day but largely free of the violence that has plagued the capital since Aristide fled.

The leading contender heading into the vote was Rene Preval, a 63-year-old agronomist and former president widely supported by Haiti's poor masses. The shy, soft-spoken Preval, Haiti's only leader to finish his elected term, is a former ally of Aristide, who is in exile in South Africa.

Preval's closest rivals include Charles Henri Baker, 50, a wealthy garment factory owner, and Leslie Manigat, 75, who was president for five months in 1988 until the army ousted him.

More than 50 percent of the 3.5 million registered voters were believed to have cast ballots, said David Wimhurst, a U.N. spokesman, adding that a precise figure wasn't yet available.

"I think no one can deny the legitimacy of this process because people really participated," the special U.N. envoy to Haiti, Juan Gabriel Valdes, told Associated Press Television News.

However, he conceded that polls opened too late and "some people were not even able to vote."

Senate candidate Myrlande Manigat, the wife of Leslie Manigat, said initial reports from party representatives monitoring the vote count indicate Preval has a big lead in her western district, which includes much of metropolitan Port-au-Prince and outlying areas.

"We are very worried that Preval has won on the first round," Manigat told The Associated Press.

Preval was in his rural hometown of Marmelade and wasn't speaking to reporters.

If no candidate wins a majority, a runoff between the top two vote-getters will be held March 19.

Election workers counted votes by candlelight overnight and resumed early Wednesday, Wimhurst said, adding that the process was gaining momentum but still going "very slowly" because of delays retrieving ballots from rural areas.

"The hardest part is getting ballots back to the capital," where the vote tabulation center is located, he said. "In some cases, it will take two days to get ballots from outlying areas."

To help the effort, U.N. officials are relying in part on 280 mules, some of which were loaded with bulging sacks of ballots and then led by handlers and U.N. troops from the countryside into towns. Later, the ballots were to be loaded onto helicopters that will carry them to the capital, Wimhurst said.

Initial results were expected to be released after 20 percent of the vote is counted, which could happen late Wednesday, said Stephan Lacroix, a spokesman for Haiti's electoral council. Final results are expected later this week.

The huge turnout all but overwhelmed electoral officials, who conceded they were ill-prepared for the crush of voters.

Many Haitians voted Tuesday night after spending hours in lines stretching up to a mile at some polling stations.

Many stations opened late, lacking the necessary workers, security and ballots to handle the number of voters who turned out by foot, car and brightly colored buses.

"It could have been better," Jose Miguel Insulza, head of the Organization of American States, said of the vote. But he said the enthusiasm of Haitian voters made the elections successful.

"In many places, people would not have stood in line for so long waiting to vote," Insulza said.

The United Nations has not received any reports of fraud or other major irregularities in the voting, Wimhurst said.

The elections were deemed vital to averting a political and economic meltdown in the Western Hemisphere's poorest nation. In the aftermath of Aristide's ouster, gangs went on a kidnapping spree and many factories closed because of security problems and a shortage of foreign investment.

Africa sees first outbreak of bird flu

By Dulue Mbachu
Associated Press

LAGOS, Nigeria — Africa's first outbreak of the deadly bird flu virus was reported Wednesday in a large commercial farm in Nigeria that raised chickens, geese and ostriches, and 46,000 birds were slaughtered.

International health officials called for help to prevent the spread of the disease on the world's poorest continent, where governments are ill-equipped to combat it.

Nigeria said the outbreak was on a farm in Jaji, a village in the northern state of Kaduna. Agriculture Minister Adamu Bello told reporters the deadly H5N1 strain of the virus was detected in samples taken Jan. 16 from birds on the farm.

Nigeria, Africa's most populous nation with 130 million people, said it would work aggressively to halt the flow of any sick birds to unaffected zones. But farmers accused the government of being slow to respond.

Alex Thiermann, an expert with the Paris-based World Organization for Animal Health, said it was not known how the virus entered Nigeria, but migratory waterfowl likely played a role because the country is on a "major flyway."

No cases of H5N1 bird flu have been reported elsewhere in Africa, and the outbreak appears to be restricted to birds, he said.

"The significance is that it's a completely new continent that we need to be looking at," Thiermann said.

Sub-Saharan Africa, with about 600 million of the world's poorest people, is particularly ill-suited to deal with a major health crisis. With weak and impoverished government institutions in regions where many people keep chickens for food, experts say any mass killings – often a first step in controlling bird flu will be difficult to pull off.

China, meanwhile, announced another human case of the disease – a 26-year-old woman – bringing to at least 11 the number of people in China who have been infected. Two have died.

The World Health Organization said Nigeria has about 140 million poultry and the country's overtaxed veterinary services need international help. It called on other African countries to act quickly against any suspected outbreaks.

"If the situation in Nigeria gets out of control, it will have a devastating impact on the poultry population in the region," said Samuel Jutzi, head of the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization's Animal Production and Health Division. "It will seriously damage the livelihoods of millions of people and it will increase the exposure of humans to the virus."

Bird flu began ravaging poultry across Asia in 2003, forcing the slaughter of more than 100 million birds and jumping to humans. WHO has confirmed 88 deaths from bird flu out of a total of 165 cases of human infection. Almost all the cases have been in Asia, but the disease recently has been detected in Europe and the Middle East.

Shiite leader calls for attention to human rights

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the current leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, shown above, has recently called on Shiites to "to continue strongly confronting terrorists but with more consideration to human rights."

By Paul Garwood
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq's most influential Shiite politician urged Shiite-led security forces Wednesday to pay attention to human rights, a gesture aimed at appeasing Sunni Arabs who accuse police of murder and abuse. The U.S. command reported three more American troops have died.

Building a powerful, yet legitimate, Iraqi police force and army is crucial for the U.S. strategy of transferring security responsibility to the Iraqis so that U.S. and other international troops can begin heading home.

Ahead of a major religious event Thursday, Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim addressed Sunni concerns when he urged security forces to obey the constitution in performing their duties.

"We call upon our faithful security forces ... to continue strongly confronting terrorists but with more consideration to human rights," al-Hakim said in a nationally televised speech at a Shiite mosque attended by 5,000 people.

Allegations of human rights abuses threaten talks aimed at forming a new government comprising Shiites, Kurds and Sunni Arabs. The U.S. hopes these efforts will blunt the Sunni Arab-led insurgency by having key members of that community handed positions of power.

The flashpoint issue is who will control the Interior and Defense ministries. Shiites, who were suppressed under Saddam Hussein, want both security posts.

But the once-dominant Sunnis, whose influence waned after Saddam's fall, oppose hard-line Shiites – particularly current Interior Minister Bayan Jabr – winning the posts. They cite allegations of widespread arrests and killings of Sunnis by security forces made up of purported Shiite sympathizers and militiamen.

U.N. envoy Ashraf Jehangir Qazi met the head of a prominent Sunni group, the Association of Muslim Scholars, Wednesday for talks on Sunni allegations of human rights abuses.

"We have emphasized to the Iraqi government the need to stop these nightly raids and we constantly pursue the veracity of these allegations," U.N. spokesman Said Arikat said. "We worry that if these acts continue, they can only exacerbate the same kind of violence, which will widen the gap between the two different communities."

A senior U.S. official said change was needed within the Interior Ministry, particularly in the way security forces conduct operations in Sunni Arab neighborhoods. The official, who declined to be identified further in line with protocol, said ending the insurgency would be much more difficult without a credible Iraqi leadership or security force.

On Wednesday, the U.S. military said an Army soldier from the 4th Squadron, 14th Cavalry Regiment died of wounds suffered three days earlier in a roadside bombing in Anbar province.

A Marine assigned to the 2nd Marine Logistics Group, II Marine Expeditionary Force (Forward) was killed Monday in a bombing in Anbar, the command said.

Another Marine assigned to the 2nd Marine Division, II Marine Expeditionary Force (Forward), died in a non-hostile vehicle accident Tuesday during combat operations near Qaim on the border with Syria, the military said.

Thousands of police and soldiers have been deployed ahead of Thursday's Ashoura feast, the climax of a month of commemorations by Shiites mourning the 7th century death of a revered Shiite saint, Imam Hussein.

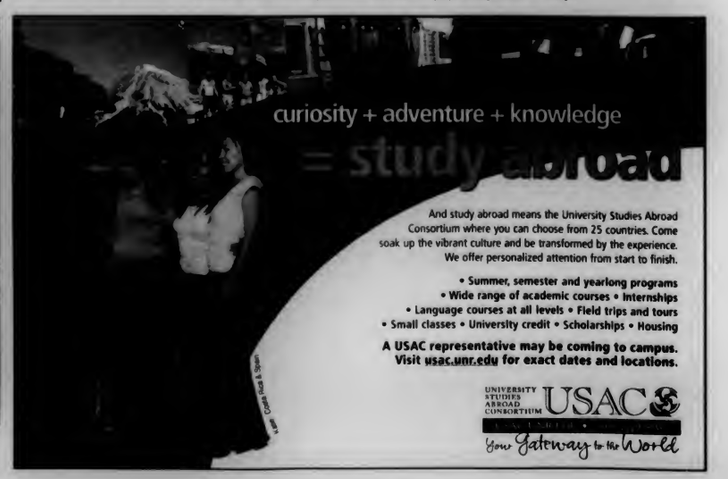
Hundreds of thousands of Shiites are expected to take part in ceremonies in Baghdad and the southern city of Karbala, where Hussein is believed buried. Processions of men whipping their backs with metal chains marched outside the gold-domed Imam Hussein shrine in Karbala on Wednesday.

Police were on high alert for Sunni Arab insurgent attacks, which have killed more than 230 people during Ashoura processions in the past two years.

Ten homemade bombs planted near a bridge in Latifiyah, between Baghdad and Karbala, were defused Wednesday, an operation that averted an attack on Shiites, police said.

Police found the bodies of four Shiite pilgrims shot repeatedly and dumped on Baghdad's northern outskirts. Three bullet-riddled bodies turned up in Baghdad's Sadr City.

An unarmed and unmanned U.S. aircraft providing security coverage for Ashoura went down near Sadr City on Tuesday and was returned by local leaders Wednesday, the military said. It was unclear what caused the crash.



Higher Education Minister Sami al-Mudafar escaped unharmed from a Baghdad car bomb attack on his convoy in which three of his bodyguards were wounded. It was the second attack on the Shiite lawmaker in two years.

Al-Mudafar has been an outspoken opponent of the increasing influence of Islamists on university campuses. Sunni Arab insurgents also frequently target members of the Iraqi government.

U.S. troops took custody of two teenage brothers suspected in Tuesday's killing of Sheik Kamal Nazal, a Sunni Arab community leader and head of the city council in the former extremist stronghold of Fallujah.

NORTHAMPTON'S STEAKHOUSE
Great place for a date!
At the Clarion Hotel
One Atwood Drive Northampton
Exit 18, off I-91
413-586-1211
view menu at www.hampshirehospitality.com

You have options!
Is everyone asking what your plans are after graduation?
Massachusetts School of Law students ALREADY
Get the same edge that MSL graduates enjoy in almost every professional realm
Law, Business, Education, Healthcare, Government, Law Enforcement
A Juris Doctorate degree puts you ahead of the competition.
A Juris Doctorate from MSL affords you the freedom of that competitive advantage without the worries that others suffer behind a mountain of debt.
Interested? Come check us out:
Massachusetts School of Law
Woodland Park, 500 Federal Street, Andover, MA 01810
(978) 681-0800 www.MSLaw.edu

curiosity + adventure + knowledge
= study abroad
And study abroad means the University Studies Abroad Consortium where you can choose from 25 countries. Come soak up the vibrant culture and be transformed by the experience. We offer personalized attention from start to finish.
• Summer, semester and yearlong programs
• Wide range of academic courses • Internships
• Language courses at all levels • Field trips and tours
• Small classes • University credit • Scholarships • Housing
A USAC representative may be coming to campus. Visit usac.unr.edu for exact dates and locations.
UNIVERSITY STUDIES ABROAD CONSORTIUM USAC
Your Gateway to the World

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
EDITORIAL OPINION
THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2006
"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire
EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Public Ivy school? Not yet

Wesley Miller

In a recent Boston Globe article, the Amherst campus of the University of Massachusetts system was examined for the socioeconomic changes that have been taking place over the past several years. Now, with the construction of the new North dorms near Totman, we can see that this goes beyond mere speculation. The face of our campus is changing.

The administration wants higher SAT scores and bigger bank accounts to help build our reputation, ultimately to have the Amherst campus being considered alongside the public ivies. The problem is that the University needs more than just a facelift or an infusion of private funds if we're going to see a change that drastic.

Though the Amherst campus has been hit particularly hard, we are not unique when considered in the national spectrum. All over the country public higher education is in crisis when it comes to funding. The national average for in-state tuition has risen 36 percent from 2000, while consumer prices have risen only about 11 percent. States are becoming less sympathetic to the public university, citing the fact that a degree vastly increases earning power. But as New York Times writer Sam Dillon in a recent article entitled "At Public Universities, Warnings of Privatization" countered,

> The difference between a safety school and a reach school could be as simple as asking ourselves the question: Do we want to be known as the University of Massachusetts at Amherst or Zoo-Mass?

"At stake are institutions that carry out much of the country's public-interest research and educate nearly 80 percent of all college students and whose scientific and technological innovation has been crucial to America's economic dominance."

Rather than stagnate suffering from lack of state funds, many public universities have chosen to pursue privatization. This term is often misunderstood. The state still retains ownership of the school and gives funding, but the school solicits private money in order to fill the gaps. A good example would be the UMass/Coca-Cola contract or the increase in out-of-state students. Some public universities have even gone as far as to follow a private model of tuition as is the case with Miami University in Ohio where students pay upwards of $38,000 dollars a year for tuition and housing.

It seems that UMass is moving with the national trends, but in what sense? Are we trying to save our university by instituting a $15,000 dollar a year price tag (a public ivy cost) or are we trying to do a little more? With the construction of the North residential complex, we're seeing that UMass is starting to become a little more ambitious. The new dorms are a statement of affluence, and that's exactly the type of student UMass wants to attract.

The reasoning, of course, is that money will eventually breed more money.

The new dorms, however, are a step backwards from our eventual goal of attracting a better student population. If we're going to go out and spend 90 million dollars on campus improvements, we should be concentrating on hiring more professors, creating smaller intellectual communities and enforcing aggressive new policy towards dealing with the problem of alcohol on our campus. The difference between a safety school and a reach school could be as simple as asking ourselves the question: Do we want to be known as the University of Massachusetts at Amherst or Zoo-Mass?

Despite our placements in US News reports and our rather poor rankings among the nation's top public universities (50th in terms of public universities and 105th in terms of national universities), students still remain proud of this campus. Despite the perceived failure of the new dormitories, we can see some very positive new developments with the new Learning Commons and success of the OIT office in introducing web-based learning. These are the types of bright new ideas that are going to elevate the status of our university, attract better students and create a safety net in the absence of state funding.

Unfortunately, the Amherst campus doesn't quite have the credentials to be acting like a public ivy just yet. It's no wonder that students are becoming increasingly more frustrated when they see that their money is being invested in the wrong places. If the University must pursue privatization as a solution, it must take the utmost care to see that private funds go toward the immediate, practical needs of our education instead of wasting it on luxury dormitories.

Wesley Miller is a Collegian Columnist

The two sides of the tracks

Rebecca Martins

Growing up, life appeared to me as a dichotomy. Surrounding communities in my Southeastern Massachusetts area were often labeled uneducated and depressed. Once booming textile cities, the industry eventually moved down the East Coast, leaving many communities' economies on a southward slope as well. Numerous individuals, including many of my relatives, suffered from the lack of work available. Only was my immediate family, the sole family from either side to ever attend college, able to escape the bounds of the working-class lifestyle.

Drive 15 minutes from these communities toward the ocean, however, and the reality of disheartened living begins to fade. Abandoned textile mills are replaced with Cape Cod-style structures. Rows of tenements eventually become one-family houses, growing more elaborate with each passing mile.

Pavement and streetlights morph into winding roads, sprawling space and ocean views. This natural beauty is often recognized in famous magazines and by Hollywood stars looking to get away. Yet, is it fathomable for such a place to exist when surrounding areas are in such disarray? Moreover, how can a single community be separated between those who can have and those who can only hope for?

Welcome to reality.

Growing up between these worlds of poverty and privilege put me in a strange position. After saving and struggling for 10 years, my parents finally moved out of the city into a more rural setting and declared themselves middle class. My dad's dream had been to live in the country, another first for his family, and after a lifetime of going without, he finally saw it through.

It was here they hoped to begin a family and thus, I was born into a community that, on the outside, did not appear to face setbacks. But secretly, I used to wonder if my family was poorer than it let on, and was only putting up a façade of comfort.

In town, I didn't always belong. We were always the family who shopped sales, put major thought into any financial decision and rarely treated ourselves to anything extravagant. It's hard to forget my class going on the senior trip in high school, while I stayed behind since neither myself nor my parents could foot the bill.

> It is obvious that strong distinctions between classes exist within this country. Living in certain communities automatically gives off impressions, whether they are positive or negative, as well as true or inaccurate. We all know of and try to believe the "American dream," but is it always in reach?

I remember going to Disney World a few times, but only after my dad, sisters and I cut lawns for wealthy residents every summer to add to our "Florida Fund." Today, I understand many people take care of themselves, and this is no great feat of mine. But being the only family doing so in "my reality" led to feelings of bitterness. Having to work multiple jobs just to get what others took for granted, or serve others who could enjoy life frugally, was never an easy concept to grasp.

It is obvious that strong distinctions between classes exist within this country. Living in certain communities automatically gives off impressions, whether they are positive or negative, as well as true or inaccurate. We all know of and try to believe the "American dream," but is it always in reach?

Within my own town, living in the north section typically was looked down upon, especially when compared to rich sections of its southern portion. Those from the suburbs have been known to think poorly of those residing in more urban areas, but this is no specific problem relating to only my own life. It is a reality many experience.

It's hard to categorize what type of area I'm from. It's complicated figuring out where I fit in the mix, but I have come to realize American society is a place where a handful flourish, many get by and a large number of today's "working poor" struggle. It is a sad but true reality that the world functions off a basis of those who receive and those who serve.

Communities exist in which some people thrive and others struggle to get by. Hopefully one day, society will be fair enough to give all the equal opportunity needed to succeed. Hopefully one day, people will realize their full potential and make use of these chances, but until then, many others and I will have to witness that life is never simple and always a personal battle.

As rapper DMX once said, "To live is to suffer, but to survive, well, that's to find meaning in the suffering."

Rebecca Martins is a Collegian columnist.

A look at Intelligent Design

Zach Oelschlegel

I often hear people tell me, "I don't believe in God, just science." I smile right back at them and usually say, "Who said you couldn't have both?"

There's a belief out there that says once you reach a certain level of intelligence, the next logical step is to outgrow this idea of a God. The reason you'd have faith in such a thing is either because you were brought up to believe what your parents believed, or that your belief is what you need to get along with your life. It's your opiate, if you're thinking along the lines of Karl Marx.

Life is too hard to get by without believing in anything, so you tell yourself everyone needs to believe in something, and keep dreaming. It's what someone is really telling you when they say the only being they trust in is science.

Another belief purported these days is how one of the main counters to these arguments is nothing more than another fallacy propped up by the religious right. In other words, if the fundamentalists can't get you to walk into that bizarre Baptist church down the street, the least they can get you to believe is their version of Christianity Lite, Intelligent Design (ID). It's understandable how many look at ID theory as Christianity Lite when men like Pat Robertson tell small cities they've "rejected God" after a school board says it has no place in science class.

Despite what you continue to read about in the news, the debate over whether Intelligent design should be taught in schools, the theory itself actually has very little to do with Christian thought, other than feeling safe, concluding "something" had a part in designing the universe and world we live in. The primary mistake people make when critiquing ID theory is characterizing this "something" as the God of the Old and New Testaments. For instance, the Discovery Institute, which carries many proponents of ID, is actually a secular think tank, and even until recently, had a Jewish chairman.

ID does not try to make distinctions about what or who could be behind the design either. That "something" could be anything or anyone including Shiva, Yahweh, Buddha, Allah or a combination of "something." Unlike theistic Christianity, ID at the core is actually quite agnostic, as nothing about the book of Genesis is included in the case.

> But I think the biggest reason why people would disregard ID theory wouldn't be the science behind it, but rather having to entertain the possibility of "something" else.

More importantly, ID is not out to prove "something" else exists, but rather to take a long look at our surroundings.

Where ID specifically makes its case is through empirical scientific evidence, all across nature, which would best be explained by design. Evolution in its most Darwinian form would look at the earth as a fantastic accident, whereas ID would see discernable evidence to the contrary through studying nature, which would point to some specific design from "something," whatever or whoever it may be.

Nature in itself demonstrates a working complexity, the evidence for which is overwhelming. Charles Darwin himself, sensing this as he was writing "The Origin of the Species," wrote that "to suppose that the eye, with its ability to adjust its focus, admit different amounts of light, and correct for chromatic aberrations, could have been formed by natural selection, seems, I freely confess, absurd in the highest degree." ID would look at the human eye and question whether it could form in such a way without an intelligent outside driving force.

Extraordinary scientific arguments, however, do require extraordinary scientific evidence, and that is how ID justifies itself. On the flip side, making the claim that "nothing" exists, and our world is a big mishap, is also an extraordinary claim that demands extraordinary evidence. ID would say that it takes a lot more faith to believe the earth randomly fell together than to believe "something" had a hand in the design of our planet and universe.

But I think the biggest reason that people would disregard ID theory wouldn't be the science behind it, but rather having to entertain the possibility of "something" else. That's okay. This isn't some sort of math equation where most of the equations and formulas are universally agreed upon, with a proof or postulate of the end result.

However, to simply throw out ID because of the motives many of its proponents have for supporting it so much, or to call it a theory without any scientific basis would be foolhardy, even if there are theological implications to deal with after looking closer at our universe. Answers to whether or not there is "something" out there are never as easy as we would hope, but there are many facts to consider. If you are one of those people who would never give credence to ID, I'd invite you to investigate it a bit more. You might be surprised by what you find.

Zach Oelschlegel is a Collegian columnist.

New anthropological discoveries

Gilad Skolnick

There are many strange cultures in our world, but of all, this one seems the weirdest. The odd behavior of this tribe might seem illogical to us, but for these people the laws that govern their way of life are sacred. These are the "Stoirtap," and we have spent countless decades trying to comprehend their dressing habits, which I must say are most peculiar.

Their males have a habit of, upon entering adulthood, wrapping a colorful piece of cloth around their necks, sort of like a leash and extending it about half of an arm's length down their chest to gain respect. Clothing must be loose on them, or they are deemed to not be interested in females, and those who are most respected in their tribe must keep their heads bare while inside.

For the rest of the males, they enjoy wearing a head covering often with a visor to protect the back of their heads from the harmful effects of the sun. In addition to short hair, the male will often attempt to harden the hair on his head to prevent its movement by the wind using synthetic chemicals.

> Regardless of the smell of their clothing, it appears to be illegal for them to wear the same clothing for two consecutive days or shunning will occur.

Despite their clothing's effectiveness in keeping them protected or warm, as soon as a natural element slightly alters the color, such as an oil or fermented grape juice, then the clothing piece is deemed to be unacceptable and may no longer be used. Furthermore, their cotton garments must always be in a condition of straightness for them to be respected, which is done so with the aid of a hot, metallic tool which is pressed on their garments.

Their tribe's females are even more peculiar. Males increase their interest to mate with a female if she wears clothing that is tight and constricts her ability to move. Foot coverings that do not properly shield a foot from the elements, with a spike on the heel at about finger-length, as well as a single tube of cloth wrapped around the body extending from above the knees to the waist prevents mobility and poses a challenge to attempts at running. Some grow their nails and are thus unable to perform many types of labor, and their hair is not shortened, making fast movement an added chore.

These people also apply synthetic chemicals, which alter and mask their smells, under their forearms and on their necks, despite their reliance on pheromones to choose a mate. Regardless of the smell of their clothing, it appears to be illegal for them to wear the same clothing for two consecutive days or shunning will occur.

The females are more sensitive to the heat than the males, as females will remove more clothing, exposing more of their arms, chest and legs in everyday attire when the warmth arrives in the time period following the vernal equinox.

Even in the presence of a body of water, males must wear loose tubes that descend from their waist to below their knees, while females wear only enough to cover their reproductive organs. This is due to this peoples desire to have the ultraviolet radiation of the sun damage their skin, thus darkening it and increasing their status, perhaps as a way of showing to others that they are brave.

When cold, males and females cover themselves in the skin of a dead cow with the fur removed or in cloth with the feathers from a few dead geese. Yet it appears their legs do not get cold, as no additional protection other than a thin layer of tightly woven material from the cotton plant is used, most popularly of the blue variety. Many choose these leg coverings with rips or holes in them, or of a light shade of blue to indicate much use, and thus more status.

Moreover, females paint their faces and attach colorful metals to their bodies at the start of each day. Some even cover their lips in a substance made of pigments, oils and waxes. Many paint the hairs on the rim of their eyelids and remove some of the protective layer of hair that rests over their eyes.

Even odder, numerous females have a curious habit of continuously rubbing a mixture of beeswax, petroleum jelly and menthol on their lips throughout the day. Further, they go through a grueling ritual that often involves blood, of using a sharp metal object to remove hair from their legs and underarms, males go as far as to subject the sharp metal object to their face to remove hair, often on a daily basis.

Of course, increased study of these people who repeatedly identify themselves as Stoirtap is needed. As strange as their clothing ritual is, their mating and eating ritual is even stranger. And it must warned, breaking any one of these rules will result in varying levels of shunning, as these laws are very important and are fundamental rules that must be obeyed in their society.

Gilad Skolnick is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

NOT "HIGH" PRIORITY

I was reading the Collegian today at breakfast and was extremely upset to find myself as the headline of your police log. My surprise quickly turned to anger and disbelief that my arrest for simple possession of marijuana was made the headline of a list of offenses that included both an aggravated assault and an OUI.

I find it appalling that a newspaper run by students would choose to highlight such a petty crime in the face of much more serious crimes. I have had several friends and a professor ask me about the article and they were equally incredulous.

I think that your newspaper needs to get its priorities straight and decide what really needs to be done to make our campus safer, and I can tell you that marijuana is not the problem here.

Wilson Boone
UMass student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS&LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2006 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fashion Week

By Rod Stafford Haywood
South Florida Sun-Sentinel

NEW YORK — It's not to say that the proposals by women's wear designers during the fall Fashion Week are dour.

No, that is not true at all.

But the catwalks during the eight-day marathon of shows are not quite as frilly/girly as recent Fashion Weeks. Oh, sure, there are still bows and ruffles here and there, but not as many and not quite so fluffy, so relentlessly optimistic.

And those sherbet shades and hot hues are fading fast. In their place comes a sea of neutrals. And black (you're way ahead, aren't you) is back in a big way.

In addition to her Hepburn-esque high-waisted trousers and tidy little '40s jackets, designer Tracy Reese darkened the mood this season for her usually Lite-Brite line of ladylike looks. Opening with mostly black and cream, she used camel, oatmeal, truffle, heather gray and cocoa for the rest of the show, accented with raspberry (where last year it would have been cherry red), rust and aubergine. Her slouchy knits sometimes had a sprinkling of sparkle here and there, but not in a pizzazzy sort of way, more like a concession to the Boho aesthetic Reese is obviously trying to evolve.

Over at Ellen Tracy, creative director George Sharp opened with black pants suits, tweed capes over miniskirts and pencil skirts with belted jackets. Then came the crisp-patterned and clean-lined gauchos, pleated skirts, sleeveless turtlenecks and Bermuda shorts in ivory, truffle, pewter, mahogany and hazelnut.

Even Studio 54 alum Diane von Furstenberg is getting down to business. With Dolly Parton's plucky "9 to 5" ringing out, down the runway came skirted suits in tweed and easy trousers under swing coats, often with a plaid on a polka dot on an abstract print.

A bit much? Possibly. But Von Furstenberg doesn't see it that way. Where you see a dizzying mix, she sees a confident and powerful muse. Inspired by powerful women (Furstenberg referenced newly elected women presidents of Chile, Liberia and Germany in her show's program), she subtly played with gender using menswear fabrics, pageboy velvets and a tuxedo with boy shirts and a beaded blazer.

Kenneth Cole, who has always leaned toward more sober shades, isn't about to fix what isn't broken. His carefully crafted brand relies on American sportswear classics modernized with just an ever-so-faint whiff of European panache. But this time his women's wear (shown alongside his menswear) had an almost intellectual pretension, with high-buttoned vaguely Goth-girl coats and men's lace-up shoes, before reverting to his more comfortable milieu: polished practicality in charcoal, cement, butterscotch and pear.

Cynthia Steffe's military-precise above-the-knee dresses under cadet jackets, pleated shorts and cropped trousers with cardigans are still as pastel pink and bright blue as previous seasons, but for next fall it was all anchored by charcoal, slate and, finally, black.

Oscar de la Renta is unrepentant about his exuberance for color (he attributes it to his Dominican heritage), and yet even the king of color opened his show with WASP-y whispers in ivory, beige, pewter, caramel and taupe. Of course, he can't resist a little glitz, with his full skirted dresses with slightly dropped waists and sleeves on cashmere jackets. But de la Renta's sheen and shine is reserved for his accessories line: alligator boots, totes and clutch purses as well as gold sandals and black satin pumps.

But when the sun sets, Oscar can't restrain himself anymore: blue, burgundy or plum cocktail suits and evening gowns (big eveningwear hues at last month's Paris haute couture shows) shifted it all out of neutral straight to fifth gear.

Fashion Week in New York Showcases 'Manlier' styles

By Elizabeth Wellington
Knight Ridder Newspapers

NEW YORK — Menswear is getting manly again.

Yes, it appears that designers are moving away from prepubescent male models showing low-rise flat-front pants paired with brightly striped shirts. Maybe they finally realized that men have waistline issues, too, and simply can't fit into skinny pants.

Or may be they figured out that when most grown men dress they actually want to get dressed up, not look all slouchy in T-shirts and boring white button-downs.

Whatever the reason, Fall 2006 Fashion Week kicked off with Kenneth Cole, John Bartlett, Ralph Lauren, Michael Westerly, among others, showcasing suits in spiffy grays and wide lapels and tonal shirts.

Sweaters were strong cashmere, cowls and chunky V-necks. Coats were long and sleek. Shoes were spit-shined wingtips, not sneakers. And the models had beards and receding hairlines.

These men have places to go, people to see and things to do, and they want to look good doing it. The laid-back, Internet-startup party dude has been replaced by the man who wants to make things happen.

"There are not that many options for men to go out there and shop," Westerly, 34, said. "We promote hard American luxury. We want to mix street wear with the corporate world."

Here's what the menswear runways had to offer:

Kenneth Cole. Of course, Cole kicked off his Friday morning show with a message – to take fashion for what it is, overuse of the word "fabulous" and folks addicted to cat-walking.

The clothing was very Hitchcock-meets-today with high collars. Cole layered his men's looks, pairing a cement-colored sports coat with a charcoal wool topcoat. A tuxedo scarf and flat-front pants made the silhouette smooth.

Another head-turner was the striking combination of black cashmere double-breasted topcoat and velvet blazer with a black polka-dot scarf.

At the same show, Cole's jersey womenswear received hearty applause, and for good reason. Four dresses in black, cement, violet and electric blue had an '80s appeal, but their slimmer body shape coupled with suede strappy heels gave the looks a very now feel.)

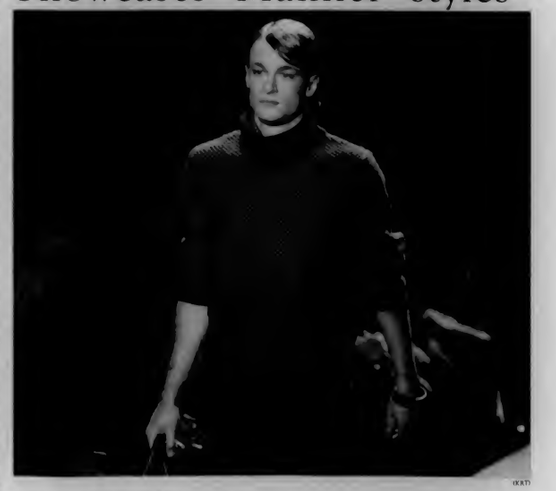
Michael Westerly. Thirteen cast members from Broadway's "The Color Purple" wore that hue in showcasing this solid collection. Westerly claims as inspiration classic American styles such as vests, jackets and full trousers.

He was able to take velvet and tuxedo pants, traditional eveningwear pieces, and transform them into strong corporate looks. He managed to make a mustard suit that did not look pimpish, and his corduroys and paisley-plaid pairings were a nice mix of textures.

All in all, Westerly's line was very sexy preppy.

John Bartlett. This collection came straight from the outdoors, with a runway covered by scented wood chips and a collection inspired by untamed coastline and wilderness.

The audience came to attention as the first model walked out wearing a full beard. Men swaggered down the runway wearing both tuxedo pants and corduroys. They carried oversized purses, bags of leather and suede.



True, some of the models appeared in leggings. But cashmere peacoats and Henley shirts made this a collection that was decidedly rough and tough.

Henry Jacobson. This designer gave his men a purpose. Yes, the collection was somewhat "costumey," but Jacobson's classic visions of artists, businessmen, stockbrokers and writers included pieces such as cargo pants, vests, and wingtip shoes that could easily be folded into today's looks.

And strangely enough, Jacobson introduced capes into the 2006 male wardrobe. Though it's too early to tell whether men will enjoy wearing cloaks that sway in the wind, the silk-and-velvet cape on Jacobson's idea of a poet was very enjoyable to look at.

John Varvatos. For Fall 2006, Varvatos wants men in neutral colors. Like many designers, he worked with a palette of slate gray and black, showing belted coats and streamlined suits.

Varvatos, however, is holding onto skinny pants and leather. Part of the reason is surely because this sleek look is his signature, but you can't ignore the fact that the young floppy-haired models he chooses look so darling in the clothes.

AP/KRT

At this weeks' New York fashion show series, some designers opted for a more masculine feel in their clothing in contrast to previous years' shows.

Is grunge on its way back?

By Michael Deeds
Knight Ridder Newspapers

If life was like a bowl of Buckcherries, we'd all be glugging Jack Daniel's by the quart, headbanging with attractively tattooed mates and maniacally screaming, "I love the cocaine! I love the cocaine!"

Fortunately, life is not like that.

But on stage, Buckcherry frontman Joshua Todd revels in his role as the wild-eyed peacock serving up the rock 'n' roll fantasy.

"I think we just bring out a good time," Todd said in a phone interview. "There's a lot of shows where you go to, and you don't leave there feeling empowered and inspired. That's what I hope we're projecting.... If it inspires people to go home and [bleep] their brains out, whatever. Or pick up a guitar."

Few rock bands captured the bluesy trash, metal essence of mid-'80s Hollywood as well as Buckcherry when it appeared with a raucous debut album in 1999. Despite being 15 years late and containing an overt drug reference, Buckcherry's single "Lit Up" was embraced by radio programmers. The Los Angeles band wound up touring the United States and Europe and opening for its own idols ranging from Kiss to Aerosmith.

But Buckcherry imploded in 2002 after a mostly forgettable sophomore disc, "Time Bomb." Eventually, Todd and Buckcherry guitarist Keith Nelson wound up jamming and writing songs in Los Angeles with Slash, Duff McKagan and Matt Sorum of Guns 'n' Roses fame. For a time, it looked like Todd might be a part of that supergroup's future.

"Then it just stopped," Todd said. "And Slash didn't want to do it, and that was it."

Todd released a solo CD. He spent nine months touring to support the album, which went nowhere. "It happened to be a really bad business venture for me," he said.

So last year, Todd and Nelson reformed their band with new members and a fresh appreciation for Buckcherry. The band has a new album, "Fifteen" (due out April 11), and a sleazy rock 'n' roll single, "Crazy Bitch." Buckcherry toured Japan with Motley Crue in November 2005, then hammered its hometown with a residency stint at the Whisky a Go-Go followed by a New Year's Eve gig at the Viper Room.

Todd says that Buckcherry is firing on all cylinders.

"We've all been through our [stuff]," he said. "That's the great thing about it. It's definitely a band. ... The rhythm section is 10 times better than it's ever been."

Great rhythm section or not, Buckcherry has always been about Todd. When he's on, he struts and sweats his way into the heart of every female and (like gifted rock singers do) male in the audience.

I expect no less during the second coming of Buckcherry.

"I'm just passionate about what I do," Todd said. "I just take it as it is; I learn from my mistakes and move on. I don't really get caught up in it. This is what I do, I'm great at it ... and there's an audience for it. I'm just going after it."

'Arrested Development' is moving off of Fox

By Virginia Rohan
Knight Ridder Newspapers

What's in a name? Could "Arrested Development" have somehow stunted that show's growth?

There's a psychology to titles, and that one does not trip lightly off the tongue. But that's not enough to explain why a comedy that seemingly offered everything a discerning viewer could ever want – originality, eccentricity, clever inside jokes and pop-culture references, vivid characters, outstanding writing, first-rate acting, even a multi-part guest appearance by Charlize Theron – forever found itself in the nether regions of the Nielsen list.

The Bluth clan also had almost all the elements that would ensure a TV family longevity: rave reviews, great pedigree, occasional big promotional pushes, even a great big Emmy as validation. So, why couldn't it find enough of an audience?

This Friday night, the Fox network will air four "Arrested Development" episodes that may well be the last hurrah for Mitch Hurwitz' critically acclaimed Bluth-centric comedy. Officially, Fox is calling the two-hour block a "mini-marathon third season finale," but the Bluths are unlikely to be seen ever again on Fox, or network television.

The good news is that last month, ABC and Showtime expressed interest in picking up "Arrested," and Showtime seems especially keen on making a deal.

At the recent television critics press tour, Showtime Entertainment President Robert Greenblatt said his network was in talks with Twentieth Television about bringing "Arrested" to Showtime.

"I've loved it since it first appeared," Greenblatt said. "About a year ago at a [Hollywood Radio and Television Society] luncheon, they asked me ... if I could take one show from another network, what would it be? My answer was 'Arrested Development.' I always thought it was probably a better fit on a cable network than on a broadcast network."

He's probably right. HBO comedies like "The Larry Sanders Show" and "Curb Your Enthusiasm" couldn't have survived on network TV. Success is measured differently on pay cable.

"If only a small fraction of the loyal audience that's on Fox came to Showtime, it would be one of our highest-rated shows," Greenblatt said, adding, "I think the show is only worth continuing if Mitch Hurwitz was at the helm running it. I think he's the genius behind it. And he hasn't yet come to that decision to continue the show."

Even if a Showtime deal does come to fruition, the lavishly lauded comedy will no longer have access to a mass audience.

Why was mainstream success so elusive?

For one, "Arrested Development" has serialized plot lines, which can deter viewers, and it's a single-camera comedy, shot without a studio audience or laugh-track. That format works well for HBO but has a spotty track record on network TV.

This season, NBC's "My Name Is Earl" instantly clicked, and "The Office" has started to pick up steam – enough for the network to pair it with "Earl" as part of a new "Must-See TV." Thursday comedy strategy. But "Scrubs," for all its great reviews, has never been a huge hit for NBC.

The quirky members of the cast, pictured above, star together as a dysfunctional family in the Fox series 'Arrested Development'.

The cast of 'Arrested Development' might be moving in with another network after their final season concludes with Fox this year.

Though Fox's "Malcolm in the Middle" caught on for a while, critical darling "Action" (1999-2000) was a ratings failure. ABC had a similar experience with "The Job."

Apparently, for all their complaints about stale sitcoms and annoying laugh tracks, viewers may be more attached to the old format than they let on.

As for other reasons "Arrested" failed to develop into a hit, I can only analyze why this clever comedy never became appointment television for me. I certainly loved the absurdist humor (Who but Hurwitz would have a family drive around in the "Star Track," whose full staircase the Bluths used as a gangway to the family jet?) Whenever I did tune in, I howled. So why didn't I tune in more often?

Well, the characters are hilarious but don't feel real, and they leave a bitter aftertaste. Most are just not very nice people.

Lucille Bluth, wickedly played by Jessica Walter, has turned grown son Buster (Tony Hale) into an infant and constantly undermines the self-esteem of daughter Lindsay (Portia de Rossi) who, in turn, belittles her sexually ambivalent and clueless husband Tobias (David Cross). Lucille shows no maternal instincts toward sons Michael (Jason Bateman) and Gob (Will Arnett).

Patriarch George Bluth Sr. (Jeffrey Tambor), locked up for corporate fraud in the pilot, cares little about his kids, either. And the siblings are always double-crossing one another, though they occasionally come through for one another in the end, at least sort of.

The Bluths are dysfunctional, but not in a relatable way. And then there's the voiceover narration by executive producer Ron Howard. Though very funny, it puts a certain distance between the Bluths from viewers.

By contrast, Jason Lee's folksy, sweetly dumb first-person narration in "My Name Is Earl" draws in the audience. And, corny as it sounds, so does his karmic quest. These characters could have easily become caricatures – especially Earl's trashy, fast-talking ex-wife Joy (Jaime Pressly), but they somehow feel like flesh-and-blood people. As a result, it's easier to relate to these trailer-park denizens than to the rich California clan.

All that said, "Arrested Development" deserves a place on another network, as well as a place in the television pantheon. Besides the bushels of awards it has received – including the Emmy for outstanding comedy series in 2004 – it can make you laugh out loud. And that's rare.

I've seen three of the four "season finales;" this year's has the bad fortune of competing with the opening ceremony of the Winter Olympics on NBC, and they are very funny. This year, George Sr.'s new attorney gets the Bluths to take part in a mock trial to prepare for the real thing. Judge Reinhold, launching a new courtroom show, presides over the faux proceedings. Buster, meanwhile, fakes a coma to avoid testifying.

Also, Michael thinks he may have a long-lost sister named Nellie, played by Justine Bateman, Jason's real life sister. Gob goes on a USO tour to Iraq to perform his Christian magic act and, for reasons too funny to divulge, ends up in prison. Michael and Buster fly to Iraq to rescue him, and they check out the model home George Sr. built there.

Fox describes the fourth, unpreviewed episode thus: "Back in Orange County, Lucille decides to throw a yacht party to celebrate. The Bluths gather aboard the Queen Mary for a trip that ends up being far from smooth sailing."

The show, of course, began with a party on a yacht, so if this is the end for "Arrested" – and its rocky voyage on network TV – things will have come full circle.

OPEN TUESDAY, VALENTINE'S DAY 4PM-10PM
Goten
OF JAPAN STEAKHOUSE
FAMOUS FOR CAPTIVATING CUISINE PREPARED AT YOUR TABLE
RT. 116, SUNDERLAND 413-665-3628

WRITE FOR ARTS!!!
e-mail: arts@dailycollegian.com

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
POTTERS RENTS A TRUCK RENTAL
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice Referrals
Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

YOU HAVE 1 WEEK!
DRESS UP / BRING YOUR RESUME
CAREER FAIRS
Feb. 15 & 16
WALK-IN CONSULATIONS HOURS 9-4:30 M-F SA GOOGELL
FEBRUARY
CAREER SERVICES WORKSHOPS
JOBS
02.15.06 PERMANENT JOBS
INTERNSHIPS 02.16.06

Grammy nominees fell short of music lovers' expectations

By Dustt Rhodes
The Daily Cougar (U. Houston)

HOUSTON — Some performances worth seeing, but some nominees aren't. I'm not the type of person who gets excited over the Grammy Awards. To be honest, I doubt I'll even watch much of them this year and I haven't really paid much attention to them in the past. The last time I can remember being emotionally involved in a music awards show was when I was about 8 years old and Ricky Scaggs didn't win the Country Music Award for best song for "Honey (Won't You Open That Door)." I literally cried myself to sleep that night — ask my parents.

Pictured above is the traditional Grammy award presented to winners.

The reason for my apathy this year is probably because I don't have much vested in popular music today, expect for a few gems here and there, but when Paul McCartney has to duke it out with Kelly Clarkson for best pop album, I think that the question of the Grammys' relevance in the music world is answered.

Many people may think I'm just being a "typical college student" by bashing the mainstream, but I disagree. I think some are just so completely jaded by the cookie-cutter coolness that is handed down from radio stations that they think bands like Jet are "groundbreaking" and that "American Idol" stars have enough clout to rival formal Beatles and real songwriters (Fiona Apple also shares a nomination with the likes of Clarkson).

The Grammys have become a way for the music industry to justify its place in society by pitting former greats and current (actual) groundbreaking artists against puppets developed to keep the musically inept amused (i.e. Neil Young versus Rob Thomas). Relevant artists are compared to mediocre talent in order to gain notoriety from the majority of the population who has no idea what the hell they are actually listening to anyway. Artists like Clarkson, Thomas, 50 Cent and Gwen Stefani are best described in the words of Bill Hicks: "demons who are sent on earth to lower the standards."

And for the record, I don't hate popular music; in fact, I hope Coldplay beats out both U2 and The Rolling Stones for best rock album because, frankly, I think the Super Bowl proved it's time for the Stones to call it quits and I wish U2 would have called it quits at their first practice.

With hip-hop the next exploited underground, you would hope to find something refreshing in the rap and R&B arena, but there is disappointment to be found even there. 50 Cent is nominated twice for best rap song — twice — and one of those is with The Game. Let's just hope that Missy Elliot or Kanye West can pull it or we may have to take the hip out of hip-hop.

I don't have much to comment on in realm of country music except to say that Gretchen Wilson is a disgrace — even to the trailer park from which she was spawned — and Emmylou Harris, Merle Haggard, Willie Nelson and George Jones should win any award they are nominated for unless it is the case that they are paired with Wilson, in which they should hope this is the last time their collaboration is ever brought up in public.

Performances can always prove to be what makes the Grammys worth a view and this year shows a few promising moments.

West will pair up with Jamie Foxx for his hit "Gold Digger," in which Foxx impersonated Ray Charles for the backing vocals. West has proved his value as a hip-hop artist and Foxx's recent album shows that not every actor should fear a crossover career.

Herbie Hancock will perform "A Song for You" with Christina Aguilera, and anyone who has heard the duo's song on Hancock's multi-artist collaboration "Possibilities" should be looking forward to its spot for the evening.

Paul McCartney will perform — see it — and Madonna will perform with the Gorillaz — see it too, as it is one of the only performances where two original artists will be performing side by side.

The band Death Cab for Cutie attended last nights Grammy Award Ceremony.

The finale will produce a tribute to Sly and Family Stone featuring various artists, which (save Steven Tyler, John Legend and Joe Perry and the choir) is like saying, "We appreciate your contribution, Sly. Please accept our tribute consisting of artists who in no way will ever live up to the influence that your music still continues to bless the musical world with today."

Although I may have my thoughts on what is deserved or undeserved, it doesn't really matter in the end — ask anyone you know who you consider to be a music "snob" and you would have a hard time in getting them to name the past winners of Album of the Year, because even though there may be a few winners that deserved their title, there is still an overabundance of untalented hacks taking up the places of unknown artists who might get mentioned if it weren't for the phonies.

Prove me wrong, Grammys. Prove me wrong.

Still a Hollywood front man, Harrison Ford wows the box-office

By Bruce Newman
Knight Ridder Newspapers

His face, with its perpetually furrowed brow, the go-to-hell curl of the upper lip and that intriguing chin scar, has carried the emotional weight of countless plot twists since it flashed across the heavens nearly 30 years ago in "Star Wars." It is a face that Americans have come to trust so steadfastly that it has made Harrison Ford the world's biggest box-office star for the past three decades.

It has been a heavy burden to bear, and now, at 63, Ford's face is beginning to show signs of wear. The furrows in his billion-dollar brow have sprouted tributaries, and his eyes look tired from what he says was a late night the night before. Sporting a goatee and a piratical gold earring, Ford has the swagger of a guy hoping to be mistaken for 62.

In "Firewall," which opens Friday, Ford plays a man named Jack who finds himself in a desperate struggle to save his family from some very bad men. When it is suggested to Ford that this Jack resembles the Jack who was forced to save his family from some very bad men in one of his earlier hits, "Patriot Games," and even to President James Marshall in his 1997 blockbuster "Air Force One," the worried look that usually signals trouble ahead suddenly appears.

"I think that was a very different kind of movie and a very different plot," he says, "so I'm not feeling that I'm going back to the same well, or that there is any cause for disappointment. In this one, the genre is one that I have visited before, and the character is not unlike some characters that have been relatively successful. Which is to say, he's not a Russian submarine captain."

This is a reference to his role in "K-19 The Widowmaker," which placed Ford in such

See FORD on page 9

Harrison Ford is sweaty and tense in his new thriller, "Firewall," about a family man who desperately tries to rescue his wife and children from large scale bank robbers.

Forget a sensual palate, some are buying wine just for the labels

By Tricia Colianne
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Do people buy wines just because of the label? You bet shiraz.

"I see people buying according to label quite a bit, actually," said Jamie Boyd, the manager of wine operations at West Point Market in Akron, Ohio.

"They end up trying something and being pleasantly surprised. And they buy more."

Wacky names and labels such as "You Bet Shiraz" (their tag line is "How you pronounce it is none of our business"), and others such as "Cheap Red Wine," "Goats Do Roam" and the Akron, Ohio brainchild "Pizza Vino" float to the top in a veritable sea of wine.

Wineries around the world are catching on, forgoing the stodgy and embracing the silly and the sexy in hopes of winning over the young, the uninitiated and the just plain skeptical.

From California's "Seven Deadly Zins" to the French label "Fat Bastard," wineries are pushing the limits — and, it seems, getting results.

A Gallup poll last year found wine in a statistical dead heat with beer as America's favorite alcoholic beverage, and it easily beat liquor.

"I hate to admit it, because sometimes we make fun of the way crazy labels are selling more than subdued labels," Boyd said, "but it does make a difference."

You can only imagine these names are thought up in the wee hours of the morning, around a table with family and friends, all of whom have, um, access to the cellar.

For Pizza Vino, the family and friends part is true enough. Mastermind Joe Zaucha gathered advice from a wide range of people – accountants, engineers and, of course, all his friends in the wine biz — to come up with the label.

It was a process, he said. The easy part was picking the picture for the label.

"That's just one of the best-looking pizzas you'll find."

Vintners need to be careful, though, about just how clever they get, lest they be taken too literally. Cheap Red Wine? No one wants their wine to be thought of as plonk. And Pizza Vino? Help us, there are people out there who think this is pizza-flavored wine at least two poor, puzzled souls we know of employed at an Acme Fresh Market.

For the most part, it's all tongue-in-cheek, and whole Web sites are dedicated to chronicling the hilarity. The site www.wine-labels.org boasts more than 230 oddball labels, like a Spanish tempranillo called "Scraping the Barrel" and a refreshingly honest Hungarian wine called "The Unpronounceable Grape."

Occasionally, though, labels have gone too far.

In 2001, Ohio banned Bonny Doon's Cardinal Zin, which featured artist Ralph Steadman's less-than-holy Catholic cardinal on its label. The state has since reconsidered, and the wildly popular Cardinal Zin is back on store shelves.

Wine shops, though, still consider customers' tolerance levels when they stock their shelves.

At an Akron market, for example, a wine called "Big Ass" (yes, you read that correctly) initially didn't make the cut. After sitting on it a little, though, and testing the waters, the store decided customers could stomach it.

"I think they're getting a little more immune to the craziness of the names," Boyd said.

The fun's all about demystifying wine, making it friendlier and more approachable. Think presidential candidate Bill Clinton circa 1992, playing the saxophone on MTV.

Some may call it pandering, but to others, it's pure genius.

And while clothes may make the man, neither the label nor the packaging necessarily makes the wine.

"It's every animal out there and every crazy thing to shock," said Marie Nicholas, who manages the wine department at two Giant Eagle stores in Ohio. "It kinda makes you stop in your tracks, so you might visit it the first time, but if the juice wasn't good, people won't come back and rebuy it."

Whether red or white, wine is the drink of the Gods and so it goes with almost any of your favorite foods, from pasta to red meat and even pizza.

In his third decade of entertainment, Ford has still got it unfamiliar waters when it was released in 2002 that it became one of his few flops.

FORD from page 8

"I try to pick films that I think an audience will enjoy," he says. "And by that, it doesn't necessarily mean that I have for myself some set idea of what the audience requires from me, or even that I'm willing to service that expectation. Because from time to time, I fly in the face of expectations, and I do that for my own amusement."

As Jack Stanfield, a computer security specialist at a Seattle bank in "Firewall," Ford is flying not in the face of expectations as much as his first career slump, following the disappointing showing of the 2003 comedy "Hollywood Homicide." He suspects his name above the title creates unrealistic expectations, brought on by his movies' domestic box office grosses of more than $3 billion.

"If you're realistic, I don't think you'd have extremely high expectations for 'Hollywood Homicide,'" he says. "It was a small comedy. Sometimes, what I think of as a small picture, by the time it gets released, people have the expectation that it's a bigger picture than it is. It's not an expectation you can fulfill every shot out of the box."

One picture that almost certainly would meet with success is the long-discussed fourth installment of the "Indiana Jones" series. "We're closer than we've ever been," he says. "I think it will happen fairly soon."

However, he dismisses a rumor that he was so smitten with his "Firewall" co-star, Virginia Madsen, that she has the role of leading lady in "Indy 4" all but wrapped up. "There is no test of truth for things that appear on the Internet," he says.

Ford is developing movies in which he would play character roles, "so that I can create a part that makes sense for me to play as a supporting actor," he says.

But as he is quick to point out, "I'm not yet offered supporting characters, so I'll continue to play the lead character as long as those are the roles that are offered."

He has several strenuous scenes in "Firewall," including a desperate fight with the picture's villain, played by a much younger Paul Bettany. "Where I am in life is that I'm still fit enough to do what we're doing here," Ford says. "So for those people who say, 'A 63-year-old man couldn't do that,' I say, 'What are you talking about?' I just did.'"

The star of 'Indiana Jones' films has traded in his hat and hall unbuttoned shirt for a suit and tie in his new film, 'Firewall'.

Do you like cameras? Do you like taking pictures?

Combine your loves and be a photographer for the Collegian!

contact us at:
news@dailycollegian.com

Russell's Liquors
18 Main St. Downtown Amherst 253-5441
Featuring Busch & Busch Light
13.99* 30/pk cans
Rolling Rock 12oz bots
13.99* case
*all beers plus deposit
Sky Vodka 80 ... $22.99 1.75 liter
Spaten Lager 12/pk bots ... $9.99*
Bud & Bud Light 12oz bots ... $12.99* 20/pk
Red Tail Ale 12oz bots ... $9.99* 12/pk
Melini Chianti Borghi D'Elsa ... $6.99* 750ml

Chance or Purpose?
The Argument for Intelligent Design in Biology

Dr. Michael Behe, author of Darwin's Black Box, the Biochemical Challenge to Evolution.

Questions and answers to follow presentation

Thursday, February 9th at 8:00 pm
Bartlett 65

The VERITAS FORUM

Sponsored by The Ark, Athletes in Action, Campus Crusade for Christ, FOCUS, Intervarsity, Mercy House, NAVs Christian Fellowship and the Veritas Forum.

www.umasscru.com or www.veritas.org

La Salle dominates UMass

MEN'S HOOPS from page 14

The Minutemen went into halftime down 27-22 and came out flat to begin the second. La Salle went on a 7-0 run, pushing its lead to 34-22.

UMass pulled within eight points around the 11-minute mark but the Explorers answered with authority, as La Salle guard Darnell Harris hit 3-pointers on back-to-back possessions down the stretch, taking the life out of the crowd and the Minutemen's chances.

"It was about us just playing bad tonight," Ford said. "We could have had the greatest game plan in the history of basketball, and it still wouldn't have worked. It happens. Unfortunately, it happened to all of our players on one night. When all eight players don't play well, that's going to spell 'trouble' for our basketball team."

Life brought the Minutemen back in the game around the 10-minute mark in the second half. He hit 3-pointers on consecutive UMass possessions – on the first he unexpectedly pulled up from NBA-range just seconds into the shot clock and buried it.

The next trip down, after a turnover on the La Salle end, Life dribbled the length of the floor and pulled up again, hitting his second straight 3 and pulling UMass inside 10 points, 46-38, for the first time in over nine minutes.

"None of us are playing well, especially myself," Life said. "I finally made my mind up to step in a little bit and see what happens. I came up short, very short. I guess it backfired."

The Minutemen went to a zone defense around the 10-minute mark of the second half, and La Salle struggled to figure it out for the better part of three minutes. The Explorers looked out of sync, turning the ball over several times and getting the Minutemen back into the flow offensively.

"We had them on their heels for a while," senior Jeff Viggiano said after the game. "They just ended up executing, and we couldn't knock down shots."

At the 7:44 mark Life struck again. A turnover led to another UMass fast break. The ball was kicked ahead to Life just inside the 3-point line. Knowing where the line was, and seeking it intently, he backed up and hit his third 3 of the half over La Salle's Jermaine Thomas.

KAREN WINKLER/COLLEGIAN

Freshman point guard Chris Lowe battled through a sprained ankle in the Minutemen's 65-44 home loss to La Salle last night.

Loss snaps winning streak at the Mullins

MEN'S HOOPS from page 14

the day. UMass coach Travis Ford hadn't planned on playing Lowe, but after warm-ups Lowe said he wanted to give it a shot.

Lowe gamely hobbled up and down the court for 30 minutes, but the injury rendered him ineffective, as he finished with just two points and three assists. Following the game, Ford said he probably wouldn't have played Lowe in hindsight, but hinted that he may rest the freshman in Sunday's game against Florida State.

"I wish I hadn't have played him now – it wasn't quite worth it," Ford said. "But I thought it was a tough, gutty performance by him. I didn't want to jeopardize the season for one game, but I also knew that we had some games we could rest him coming up if we needed to."

FREEMAN BOTTLED-UP

Junior Rashaun Freeman tied his season-low offensive output with just four points. Freeman was also held to four points in a loss at St. Louis early this year.

Freeman, who came into the game shooting 52 percent from the floor, went 0-for-8 last night. Freeman did manage 11 rebounds and five blocks.

"Ray battled," Ford said. "He was in there crashing the offensive glass and really competing, but it was just one of those nights. Everyone just had a bad night."

STREAK SNAPPED

Last night's loss ended a 12-game winning streak for UMass at the Mullins Center. The streak was the longest active in the Atlantic 10.

The Minutemen hadn't lost at home since last Jan. 29, when they fell 69-64 to Richmond.

The steak was the second longest in Mullins Center history. UMass won its first 27 games in the arena.

Damon thanks fans

BOSTON (AP) — Johnny Damon, the former Boston Red Sox center fielder beloved by fans until he defected to the rival New York Yankees in December, is trying to mend fences with a full-page newspaper advertisement thanking Red Sox nation.

The ad, which ran inside the sports section of The Boston Globe on Wednesday, reads, "Many thanks to the great fans of New England and the city of Boston. It was a privilege and an honor."

The message, displayed in the form of a letter with Damon's signature, is superimposed over a photo of the Red Sox' former leadoff hitter in action.

Damon incurred the wrath of legions of Red Sox loyalists in December when the former free agent agreed to a $52 million, four-year contract with the Yankees, a team with a long history of enmity with the Red Sox.

After Damon's move to the Yankees was announced, Damon sounded sad to leave the Fenway Park faithful.

"Those fans were very loyal to me," he told reporters in December. "It took some thinking, but I realized that the organization did not hold me at that level. I understood that I needed to go elsewhere."

SHOULDER SHELVES PERKINS

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Celtics center Kendrick Perkins suffered a dislocated left shoulder at end of practice on Wednesday and is listed as day-to-day, a team spokesman said.

Perkins was hurt during a team scrimmage, and X-rays revealed the dislocation, spokesman Jeff Twiss said.

Perkins, in his third NBA season, is averaging 4.5 points and nearly six rebounds per game. The Celtics drafted the 6-foot-10, 280-pound center out of high school.

Also Wednesday, the team recalled center Dwayne Jones from the Florida Flame of the NBA Development League.

Boston acquired Jones from the Minnesota Timberwolves in a seven-player deal on Jan. 26. The 6-foot-11, 250-pounder was fifth in the nation in rebounding and blocks per game for Saint Joseph's in 2004-05.

Associated Press

Miller would best benefit by sticking to skiing

MILLER from page 14

aggrandizement.

There is no denying Miller's talent. There is no denying that he has every right to be what he wants to be – on his own time, and in his own clothing.

But here's a humble suggestion that no doubt will, like everything else that doesn't originate in the depths of his own mind, go unheeded: Join your own countrymen – most of whom have worked as hard, or harder, than you to be here, in at least pretending to give a rip about the Olympics.

You don't put on a uniform representing your country at the greatest gathering in the world, for sport or any other purpose, and act like you've really got better things to do with your time.

Miller's main line of reasoning – he's great in spite of his country and its athletic trappings, not because of them – might be true. So what?

Can't avoid embarrassing the people in the country that made you rich and famous doing fulltime what to most people qualifies as playing hooky? Be smart enough to fake it. Suck it up, tuck in your shirt, put on a smile, and cash your checks.

Miller's limp mantra is exposed for what it is when you see how vividly it contrasts with the U.S. team's other marquee athletes.

Two-time medalist Apolo Ohno made his own press appearance here Wednesday and answered, patiently, every question put to him by 100 reporters, looking each of them in the eye and treating them like they were of the same species. You think he lives to answer every TV reporter's inane questions about his chin hair?

Two-time medalist Michelle Kwan, in the midst of a dicey pre-Olympics controversy about getting into the Olympics via an injury waiver, explained herself honestly and patiently. You think she, with her five world and nine U.S. titles, really needed to?

It's part of the deal. Great athletes don't always get that. Great champions do.

"It's important for athletes to be honest," two-time medalist Miller said. He's right.

But here's the corollary: If the brutal truth is that your planet is in an orbit around itself, feel free to fudge it a little. Pretend you care. Pretend you get that you're representing something greater than yourself.

Pretend you've got class. Join your own team. Or get the hell off it.

Bode Miller may be the greatest skier to ever come from American soil, but his antics have grown tiresome to some reporters.

The only thing more powerful than our systems? Your imagination.

The technologies we create define leading-edge. So do our opportunities. Join Raytheon, one of the world's most admired defense and aerospace systems suppliers, and apply your mind in ways that you have always thought possible.

Advance engineering with a diversity of people and talents. Take on challenges that defy conventional thinking. And meet us at the forefront of innovation.

Visit our Career Fair Booth at the ALANA Fair on Feb. 15, 2006

Opportunities are available in the following areas:
Aeronautical Engineering | Computer Engineering | Computer Science | Electrical Engineering | Mechanical Engineering | Math | Optics | Physics | Software Engineering | Systems Engineering

www.rayjobs.com/campus

Raytheon
Customer Success Is Our Mission

Leaderer joins the club

HOCKEY from page 14

all behind Gabe so that's how it goes."

Cahoon wasn't as concerned that his good friend, former boss and BU coach Jack Parker – who was in attendance at the Tsongas Arena that night to see fracas – would be able to strictly prepare for Jon Quick rather than splitting his time to scout both goaltenders this week.

"A lot of teams in this league go with the same goaltender night after night," Cahoon said following his team's win in Lowell. "They were at the game tonight. They got to watch him. They'll look at the tape from tonight's game, and they're not going to see a lot of him. It's just a matter of whether Jon prepares himself properly and has a good week of practice, and he'll play well in goal."

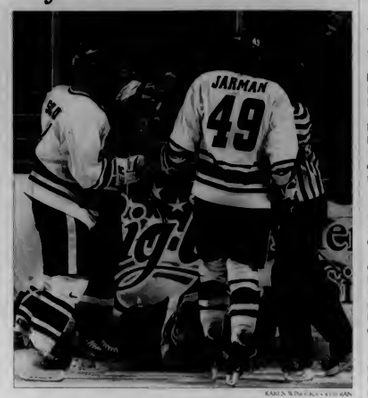
THE UMASS SIX-PACK

Before Gravallese unleashed his iron fist at the end of the game, he was busy closing out UMass defenseman David Leaderer's night just 33 seconds after the opening faceoff, whistling him for a questionable hitting-from-behind penalty and a game misconduct.

Leaderer became the sixth UMass skater to get the gate for that penalty this season, which became a major point of emphasis for officials in order to keep cheap shots and unnecessary injuries out of the college game.

He joins Alex Berry, who was tossed in a 4-2 win at Clarkson on Oct. 15, Degon, who was whistled in a 4-1 loss against UNH on Oct. 28, Chris Davis, who was ejected in a 4-2 loss at Providence on Nov. 4, Patrick Dineen, who was run in a 7-0 loss at BC on Dec. 9, and Jordan Virtue, who was booted in a 3-2 loss at Lowell on Jan. 27.

"The intent [to call the penalty] is being followed through, and I think that is the most important thing," Cahoon said. "In years past, they would have these points of emphasis. By November, they would quit on them, and the game would be the same old year in and year out. Now, at least, we're developing a new brand of hockey that is probably more conducive to good play because they are getting the cheap shots out of it."



"It's a tough situation, but it's in our best interest that they call those penalties because it gets rid of them," Degon said. "It happens, and they've got to do something big in order to get rid of it. If you get five minutes and you get kicked out of the game, you're not going to do it again."

SEVENTH HEAVEN

The victory over Boston College immediately levitated to "classic" status as far as the history of the UMass hockey program is concerned, but the importance of the win the following night at Lowell should not be forgotten: mainly because the Minutemen avoided what would have been an insufferable letdown with a loss, but also because they shook up the conference standings.

UMass leapfrogged the River Hawks into seventh place in Hockey East, holding a 16-15 edge in points. Plus, the Minutemen have eight games remaining on their Hockey East tab while Lowell only has seven. And since UML took the season series between the two teams, the Minutemen will lose a one-on-one tiebreaker to the River Hawks when postseason seeding becomes an issue so that extra point becomes all that more important.

"Starting off the weekend, we were three points behind Lowell, and they were playing so well that we didn't think [passing them in the standings] was an attainable goal this weekend," Degon said after the win on Saturday. "After [Friday] night's win, we looked at each other in the locker room and thought we could do this. To be able to jump somebody in the standings this late in the season, you can't even talk about how important it is."

KAREN WINKLER/COLLEGIAN

Minutemen Kevin Jarman (49) and Jamie Solon (left) mix it up with some Denver players in November. They found themselves in another fight in Lowell.

New sound on Monday Night

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Do you believe in switching networks? Yes!

Al Michaels appears headed to NBC after ESPN hired former quarterback Joe Theismann, Washington Post columnist Tony Kornheiser and Mike Tirico as its Monday night broadcast crew.

Michaels had been with ABC since 1976 and had been the play-by-play voice of "Monday Night Football" since 1986, when he replaced Frank Gifford. A four-time Emmy-Award winner, he is best known for exclaiming "Do you believe in miracles? Yes!" when the United States upset the favored Soviet Union in the 1980 Winter Olympic hockey tournament.

NBC takes over Sunday night games next season from ESPN. John Madden, Michaels' broadcast partner for the last four seasons, agreed in June to a six-year contract with NBC.

"Al was not comfortable and let us know he was not comfortable with our vision of where we are going," ESPN executive vice president John Skipper said after Wednesday's announcement. "Back in November he said it was the greatest job ever invented. So sometime between the last couple of weeks and November apparently he had a change of heart."

At a news conference July 26, Michaels said he would remain with "Monday Night Football" when it switched to ESPN after 36 seasons on ABC. He was to be paired with Theismann, who had broadcast Sunday night games on ESPN with Mike Patrick and Paul Maguire.

"I feel like I'm a creature of Monday night. I'm home and I'm staying home," Michaels said then. "The three words 'Monday Night Football' resonate like no other."

Skipper was evasive when asked about specifics on Michaels, saying only a "satisfactory resolution" had been reached. Pat Gibbons, a marketing representative for Michaels, said he could not reach the broadcaster. NBC Sports chairman Dick Ebersol did not return a telephone message left with a spokesman.

Mike Breen will replace Michaels as the lead NBA play-by-play announcer on ABC/ESPN. He will be joined by former NBA coach Hubie Brown, hired in December 2004 as the analyst.

ESPN plans to use its various television and radio networks and Web sites for daylong buildups to the Monday night games, which will start at 8:40 p.m., about 25 minutes earlier than previously. MNF has not had a three-man booth since Michaels was teamed with Dan Fouts and Dennis Miller in 2000-01.

Theismann was an NFL quarterback for 12 seasons and had worked on ESPN's Sunday night games since 1988. Kornheiser, who had auditioned for the MNF job Miller got, has written for the Post since 1979 and has co-hosted "Pardon the Interruption" on ESPN since September 2001 with Michael Wilbon, another Post writer.

"I've got about 27 gigs right now," Kornheiser said. "I've got radio, I've got television, I've got The Washington Post."

He thinks listeners do care about who broadcasts games, especially "if the telecast has a certain amount of sizzle."

"Roone Arledge and Howard Cosell, among others, sort of changed the viewing habits of America," he said.

He also must adjust his schedule.

"I live like a barn animal. I go to sleep at 9:30 and wake up at about 5," he said.

Tirico has been a "SportsCenter" host for ESPN and handled play-by-play of the last Orange Bowl. He has worked for ESPN and ABC since 1991.

"It's the best play-by-play chair in sports," Tirico said. "To be the next person to sit in it is humbling."

Michele Tafoya returns for her third season as a "Monday Night Football" sideline reporter, and Suzy Kolber was added as a second sideline reporter.

Koznick aims for better days

By Erica Bulman
Associated Press

SESTRIERE, Italy — It's not the symmetry. Kristina Koznick wants. The top-ranked U.S. women's slalom skier is hoping that her Olympic career doesn't end the way it started – on the injury list instead of the slopes.

Koznick partially tore ligaments in her right knee while warming up for a World Cup race in Germany last weekend, and she doesn't know if she'll even participate in Friday's opening ceremony, much less the women's slalom on Feb. 22. She said she won't march if she's on crutches.

"I'm at least working toward a chance, which is better than nothing," she said by phone Wednesday on her way to be fitted for a brace.

Koznick said she should know more Thursday, when she expects to meet with U.S. Ski Team doctor William Sterett.

Then she could face an unhappy choice: Race injured or surrender her spot to another U.S. hopeful.

"Right now, as far as competing, we don't know whether that's going to happen," said Koznick's coach and boyfriend, Dan Stripp. "If she feels like she can't, she's going to say, 'I can't do it.'"

While Koznick's ACL is still attached, Stripp said, her bone was bruised and the doctor probably will share the decision. Meanwhile, it's rehab and a dose of hope.

It's not the first time Koznick, 30, has confronted hard luck and hard decisions.

A more severe injury to her other knee kept her from what would have been her first Olympics in 1994. Frostbite sidelined her for part of the 1995-96 World Cup season.

This is her final season as a World Cup skier and her final Olympics, the last chances for that elusive big win.

In the 1998 Olympics, she failed to finish the slalom, and in 2002 she was 17th in the giant slalom and did not finish the slalom.

As the only independent racer on the World Cup circuit, she first left the U.S. Ski team after her relationship with Stripp led to his firing as a U.S. coach in 1999. She rejoined the U.S. squad in 2003 but returned to independent status last year.

Koznick admits that maintaining her own tiny team – with only a handful of staffers – can be a challenge. Everything becomes a worry, from denting the rental car to an illness on the staff. That constant struggle makes her latest setback even more poignant.

The Minnesota native hasn't won a World Cup race since 2003, but she had two second places and a third last winter. This season, she has been in the top 10 in four of the five World Cup slaloms she entered and twice brushed the podium, finishing fourth both in Maribor, Slovenia, and Lienz, Austria.

In a career that includes six slalom victories but no major championships, "Koz" was hoping Sestriere would be a defining triumph.

Currently eighth in the World Cup women's slalom standings, she is the country's best chance for a women's slalom medal. Because she is ranked seventh on the World Cup Start List, she would be the only U.S. woman with the advantage of starting in the first group, before the course gets chopped up.

U.S. Olympic skier Kristina Koznick has faced an injury-riddled career, and she is hoping to turn things around in this year's games.

The U.S. team is ready with a replacement should Koznick scratch.

"She's a great slalom skier and the U.S. needs to have the best team possible," said U.S. women's technical coach Trevor Wagner. "But we'll be racing four women in every event. If she can't, there are other athletes who would go instead."

Only four berths are awarded per discipline to each country. Compatriots Lindsey Kildow and Julia Mancuso have secured slalom berths based on the U.S. team's objective criteria; Sarah Schleper and Resi Stiegler are vying for the last spot.

The American team suffered an earlier blow when Caroline Lalive injured ligaments in an awkward landing last month during downhill practice at Cortina d'Ampezzo.

Koznick injured her knee on the second day of giant slalom in Ofterschwang, Germany, when she skied over a blind seven-foot ledge onto a cat track while going from one warmup course to the other.

She said she's been swamped with e-mails from well-wishers.

"Mostly everybody says they're behind me," she said. "It makes me feel better, but it doesn't patch the wound."

Security tightens up for Olympics

By David Crary
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy — Fast-changing events, including regional protests and the surge of rioting across the Muslim world, have complicated the task of protecting the Winter Games. The host city's police chief still believes security plans are flexible and thorough enough to avert serious problems.

"Our plan, which has been in preparation for many years, took into account the possible emergence of new problems," Rodolfo Poli said in an interview at his office Wednesday with The Associated Press.

"We're policemen, not altar boys," he added. "We always think more pessimistically than what happens in reality."

Poli, a veteran of Italy's long-running battle against domestic terrorist groups such as the Red Brigades, said authorities are bracing for attempts by leftist and anti-globalization protesters to stage attention-getting disruptions of the games as they get under way Friday. On Wednesday, for the second time in four days, torch bearers carrying the Olympic flame through northern towns were forced to change their route because of protests.

Poli also acknowledged that new security concerns had arisen because of the recent far-flung rioting by Muslims angered over cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad published in several European newspapers.

Asked if athletes from Denmark and other countries targeted by the riots would receive extra security, he replied rhetorically, "What would you do?"

Turin has a substantial Muslim community, estimated at about 10,000, that already has been the focus of security efforts – a local Moroccan-born imam was expelled from Italy in September on grounds that his hardline views represented a danger to public security.

Asked if the recent Muslim rioting in other countries had prompted even tighter monitoring of Turin's Muslims, Poli answered politely, "Let us do our job."

Denmark, where the controversial cartoons first appeared, is sending five athletes and five officials to the Turin Games. The team chief, Jesper Ingast Larsen, said Tuesday that the delegation has been in close contact with security forces and "so far they tell us we can act normally" and travel around Turin without any restrictions.

"There's always a list of some countries where security forces look a little closer. That is traditionally countries like Israel and USA and so on, and Denmark has been put on this list," he said. "It is not something that will mean a big change for us."

The vast multinational security plan for the Olympics includes coordination by Italy and foreign security agencies to monitor possible terrorist threats. So far, Poli said, authorities have not substantiated any links between outside terrorist groups and the activists who are planning a series of protests in Turin starting with a rally Thursday.

Protest organizers have a range of complaints – some are involved in promoting a global boycott against Coca-Cola, others oppose the proposed high-speed train route linking Turin to Lyon, France, via a tunnel through the Alps. More generally, protest organizers have denounced the Winter Games themselves, saying they will profit multinational corporations at the expense of Italian taxpayers while forcing Turin residents to endure "a militarized city."

Poli depicted the hard core of protesters as "relatively small but very loud," and expressed concern that they would stage disruptive actions in hopes of getting worldwide news coverage from the huge media contingent at the Olympics.

LIQUORS 44

Smirnoff 80° 1.75 liter $20.49	Kahlúa Sweetened Blended Liquor Cream 1.75 liter $21.99	Parrot Bay Mango/Passion Fruit/Pineapple Coconut 1.75 liter $24.99	Captain Morgan Original Spiced Rum 1.75 liter $24.99
Smirnoff Tattoo 750 mls $13.99	Jose Cuervo Especial Gold 1.75 liter $33.99	Tanqueray Gin 1.75 liter $28.99	Crown Royal 750 mls $20.99
Bacardi Light & Dark 1.75 liter $20.99	Bombay Sapphire 1.75 liter $33.99	Mike's Hard Lemonade All Flavors 12PACKS $11.99 + DEP	Budweiser 12PACKS $11.99 + DEP

DOMESTIC KEGS	1/2 Bbls	1/4 Bbls
Bud	$63.99	$43.99
Bud Light	$63.99	$43.99
Bud Select	$63.99	$43.99
Coors Light	$63.99
Miller Lite	$63.99
Rolling Rock	$55.99
Keystone Light	$44.99
Pabst Blue Ribbon	$48.99
Natural Light/Ice	$48.99
Busch Light	$47.99

AT THE HADLEY LOCATION
458 Russell St. #9 • Campus Plaza
413-253-9344

Visit us at our other locations:
NORTHAMPTON • 238 King St.
HOLYOKE • 44 Lincoln St.

FULL REDEMPTION AT ALL LOCATIONS

NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS

DON'T DRINK & DRIVE

www.dailycollegian.com

Staubach and Aikman ready for first season

By Stephen Hawkins
Associated Press

Roger Staubach is starting to get that adrenaline rush in anticipation of a new season.

Only this time it's a different game.

The quarterback who won two Super Bowls in the 1970s with the Dallas Cowboys is the co-owner of a first-year NASCAR team.

"I've never been involved with a sport where I didn't have some control," Staubach said. "I'm going to be there at Daytona, scared to death, and yelling for Car 96 to make sure it comes around the track and finishes."

Hall of Fame Racing is the aptly named team Staubach owns with Troy Aikman, the just-elected Pro Football Hall of Famer who led the Cowboys to their other three Super Bowls in the 1990s.

Three years after the quarterbacks got together to form a team, it's finally time for their first race.

But the racing team's debut won't come in a preseason exhibition.

Their foray into racing as owners comes Feb. 19 at the season-opening Daytona 500, the Nextel Cup's own Super Bowl.

Staubach and Aikman have no expectations of a championship. A top-25 finish — in any race or the points chase in the 36-race season that goes until November — would be considered a success.

"I hate to admit that. I want to win every race, but I know that's not possible," Staubach said.

"To be in the top 25 is realistic if we have any luck this year. But anything to be in the chase or something like that is very unrealistic."

This, after all, is a startup, one-car operation in a sport dominated by multicar teams owned by the likes of Jack Roush, Rick Hendrick and former NFL coach Joe Gibbs.

Two-time Nextel Cup champion Terry Labonte will drive the No. 96 Chevrolet the first five races. His status as a past champion will ensure Hall of Fame Racing a spot in those events even if they aren't able to qualify on speed.

"My job is to try to get them top 20, top 25 in points," Labonte said. "If I could do that, it's kind of what they need to get off to a good start."

If "Texas Terry" can do that, the team would be in pretty good position to have a spot in every race after Tony Raines takes over behind the wheel in April.

Labonte is to return to Hall of Fame for two road-courses. He also will run 10 races for Hendrick, including what Labonte insists will be the final NASCAR race of his career at Texas Motor Speedway in November.

Raines is a journeyman who won four NASCAR truck races, but doesn't have a victory in the Nextel Cup or Busch series.

He was the top Busch rookie in 1999, but has only one top-10 finish in 54 Cup races the past four years.

"It's definitely the best opportunity that I've had," Raines said.

"This is a huge leap forward. When I walk in, I see more than four guys working on a race car. I see more than two race cars. I see equipment everywhere. I see engineers."

Hall of Fame Racing has a partnership with Joe Gibbs Racing to provide engines, equipment and technical help.

And the team's 40,000-square-foot shop in North Carolina is a facility they lease from Gibbs.

"With what they're going through and what they have at their disposal, it's going to get us pointed in the right direction sooner than later," Raines said.

Terry Labonte is looking forward to his first season on the new racing team owned by Roger Staubach.

Staubach said things finally came together about six months ago when Hall of Fame Racing secured its sponsorship from the DLP brand of Texas Instruments.

With the primary financial backing in place, the team hired its drivers and crew chief Philippe Lopez, who has worked for Gibbs and Richard Childress.

Putting the team together was harder and more expensive than Staubach imagined.

He followed the model for the global real estate advisory firm that bears his name. He tried to make sure the right people were in place, doing the right things.

"In racing, we have a better chance of it happening quicker because we have attracted good people to come to work for us," Staubach said. "It's the beginning of a great adventure, and we're looking forward to it."

Labonte said the quarterbacks-turned-NASCAR owners have asked a lot of good questions, and seem committed to the new venture.

"I'm going to be as excited watching Car 96 as I was when I was playing," Staubach said. "When [original Cowboys owner] Clint Murchison came into the locker room, he was all excited when we won a game and everything else. I guess that's going to be me. It's a different deal."

Edwards turns out to be a hit in cameo on hit series '24'

(AP) — NASCAR star Carl Edwards seems to make everything look easy.

First it was winning in a Nextel Cup car, and now it's acting.

The Roush Racing driver, in California to help promote the Cup race at California Speedway on Feb. 26, took part this week in the filming of FOX's hit show "24." He even has one speaking line in the episode that will air Monday, April 3.

"First I have to thank California Speedway for setting this up; this is a lot of fun," said Edwards, who finished third in the 2005 Cup points. "I definitely think acting is something I'd like to do more of. I had such a blast being on the set of '24.'

"The best part was they gave me a line to read. The cameras started to roll and as I was walking over to shake the other character's hand I realized my palms were a little sweaty, which doesn't happen very often."

Kiefer Sutherland, who plays the lead character, Jack Bauer, on the show, wasn't in the scene with Edwards, but still critiqued his performance.

"I watched a couple takes and he was moving faster than our average extra," Sutherland said. "Our teamsters right now are so excited about having Carl here it's unbelievable. Most of our guys come all the way from Georgia, Oklahoma, Kentucky and are huge NASCAR fans, so they've been waiting for this day for a while. I would have loved to have done a scene with him, and we still might someday."

When asked if he would like to try his hand at racing, Sutherland said, "My line of work is inherently less dangerous than his. Yeah, I wouldn't mind taking [a race car] for a spin, but I certainly wouldn't even get it to half the speed those guys do racing."

Edwards said he believes Sutherland would do just fine in a race car.

"I invited him out to the race at California in a few weeks to get a behind-the-scenes look at what we do," Edwards said. "I know I was in awe of everything that it takes to put together a production like '24.'

"I would love to return the invitation and allow him to come into our world. I even told him he could talk to me on our team radios, which I think sparked his interest."

Incentive Clause

Terry Labonte is only a part-time driver in NASCAR's Nextel Cup Series these days, but he's still got the will to win.

Labonte will drive in the season-opening Daytona 500 for the new Hall of Fame Racing team, whose ownership includes Pro Football Hall of Fame quarterbacks Roger Staubach and Troy Aikman.

As an incentive for Labonte, who has never won at Daytona but owns 22 career wins, Staubach has offered to give his 1963 Heisman Trophy to Labonte for a Daytona 500 victory.

"That's how important this race is to me," Staubach said.

"I'm excited about it. I've never been involved with a sport where I didn't have some control," he added. "So I'm going to be there at Daytona, and scared to death, yelling for car 96, make sure it comes around the track and finishes. It's the beginning of a great adventure and we're looking forward to it."

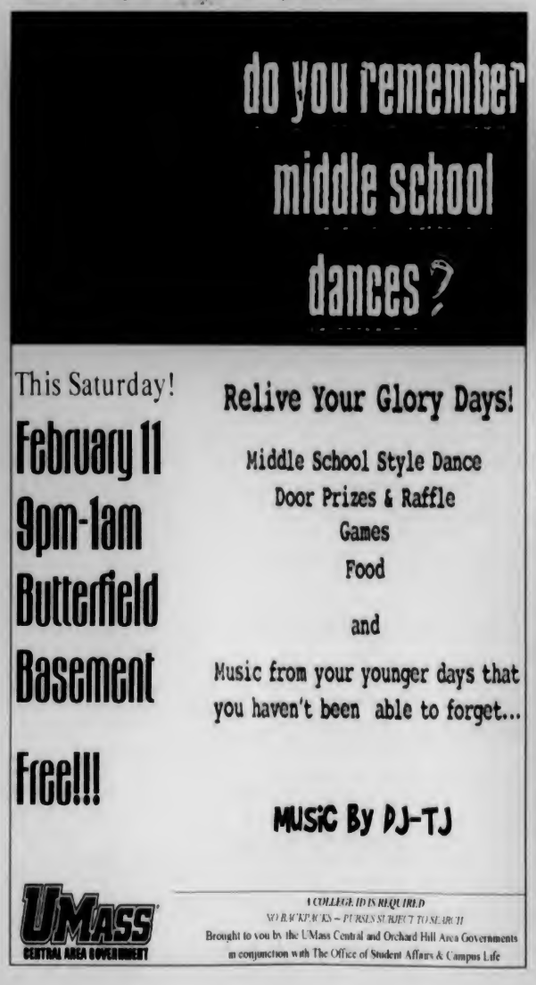
Asked if he really believes the new team can win its first race, Staubach said, "I'd say anything is possible with the experienced people we have."

Labonte, who plans to retire at the end of 2006, said he would love to take possession of the big trophy — at least for a while.

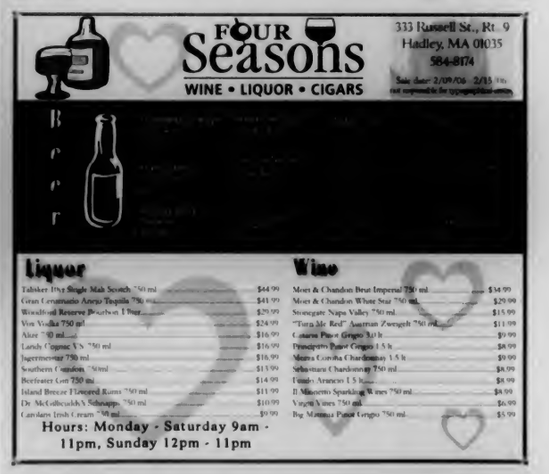
"Am I going to take it? Heck, yeah, I'm going to take it," Labonte said. "I'm going to take it for two weeks and carry it around to all my buddies and get my pictures made with it, and then I'm going to give it back to him."

Sold Out

Reserved seats for the Daytona 500 are sold and Daytona International Speedway has announced the event will pay more than $18 million, the biggest purse in the history of stock car racing.



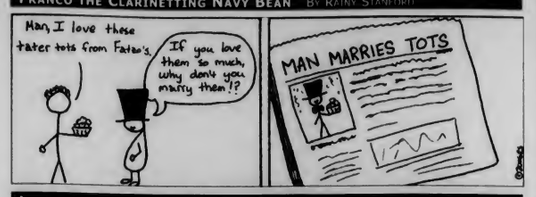
The posted awards for the stock car portion of Dayton's Speedweeks, which end Feb. 19 with "The Great America Race," will be $18,029,052. The previous record was $17,623,980 last year.



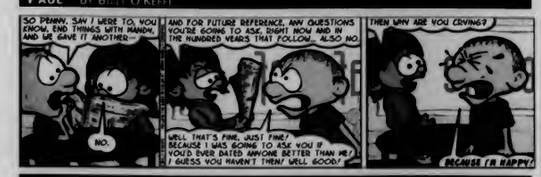
The winner of this year's season-opening Daytona 500 will collect a minimum of $1,438,155. The second, third, fourth and fifth-place finishers will receive a minimum of $1,034,175, $741,325, $589,500 and $461,925, respectively.

Last place in the 43-car field will be worth at least $224,665.

Speedway officials said last week that all the grandstand seats — more than 167,000 — have been sold, with only infield general admission tickets remaining. A crowd of more than 200,000 is expected.



—Associated Press



Franco the Clarinetting Navy Bean By Rainy Stanford

Labrat By Richard Martelly

Paul By Billy O'Keefe

The Family Monster By Josh Shaler

Two Dudes By Aaron Wagner

Quote of the Day

"The love you take, is equal to the love you make."

—The Beatles

ACROSS
1 Hefty slice
5 Calendar 11
8 Not on target
14 Verdi opera
15 Sue ___ Langdon
16 John of "Family Towers"
17 Adolescent
18 Miles ___ hour
19 Actress Mason
20 Ether or chloroform
23 Fight venue
26 Dead heat
27 "___ Now or Never"
30 Backless sofa
31 Electra's father
35 Beyond chunky
36 Person to be entrusted
37 & the rest
39 Payment or support lead-in 40 Living things
45 Roman robes
50 Superlatively severe
51 Public persona
52 Wager
53 World before bag or box
54 Parking attendant
55 Early American patriot
60 On the same team
62 Layer
63 Cookbook author Rombauer
67 Lounged about
68 Organ of equilibrium
69 Sr. citizen's grp.
70 Strengthens
71 Period
72 Polish partner?

DOWN
1 Took a seat
2 Whopper
3 Summer cooler
4 Bicyclist's perch
5 Neck part
6 Type of general
7 Dizziness
8 Peak
9 Blind element
10 Actress Garr
11 Make void
12 Cigar dropping
13 Affirmative vote
21 Actress Fabray
22 Blart to mend
23 Fuss
24 Chest bone
25 Holiday launcher
28 Punter's digit
29 NBC classic
32 Boyz II
33 Touching the soul
34 Obsessions
38 Mongrel dog
40 Tide
41 Have regrets
42 Actress Parsons
43 Harness part
44 One that got away
45 Of stars
47 Guy's honey
48 Long span of time
49 In position
56 Flooring piece
57 Dishonorable man
58 Contributes
59 Vega's constellation
60 Score and Smith
61 Used-car site
64 Music genre
65 Open-scan med procedure
66 Mentally acute

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

Submit your comic!

e-mail collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Don't think about dignity, it will only make you less fun to laugh at.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
When wars are fought by robots, your madden skills will be highly prized.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
At the next sign you read, do the exact opposite. What could go wrong?

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
A little inside info, those pants are as ugly as monkey love.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Chicks love being called chicks, it makes them think of birds having sex.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Every time you pop your collar, you make baby Jesus cry.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
If it's brown, drink it down. If it's black, send it back.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Instead of "excuse me," try: "Die in a Fire." See what happens.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Ten bucks says you can't throw a football over them mountains.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Pick someone up via the magic of words formed by upside-down calculators.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Get out of your cocoon. Caterpillars suck!

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Take a deep breath, and utilize the magic of Valentine's Day.... Rob a bank.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

TANNING SPECIAL! 25% off all purchases including packages & tanning products! Go to Beach Club Tanning on Monday Feb. 13th and ask for the "Hockey Special" Every purchase helps send the women's ice hockey team to the National Tournament in Missouri!

Minor in LEADERSHIP And get paid for it! Full time, part time careers after college, ARMY ROTC www.umass.edu/armyrotc

Apartment for Rent

Center of town 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherst-lincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Childcare

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part-time Spring – full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email: fjmooney@msn.com

Employment

Needed NVIVO tutor. Call 253-0691

Become a Summer Orientation Counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/student_jobs/Orientation_position/ The application deadline is February 15th.

Rent us your Ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837

Employment

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience nec. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288 / email: fjmooney@msn.com

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 800-766-7174

Furniture

Full Platform Bed 413-695-2957

Miscellaneous

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.athenashn.com/goddess/910

Services

Pregnant? Consider adoption. Free confidential counseling to help you make fully informed decisions for your baby and you. Choose your baby's parents, meet and stay in touch. Stable, loving two parent families waiting to adopt. Call 24/7 Brightside 1-877-777-7774 License# 1465107

Travel

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1988 Hottest Destinations – Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $159 www.sunsplashtours.com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Collegian Advertising
Business Hours:
8:30am - 3:30pm
Campus Center Basement
(413) 545-3500

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2006 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

La Salle too much for Minutemen

Offensive woes costly for UMass

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

It was too little, too late for the Massachusetts men's basketball team (10-10, 5-5 Atlantic 10), as the La Salle Explorers held off a late offensive rush from the Minutemen and swept the season series with a 65-44 victory at the Mullins Center last night.

UMass	44
La Salle	65

Junior James Life finished the game with 18 points on 4-of-13 shooting – all four field goals were 3-pointers. He went 6-for-6 from the free-throw line.

UMass' offense was dormant for the majority of the game. The Minutemen went for just 22 points in the first half and went for a stretch of over eight minutes without a field goal.

"It was a disappointing game," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "I thought we competed for the majority of game, but nobody played well, not a soul."

La Salle held UMass to just 23.5 percent from the field on 12-of-51 shooting. Junior captain Rashaun Freeman was held scoreless and went 0-of-8 on the night in 34 minutes of action; his four points came on 4-for-4 shooting at the free-throw line.

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 10

Junior guard Brandon Thomas had five points and five rebounds in a 65-44 loss last night to La Salle. The loss ended a 12-game winning streak for UMass at the Mullins Center.

Life's hot shooting not enough for UM

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

If ever the "shooter's mentality" was on display, it was in last night's game between the Massachusetts men's basketball team and La Salle. Minuteman guard James Life went 0-for-4 from the floor in the first half last night, but kept gunning, and in the second half he took over the game for a four-minute stretch.

With the Minutemen in the midst of horrific drought from the field, which saw them make just one field goal in 19:15 of action, Life came alive. With 11:53 remaining in the game, and UMass trailing 44-26, Life went on a personal 15-2 run to bring the Maroon and White within five points.

Life began the spurt by knocking down six straight foul shots, and appeared to gain some confidence. That confidence extended to 3-point land, as he connected on three consecutive treys, the third of which brought the Mullins Center faithful to their feet, as it closed the gap to 46-41.

Following a timeout, La Salle employed the triangle-and-two defense that caused UMass fits in the earlier meeting between the two teams, and shadowed Life all over the court. Life missed his next three deep balls, and the Explorers went on a 16-0 run to pull away, winning 65-44.

Life scored 18 of the 22 points UMass scored in the second half, and for the second time in a week he registered all of his points after the break, as he had 19 points last Wednesday at Temple. Life is averaging 16.6 points over the last five games, bringing his season average to 10.1.

LOWE TOUGHS IT OUT

Freshman point guard Chris Lowe was a game-time decision as he sprained his right ankle during the team shoot-around earlier in

See NOTEBOOK on page 10

Fight night in Lowell

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The element of surprise has been taken out of the equation this weekend in regards to who Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon will start between the pipes against Boston University tomorrow night.

Gabe Winer has been the man of late, but after Jon Quick's brilliant 47-save performance in UMass' 3-2 upset victory over Boston College, it seemed like no one would know who would get the nod until about an hour before the puck drops on Friday.

But, of course, that all changed with 2:33 left to play in the game at Lowell on Saturday when a bar room brawl of sorts broke out around Winer's crease after River Hawk forward Elias Godoy took a little bit too much of an aggressive charge at the UMass senior netminder.

Each member of the Minutemen on the ice at the time sized up a River Hawk, but the main event featured Winer and Godoy along the back boards. Winer got the best of his sparring partner by taking a page out of the WWE playbook and body slamming him to the ground, but head referee John Gravallese wasn't as amused as the ringside ticket holders.

He sentenced game disqualifications to Winer and Godoy for their efforts, meaning Winer is ineligible for BU and Godoy will get a taste of the Matthews Arena concession stand rather than taking the ice against the Huskies tomorrow night.

UMass goalie Gabe Winer found himself in the middle of a fracas during Saturday night's 5-2 victory against the River Hawks.

"Godoy was trying to take a run at me," Winer said. "It was a little uncalled for. I didn't punch him, but if I knew I was going to get thrown out, I would have dropped the gloves. I didn't punch him, but I let him get up and he punched me. It's kind of tough to fight a kid like that anyways. He's just ugly as it is. You can't make him much uglier."

"I'm disappointed I got thrown out. I thought maybe I'd get a double-minor. Obviously, the refs thought differently than I did."

In addition, four other Minutemen – Matt Anderson, Jamie Solon, John Wessbecker and Kevin Jarman – and four more River Hawks – Matt Collar, Nick Monroe, Adam Stanieich and Mike Potacco – were given game misconducts.

"It happens," UMass senior defensive captain Marvin Degon said. "It's hockey. There are a couple golden rules in hockey, and one of them is you don't touch a goalie. Boys will be boys. One of the Lowell players went a little hard to the net, and Gabe took offense. We're

See HOCKEY on page 11

Bode's antics grow bothersome

By Ron Judd
Knight Ridder

TURIN, Italy – Months ago, U.S. ski star Bode Miller was thinking, not exactly privately, about sitting out the Winter Olympics.

Weeks ago, Miller's coaches were talking publicly about booting him off the U.S. Ski Team and let him fulfill his own fantasy, being captain of his own Team Bode.

Didn't happen. But one quick question before they light the flame: Is it too late for a recount?

Miller, perhaps the most talented American ever to click into ski bindings, used the U.S. alpine team's news conference Tuesday to spread his increasingly tiresome, woe-is-me shtick all over the Winter Olympics.

He squints into the camera lights that produce the images that make him rich and decries their very existence.

He bemoans the corporate poisoning of sport while stopping just short of tattooing the name of a pasta company across his forehead. He bristles at the gall of anyone who dares add all that up and come up with a sum total of hypocrite.

This is the guy who issued a non-apology apology for his now-infamous "60 Minutes" confessional to skiing drunk, or near-drunk, or however he wants to Clinton his way out of it. And by gosh, he's sticking with it.

"I don't want to sound arrogant," Miller said, sounding arrogant, "but none of that bothers me much. I would be lying if I said I had massive regrets about the things I have said."

Bode, warrior for truth.

Maybe that's the hidden message in the new "Join Bode" Nike Web site campaign, which expounds on Miller's apparent life philosophy:

"Join the bold, the brazen, the unintimidated," Miller's "manifesto" states. "Join the unwillingness to give in. Join doing things your way. Join not joining." Deep.

That "message," Miller insists, is the only reason he signed that big, fat contract with Nike – to communicate directly with the residents of planet Earth, without media drones trying to interpret what he's saying, whatever that might be.

Miller sneered at a query near the end of his pre-Olympic press appearance Tuesday, visibly ticked that people keep asking him about the media air strikes he keeps calling in on his own position.

"Thanks for mixing up the questions," he sniggered.

When the news conference broke up to allow one-on-one questions, Miller beat it for the back door, leaving his lesser teammates on the stage.

Join Bode. Join profiting from not caring. Join the relentless pursuit of self-

See MILLER on page 10

U.S. Olympic skier Bode Miller has made quite a name for himself since his appearance on "60 Minutes" a few months ago.

Stanford studies perfect swing

By Lisa M. Krieger
Knight Ridder

SAN JOSE, Calif. – What makes a golf swing sing?

Stanford University scientists are getting closer to solving that age-old mystery. They believe that motion analysis of elite professional golfers can unlock the secrets of one of the most analyzed – yet still most exasperating – of sports.

"There are a lot of different opinions as to what creates power and how you can generate more speed," said Will Yanagisawa, a Stanford graduate and pro golfer whose swing the study will analyze.

"But there isn't much science," said the golfer, winner of last year's Hawaii Pearl Open. "This should give a better idea of what is happening – real data of exactly what is going on."

In a study at the university's Motion and Gait Analysis Laboratory, Yanagisawa hit an imaginary ball off the lab's linoleum floor. He wore only shorts, goose bumps and dozens of silver light-reflecting balls the size of marbles.

The lab's eight cameras will make a digital record of his skeleton as it twists and releases, providing a three-dimensional picture of its motion and angles. Another tool will measure muscle activity, identifying the action of each muscle. A third tool will measure balance and the amount of body sway.

The resulting data will reveal essential elements of a top-notch golf swing, said investigator Jessica Rose Agramonte of Lucile Salter Packard Children's Hospital at Stanford.

Orthopedic surgeon Dr. Amy Ladd, a fellow investigator who is also married to a golf pro, calls the search for the perfect swing "the holy grail of golf." She asked: "If you break it down, where are its key elements?"

Gait and motion analysis at Stanford traces its roots back to the pioneering photographer Eadweard Muybridge, who was hired by Leland Stanford to prove that a horse trotting at top speed has all four feet off the ground at one point in its stride.

The lab has prospered and now specializes in high-tech evaluations for children and adults with disabilities.

The golf study is one of several unique projects by Stanford undergraduates in an "Anatomy of Motion" class.

They are also studying the bowling techniques of violinist Barry Shiffman of the St. Lawrence Quartet as he plays J.S. Bach. Last year they measured the leaps and spins of modern dancers with the Merce Cunningham Dance Company.

So far, the golf study links "club head speed at impact" – a measure of how hard a golfer is able to hit a ball – to two factors. One is "peak torque," the twisting and unleashing of the body's energy. Another is something called "X-factor," which is the rotation of the hip to shoulder. The longest hitters in golf have their shoulders turn more than their hips at the top of the swing.

They also plan to measure something called "the Y-factor," which relates to the movement of the left shoulder on the backswing. Golfer Tiger Woods is said to move his left shoulder a full 19 inches back from its starting point, while amateurs typically move theirs only 8 or 9 inches.

So far, wrist flexion and weight shift seem less strictly correlated with power.

"The motion of a good golf swing is debated. There are lots of theories," said Stanford grad and golf pro Casey Martin, another volunteer in the study.

"If we can understand the components of a good golf swing, then it can be shared with people to improve their games," he said.

Will he take the lab findings onto the fairway with him at his next big tournament?

"Less is more in golf," he said, laughing. "You want to not think."

If you want to swing a golf club with the likes of Tiger Woods, pay attention to the Stanford study that is trying to zero in on the perfect swing. Woods is himself a Stanford graduate and will play at Pebble Beach this weekend.

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 75

Panel reports 'crisis' in university publishing

By Mike Sances
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate held its first meeting of the semester Thursday, hearing a report from a panel on the issue of digital research and publication, a debriefing from the Senate's representative to Wednesday's Board of Trustees meeting, and approving a new course in Communications as well as changes to the undergraduate degree in the Department of Veterinary and Animal Sciences.

After brief opening remarks by Chancellor John V. Lombardi, the Faculty Senate witnessed a presentation entitled "Research and Publication in the Digital Age," moderated by Marilyn Billings, Coordinator for the Five College Cooperative Library Systems and Special Initiatives, and featuring representatives from the UMass Press, the W.E.B Dubois Library and a member of the Senate Research Library Council.

The panel reported on what it repeatedly referred to as a "crisis" in university publishing: the changing nature of the relationship between scholars and academic publishing houses that has resulted in a massive increase in the costs of purchasing books and journal articles.

Jay Schafer, Director of Libraries for UMass Amherst, reported that the cost of purchasing books and journal articles for academic libraries has increased 260 percent over the last 16 years. And only in the past five years, according to Schafer, the cost of science journals has increased somewhere between 30 and 40 percent. Added to the problem of rising costs is the traditional role of publishing in enabling junior faculty to achieve tenure.

"The reality is that excellent scholarly manuscripts are being rejected on strictly financial grounds," Bruce Wilcox, director of the UMass Press, told the Senate.

According to the panel, a possible solution to the rising costs of academic publishing may be found via aspiring faculty members submitting manuscripts to digital publications, which would still be peer-reviewed but would also be provided for "open access" – that is, free of charge for the reader.

Shortly after the presentation, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano announced the results of the incoming undergraduate applications for the Fall 2006 semester. Gargano said that as of the Jan. 15 deadline, UMass had received nearly 24,000 applications for the class of 2010. The applicant pool is 53 percent female, 64 percent in-state, 35 percent out-of-state, and two percent international. 68 percent of the applications were filed over the World Wide Web, according to Gargano.

After attending the Board of Trustees meeting on Wednesday, the Faculty Senate delegate to the Board, Brian O'Connor, reported to the meeting of a "very good discussion" concerning the increase in student fees. O'Connor, a professor of biology who also serves as an adviser to pre-med students, praised the trustees for their "very, very gracious" manner toward a delegation of undergraduate students who had sought to implement a tuition freeze.

The Senate meeting ended with the approval of two changes regarding academics. First was the approval of a new course in the Department of Communications, a three credit course titled "Media Violence." The course is numbered 426. The Senate also approved a motion to change the two undergraduate degrees in Veterinary and Animal Sciences so as to better enable students to gain acceptance to veterinary schools after graduation.

The first meeting of the Massachusetts Faculty Senate hosted a group of panelists that included Director of Libraries Jay Schafer, Director of University Press Bruce Wilcox, and member of the Research Library Council Robert Robbins.

Foundation gives grant to five professors

By Hayden Mary
Collegian Staff

Five University of Massachusetts faculty members affiliated with the Center for Research on Families (CRF) were awarded grants totaling more than $903,000 by the National Science Foundation.

The five faculty members consist of Professor Daniel R. Anderson, Professor Naomi Gerstel, Professor Dan Clawson, associate professor Joya Misra, and associate professor Lynnette Leidy Seivert.

Anderson, a psychology professor, was awarded $269,248 over three years for his research on "The Effects of Background Television on Very Young Children."

On his Web site, he states, "My current research interests include toddler understanding of television, the effects of adult background television on infant and toddler behavior, brain activation during television viewing, and the relationship between television viewing and diet."

Seivert, an associate professor of anthropology, was awarded a three-year $270,000 grant for her research on "Reproductive Aging and Symptom Experience at Midlife Among Bangladeshi Immigrants, Sedentees and White London Neighbors."

Gerstel and Clawson, sociology professors, were awarded a two-year $236,682 grant for their research on "Job Hours and Schedules: Explaining the Social Processes in Four Health Care Occupations."

Misra, an associate professor of sociology and public policy, along with Budig, an assistant professor of Sociology, were awarded $98,000 for their research on "The Cross-National Effects of Work-Family Policies on the Wage Penalty for Motherhood."

Their study examined a variety of wealthy nations to determine which polices are the most effective in supporting working mothers.

Prior to receiving their grants, they had taken part in the CRF's Family Research Scholars Program, a year-long interdisciplinary faculty seminar that assists scholars in conceptualizing, writing and submitting grant proposals for family research in collaboration with the center.

The program is completed through a series of seminars which include presentations and discussions of the scholars' developing proposals, and instruction on the details of what makes a successful proposal and resources available through the University.

Police to talk with supremacists about Robida

By Kelly P. Kissel
Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. – Investigators tracking hour-by-hour movements of a teenager after a hatchet-and-gun attack in a Massachusetts gay bar are looking into whether he was heading to Arkansas to meet up with white supremacists, a source close to the investigation said Wednesday.

Jacob Robida, 18, shot and killed himself after a police chase ended Saturday in Norfork. Moments earlier, Robida shot and killed Gassville police officer Jim Sell, 63, after a traffic stop. As police closed in at Norfork, Robida also shot and killed a female acquaintance, Jennifer Rena Bailey, 33, of Charleston, W.Va.

Using information from credit card receipts, investigators are developing a timeline on Robida's movements after the Feb. 2 attack at the Puzzles Lounge in New Bedford, Mass., said an Arkansas police official speaking on condition of anonymity.

"Our people want to know, for intelligence purposes only, if there was something leading him to one of at least two organizations" in northern Arkansas, said the source, who was unable to comment publicly because police supervisors have ordered silence.

Robida did not take a meandering course while traveling from Massachusetts to Arkansas, the source said. "He was driving like he knew where he was going," the source said.

Investigators planned to talk to members of the organizations, and may have done so already, the source said. White supremacists and similar groups can be found in certain pockets of rural Arkansas.

Meanwhile, a West Virginia television station reported Wednesday that Bailey's father had reported two guns stolen from his home at the same time his daughter was missing and Robida was traveling toward Arkansas.

West Virginia State Police said Robida may have stolen the guns, WOWK-TV in Huntington reported.

"Two firearms were reported stolen as a part of that burglary at this time, we believe they may possibly have been taken by Robida to Arkansas," said Sgt. T.C. Bledsoe of the West Virginia State Police. Weapons taken were a .20-gauge shotgun and a .22-caliber rifle.

"We believe those to be his firearms," Bledsoe said. Investigators would need to check the guns' serial numbers to verify the guns belonged to Bailey's father.

The Arkansas source said Robida had a handgun and two long guns in his possession when the car was stopped after a 20-mile chase Saturday in Baxter County.

Police had searched for Robida since early Feb. 2, when, they say, he used a hatchet and handgun to wound three men at Puzzles.

At 9:30 a.m. Feb. 3, Robida sought medical care in Burlington County, N.J. for a cut on his head, Bristol (Mass.) District Attorney Paul Walsh Jr. told The Boston Globe. Robida claimed he was homeless and gave a fake name, Walsh said.

New video shows Carroll pleading for help

By Diana Elias
Associated Press

Kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll appeared in a video aired Thursday on a private Kuwaiti TV channel, appealing for her supporters to do whatever it takes to win her release and saying "there is a very short time."

Carroll was shown in the black-and-white video wearing an Islamic headscarf, sitting on a chair in front of a wall with a large floral design. She spoke to the camera in a firm voice, without weeping as she did on a previous video.

"I am here. I am fine. Please just do whatever they want, give them whatever they want as quickly as possible," she said, adding she was speaking on Feb. 2, nearly a month after she was abducted by armed men in Baghdad. "There is a very short time. Please do it fast. That's all."

The 22-second video was aired on Al Rai TV, a private Kuwaiti channel, and included audio, unlike two previous videos of Carroll.

The video was delivered earlier Thursday to Al Rai's Baghdad office and was aired in its entirety, Hani al-Srougi, an editor at the station, told The Associated Press. It was accompanied by a letter written by the 28-year-old freelancer.

The newscaster said on the air that the station would hand the letter over to authorities but did not specify whether they would give it to Kuwaiti or American officials. The station said it would not disclose the letter's contents.

In Baghdad, a U.S. Embassy spokesman Dennis Culkin said Thursday that American authorities routinely do not comment on such tapes, especially before they have been authenticated.

In the tape, Carroll mentions the letter and suggests that her captors sent a letter in her handwriting previously. It was the first report of any letters from Carroll.

"I am with the mujahadeen [holy warriors]. I sent you a letter written by my hand, but you wanted more evidence, so we are sending you this letter now to prove I am with the mujahadeen," she said.

Armed men abducted Carroll on Jan. 7 in Baghdad, killing her Iraqi translator.

A new video shows kidnapped U.S. journalist Jill Carroll asking people to do whatever her Iraqi kidnappers want to get her released. Her captors demanded the release of all Iraqi women prisoners held in U.S. Iraqi jails.

On Jan. 30, Al-Jazeera television broadcast a video showing Carroll weeping as she appealed for the release of female Iraqi prisoners.

The name of the group that has claimed responsibility for her abduction, the Revenge Brigades, appeared on that video.

On Jan. 17, Al-Jazeera aired a video released by the Revenge Brigades showing Carroll – her head bare, and her long straight brown hair parted in the middle – and setting a Jan. 20 deadline for the release of all female prisoners in Iraq. The group threatened to execute her unless their demands were met.

A producer at Al-Jazeera said the station did not receive any letters with the videos it aired.

Late last month, the U.S. military freed five Iraqi women detainees, but American officials insisted the release was not linked to the demand by Carroll's abductors.

The U.S. military was believed be holding about six more. It was unclear how many women were held by Iraqi authorities.

Some 250 foreigners have been taken captive since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, and at least 39 have been killed.

The Daily Collegian will be having a vigil to support Jill Carroll.

All are welcome to gather
Thursday, February 16, 2006 7 p.m. on the library lawn in front of the Student Union building.

ARTS AND LIVING
FINAL DESTINATION III
Hollywood stars face off against death.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
THOUGHTS ON RECENT WARS
Columnist reflects on feelings towards Bush and other related issues.
PAGE 3

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy, H33
TONIGHT Cloudy, H19
TOMORROW Mostly Cloudy, H35 , L19

SPORTS
UMASS LOOK AHEAD
Minutemen look ahead to match up with Terriers.
PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Eric Athas
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Katie Huston
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerri Ciraldi
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egasian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Ian Jones
COPY EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Kristen LaCasse
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Fortenot
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Morgan-Ann Rousseau
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Alex Butler
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellbusu
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Carlisi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT SPORTS Rob Greenfield
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Tucker Merrick

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIATE SCHEDULE. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATED AND EDITED BY STUDENTS. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE DAILY HAS BEEN AWARDED THE HIGHEST HONORS BY ASSOCIATED COLLEGIATE PRESS IN 1960, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1964, AND THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1996. PURCHASED BY THE STUDENT GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION IN 1991, THE DAILY COLLEGIAN BECAME AN INDEPENDENT NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORPORATION IN 1996. PURCHASED BACK SINCE 1996, THE DAILY COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AN INDEPENDENT NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORPORATION.

SUBSCRIPTIONS ARE $100 PER SEMESTER.

Bush says cooperation thwarted 2002 attack

By Deb Riechmann
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush said the U.S.-led global war on terror has "weakened and fractured" al-Qaida and allied groups, outlining as proof new details about the multinational cooperation that foiled purported terrorist plans to fly a commercial airplane into the tallest skyscraper on the West Coast.

"The terrorists are living under constant pressure and this adds to our security," Bush said. "When terrorists spend their days working to avoid death or capture, it's harder for them to plan and execute new attacks on our country. By striking the terrorists where they live, we're protecting the American homeland."

But the president said the anti-terror battle is far from over.

"The terrorists are weakened and fractured, yet they're still lethal," the president said in a speech at the National Guard Memorial Building. "We cannot let the fact that America hasn't been attacked in 4 1/2 years since September the 11th lull us into the illusion that the threats to our nation have disappeared. They have not."

Bush has referred to the 2002 plot before. In an address last October, he said the United States and its allies had foiled at least 10 serious plots by the al-Qaida terror network in the last four years, including plans for Sept. 11-like attacks on both U.S. coasts. The White House initially would not give details of the plots but later released a fact sheet with a brief, and vague, description of each.

The president filled in details on Thursday.

He said that Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks who was captured in 2003, had already begun planning the West Coast operation in October, just after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks. One of Mohammed's key planners was Hambali, the alleged operations chief of the al-Qaida related terrorist group Jemaah Islamiyah. Instead of recruiting Arab hijackers, Hambali found Southeast Asian men who would be less likely to arouse suspicion and who were sent to meet with Osama bin Laden, Bush said.

Under the plot, the hijackers were to use shoe bombs to blow open the cockpit door of a commercial jetliner, take control of the plane and crash it into the Library Tower in Los Angeles, since renamed the U.S. Bank Tower, Bush said. In his remarks, Bush inadvertently referred to the site as "Liberty Tower," and immediately afterward, the White House corrected him.

The president said the plot was derailed when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key al-Qaida operative. Bush did not name the country or the operative.

Frances Fragos Townsend, assistant to the president for homeland security and counterterrorism, said Mohammed, working with Hambali in Asia, recruited four members of the terrorist cell. She told reporters in a conference call that all four went to Afghanistan where they met and swore their loyalty to bin Laden.

Townsend said all four members of the cell have been apprehended, but said she could not release their names or where they were caught. She would not identify the two South Asia and two Southeast Asian nations that helped foil the attack.

Bush has been on a campaign to defend his controversial domestic monitoring program. But the White House would not say whether the 2002 plot was thwarted as a result of the National Security Agency program to eavesdrop on the international e-mails and phone calls of people inside the United States with suspected ties to terrorists.

Bush said only that "subsequent debriefings and other intelligence operations" after the arrest of the unnamed operative led to information about the plot, and to the capture of other ringleaders and operatives involved in it. Hambali, for instance, was captured in Thailand in 2003 and handed over to the United States.

"It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot," the president said. "By working together, we took dangerous terrorists off the streets. By working together, we stopped a catastrophic attack on our homeland."

Bush's speech in October cited two other attacks inside the United States that were foiled, including one to use hijacked planes to attack the East Coast in mid-2003.

The third was the case of Jose Padilla, a former Chicago gang member who converted to Islam and allegedly plotted with top al-Qaida commanders to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a U.S. city.

Padilla, whose plot never materialized, now is being held without bail in civilian custody on charges that he was part of a secret network that supported Muslim terrorists. He was arrested in May 2002 and had been held as an enemy combatant without criminal charge at a Navy brig in South Carolina until last month.

President Bush makes remarks on the Global War on Terror at the National Guard Memorial Building in Washington. Bush gave new details of terrorist plans to fly a commercial airplane into a skyscraper on the West Coast.

Massachusetts man arrested in killing wife, daughter

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON — British authorities arrested a man Thursday in the shooting deaths of his wife and baby daughter, and prosecutors say he may have backed out of a plan to commit suicide after killing them in their Massachusetts home.

Neil Entwistle, who returned to his native England a day after the killings, is charged with two counts of murder and two weapons-related charges, Middlesex District Attorney Martha Coakley said.

Investigators believe he used his father-in-law's handgun to shoot his wife, Rachel, and their daughter on the morning of Jan. 20, Coakley said. She said he may have intended to kill himself as well, possibly because of financial difficulties as his Internet business ventures failed, but he didn't follow through.

The next morning, Entwistle bought a one-way ticket and got on a flight to London. Before leaving, he returned the .22-caliber handgun to his father-in-law's home in Carver, Coakley said.

"We have forensic information that links it both to him and to Rachel, and we know Rachel had not used that gun," Coakley said. Rachel Entwistle, 27, and 9-month-old Lillian, were found dead Jan. 22 in their home in the Boston suburb of Hopkinton.

Neil Entwistle, also 27, was ordered held until a Friday hearing in London after his arrest Thursday at a subway station. Coakley said the arrest warrant was issued Wednesday, a day after prosecutors received forensic results indicating the gun used in the killing was from a collection owned by the father-in-law.

A spokesman for Rachel Entwistle's family declined to immediately comment on the arrest.

Police were first called to the Hopkinton home on Jan. 21 but didn't see anything wrong, authorities said. Coakley said that friends of the couple had showed up for a dinner party but no one answered the door, and that Rachel Entwistle's mother called police when she couldn't reach her daughter.

After a missing-person report was filed, police visited the home again, and during the second search, discovered the bodies amid piles of bedding. Rachel Entwistle had been shot in the head, and the baby in the abdomen, Coakley said. It wasn't clear if they were awake or sleeping when they were shot, she said.

Neil Entwistle didn't return for his wife and daughter's funeral on Feb. 1.

At the time of the killings, Neil Entwistle was nearing financial ruin, but he apparently hid the problems from his wife and family, Coakley said.

"The picture we had was of a young couple starting out with a healthy future," Coakley said. But in reality, she said, "he had no money and really had no assets."

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today
NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Julie Leyce
COPY EDITOR
Michael A. Busack
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Sarah Belanger, Sean Durham

This Saturday!
February 11
9pm-1am
Butterfield
Basement
Free!!!

Relive Your Glory Days!
Middle School Style Dance
Door Prizes & Raffle
Games
Food
and
Music from your younger days that you haven't been able to forget...
MUSIC By DJ-TJ

UMASS CENTRAL AREA GOVERNMENT
A COLLEGE ID IS REQUIRED
NO BOOKBAGS – PURSES SUBJECT TO SEARCH
Brought to you by the UMass Central and Orchard Hill Area Governments in conjunction with The Office of Student Affairs & Campus Life

White House offers more lawmakers details on eavesdropping

By Katherine Shrader
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush's month-long campaign to convince the public that the government's eavesdropping program is an essential anti-terrorism tool appears to have made an impact, a new AP-Ipsos poll suggests.

Some 48 percent now support the administration's program to monitor — without a court warrant — some U.S.-based calls with suspected links to terrorists. That's up from 42 percent last month. Half now say the administration should have to get a warrant, down from 56 percent one month ago.

Bush has been particularly successful at making his case for the National Security Agency's controversial monitoring among men and core segments of his base.

After weeks of insisting that divulging details would harm the program, the White House relented Wednesday and briefed House intelligence committee lawmakers. Thursday, the Senate learned more about the NSA program.

Press secretary Scott McClellan said the White House will listen to ideas that lawmakers have about legislation, but Bush has indicated that he would resist any move that would compromise the program.

"There is a high bar to overcome on such ideas," McClellan said.

The decision to give Congress more information came as Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., announced he was drafting legislation that would require the secretive Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to review the constitutionality of the administration's monitoring of terror-related international communications when one party to the call is in the United States.

It also came as Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., chairwoman of a House intelligence subcommittee that oversees the NSA, broke with the Bush administration and called for a full review of the NSA's program, along with legislative action to update the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

She and others also wanted the full House Intelligence Committee to be briefed on the program's operational details. Although the White House initially promised only information about the legal rationale for surveillance, administration officials broadened the scope Wednesday to include more sensitive details about how the program works.

Questions from Congress about the monitoring abound. Once publicly mum on the subject, House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales with 51 questions he wants answered by early March.

As part of his upcoming bill, Specter said he wants the FISA court to review the program to weigh the nature of the terrorist threat, the program's scope, the number of people being monitored and how the information is being handled.

Since the monitoring program's existence was first revealed in a newspaper report more than 50 days, senior administration officials have argued that Bush and Cheney were within the law when they chose to brief only the eight lawmakers who lead the House and Senate and their intelligence committees.

Several lawmakers want to hearings to review whether the FISA law should be updated.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said the White House will listen to ideas that lawmakers have about legislation but Bush has indicated that he would resist any move that would compromise the eavesdropping program.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 2006

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Iraq War and war on terror

Greg Collins

The "Mission Accomplished" photo-op was a good-faith gesture to unify Americans and bring some sort of symbolic closure to brutal combat. However, it was an ill-timed event, as the Bush administration severely underestimated the relentlessness of the Iraqi insurgency.

President Bush's claim that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction was supported by major industrialized nations of the international community, as well as the U.N.'s very own weapons inspector David Kay, who, before the Iraq war, expressed little doubt that Saddam had weapons of mass destruction.

Much has been made in the media about President Bush's low approval ratings, but almost all presidents have experienced lower approval ratings in their second term. Harry Truman's approval rating reached below 25 percent, and many historians now consider him to be one of the most brilliant statesmen the United States has ever produced. History, not intellectuals or public opinion, will determine the success of the Bush administration.

The high participation of Iraqi citizens in the three democratic elections for an interim government, a constitution and a permanent parliament, are all better indicators of the mindset of the country's populace than countless public opinion polls conducted by American and foreign research groups and think tanks. Polls can be read to support the conclusion that the commentator reached before the poll was conducted, but real-world events, such as elections, are the ultimate indicator of support for democracy.

> All of us should put ourselves in the shoes of an innocent captive and then decide whether America's foremost priority should be trying to understand the "root causes" of terrorism or trying to kill terrorists and destroy the regimes that support them.

The approved Iraqi constitution was a legitimate, democratically developed charter. Cries that this document will not hold up in the ensuing years in Iraq fail to consider that more liberal-minded leaders in Iraq are more likely to adhere to a constitution than Saddam Hussein's Baathist party leaders were. Did U.S.-led forces enter Iraq illegally? The question should be whether Saddam Hussein ruled Iraq legally for 20 some-odd years.

At a UMass lecture before the winter break, author Dinesh D'Souza explained the difference between a statesman and an intellectual. A statesman's priorities are to absorb all of the information given to him or her and to make the decision he or she faithfully feels is in the best interests of the security of his or her country at that particular moment in time. An intellectual has the benefit of looking back and criticizing whatever information or policy did not turn out to be true or helpful.

Knowing what I know now, I would not have tried to link 9/11 with Saddam Hussein, but remember that terrorists are not merely criminal gangs, as the Clinton and George Herbert Walker Bush administrations all too often treated them. They are proxies of public western-hating regimes that are used to make war on western regimes by terrorizing western civilians. There will be little need for surveillance programs and wiretapping if such regimes are annihilated. The destruction of regimes that support terrorists would be the greatest assurance of our civil liberties.

For those who forget the nature of our enemy, the people who abducted UMass grad Jill Carroll are the same people who some individuals claim should be protected under international law and be excused from rendition. Whenever I see innocent civilians on terrorist videos, I think about if I was the one being abducted. All of us should put ourselves in the shoes of an innocent captive, and then decide whether America's foremost priority should be trying to understand the "root causes" of terrorism or trying to kill terrorists and destroy the regimes that support them.

Blindly supporting this administration's counterterrorism policies does no good to anyone. However, constantly pointing out what is wrong with American foreign policy is just as mindless.

Why would Saddam, of the secular Baathist regime, finance terrorism and have relations with theocratic regimes and terrorist networks? Because regimes that support terror just for power, and those who lust for power will use any means to gain that power. Terrorism in the name of Islam is as baseless as overt homosexual bigotry in the name of Christianity.

All too many members of the Democratic Party are willing to attempt to undermine reasonable homeland security policies; George W. Bush's surveillance programs do not materially differ from such past programs carried on by both Democratic and Republican administrations.

The question should be whether Saddam Hussein ruled Iraq legally for 20 some-odd years.

When all but two senators authorized the President to use all necessary force to combat terrorism, those that voted in favor of this resolution and are now claiming they weren't aware of the extent to which the wiretapping was being implemented, are being completely delusional. For if they assumed "all necessary force," the wording included in the resolution, did not include the authority to spy on suspected Al Qaeda agents in the U.S., what else could they have possibly been thinking when passing this resolution?

Scholar Lee Harris said it best concerning America's enemies: "It is your enemy, and not you, who decides what is a matter of life and death."

Greg Collins is a Collegian columnist

Alito not indifferent on abortion

Amy Grzybinski

On Jan. 31, Judge Samuel Alito was confirmed by the Senate as the replacement for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor on the U.S. Supreme Court. The confirmation vote, which came following a defeated Democratic filibuster, was largely along party lines. The final tally was 58-42. All of the Senate's Republicans but one voted for him. All but four Democrats voted against.

What could Alito's confirmation mean for the future of reproductive justice in our country? Pro-choice advocates and others that have voiced opposition to Alito cited his statement in a 1985 job application to the Justice Department under President Reagan, where he said that the Constitution does not provide a basis for the right to an abortion.

He later went on to write, "I am particularly proud of my contributions in recent cases in which the government has argued in the Supreme Court ... that the Constitution does not protect the right to an abortion." In another written statement around the same time, he offered a strategy for how the Administration should tackle abortion-related laws.

> Pro-choice advocates and others that have voiced opposition to Alito cited his statement in a 1985 job application to the Justice Department under President Reagan, where he said that the Constitution does not provide a basis for the right to an abortion.

"There may be an opportunity to nudge the [Supreme] court ... to provide greater recognition of the states' interest in protecting the unborn throughout pregnancy," Alito wrote, also stating that he preferred his method over a direct assault on Roe vs. Wade, since it made their anti-choice position clear while also seeming to leave the question open to debate.

When Alito was questioned about his views on abortion during the confirmation hearings that took place in January, however, he claimed that the previous statements were made "... at a prior period of time when I was performing a different role." He also stated that he would be sure to "keep an open mind" when faced with a decision on the issue in the future.

But if these statements were meant to convince Americans that Alito would continue to provide a moderate conservative voice as O'Connor did — when making decisions regarding a woman's right to choose, then why was his confirmation hailed by anti-choice groups such as the American Life League, who stated that Alito's confirmation "... offers pro-life Americans reason for hope and optimism about the future?"

Consider Alito's past decisions regarding abortion laws. In Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1991), Alito disagreed with the majority opinion of the Pennsylvania legislature that the state law requiring women to notify their spouse before an abortion was unconstitutional. Think about the implications of this decision. What happens to a woman in an abusive relationship?

In Planned Parenthood of Central New Jersey v. Farmer (2000), Alito agreed with the majority that a law banning "partial-birth" abortion was unconstitutional, but later opined that he voted to strike the law down simply because, as an appellate judge, he was obligated to follow precedent set by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Does this mean Alito will uphold precedent, and will not strive to overturn Roe, a decision which asserted that a woman retains the right to decide what she does with her own body? Suppose he doesn't make the decision to actually reverse Roe, but instead continues to chip away at the accessibility of abortion. The right may stand, but each decision that strips away access to abortion eventually makes the right a hollow one.

With the outcry against "activist judges" in the past few years, shouldn't we be reassured that Alito will keep his personal views separate from his judicial decisions?

We should be. However, Alito has shown in the past that he has an agenda, and his future decisions will be sure to change the face of the Supreme Court and the constitutional framework that has previously protected reproductive rights in our country.

Amy Grzybinski is a UMass student

Muslim medieval mentality

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

From the other side of the Atlantic, the issue of the Danish Mohammed caricatures seems almost a satire of itself. A series of tasteless newspaper cartoons spark off an international crisis involving the withdrawal of ambassadors, billions of dollars lost in boycotts, a questioning of the impartiality of Nordic countries in international conflict mediation and investigations by the Arab League and the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights. It all seems so ridiculous, except that the issues are very real.

Pluralism, secularism and the right to free speech are fundamental values of western democracy. These are essentially inalienable rights forged in the mold of hard-fought centuries and should not be compromised lightly. When individuals, or sectors, of society systematically self-censor Constitutionally-protected speech, it is tantamount to a violation of these principles.

In this sense, The Jyllands-Posten and the various papers that have reprinted the cartoons have done nothing more than highlight a serious challenge to these freedoms as they are currently understood. Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen has been proper in apologizing for the poorly conceived cartoons while refusing to express regret for "allowing" the paper to publish religious parody.

The outrage and violence of Muslims in the Middle East, North Africa and Indonesia highlights the gap that exists between secular western values and those of their communities. The now former editor of France Soir was correct in pointing out that the inability of some Muslims to accept such satire, while it remains a time-honored tradition in European society, is indicative of something akin to a medieval mentality.

Also, it is important to note, however, that European Muslims have thus far comported themselves quite democratically — issuing political grievances and engaging in peaceful demonstrations. Leaders of these communities have been joined by Christian and Jewish groups in condemning the publication of the cartoons as nothing more than a provocation intended to stir up trouble.

It is important to make the distinction between European Muslim communities and those elsewhere, for those in Europe are by and large committed to the democratic systems in which they reside. This is a fact well noted by British author Salman Rushdie, who has declared on numerous occasions that if anyone in Europe was serious about the Fatwa declared against him by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, he would already be dead.

The current incident began because Danish author Kare Bluitgen apparently could not find an illustrator for a children's book on the life of Mohammed, and so approached Jyllands-Posten cultural editor Flemming Rose to help demonstrate the depth of Danish self-censorship. We must ask ourselves what sort of book Bluitgen sought to publish that he couldn't find any illustrator for and finally ended up with the cartoons in question? Certainly, this is not the sort of stereotypical intolerance that the Danes would like to see disseminated amongst their preschools.

> Would these caricatures have been published about a minister, a priest or a rabbi? How about the Dali Lama? It is more likely that they would never have been conceived about figures from other religious backgrounds, and even less likely that they would have been published.

Another pertinent question regards the anti-Muslim prejudice growing in western European populations and evidenced by the rise of folk parties on the extreme right in countries from France and Belgium to Denmark and Sweden. Even Her Majesty Queen Margrethe II of Denmark, apparently ignorant of the respectful position of Islam held by the church which she heads, threw herself into the populist fray and advocated intolerance last April.

Would these caricatures have been published about a minister, a priest or a rabbi? How about the Dali Lama? It is more likely that they would never have been conceived about figures from other religious backgrounds, and even less likely that they would have been published. This seems to indicate the xenophobic undertones of the pieces.

In some European countries, Chinese immigration equals, or even exceeds, immigration from North Africa and the Middle East, yet there is nary a mention of anti-Chinese xenophobia. This phenomenon is far more indicative of the failure of host countries to accommodate immigration than of the immigrants to accept the values of their new neighbors.

Liberalism demands that free speech never be limited for political reasons. In practice, however, democratic systems have had to impose certain limitations in the name of other fundamental values or in defense of state security. As Kaj Wilhelmsen discovered in August, Article 77 of the Danish Constitution did not afford him the right to issue broadcasts that constituted an incitement to violence. Yet clearly, The Jyllands-Posten cartoons are a far different case, and one that must legally be tolerated.

This does not mean that publication of the Mohammed caricatures was right. Danish Vice Prime Minister Bendt Brendtsen put it well: "What Jyllands-Posten did is totally legal. I've got nothing against freedom of speech — it is important for us all — but if it can offend and hurt a lot of people, why use freedom of speech for that? This is about respecting other people's cultures."

What is abundantly clear is that if the goal of Bluitgen and The Jyllands-Posten was to provoke a thoughtful, democratic debate on the issue, they have failed miserably.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a UMass alumnus.

Stern's choice is satellite radio

Kevin Dooley

The concept of ordinary people paying for television 26 years ago, a service that had always been for free, seemed just as likely as democracy flourishing in the Middle East today. Nowadays, when you say you have cable television, no one raises an eyebrow, and you are the majority instead of the minority. Even the news that the Boston Red Sox would no longer be broadcasting any games on free TV went unnoticed by most.

Just as cable television revolutionized the way we watch television and the obesity crisis in this country, a new revolution in broadcast media is taking root in radio, satellite radio.

Satellite radio began to become a household name when the most successful and entertaining radio talk show host of all time, Howard Stern, announced in late 2004 that he was making the move from regulated FCC-mandated radio to Sirius satellite radio, when his contract expired with Viacom at the end of 2005. Stern has said on many occasions that he was fed up with the regulations and rules which the FCC had placed on the content of what he could say on his own show for the better part of 20 years.

Now that Stern has been freed from terrestrial radio, and broadcasting on the unregulated airwaves of satellite radio for a month now, sales in Sirius radio have climbed to almost 1.3 million subscribers. Just one year ago they were at a mere half-million. Many more subscribers are expected to join when the receivers become more portable and the cost declines. In addition, Sirius radio is beginning to overtake its closest competitor in satellite radio, XM radio.

Just like you have to pay money out of your own pocket for cable television, if you want to listen to satellite radio you have to put up money for the receiver. The cost will depend on if you decide to purchase a portable radio, or a home and car-radio, in addition to a monthly fee of $12.95. But let me tell you, for roughly 43 cents a day, you will experience radio like you never have before.

Not only does Sirius radio provide two 24-hour stations devoted just to Howard Stern, (which may be a little too much, I'll even admit), you get over 60 commercial-free music stations as well, which cater to almost any musical taste a person can possibly have.

For those of you who are hoping God is a big sports fan when you leave this world, you can purchase the "Sportster" Sirius receiver, where you will be able to enjoy any NFL, NBA or NHL game of your choosing. Sorry baseball fans, XM radio has the rights to broadcast all MLB games for the time being.

However, the whole point of satellite radio is not so you can listen to a bunch of stoppers retelling their favorite lesbian experiences or to hear the f-bomb on radio or to listen to sports all day.

When you purchase a satellite radio you are making a statement to the U.S. government hell-bent on determining what we see, hear and what we can and can't say.

The FCC (Federal Communications Commission) decided a long time ago that it has the authority to regulate the content of what we hear on radio and see on television. They claim they have the power to do this because those radio and television stations are owned by "we the people." Do you know anyone who owns a radio station?

You may all remember the infamous "nipplegate" controversy, where over 140 million people watching the Superbowl two years ago got the privilege of seeing Janet Jackson's left nipple. After that, Janet Jackson is now becoming the top agenda of the government and the morning right wingers. As a result, decency laws were tightened on broadcasters like they never have been in our memory, with fines on Stern's show totaling over a half-million dollars.

There is even speculation that a law will be trying to be pushed through Congress that will make subscription radio subject to the rules of decency and obscenity, which applies to AM and FM radio have to adhere to. In Canada, Sirius and other radio personalities on Sirius are under the microscope of Canada's version of the FCC for decency and obscenity violations. Not surprisingly, Stern has already forecast that he does not want make it in Canada.

If satellite radio is able to be scrutinized and regulated by the FCC, it will be the death sentence to the First Amendment of the Constitution. Imagine the government telling you what you can and can't hear even though you are paying for the service and can decide whether or not to purchase the product or not. The founders of this country would be rolling in their graves if they think when the Constitution was being drafted, the idea of having a standing army and the power of the federal government to levy taxes on its citizens was unfathomable to many.

I believe Stern's departure from terrestrial to satellite radio will be the catalyst for the ever-growing decline of influence public radio in this country. It's time people wake up and remember that the power of the government rests in its citizens. For 43 cents a day, you can do just that.

Kevin Dooley is a UMass student.

check out our new website www.dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 2006 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Hopkins finds 'Fastest' role more subtle, more private

By Nancy Mills
New York Daily News

HOLLYWOOD — In "The World's Fastest Indian," Anthony Hopkins breaks speed records. But you'll get a serious case of road rage if you get behind him on the Interstate.

"I'm one of the slowest drivers on the road," says Hopkins. "I mosey along. If you're doing anything too fast, including living life too fast, that creates sudden death. If I have to be somewhere on time, I make sure I leave early enough."

Slow and steady is Hopkins' current mantra. And it has yielded him one Oscar (for 1991's "The Silence of the Lambs"), a happy third marriage to antiques dealer Stella Arroyave and, at 68, a still-thriving career.

"The World's Fastest Indian," based on the life of New Zealander Burt Munro, offered Hopkins a change of pace from his signature Hannibal Lecter role. This time, he was simply a speed maniac. He didn't have to eat anybody.

Munro's dream was to make his 1920 classic Indian Twin Scout the fastest motorcycle in the world. So in the late 1960s, he signed on as a ship's cook to get to the United States, and the Bonneville Salt Flats in Utah. He just wanted to clock his time and maybe break 200 mph.

"Burt and I share the same philosophy," says Hopkins. "Our feet are very much planted on the ground.

"I've given up the intensity," he adds, referring to his youthful bad moods and temper tantrums. "Now I belong to the Clint Eastwood school of just getting on with it and having fun. I want to go on till 90. I practice being a bit more serene, although," he adds with a nervous laugh, "I haven't become a vegetable."

Hardly. During filming, Hopkins reached 70 mph on the bike, but he left most of the racing to stunt men.

"Anthony is as committed to his acting as Burt was to his bike," says "Indian" director Roger Donaldson, who made a documentary about Munro before he died in 1978. "When someone finds a real passion in their work, you can feel it."

Hopkins credits a mellower mood. "Marriage has helped me a lot," he says. "I'm very happy. Stella has encouraged me to have a life beyond acting. I write music, and I recently had an art show in San Antonio. I sold 100 paintings in six days, small landscapes in acrylic ink.

"I realize I don't have to act all the time, so I space it out and don't do big, strenuous stuff."

Nevertheless, he has three films opening this year: "Beowulf" with Angelina Jolie, "All the King's Men" with Sean Penn and "Bobby" with Emilio Estevez. In March, he will film "Fracture" opposite Ryan Gosling, playing "not such a nice guy," he says mysteriously.

As for reprising Hannibal, Hopkins has no plans to give Lecter another meal. "Count me out," he says firmly. "Enough is enough."

Anthony Hopkins, star of the new "The World's Fastest Indian," plays a new, more subtle role than what he is used to.

Martin clues to his new Inspector

By Daniel Fienberg
Knight Ridder Newspapers

LOS ANGELES — Steve Martin met Peter Sellers in 1980, shortly before the British comic died of a heart attack. Martin was promoting his first starring feature, "The Jerk," while Sellers was on the trail for "The Fiendish Plot of Dr. Fu Manchu," his last release.

"I was coming off the sort of slaughter years of my standup career, that I had stopped in 1980, and I had just done 'The Jerk' and it was not out," Martin recalls. "And I was in Hawaii on a luau ... and he came up to me, he was a God to me, and he said to me, 'I know you're under a lot of criticism right now, but I know what you're doing.' And that was kind of breathtaking. I felt like a little mantle, a torch was passed."

More than 25 years later, the torch is passed again, as Martin puts his own spin on Inspector Clouseau, one of Sellers' most famous characters, in Sony's "The Pink Panther." With a fresh plot involving a murder, a pop star (Beyonce Knowles) and a missing diamond, "The Pink Panther" isn't a remake, but Martin has a difficult time defining it.

"The studio at first, this is when we were at MGM, insisted that it be called a re-imagining," Martin says. "What does that mean? So, it's not officially a remake, because a remake to me is when you use the same script or the same story. So, I dunno what to call it? A play? I don't know. Who cares anyway? It's the 'Pink Panther' movie."

Certain aspects of Martin's Clouseau will still draw obvious comparisons to Sellers' creation, from his comical moustache to the convoluted French accent.

"It would have been harder to imitate Peter Sellers," Martin says. "I realized that Peter Sellers knew the character inside and out. And I figured, he could probably ad lib all day as that character. And I thought, 'That is a sign to me that I have it,' when you can ad lib all day as the character."

When Martin entered the project and he did a heavy rewrite on the script by Len Blum ("Stripes"), adjusting the ratio of physical and verbal gags.

"I wanted to go back to broad comedy and here was a ready-made broad comedy," Martin explains. "What I love about these kinds of comedies and our comedy in particular is that it went from very physical to what I'd call 'tiny, tiny verbal jokes.' It's all over the place always coming at you. Big, small, smart, dumb."

When Sony bought MGM and rescheduled the "Pink Panther" last summer, tongues began wagging about the film's quality, but Martin looks forward to proving the naysayers wrong.

"When the movie is delayed, in the Internet's mind there is only one reason — because it's lousy," Martin notes. "And I hope that when people see the film, first I hope they love it ... and I hope we get a couple apologies."

Beyoncé Knowles and Steve Martin answer questions from the press over their newly released version of the Pink Panther.

Old slasher to find new audience

By Daniel Fienberg
Knight Ridder Newspapers

LOS ANGELES — When it was released in 1974, Bob Clark's "Black Christmas" became a cult sensation and its plot line — a twisted psychopath methodically slaughters the nubile residents of a sorority house — helped established the framework for the legion of mostly inferior slasher flicks that followed.

The genre is set to go full circle this winter when the Dimension and 2929 Productions unleash a new "Black Christmas."

"It is different," promises "Final Destination 3" director James Wong, who worked on the "Black Christmas" script with helmer Glen Morgan. "There's the basic elements of 'Black Christmas,' which is Bob Clark's movie. I don't know if I want to give too much away. There's stuff that is much darker in terms of who the killer is and how he got to be who he is and who he actually is."

Meeting with reporters to talk about more immediately upcoming films, several members of the new "Black Christmas" cast were a bit more willing to delve into details, though they also left a healthy measure of ambiguity.

"It basically centers around four sorority girls and it's an ensemble, so I'm one of the girls who's being stalked by this crazed killer," says "Final Destination 3" star Mary Elizabeth Winstead, suggesting at least one strong tie between the two films. "I don't know if anyone's seen the original, but it's sort of a prequel and a sequel kind of combined. The first big chunk of the movie follows Billy's back story as child. There's a lot of twists in it, so it has a lot of surprises. It's definitely different than the original, but it's sort of based on the original."

The other members of the probably doomed sisterhood seem to be Michelle Trachtenberg ("Buffy the Vampire Slayer"), Lacey Chabert ("Party of Five") and Katie Cassidy ("Click"). Promoting her brief role in "When a Stranger Calls" (a remake of the 1979 thriller that was, coincidentally, conceived as a "Black Christmas" sequel), Cassidy offers a few spoilers about both her character and her fate.

"I decided she was probably there on scholarship or something, she's like the girl next door," Cassidy says. "She's sweet. I'll actually tell you that I do live in the film, which is exciting."

Cassidy adds that the first 20 pages of the new script concentrate on the presumptive killer's origins, which involve murder, forced confinement and a distinct absence of Yule-time spirit.

"I just remember when I was reading, that seriously scared the crap out of me," Cassidy says of the opening scenes. "I was at home reading it at night by myself and normally I'm fine doing that and I had to put it down, because I was like, 'I'm gonna freak out.'"

"Black Christmas" is aiming for a Dec. 25 release. "When a Stranger Calls" is now in theaters and "Final Destination 3" opens Friday.

New Hollywood book details deaths

By Jina Hassan
Daily Northwestern

EVANSTON, Ill. — If movies could curse the faces they immortalize, 1955's "Rebel Without a Cause" would be shockingly notorious. One can attribute four premature deaths to the film: James Dean, who died in a car accident at age 24; Nick Adams, who overdosed at 36; Natalie Wood, who fell off her boat and drowned at 43; and Sal Mineo, who was stabbed to death by an unknown assailant at 37.

"Cut!: Hollywood Murders, Accidents, and Other Tragedies" discloses these and other stories relating to Hollywood murders, calamities and other deadly misfortunes in a visually rich and provocative anthology. A 2006 pop culture compendium of 250 celebrity obituaries by eight film historians, "Cut!" is a testament to our culture's lust for Hollywood horror — the bloodier the better.

Cataloging the untimely deaths of actors, singers and other entertainers from the silent film era to the present, "Cut!" features notable silver-screen figures like Rudolph Valentino and Jean Harlow as well as recent stars like River Pheonix and Christopher Reeve.

The book is easy to read and rich with colored photographs. One-page celebrity obituaries are alphabetized and categorized into chapters according to cause of death: illness, murder, alcohol and drug abuse, suicide and freak accidents. While these divisions provide a thematic framework when browsing entries, the index is best when searching for specific celebrities. Readers can also gather some of the most interesting facts from the book's illustrated introduction and various photo captions.

An addictively readable coffee-table showpiece or bathroom companion, "Cut!" is a much classier alternative to Us Weekly: While it entertains readers with salacious rumors, it also pays tribute to their abbreviated careers. Perhaps in maintaining a respectful tone toward their subject, the authors come across slightly stiff, a point nonetheless qualified by the book's rich detail and interesting sidebars.

On a cautionary note, "Cut!" is best read in small chunks because of its morbid subject matter — an objective downer for the winter-trodden college student.

ABC throws new act for anchors

By Aaron Barnhart
Knight Ridder Newspapers

The attack that injured ABC "World News Tonight" co-anchor Bob Woodruff and his photographer, Doug Vogt, in Iraq brought media glare on the 44-year-old Woodruff as never before.

His face was splashed on newspaper covers, and wire services updated editors frequently on his and Vogt's medical progress. Cable news aired live coverage of their transfer from Germany to the United States.

For many Americans, this was their introduction to Woodruff, a productive but not exactly famous ABC correspondent who was promoted to co-anchor alongside Elizabeth Vargas in December. They succeeded Peter Jennings, who died of lung cancer last fall.

What surprised many observers was that an evening news anchor would be on a treacherous road outside Baghdad, shooting a news story. It sounded, frankly, like something Woodruff would be doing had he not gotten the "World News Tonight" assignment.

But road duty has become part of the job description for network news anchors. With the promotion of Woodruff, ABC was simply raising the ante.

In the month before he was wounded, he had already read the news from Israel twice, as well as the Palestinian territories, Iraq, Iran and Google headquarters in California. His co-anchor, Vargas, has also been to Iraq, though it seems she's in New York more often than Woodruff.

In an appearance before TV critics the previous week, ABC News president David Westin said Woodruff and Vargas should be thought of, not just as anchors, but "anchor-reporters." Westin called this a fundamental change at ABC, having "the anchor as [both] anchor and reporter out in the field."

Woodruff even suggested that Jennings would have approved.

"Peter said to me when he was alive, 'You know, this is a difficult job because I'm not able to get out and report the stories in the field the way that I love to do them,'" Woodruff said. "'Now, not only because of technology but because of having another anchor that can be back in New York ... you're going to see a lot more of this.'"

Whether Jennings would have been delighted to do so much reporting while continuing to manage a news program, we can only speculate. But on the other matter, there is no doubt. This is a major shift in the way ABC does the news. And if it works, there will doubtless be more peripatetic anchor-reporters assigned to circle the globe, putting themselves in harm's way with far greater frequency.

The same transformation has already taken place at "Nightline," which since Ted Koppel's retirement has turned from a staid discussion of a single topic into a hurly-burly of reports. Three anchor-reporters, Martin Bashir, Terry Moran and Cynthia McFadden, jockey for the 22 minutes of airtime that Koppel used to have all to himself.

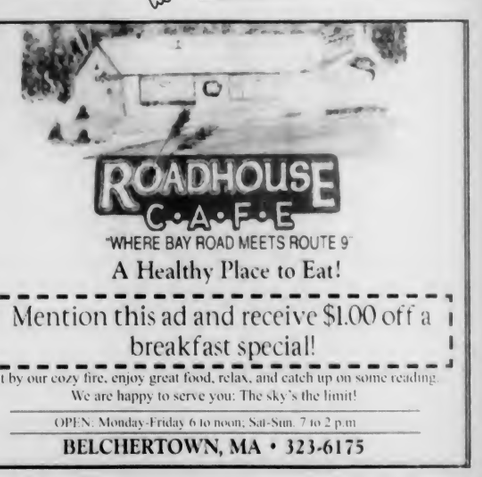
Over at NBC, Brian Williams has stepped up his pace as well. In recent months he has anchored the "NBC Nightly News" in front of the White House, in Detroit, Los Angeles, Oklahoma City, even the Billy Graham Crusade. He has visited New Orleans and the Gulf Coast repeatedly to survey hurricane damage and rebuilding efforts. He has joked, half ruefully, that his teenaged children know him only as that man who stays with them between trips to the airport.

What all these machinations have in common is a shift away from the authoritative single anchor, projecting authority and wisdom from his command post in New York.

These changes have not gone unnoticed at CBS, where the company's chairman, Leslie Moonves, is said to be wooing "Today" show host Katie Couric. Moonves has already said he'd be willing to try multiple anchors on the "CBS Evening News" and has declared flatly he won't hire another old-fashioned, "voice of God" anchor again.

While all these anchor changes are under way, more attention should be paid to the travesty behind the scenes: an almost criminal depletion of network news operations through cost-cutting and layoffs.

According to the Project for Excellence in Journalism, foreign bureaus have been cut in half at all three networks since the 1980s. The average network has 44 correspondents, seven fewer than in 1996, despite the wake-up call of 9-11.



CINEMARK
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
30 Russell St. 413-587-4223
Schedule for Friday 2/10/06
thru Thursday 2/16/06
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Final Destination 3(R) 1:00 4:30 7:40 10:10*
Firewall(PG13) 1:20 4:20 7:10 10:00*
The Pink Panther (PG) 1:30 4:35 7:05 9:20*
Curious George(PG) 1:00 4:10 6:30 8:40*
Munich(R) 1:10 4:40 8:15
Capote(R) 1:10 7:20
When A Stranger Calls (PG-13) 1:35 4:25 7:30 9:45*
Something New(PG13) 1:00 4:35 7:25 9:50*
Big Momma's House 2 (PG-13) 1:55 4:55 7:55 10:15*
Annapolis(PG13) 4:05 9:55
Nanny Mc Phee(PG) 1:20 4:20 6:45 9:10
Underworld: Evolution (R) 10:10
The Nine Worlds(PG-13) 1:00 6:50
Hoodwinked(PG) 1:40 4:10 6:55
Brokeback Mountain (R) 1:00 4:00 7:00 10:05
Senior Show 2/16 Capote @ 10am
Friday Night Rewind Mar 3rd Fast Times at Ridgemont High @Midnight
* NO PASSES NO SUPERSAVERS
Check showtimes and other at cinemark.com

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA
BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK
Don't Get Left Behind!
BOOK TODAY!
STS STUDENT TRAVEL SERVICES
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Address: @www.SunraiseInc.com
Screen Printed T's
*White T's ONLY
24 minimum
1 Color, 1 side
Standard Ink
Max Size 10x13
Screen $20
$5
Your Design or Logo!
*Exp. 2.28.06
Apparel Unlimited
SCREEN PRINTERS
322 Russell Street
Hadley, MA 01035
322 Russell St
Hadley, MA 01035
413-586-7133
www.SunraiseInc.com

UMass rides momentum to BU

HOCKEY from page 8

Garden against Boston College on Monday night.

BU is strong from the net out and John Curry is having his second straight phenomenal year between the pipes. He boasts a .923 save percentage, 2.28 goals against average and is the proud owner of two shutouts.

The biggest reason Jack Parker and his team have been so successful since the turn of the New Year hinges on how well the team's top line of Kenny Roche, Bryan Ewing and Peter MacArthur is playing.

"Roche, in particular, is playing as well as he has ever played since he's been there," said Cahoon, a former BU player and member of Parker's coaching staff. "I see Ewing making the big jump, and MacArthur has always been a good player. Ewing and Roche have just grown into their roles, and MacArthur has been a terrific player to begin with. That line will hear a lot of attention, but they have depth that we'll have to pay attention to as well."

Part of that depth includes BU's freshman line of Hockey East Rookie of the Year candidate Brandon Yip, Chris Higgins and Jason Lawrence. The trio combined for two goals and three assists during Monday's 5-3 win over Harvard in the Beanpot semifinal.

Jon Quick, who made 47 saves in net in the win against BC, will get the nod tonight due to Gabe Winer's one-game suspension for receiving a game disqualification stemming from a fight in the third period of Saturday's win at Lowell.

"He is beaming down," Cahoon said of Quick. "I'm sure he is excited about the prospects of playing [tonight], but at the same time he knows he has to have that narrow focus to be ready and be physically and mentally prepared to play at the top level."

KAREN WINOKUR/COLLEGIAN

UMass' Kevin Jarman had his first assist of the season against Colorado College and added an assist against Boston College on Feb. 2.

When the Minutemen shift to Rhode Island tomorrow night, they will square off with the most surprising team in Hockey East this season. The Friars currently reside in third place, three points behind BU and seven behind BC.

Leading the way for PC is senior Torry Gajda, a Westfield, Mass. native who Cahoon once recruited. Gajda leads the team with 13 goals and 31 points and is second with 18 assists, a year after he only knocked home six goals and dished out seven helpers.

"He is having one of those classic senior years where he has improved his scoring and his overall play to such an extent that everyone has taken note," Cahoon said. "He has obviously adjusted well to the coaching change and his new role as a senior leader. It's just all come together for him.

"We recruited Torry five years ago, and he ended up choosing Providence" Cahoon added.

"Through his first two or three years, he was a good player but was just another good player in the league. Now, he has done what we thought he could do and separated himself a little bit from the pack."

The Minutemen were swept in a home-and-home series with Providence back in November, and Cahoon was particularly frustrated following the 3-2 loss at the Mullins Center on Nov. 5. He is optimistic, however, because both he and his players know what they have to do to come out of this weekend as successful as they did last weekend.

"I think we understand ourselves a whole lot better," he said. "We know both sides of our performance level. We've seen ourselves when we're tentative and when we haven't given the attention to detail that we need to, and it isn't pretty. I think we've also seen when the attention to detail is in place and we're totally prepared to compete. We can go toe-to-toe with the best teams in the country."

Woes at point position

LOWE from page 8

KAREN WINOKUR/COLLEGIAN

Lowe hobbled on his tender ankle against the La Salle Explorers on Wednesday night. UMass coach Travis Ford called it a "gritty performance."

to see time at the point this season.

Thomas struggled in three starts at point guard in early January, and therefore Ford will explore all of his options in the next three days.

"We don't have a point guard if Chris isn't playing," Ford said. "It's going to be by committee. Brandon probably has the edge, but James Life can bring it up. Jeff Viggiano can bring it up and we've even talked about Lawrence Carrier bringing it up. We're going to experiment in the next couple of days."

For Lowe, or whoever is his replacement at the point, to be successful, UMass will need to execute better offensively.

"To watch our offense is not a pretty sight at all right now," Ford said. "Whether it's the point guard or anybody at this point — after [Wednesday] night's performance, you really just want to go home and puke."

VIDEO BOARDS ON THE WAY

There has been much speculation about when the new video boards would be installed in the Mullins Center. Yesterday, the old boards were in the process of being taken down, clearing the way to put up the new scoreboards.

The boards will be ready for next Friday night's hockey game when UMass hosts Vermont. The next home men's basketball game is not until Feb. 22 against Charlotte.

The women's basketball team will play St. Bonaventure at home on Sunday, but the new video boards will not be in use for that game. The auxiliary boards that were recently added midway up the arena on each side of the court will be used for that game.

When the new video boards are up and running, the auxiliary boards will still be used, as they will always display the time and score, while the video boards will feature

Trip to Boston University for UM

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams will head to Boston on Friday and Saturday for the Boston University Valentine Invitational.

Both meets will host dozens of collegiate teams from all across the country.

At the women's competition last year, held on Feb. 13, 2005, the Minutewomen had a few stellar performances, mainly by sophomore Kristen Bakanowski and junior Katelyn O'Toole.

Bakanowski performed well in the pole-vault (a sign of things to come), tying the UMass record for the second time during her freshman year.

O'Toole set a season best in the high jump of five feet, 2.25 inches. This is a mark she later surpassed when she cleared five feet and three inches at the Atlantic-10 Championships about a week later.

This year head coach Julie LaFreniere looks forward to more of the same.

She said that she expects stellar performances for several athletes who have excelled lately, including Bakanowski, freshman shot-putter Jordan Veney, freshman Dionise Miranda and senior Elisabeth Budd. However, they aren't the only girls that LaFreniere expects to contribute.

"I am hoping for great performances from everybody. We're using this meet to sharpen up for [the Atlantic-10 Championships] which are the following weekend," LaFreniere said. "And what they do on Friday will determine what [events] we decide to put them in at A-10's."

She said that this Friday's meet will be "a good test" for her team and a chance for it to fine-tune their performances in time for the A-10 Championships.

"We're going to get a final look at all of the athletes and hopefully people are going to step up to the competition that we have," LaFreniere said.

As for the men's team, sophomore Ryan Logan and seniors James Godinho and Jon Konhonen all performed to their expectations at last year's Valentine Invitational.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien doesn't expect this year's meet to be any different, despite the grind of the season.

"Right now I think we just have some normal aches and pains that you get during a season," O'Brien said. "[There is] nothing of outrageous significance."

O'Brien, like LaFreniere, is expecting his team to perform well and is using this meet to prep his team for the following weekend's A-10 Championships.

"I'm expecting a great performance by everybody this Saturday," O'Brien said. "I thought that [the Rhode Island Invitational] was a real big step up for us after our few initial meets from the time we returned back from winter season.

"I think it marked the start of an upward trend that actually carried across the whole team and I expect them to continue in the next month," he added.

O'Brien later mentioned the significance and quality of this annual meet.

"The meet itself will probably be the largest, in terms of the number of schools and the number of athletes [competing], that will, probably, actually attend, you know, this indoor season," O'Brien said.

"Not only do we get to meet good competition," he added. "But we get to see a lot of schools and uniforms that you would not normally expect us to compete with."

Michaels moves to Sunday night

BY RONALD BLUM
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Al Michaels was traded from ABC to NBC for a cartoon bunny, four rounds of golf and Olympic highlights.

The rights to Oswald the Lucky Rabbit, a bunny created by Walt Disney in the 1920s before he invented Mickey Mouse, were transferred from NBC Universal to The Walt Disney Co. as part of the agreement to release the broadcaster from his contract with ABC and ESPN.

"As the forerunner to Mickey Mouse and an important part of Walt Disney's creative legacy, the fun and mischievous Oswald is back where he belongs, at the home of his creator and among the stable of beloved characters created by Walt himself," Disney president Robert Iger said after Thursday's announcement.

Michaels had been with ABC for three decades and had been the play-by-play announcer for "Monday Night Football" for the past 20 years.

"Oswald is definitely worth more than a fourth-round draft choice," Michaels said, referring to what the Kansas City Chiefs gave the New York Jets as compensation for releasing coach Herm Edwards from his contract.

"I'm going to be a trivia answer someday."

A four-time Emmy Award winner, Michaels agreed last July to stay with ABC/ESPN as the Monday game switched to the cable network next fall, but he asked to back out and instead will broadcast Sunday night NFL games on NBC with John Madden, his partner on ABC during the past four seasons.

As part of the deal, NBC sold ESPN cable rights to Friday coverage of the next four Ryder Cups through 2014, granted ESPN increased usage of Olympic highlights through 2012 and other NBC properties through 2011, and agreed to promote ESPN's NFL games through 2011.

NBC Sports chairman Dick Ebersol said ABC Sports and ESPN president George Bodenheimer called last month to initiate talks, which culminated in an agreement Tuesday.

"He told me this incredible story that Walt's first really big production as a cartoonist for the cinema had been a character called Oswald the Lucky Rabbit, which was before Mickey," Ebersol said. "And for reasons that aren't still totally clear to me, Walt lost those rights. He didn't have the money to hold onto them."

Disney and his partner, Ub Iwerks, created the rabbit in 1927 at the request of Carl Laemmle, the founder of Universal Pictures, and made 26 silent cartoons. After Disney learned that Universal held the rights, he created a new character, eventually named Mickey Mouse, who resembled Oswald, but with shorter ears.

Universal continued to make Oswald films from 1929-38 — Mickey Rooney was one of his voices — and appeared in a comic book from 1943-62.

"We earn nothing from those rights; they've had no value in the United States," Ebersol said.

The Walt Disney Co. had been trying to reacquire the rabbit for some time.

"When Bob was named CEO, he told me he wanted to bring Oswald back to Disney, and I appreciate that he is a man of his word," Walt Disney's daughter Diane Disney Miller said in a statement. "Having Oswald around again is going to be a lot of fun."

Michaels, 61, began to think about hopping networks during the past season, realizing he wanted to work with Madden, producer Fred Gaudelli and director Drew Esocoff, who also are moving from ABC to NBC.

"As the weeks went on, I began to realize more and more how much I was going to miss being with those people," he said. "That's my family, that's my broadcasting family, and they're moving out of the house, and I wanted to move back in with them."

Cris Collinsworth, who had been set to be NBC's play-by-play broadcaster, will instead be a studio analyst.

Michaels wanted to finish the current NBA season as ABC/ESPN's lead announcer. He is being replaced by Mike Breen.

Michaels' first television broadcast was on NBC, when Buffalo played Minnesota in October 1971. He'll get a chance to work with his brother, who a producer of NBC's Olympic coverage.

"Life comes full circle," Michaels said.

Gretzsky mired in gambling talk

BY ANGELA DELLI SANTI
ASSOCIATED PRESS

TRENTON, N.J. — Wayne Gretzky was recorded on a wiretap talking to the alleged financier of a gambling ring, discussing how his wife could avoid being implicated, a person with knowledge of the investigation told The Associated Press on Thursday.

Gretzky, coach and part-owner of the Phoenix Coyotes, can be heard on wiretaps made within the past month talking about his wife with assistant coach Rick Tocchet, the person said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the investigation was ongoing.

Gretzky's wife, actress Janet Jones, allegedly bet at least $100,000 on football games over the course of the investigation by state authorities, the person said.

There is no evidence that Gretzky placed any bets, according to the person.

Authorities say from Dec. 29 through Feb. 5 — the day of the Super Bowl — bettors placed a total of $1.7 million in wagers with the ring run by a New Jersey state trooper, Tocchet and a South Jersey man. All face charges of promoting gambling, money laundering and conspiracy and are scheduled to be arraigned in Superior Court in Mount Holly on Feb. 21, the state Attorney General's office said Thursday.

Jones has not been charged.

Investigators say about a half-dozen current NHL players placed bets with the ring and are looking into whether anyone involved in the five-year-old operation, which authorities say had a connection to organized crime in Philadelphia and southern New Jersey, wagered on NHL games. Gretzky is not the main focus of the probe, the person said.

The Star-Ledger of Newark, citing unidentified law enforcement sources, first reported of a wiretap involving Gretzky in Thursday's newspapers. The newspaper also reported that Jones bet $500,000 during the investigation, including $75,000 on the Super Bowl.

Earlier in the week, Gretzky denied any involvement in the ring.

"My love for her (Jones) is deeper than anything. The reality is, I'm not involved, I wasn't involved and I'm not going to be involved. Am I concerned for both of them? Sure there's concern from me. I'm more worried about them than me. I'm like you guys, I'm trying to figure it all out," Gretzky said Tuesday.

Gretzky did not attend the Coyotes practice in Phoenix on Thursday. He would not be available until after Thursday night's game against the Dallas Stars in Phoenix and the team would not comment, said Coyotes spokesman Rob Naim.

Lawyers involved in the case said details of the three-month investigation should not be made public.

"I have never been involved in a case where the prosecution has engaged in such inappropriate conduct in terms of making investigators available to the press, appearing on nationally syndicated television," said Kevin Marino, a lawyer for Tocchet, who was granted an indefinite leave from the NHL Wednesday. "It's improper, it's unwarranted and I will not tolerate it."

"We are not going to try this case in the press and we're not going to let them either," he said.

Attorneys for all three men, charged in what authorities have dubbed "Operation Slapshot," said they will fight the charges.

"This case will not be a guilty plea," said Charles A. Peruto Jr., who is representing James Ulmer. Ulmer, along with Trooper James Harney, is accused of taking wagers and cuts of the bets.

The allegations have sent shock waves through the hockey world.

State investigators said they will interview more hockey players who were believed to have placed bets, in part to determine whether there was any gambling on hockey. So far, authorities say, they do not have evidence that there was.

The NHL has hired Robert Cleary, a former federal prosecutor who handled the Unabomber case, to investigate.

Cleary said Thursday that he was not sure how long his work might take, in part because he wants to stay out of the way of law enforcement agents who are continuing to investigate.

Hockey players are prohibited from making NHL wagers, legal or otherwise. There are no rules that forbid them from placing legal bets on other sports.

With the NHL launching its own investigation into the alleged gambling ring, the National Hockey League Players' Association has been telling its members that their collective bargaining agreement gives them the right to counsel the players union during interviews, the association said in a statement released Thursday.

"In addition, the NHLPA has recommended that players investigated in connection with criminal proceedings retain counsel so that their legal rights are fully protected," the statement reads.

Asked about the scandal Thursday, Gov. Jon S. Corzine expressed confidence in law enforcement.

The New Jersey State Police is also investigating itself in the case.

"I'm convinced that the state police are doing a thorough investigation of their own affairs," Gov. Jon S. Corzine said at a news conference Thursday.

OPEN TUESDAY, VALENTINE'S DAY 4PM-10PM
Goten
OF JAPAN STEAKHOUSE
FAMOUS FOR CAPTIVATING CUISINE PREPARED AT YOUR TABLE
RT. 116, SUNDERLAND 413-665-3628

Artist Lecture
Thursday
Feb. 16, 2006
4:30 pm
Stirn Auditorium
Reception to follow in museum
Free and open to the public
Duane Michals:
Photography and Reality
20 January – 16 April 2006

STOCKBRIDGE SCHOOL
JOB FAIR 2005
Tuesday, February 14th
10:00 a.m. - 1:00 p.m.
Campus Center Auditorium
UMass Amherst
More than 90 companies will be hiring for positions in crop production, horticulture, landscape design & construction, park management, tree care and turfgrass management
ALL students are welcome!
Bring your resume!
413.545.2222 • www.umass.edu/stockbridge

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN By Rainy Stanford

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

LABRAT By Richard Martelly

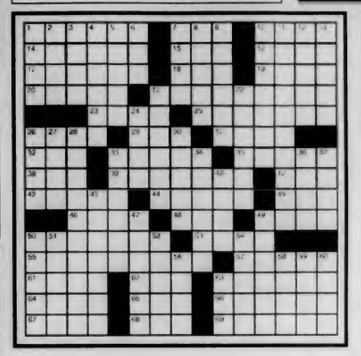
THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Dreams come true, not free."

—Stephen Sondheim



ACROSS
1 Philatelist's collection
7 Lawyers' org.
10 Picnic pests
14 Radio antenna
15 Deteriorate
16 Slight
17 Mommy's mommy
18 Oneself
19 Tylenol's target
20 Implant
21 Rocket platform
23 Going price
25 Educates
26 Showy flower
29 Cereal grain
31 English noble
32 Nerd or hunn
33 Thrash out
35 Catholic honoree
38 Kind of service or gloss
39 Bravery
41 AAA service
42 Put in office
44 Go in
45 "Much About Nothing"
46 Henhouse
48 Boozer
49 Smallest bills
50 Got hold of
53 Exploited
55 Move from here to there
57 Workshop implements
61 Rips off
62 Org. of Player and Woods
63 Celeb magazine
64 At rest
65 Better ingredient
66 Injury showing discoloration
67 Outer banana
68 Kind of whiskey
69 Word after buddy or solar

DOWN
1 Wise person
2 Period in office
3 Part of U.A.R.
4 Colliers
5 Bamboo-eating animal
6 Foxy
7 Geographical region
8 False
9 Immediately if not sooner
10 Two-handed jar
11 Three-flavored ice cream
12 Court case
13 E-mails
21 Alliance
22 Pursuer
24 Matador's adversary
26 Cay or key
27 Horizontal barrier
28 Without flaws
30 Rotates
33 Tragedians
34 Lunch al fresco?
36 Pronuberance
37 "Terrible" years
40 Catches on to
43 Guidance
47 Granular seasoning
49 Hateful
50 Take off
51 Undermine
52 Small pooch
54 ___ so often
56 Latest popular thing
58 Barbecue stick
59 Besides
60 Appear to be
63 "Masterpiece Theatre" network

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

9	2			6				5
	4	5						3
	3	8		7		9
	8				7			1
5				3				7
4			2				5
		4		5		1	8
7						6	3
8				4			7	2

Sudoku brought to you by andiamo 256 • FOOD
www.andiamo.cc

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
You need to accept the fact that you are not a good story teller.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Spend the weekend organizing your Rolodex.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
You will find a date for Valentine's Day this weekend.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Dolphins might be smart, but they are also very mean.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
You will see a wild bear two months from today.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
You should seriously think about plastic surgery.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
If you watch any more TV, your head will explode.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
You should probably get that plane ticket for spring break.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
You are falling apart at the seams. Get better soon, Humpty Dumpty.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You will eat way too much chocolate in the coming week.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
You have a serious disease. You just don't know what it is yet.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
It is a crime to pay more than a five dollar cover charge anywhere.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

TANNING SPECIAL! 25% off all purchases including packages & tanning products! Go to Beach Club Tanning on Monday Feb. 13th and ask for the "Hockey Special" Every purchase helps send the women's ice hockey team to the National Tournament in Missouri!

Full Scholarships plus $5,000 cash yearly College for free and career after graduation ARMY ROTC www.umass.edu/armyrotc

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

CHILDCARE

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part-time Spring – full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email: fjmooney@msn.com

EMPLOYMENT

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288 / email: fjmooney@msn.com

EMPLOYMENT

Summer Camp Counselor on Campus Interviews For Premier Girls Camp in the Berkshires Positions available for talented, energetic, and fun loving students as counselors in all Team Sports, all Individual Sports such as Tennis & Golf, Waterfront & Pool Activities, and Specialty Activities including Art, Dance, Theatre, Gymnastics, Newspaper, Rocketry, Radio and more. GREAT SALARIES, room, board and travel. Camp runs June 17th – August 12th.

Rent us your Ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837

Become a Summer Orientation Counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/student_jobs/Orientation_position/ The application deadline is February 15th.

Needed NVIVO tutor. Call 253-0691

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 800-766-7174

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience nec. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

MISCELLANEOUS

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.ATHENASHN.com/Goddess/910

SERVICES

Legal questions? We have answers at the Student Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center or Call 545-1995.

Pregnant? Consider adoption. Free confidential counseling to help you make fully informed decisions for your baby and you. Choose your baby's parents, meet and stay in touch. Stable, loving two parent families waiting to adopt. Call 24/7 Brightside 1-877-777-7774 License# 1465107

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1988 Hottest Destinations - Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $150 www.sunsplashtours.com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $459! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Reach over 10,000 readers daily!
Collegian Advertising
(located in the Campus Center Basement)
(413) 545-3500
8:30am – 3:30pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 2006 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen look ahead

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team (11-15-0, 8-11-0 Hockey East) is coming off one of its most illustrious weekends in the history of the program, but UMass coach Don Cahoon wants to make sure his team understands exactly that: the wins over Boston College and UMass Lowell are in the past.

"We have to keep our feet on the ground and know how this can go week to week," Cahoon said. "All it takes is a bad weekend to put you back on your heels again. We need to be able to stay grounded and try to find a way to get something out of this weekend and try to build towards next week."

Cahoon won't deny the fact that last weekend was important on a countless amount of levels. He knows the four points his team picked up by knocking off BC and UML will help their playoff chances a month from now. But more significantly, the upset of Boston College in front of a raucous 7,132 Mullins Center fans and an entire NESN audience will go a long way to helping the program even further down the road.

Defenseman Marvin Degon scored his ninth goal against UMass-Lowell on Jan. 27. He tallied an assist in UM's triumph over BC on Feb. 2.

"The visibility is obvious," Cahoon said. "The feedback we get from alumni and people in the hockey world is immeasurable. You can't put a figure on it, but it's incredible to the growth and development [of the program]. It helps you in the recruiting circle and the fundraising circle. It creates a fan base. I'm sure all 7,000 people that were here will come back to watch another UMass hockey game."

On more of a current spectrum, though, the Minutemen have another important slate of games on their menu this weekend, beginning tonight with No. 6 Boston University (16-8-2, 13-6-1 HEA) at Agganis Arena and then concluding tomorrow against No. 14 Providence College (14-10-2, 11-6-2 HEA) at Schneider Arena. Both games start at 7 p.m.

It is another tough weekend for the Maroon and White, and even though everyone in the locker room should be playing with an air of confidence, Cahoon understands that it isn't always confidence they need to bring into games in order to have success.

"You can say you have confidence or don't have confidence, but it's really paying attention to what is most important and that is preparation," Cahoon said. "If we prepare ourselves properly, then we'll play with a level of confidence that people will see."

The Terriers are the hottest team in the nation, posting wins in nine straight games and in 10 of their last 11, and they will be playing for their 27th Beanpot championship at the TD Banknorth

See HOCKEY on page 6

Lowe unlikely to play Sunday

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team (10-10, 5-5 Atlantic 10) got a reminder of just how important Chris Lowe is in Wednesday's 65-44 loss to La Salle (14-7, 6-4 Atlantic 10). The freshman point guard played 30 minutes, but was hobbled by a sprained right ankle that he suffered earlier in the day in the team shoot-around.

Lowe scored just two points and handed out only three assists, and the UMass offense looked out of sorts all night, connecting on just 12 of 51 field goal attempts.

While the team struggled without Lowe at full strength against a decent La Salle team, it's downright frightening to think of what could happen on Sunday if Lowe is not healthy when UMass faces a far stronger Florida State squad in Tallahassee.

The Seminoles (13-6, 4-5 Atlantic Coast Conference) are coming off of a 97-96 overtime loss at No. 2 Duke on Saturday. Sunday's tip-off is scheduled for 5:30 p.m. and the game will be televised nationally by the Fox Sports Network.

Lowe, who was noticeably limping yesterday prior to practice, will not participate in practice before Sunday's game and, as was the case Wednesday, his availability will be a game-time decision.

"Whether he plays on Sunday will be determined on Sunday," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "If he can go through shoot-around I'll probably play him, but if he can't go through shoot-around, it's not a game that I want to try to make it worse."

Junior Brandon Thomas will have to take over some of the point guard duties from an injured Chris Lowe on Sunday.

Whether Lowe plays is one thing, how effective he will be if he does is an entirely different issue. After the La Salle game, Lowe said that he only felt about 40 to 50 percent. With Sunday's game meaningless to the team's A-10 standings, it would not come as a huge surprise if Lowe does not suit up, as the conference stretch run begins on Wednesday at No. 8 George Washington.

If Lowe, who is fourth in the A-10 in assists with 4.5 per game, can't go on Sunday, Ford doesn't have many options to replace him. He will most likely turn first to junior Brandon Thomas, as he is the only other scholarship player on the roster

See LOWE on page 6

UM successful at home

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

After having a week off, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (8-14 5-6 Atlantic 10) will be back in action as they take on Fordham (7-14 2-8 A-10) at 2 p.m. on Sunday at the Mullins Center.

UMass has turned its season around after losing its first five Atlantic 10 conference games back in January. Since then, the Minutewomen have won five of their last six games, and have established themselves as a force to be reckoned with in the A-10.

Much of their recent success can be attributed to the home crowd. The Minutewomen are a much better team at home than on the road. Just look at their records.

UMass has been solid at home as of late, winning its last three home games, including a stunning upset over No. 25 George Washington on January 22. The Minutewomen are 5-4 at home on the season. Compare that to their dismal 2-10 road record, and it's no wonder why they would rather play in the Mullins Center

"We're playing really good at home," Nelson said after the win over Saint Joseph's last Sunday. "The home crowd does a great job of making noise for us and supporting us. It's nice to have them there. It's just nice to be at home. We have more trouble on the road. When you're on the road, you're not as relaxed. It's just nice to be able to come home."

UMass is coming off of back-to-back wins, and will look for its third-straight on Sunday afternoon against a struggling Fordham team. The Rams are coming off of five consecutive losses and are in the basement of the A-10 standings.

Luckily for the Minutewomen, the Rams are not too good on the road themselves. Fordham has a 3-8 record when not playing at Rose Hill Gym, and have lost their last three road games.

Sophomore Kaylie Schiavetta lines up a free throw for the Minutewomen. She had an assist against Rhode Island on Feb. 2 and added three points and a rebound against Temple on Jan. 29.

While the Rams are ranked as the worst offensive scoring team in the A-10, they still have two players in the top-20 in scoring in the conference. Junior Lisa Carrol leads her team in scoring is seventh in the A-10 with 14.7 points per game.

Senior Jada Jefferson is second on her team in scoring and is 15th in the A-10 with 12.7 points per game. Jefferson is also quite a presence on the boards as she ranks third in the conference with 8.8 rebounds per game.

The Minutewomen have worked hard to be where they are at this point of the season, and as a result, they too have multiple players in the conference leader boards.

Sophomores Pam Rosario and Kate Mills are also in the top-20 in scoring. Rosario leads the Minutewomen with 12.9 points per game and ranks 13th in the A-10, while Mills is 18th with 12 points per contest.

UMass is currently in eighth place in the A-10, and will look to keep the momentum going as the regular season comes to an end. The Minutewomen have made it crystal clear that they are no longer playing for just an A-10 playoff berth, but are battling for a higher seed and a chance to get a first-round bye.

And with three of their last five games at the Mullins Center, UMass coach Marnie Dacko knows that there is nothing better than a little home cooking.

"There's no question we like being at home," Dacko said last week. "The band has been terrific. The fans have been great. We've got to get more and more people to our games to make it a sixth man. This team likes playing at home, so it's nice being at home."

UMass to face top teams

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

In every sport, there are always dominating programs. They are the teams that are constantly expected to play for a championship, hang with the best of the best and never fall short of perfection. In the world of college softball, two programs — UCLA and California — typify this concept.

This weekend, at the Campbell Carrier Tournament in San Diego, the Massachusetts softball team will play its first five contests of the 2006 season — two of those games will be against UCLA and Cal.

Since UMass coach Elaine Sortino has built one of the most powerful softball programs in the East Coast, every season it is her obligation to take her team to the West Coast, and take on the elite.

"This is our opportunity to see the teams that are going to make the tournament," Sortino said. "We have choices to make trips to other places, but it would make no sense in terms of what kind of program we are and what kind of caliber team we need to play."

The Minutewomen will jump-start their season today in San Diego, and will continue play all weekend — they will face UC Santa Barbara at 12 p.m. today then Sacramento State at 2 p.m., No. 2 UCLA at 10 a.m. tomorrow, San Diego State at 2 p.m. tomorrow and No. 8/7 Cal Sunday at 12 p.m.

UMass fell short in last season's NCAA tournament, losing to No. 4 Texas 1-0 on May 20 and then getting knocked out by Texas A&M-Corpus Christi 6-2 the following day.

This season, the team is anchored by two seniors — pitcher Jenna Busa, who had an unprecedented late-season surge in 2005, and UMass homerun queen K.J. Kelley, who catches Busa's strikeouts on the defensive end.

Busa finished her 2005 campaign with a 1.96 ERA, a 17-6 record, 137 strikeouts and she tacked on some offensive stats as well with three homeruns and seven RBIs in 25 at-bats.

Kelley had her best season yet as a junior, knocking 14 pitches out of the park, tallying 43 RBIs and recording an Atlantic 10-high .382 batting average. She was also named as an Easton Sports All-American, first-team and was honored as an A-10 All-Conference and All-Tournament player.

The Minutewomen are balanced when it comes to age, with four seniors, five juniors, three sophomores and six freshmen on the roster. One of those freshmen, Brandice Balschmiter, will be the No. 2 pitcher and will most-likely be the successor to Busa.

With the core of Sortino's squad remaining, and an above-average freshman class, another Atlantic 10 Championship and NCAA berth is almost a lock for the Minutewomen.

Although the Minutewomen's practices have been limited due to the snow and cold weather, Sortino is confident that they are prepared, regardless of where they have been forced to practice.

"They're ready to play," Sortino said. "Obviously they haven't taken a ground ball in the dirt, but it doesn't matter."

The Minutewomen's first home game will not occur until March 29 against Dartmouth, which means the team will be traveling around the country, playing top-tier programs until then. This weekend is just the start of that type of competition.

"We've got really tough competition," Sortino said. "All of those teams are ranked regionally in their regions, so it's going to be a tough trip."

UCLA

The Bruins truly are the mother ship of college softball. With 11 national championships under its belt, this program has won more games than any in the country.

"They're a really balanced offense, they have some small kids that can run, but they also have some great power," Sortino said.

After falling to Michigan in extra innings in the third game of the NCAA Championship Series last season, the Bruins are making their case as a returnee to this season's championship games.

"They have all of their kids back, they have a great sophomore on the mound in Angelica Seldon," Sortino said. "She's more than a polished pitcher; she's probably going to be on the National Team and then the Olympics in 2008, and if not, then in 2012."

Cal

Ranked No. 2 in last season's World Series, the Golden Bears will be the second-toughest challenge that the Minutewomen will be faced with this weekend. Senior slugger Lindsay James held her own last season with an overall batting average of .439, and leads a primarily young squad. Defensively for the Golden Bears, senior Kristina Thorson owns the circle. Thorson was a second-team All-American last season with a 1.09 ERA and a 23-5 record, and led her team to the World Series.

UC Santa Barbara

In 2004, the Gauchos received their first NCAA tournament bid ever. After ending their 2005 season without a place in the Big Dance, the Gauchos will lean on their veteran core to make it back this season. The Minutewomen will have to, first and foremost, get something going against the Gaucho's starting junior pitcher Jennifer Davis, whose 2.09 ERA last season earned her All-Big West Second Team honors.

Sacramento State

It was 1995 when the Hornets last made an appearance at the NCAA tournament, but they have been on the brink of an at-large berth the past two seasons and have the tools to get the job done in 2006. Spearheaded by Lindy Winkler, who held a .369 batting average last season, the Hornets are returning 14 players, including 11 upperclassmen. Senior pitcher Nikki Cinque will look to build on her 1.52 ERA and 90 strikeouts from the 2005 season.

San Diego State

Senior Celena Velasquez is possibly the best pitcher in the history of the Aztec program. An all-time leader in 16 school records, Velasquez finished last season with 1.19 ERA and was named to the all-Mountain West Conference team for the third straight time. The team is filled with underclassmen, however, and sports eight freshmen and seven sophomores.

"Every team is going to be well rehearsed physically, and all of these teams are well-coached," Sortino said. "It's going to come down to our ability to really master the game, to always have a plan and to always know what we're doing and why we're doing it."

Boston College Carnival next on agenda

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

About this time last winter, the Hawkins siblings were leading the Massachusetts ski teams towards a regional championship. The brother-sister duo led UMass down the home stretch of the winter carnival season, winning race after race en route to an Eastern College Ski Conference championship.

That run began last year at the Boston College Carnival, where both squads took second overall in the slalom and giant slalom events.

Sophomore Eliza Hawkins swept the event last year as a freshman, placing first in both the slalom and giant slalom, while her brother junior Rush Hawkins won the slalom and event and tied for second in the giant slalom with sophomore teammate Jason Small.

One year later, the Maroon and White will return to Ascutney for the Boston College Carnival Saturday for a two-day event. On Saturday, the skiers will compete in the slalom, followed by the giant slalom on Sunday.

The Minutemen and women are once again in prime position to make a run at the ECSC Championship.

Both the men and women are in the top three of the conference standings, as UMass has been the only school so far to produce a top-3 team in both the men's and women's divisions.

The men are currently third in the ECSC behind second place Plymouth State and conference leader Colby-Sawyer, in what is a very tight race this late in the season. The women maintain their hold on second place in the ECSC, just one point from a tie for first with Boston College.

Last weekend was a rough for UMass, as members of both the men's and women's team suffered a leg injury. Rush Hawkins fell Saturday, snapping both his skis in half and badly bruising his shin. He did not race on Sunday.

"Rush pulled himself out on Sunday and I trusted his decision. He's been doing this for a long time," coach Justin Rouleau said.

Rush said earlier in the week that, barring any setbacks, he plans to rejoin the team on the slopes this weekend at Ascutney.

Senior Caitlin Doughty suffered a much more severe injury Sunday. Following her best collegiate performance Saturday with a fifth place finish in the Brown Carnival Giant Slalom, Doughty fell Sunday in the UConn Carnival slalom, badly injuring her left knee.

Doughty was taken to a local hospital and later released with what was said to be "ligament damage." An MRI earlier this week showed what may be a partially to fully torn anterior cruciate ligament (ACL.) Such a severe injury would be career-ending for the senior skier.

"The initial news was not good, but we'll be having some more tests done, and hopefully we will find some more positive news," Rouleau said of Doughty's injury.

Doughty is likely done for the season, though it is yet to be seen if she will be able to ski competitively again.

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Monday, February 13, 2006 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 76

Extreme sledding
Several students from the engineering department at UMass attempted to glide down a hill in a shopping cart-turned-sled, complete with decorative flames, at the Central Residential Area during yesterday's snowstorm. For more on the storm's impact, turn to page 3.

Carroll's kidnappers set new deadline

By Diana Elias
Associated Press

Jill Carroll's kidnappers recently set new demands.

KUWAIT CITY — The Iraqi kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll have set a Feb. 26 deadline for their demands to be met or they will kill her, the owner of Kuwait's Al-Rai television said Friday.

People close to the kidnappers told the private TV channel earlier Friday that Carroll is "in a safe house owned by one of the kidnappers in downtown Baghdad with a group of women," Jassem Boudai told The Associated Press.

Carroll, who was kidnapped in Baghdad on Jan. 7, appeared in a video broadcast Thursday by Al-Rai in which she pleaded with the authorities to do whatever her abductors demanded, saying "there is a very short time."

"Please just do whatever they want, give them whatever they want as quickly as possible," she said, adding she was speaking on Feb. 2.

Her kidnappers, who call themselves the Revenge Brigades, have demanded the release of all Iraqi women held in U.S. military and Iraqi jails.

Boudai said Al-Rai had received a message from "sources close to the kidnappers." He said the message was not conveyed in a videotape, but "another method." He declined to how it was received and whether the message was delivered to Al-Rai's head office in Kuwait or its bureau in Baghdad — where Thursday's video of Carroll was received.

"Sources close to the kidnappers informed Al-Rai TV that the kidnappers have set a Feb. 26 deadline for their demands to be met or they will execute her according to Shariah," he said, referring to Islamic law.

He said the kidnappers have "more specific demands than releasing all women from jail," but he refused to disclose these demands.

He said the sources told Al-Rai that Carroll was in good psychological condition and was doing housework with the other women in the place where she was being held.

According to the sources, the kidnappers denied they killed Carroll's translator when they abducted her at gunpoint, as has previously been reported.

Carroll is a freelance reporter for The Christian Science Monitor.

Late last month, the U.S. military freed five Iraqi women detainees, but American officials insisted the release was not linked to the demand by Carroll's abductors.

The U.S. military was believed to be holding about six more Iraqi women. It was unclear how many women were held by Iraqi authorities.

Some 250 foreigners have been taken captive since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, and at least 39 have been killed.

Jill Carroll rally time change:

The Daily Collegian will hold a rally in support of Collegian alumna and journalist Jill Carroll, who is currently held captive in Iraq.

Where: Lawn next to DuBois Library at UMass
When: Thursday at 12:00 p.m.

We apologize for the time change and any confusion it may have caused. UMass is hoping for Jill's safe return.

The million-dollar question
UMass student appears on TV's "Millionaire"

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — At 48 years old, Mary Robison, a mother and graduate student at the University of Massachusetts, never understood why so many people take illegal drugs.

That is, until now.

Robison, who has nearly completed her dissertation for a PhD in anthropology, is a contestant on the syndicated game show "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?" which airs today. She described her experience on the show as "euphoric."

"You had to scrape me off the ceiling because I was so high," Robison said. "I was so happy."

After being out of a job for several months and hearing an opportunity to become a contestant on the show, Robison realized she had nothing to lose.

"I thought 'What's the worst that could happen? I'd make a fool out of myself?' Well, I've done that before," she joked.

Robison got involved in the show by completing a timed, 30-question, multiple-choice exam with over 200 other people. The group was allowed to sit through the taping of two episodes, when the names of those who passed the test were announced.

UMass graduate student Mary Robison displays her T-shirt that she received after being a contestant on "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?"

After Robison's name was called, she was interviewed immediately afterwards by "Millionaire." Within weeks, she was picked to be a contestant on the show.

Robison was driving in her car when she got a call on her cell phone by someone from the show. "When I got the call, I thought I was going to drive off the road," she said. "I literally had to pull over."

Due to restrictions created by the show's executives, Robison was not allowed to tell anyone — even her own son — how much money she was awarded on "Millionaire" before it aired.

"I'll just say I'm very happy," she said.

The show was taped on Nov. 8. It was originally supposed to air on Feb. 6, but the date got changed to today, which made Robison only the more apprehensive.

"I thought, 'If I have to keep the secret another week, I'm gonna explode!'" she said. "This past week was the hardest to keep the secret. I got so used to saying 'I can't tell you,' but now I want to talk."

Another part of Robison's agreement with "Millionaire" is

See MILLIONAIRE on page 3

UMass receives large arts grant; hopes to grow 'creative economy'

By S.J. Port
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John Lombardi, UMass alumnus State Senator Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) and affiliates of the Massachusetts Cultural Council gathered in the lobby of the Fine Arts Center on Friday morning to celebrate the release of more than $100,000 in grants for three cultural development projects in the Pioneer Valley.

The grants are part of $1.35 million that the MCC is investing statewide to "stimulate the state's burgeoning creative economy," according to their press release. The money has been allocated to 34 projects across the Commonwealth. The three programs in the Pioneer Valley chosen to receive support from the MCC are the Museums10 collective, the Somali Women's Project and the Easthampton City Arts Development Project. In total, the three programs will receive $112,475 in grants.

Lombardi opened the celebration by saying, "Anytime you can get money for the arts there's major cause for celebration. The arts are there to lift our spirits and expand our vision."

Lombardi went on to say that at UMass, "we take our arts very seriously," adding that the University is, "proud to be part of [the Museums10], which shows the kind of strength among artistic institutions."

The Museums10 collective received half, or $50,000, of the grant money for GoDutch!, its region-wide Summer 2006 exhibition. Established in 2005, Museums10 is a cooperation between seven college and university museums and three neighboring museums in the Pioneer Valley, including the University Gallery. GoDutch! will be a themed series of events and exhibitions focusing on Dutch art, culture, and horti-

See ARTS on page 3

Cheney accidentally shoots friend in hunting accident

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Vice President Dick Cheney accidentally shot and injured a man during a weekend quail hunting trip in Texas, his spokeswoman said Sunday.

Harry Whittington, 78, was "alert and doing fine" after Cheney sprayed him with shotgun pellets on Saturday while the two were hunting at the Armstrong Ranch in south Texas, said property owner Katharine Armstrong.

Armstrong said Whittington was mostly injured on his right side, with the pellets hitting his cheek, neck and chest, and was taken to the hospital by ambulance.

Whittington was in stable condition Sunday, said Yvonne Wheeler, spokeswoman for the Christus Spohn Health System.

Cheney's spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride, said the vice president was with Whittington, a lawyer from Austin, Texas, and his wife at the hospital on Sunday afternoon.

Armstrong said she was watching from a car while Cheney, Whittington and another hunter got out of the vehicle to shoot at a covey of quail late afternoon on Saturday.

Whittington shot a bird and went to look for it in the tall grass, while Cheney and the third hunter walked to another spot and found a second covey.

Vice President Dick Cheney holds a rifle with members of the National Rifle Association last year.

Whittington "came up from behind the vice president and the other hunter and didn't signal them or indicate to them or announce himself," Armstrong told the Associated Press in an interview.

"The vice president didn't see him," she continued. "The covey flushed and the vice president picked out a bird and was following it and shot. And by god, Harry was in the line of fire and got peppered pretty good."

The shooting was first reported by the Corpus Christi Caller-Times.

She said Whittington was bleeding but not very seriously injured, and Cheney was very apologetic.

"It broke the skin," she said. "It knocked him silly. But he was fine. He was talking. His eyes were open. It didn't get in his eyes or anything like that."

She said emergency personnel traveling with Cheney tended to Whittington, holding his face and cleaning up the blood.

"Fortunately, the vice president has got a lot of medical people around him and so they were right there and probably more cautious than we would have been," she said. "The vice president has got an ambulance on call, so the ambulance came."

Associate Vice Chancellor seat filled in face of diversity issues

By Eva Piccozzi
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts recently announced that Byron S. Bullock will serve as the associate vice chancellor for student affairs and campus life.

Bullock, under the supervision of Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano, will oversee the new Center for Student Development (CSD), which coordinates programs and services aimed at promoting community and multiculturalism across campus.

After a 2004 incident that involved student leaders posing in front of a cartoon of a Ku Klux Klan figure, students across campus grew concerned about the quality of student life in areas of diversity. The Center for Student Development was established as part of the Commission on Campus Diversity, a four-month assessment that featured recommendations for student development and an emphasis on understanding and

See BULLOCK on page 3

ARTS & LIVING
STRIPPED
'Mrs. Henderson Presents' viewers with nudity, glamour and not much more.
Page 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
SICK OF TUITION AND FEE INCREASES?
Collegian editor rants about fifth raise in five years.
Page 4

WEATHER
TODAY Mostly Sunny, 1135°
TONIGHT Scattered Flurries, 119°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, 1138°, 1.26°

SPORTS
ROAD WOES CONTINUE
UMass fell 73-63 last night at Florida State.
Page 10

We believe in sandy feet,
beach bonfires and
lifelong memories.
We believe in vacations.*

Enter our vacation
sweepstakes at pwc.com/freevacation

Your life.
You can bring it with you.

*connectedthinking

PRICEWATERHOUSECOOPERS

1. No purchase necessary. 2. Sweepstakes begins 1.4.06. 3. Open to US residents, 18 & older, who are students at a participating college or university. 4. Visit pwc.com/freevacation for details and complete official rules.
© 2006 PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. All rights reserved. "PricewaterhouseCoopers" refers to PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (a Delaware limited liability partnership) or, as the context requires, other member firms of PricewaterhouseCoopers International Limited, each of which is a separate and independent entity. "connectedthinking is a trademark of PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (US). We are proud to be an Affirmative Action an Equal Opportunity Employer.

Student appears on TV's 'Millionaire' show today

MILLIONAIRE from page 1

that she could not disclose how many "lifelines" were used, or which ones, and she could not say the outcome of the episode.

There were five people on her "phone-a-friend" list, which included friends and family members, but she could not say who she called, or if she even used the option.

Robison said she wasn't expecting to become a millionaire after the show, but only "wanted enough to pay my hotel bill."

"Millionaire" does not pay travel expenses for its contestants. Robison had to take a Peter Pan bus from Springfield to New York City with her two friends. Luckily, she worked out a deal with a friend who works for Peter Pan, allowing her to pay a reduced fare. She and her friends did, however, pay for their hotel room.

Assuming the best did happen, Robison would be paid $1 million in payments over the next 20 years. If she won $500,000, then she would be paid over the next 10 years.

Without a steady income since May and with a leaky roof looming over her South Hadley house, Robison said she was thrilled for the opportunity to appear on "Millionaire." She says it's great that so many people are rooting for her, including her coworkers at Holyoke Community College where she teaches anthropology part-time.

"My coworkers are really excited. They've wished me well," she said. "And some friends are having a party for me while we watch the show on Monday."

"Who Wants to be a Millionaire" will air today at noon on WSHM-TV (CBS 3) and 1 p.m. on WTIC-TV (FOX 61).

A UMass graduate student will appear on the TV gameshow "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" today.

Bullock named to work under Gargano as Associate V.C.

BULLOCK from page 1

valuing human diversity. To accomplish the mission of the CSD, leadership from a newly created associate vice chancellor position was recommended.

Bullock was selected after a nationwide search and will assume his position at UMass on April 2. He is currently the assistant dean of student affairs at Saint Augustine's College.

According to a press release from UMass, Bullock previously served at James Madison University as associate vice president for student affairs from 1994 to 1999 and assistant to the associate vice president for student affairs from 1985 to 1994. He was an assistant director and counselor of the Upward Bound program at the University of Delaware from 1979 to 1985.

"Bynun possesses the right blend of administrative experience and analytical and creative thinking skills as well as a passion for student development that make him perfectly suited for this position," said Gargano.

At the University of Delaware, Bullock gained experience working with an undergraduate population the size of UMass. He also has extensive background working with minority campus organizations. At James Madison University he served as Director of the center for Multicultural and International Student Services and he was selected to serve as Faculty Member in Residence for the Studies Abroad Program at JMU and spent the 1993 fall semester abroad. Upon his return to campus, he was promoted to associate vice president for student affairs and founded the campus's Academy for the Academic Achievement and Development of African-American Males.

"I believe I have the ability to relate to people from all walks of life," said Bullock.

According to the Commission on Campus Diversity mission statement, the associate vice chancellor position will align student development services and programs within the division of Student Affairs and Campus Life. The CSD hopes to foster interpersonal, social and intellectual development that occurs inside and outside the classroom. One of the main objectives of the CSD is to "eliminate the pattern of balkanization that often results in a disconnection of students of color from the general campus community."

"I think the commission that I read and expectations I see in it have a positive, forward step for how we develop students over time," Bullock said.

In a recent phone interview, Bullock talked about how all universities are faced with diversity issues and that the only way to promote awareness is to connect faculty, staff and students together to create a sense of harmony and direction.

"I see myself as a bridge builder. I will work closely with students and staff to create scenarios where people can begin to understand the power of working together," he said.

The CSD initiative plans on addressing cultural programming and enrichment with the purpose of educating a campus community on the value of cultural history and significance to the world-at-large.

"Not a lot of institutions prepare their students for the reality outside of college. Students are going to at some time be exposed to diversity. Anything we can do to prepare for real life challenges is a plus," he said.

One of the Commission's major recommendations is to "establish a planning and assessment process to govern undergraduate and graduate enrollment management with particular attention paid to reversing the decline of minority students."

"There are not enough minority students on campus. We need to start by increasing diversity through outreach to local urban communities like Holyoke and Springfield," said Sean Bliss, speaker of the UMass Student Government Association.

Bullock noted that there is a national trend of a decline of minority students attending institutions of higher education.

"What we need to do at UMass is create an environment for students of different minority groups. I would be looking to assist and generate ideas in the recruitment process," said Bullock.

Some of the 40 centers that support campus constituencies criticize the CSD because they say it is an attempt for the administration to take control over student-run organizations.

Bliss argues that increasing administrators and taking away the independence of student-run organizations is not going to improve the critical issues that face UMass students.

"More direct control over the students is contrary to the history of UMass. You'll rarely see the administration being the ones to revolutionize things," said Bliss.

Eastern Mass. gets brunt of snowstorm

By Brandie M. Jefferson
Associated Press

BOSTON — A blizzard: weather to avoid or something to look forward to year after year in New England? The answer depends on who you ask.

Cindie Fitzgerald, director of guest services at Wachusett Ski Resort in central Massachusetts said Sunday's snowstorm was "what we've all been waiting for" after an unseasonably mild January.

But Dave Allison and Beth Todzia were less than thrilled as they stood inside a Dunkin' Donuts in Boston and watched the snow rip past the window. They had come to Massachusetts from southern Connecticut for an early Valentine's Day getaway, but their plans changed to "trying to figure out how to get home," Allison said.

Across southern New England Sunday, heavy snow and whipping winds had most people huddled in their homes rather than enjoying the first major winter blast of the season. Church services were canceled, flights delayed and parking bans were in effect across the region.

Rhode Island Gov. Don Carcieri declared a state of emergency as blizzard conditions settled across the area. Connecticut Gov. M. Jodi Rell ordered officials to open the state emergency operations center at the State Armory in Hartford to coordinate state and local efforts.

Boston Mayor Tom Menino canceled school for Monday and urged residents and visitors to stay off the roads — whether they traveled by foot or car. He said it was simply too dangerous with the whiteout conditions.

Gusty winds created snow drifts of more than three feet in some areas and low visibility meant tricky conditions to navigate.

Logan Airport reported zero visibility at times but remained open, along with T.F. Green in Warwick, R.I. Delta Airlines, however, canceled all flights to and from both airports, and other airlines were experiencing delays and cancellations.

In Boston, commuter and subway trains operated on a normal schedule, but many buses used different routes to avoid hills and narrow roads.

The National Weather Service reported more than 21 inches of snow in the Hartford, Conn. area. More than a foot fell in Springfield, and the Providence area saw at least 7 inches by late morning. Boston recorded about 13.5 inches by Sunday evening.

Outer Cape Cod and Nantucket were getting a mix of sleet and snow with winds up to 60 mph.

In the coastal town of Chatham, there was minor flooding around high tide. The docks were underwater and water lapped into the parking lot at the Chatham Fish Pier. Most of the town's commercial fishing fleet had taken refuge in protected harbors.

Roads along the Cape were mostly empty throughout the height of the storm, with the exception of plows. Stores also were closed.

Lombardi hopes new grant will inspire more arts at UM culture that will run from March through August, aimed at "drawing increased cultural tourism to the Pioneer Valley region," according to the MCC's press release.

ARTS from page 1

The Somali Women's Project received $40, 475 in MCC grants to formally begin an effort in which the Somali women will participate in a partnership with UMass's New WORLD Theater to create theater based storytelling pieces. Two performances from the group will be presented in late 2006. According to an MCC press release, the project is aimed at "creating income opportunities for Springfield's Somali refugee community by enabling the women through business, crafts and language training to develop sustainable craft and service-based cottage industries." The project as a whole will be documented by filmmaker Julie Akeret, and, according to a press release from the Somali Woman's Project, the film will, "be a key component in the project's dissemination as a model of arts-based economic development."

The Easthampton City Arts Development Project in Easthampton links Easthampton artists and cultural organizations with entertainment venues, and provides technical assistance to arts related small businesses. Launched in 2005 by the MCC, the project received $22,000 more in new MCC grants on Friday.

"Art is about very lofty things, but we're also a practical society," said Sen. Rosenberg. "These grants are a very significant example of what is going on. We are helping artists become more effective businesspeople, taking art and integrating it into products people want to buy."

Rosenberg also made note that this part of the Commonwealth is "getting our share of the money from this group."

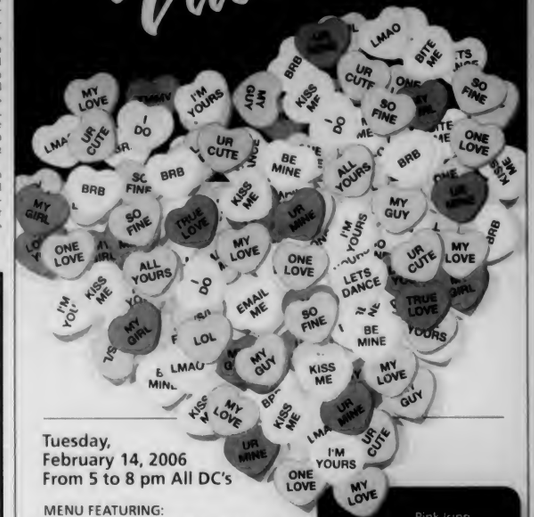
Executive Director of MCC Mary Kelley shared Rosenberg's enthusiasm saying, "It's great to be bringing good news to this part of the state." Kelley thanked the Massachusetts Legislature for their support, and complimented Lombardi, saying, "It's so nice to have a Chancellor who gets it."

Hampshire College alumnus Dan Hunter, Executive Director of Massachusetts Advocates for the Arts, Sciences and Humanities (MAASH), an affiliate program of MCC, said that the grants and programs they fund "build on a legacy of innovation started here in the valley by institutions like UMass Amherst." The grants, according to Hunter, will "nurture innovation through collaboration while welcoming and capitalizing on diversity."

Following remarks from Lombardi, Kelley, Hunter and Rosenberg, grant recipient program members gathered for pictures with oversized checks endorsed by the MCC.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael Busack
Managing Editor Eric Athas
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Katie Huston
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egerian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Ian Jones
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Kristen LaCasse
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Asst. Arts & Living Alex Butler
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Belliveau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Corsiri
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Sports Rob Greenfield
Assistant Editorial Tucker Merrick



The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently owned, operating on a self-supporting business. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1904 and the Daily Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967, the Collegian has been recognized with 2004 and 2005 Associated Collegiate Press and New England Newspaper Association awards. Subscriptions are $150 for one semester, $300 for the academic year. Publication is Monday through Friday during the academic year except during vacations and exam periods. Publication is 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Katie Huston
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Eric Athas
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Melody Natal
PRODUCTION STAFF
Michael A. Busack, Lauren Egerian

AIO
ATLANTIC 10 SHOOTOUT
UMASS
WIN $10,000!
& A NEW PONTIAC SEDAN
Firestone
SmartEdge
NIVEA MEN
PONTIAC
One lucky registered UMass student will shoot for a NEW Pontiac Sedan! presented by: Roche Whitaker Pontiac
ALSO WIN...
- A trip to the A-10 Tourney!
- $500 Gift Card @ Circuit City!
- win an iPod at the GMAC table
FREE TO STUDENTS...
- Food & Drinks
- Cameras
- T-shirts
- Give-aways!
THURSDAY, FEB. 21 @ 6 PM
CURRY HICKS CAGE
REGISTER AT WWW.ATLANTIC10.ORG/SHOOTOUT
or visit the Intramural office for more details
Sponsored locally by: chili's
Sponsored locally by: Sharp (SNYDERS) SPALDING
STA TRAVEL

Be My Valentine

Tuesday,
February 14, 2006
From 5 to 8 pm All DC's

MENU FEATURING:
Seafood Bisque, Prime Rib, Chicken Sofia
Buffalo Portabella Mushroom,
Chocolate Cake/Raspberry Mousse

Frost Your Own Heart Shaped Cookies
Pink Icing
White Icing
Chocolate Icing
Heart Sprinkles

Enter Our Raffle Today!
1st Prize
Godiva Chocolates
Two 2nd Prizes
Assorted Chocolate Truffles
from our very own UMass Bake Shop

DRAWINGS TO BE HELD MONDAY, 2/13/06

DINING SERVICES
UMass Amherst
YCMP
www.umass.edu/diningservices

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 2006

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Outraged over tuition hikes?

Dan O'Brien

Without trying to sound arrogant, I am probably one of the most informed people on the University of Massachusetts campus. I suppose that comes with being the news editor of the largest daily college newspaper in New England. Part of my job is to monitor what our University's administration does and to get someone to report on it.

That being said, I've taken a keen interest with one particular issue as of late: increasing tuition fees for undergraduate students. If passed, the newest fee hike would become the fifth cost hike passed on to students in as many years.

As a news reporter, I try my hardest to leave my bias and opinion out of my articles. However, since this is an opinion piece, I have no problem writing this: this newest fee hike absolutely disgusts me.

What gets me even angrier is when I read quotes in the newspaper like this:

"Tuition in public universities is low when the state pays most of the expenses, and high when the state pays less of the expenses. As state funding for higher education institutions declines, tuition and fees rise," said our fine Chancellor at UMass Amherst, John Lombardi.

Let me sum up what Lombardi just said in my own words: "Due to the fact that our Republican governor doesn't want to fund this university, I have no problem forcing my students to bend over and take more and more fee increases from behind."

Let me sum up what Lombardi just said in my own words: "Due to the fact that our Republican governor doesn't want to fund this University, I have no problem forcing my students to bend over and take more and more fee increases from behind."

John, I don't care if Mitt Romney wanted to cut funding to UMass Amherst altogether. It still doesn't give you the right to justify hiking the price for low- and middle-income students.

Isn't it a coincidence that more and more students are from New York and New Jersey, and fewer and fewer are from Massachusetts? I thought UMass's main purpose was to serve as an affordable university for in-state students who otherwise couldn't afford a higher education. No?

If you didn't read the Daily Collegian article titled "A changing UMass worries students," by staff writer Anna Dolianitis, printed on Feb. 2, then you should look it up online, because it was one of the best articles we've ran all year. In it, we learn how more and more in-state students have to sacrifice their learning due to the high costs of attending this school.

"As an in-state student, my total bill has gone up $5,000 — 50 percent — since 2001-2002," from $10,822 to $15,795 in less than four years, said SGA President Pavel Payano in the article.

The facts are scary. According to a report conducted by the Undergraduate Student Charges Fact Sheet, the cost of mandatory fees for an in-state undergraduate to attend UMass has increased nearly 100 percent within the last five years.

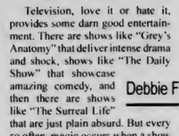
According to a recent USA Today survey, UMass Amherst is the fifth most expensive of the country's 67 public flagship schools. Without room and board, the average UMass student pays $9,278 a year.

A Boston Globe report printed in December 2005 found that the percentage of UMass students drawn from the lowest income categories recorded on financial aid documents had been reduced by half over the last five years.

So what has the University done since this information was released? Raise student fees. UMass President Jack Wilson submitted a proposal to increase tuition by another 3.4 percent on Feb. 8.

In response to this, the SGA is, thankfully, doing something right. The Senate is trying to draft a motion to implement a "fee freeze" on all five UMass campuses. The proposed freeze would prevent the UMass Board of Trustees from raising mandatory undergraduate student fees for the 2006 to 2007 academic year.

Every single in-state student on this campus should find a way to lend his or her support to the SGA to help pass this proposal. It could be as simple as writing a letter to the Collegian or signing a petition. If you are sick and tired of your parents complaining about how friggin' expensive it is to send you here, then now is the time to act.



It is clearly obvious that Lombardi doesn't give a damn about his students. His primary goal is to, essentially, privatize UMass Amherst, but without actually privatizing it. If his dreams come true, in the next decade, UMass would become the leading math and science school in the country, tuition and fees would cost students around $25,000 a year and our school would become extremely competitive.

The average student's parents' income would range above $150,000 a year, and the Office of ALANA (African American, Latino, Asian, Native American) Affairs would be non-existent. And UMass wouldn't need much funding from the state because every student would have rich parents.

If you believe that higher education should be available to all citizens, and not just those who are inherently rich, then support the SGA in fighting this latest increase. Education is a right, not a privilege.

Dan O'Brien is a Collegian editor.

State of the Union is must see TV

Debbie Friedman

Television, love it or hate it, provides some darn good entertainment. There are shows like "Grey's Anatomy" that deliver intense drama and shock, shows like "The Daily Show" that showcase amazing comedy, and then there are shows like "The Surreal Life" that are just plain absurd. But every so often, magic occurs when a show is able to envelop all of these qualities into one amazing night of TV. About two weeks ago this magic occurred in a show entitled the "State of the Union Address," starring George W. Bush.

It is always fun to sit and watch a talented actor like our president carefully recite his glossy, simplified rhetoric and smirk, either in disbelief that people are buying his bulls or in satisfaction that he is actually able to pronounce the words his speechwriter crafted.

While the spotlight is mostly on George, he is certainly not the source of all the entertainment. It's rounded up from all of the politicos in the chamber taking part in the ridiculous bipartisan mania. To see these well-groomed, upper-crust people go from sitting obediently to suddenly shooting up and erupting into cheers and jeers during the presidential speech is a sight worth seeing. That aspect brings the comedy element into my viewing experience, but for the majority of the time, I sit in shock and awe (pun intended) in reaction to the things coming out of our fine president's mouth.

First of all, when Bush looked into the camera and with a shame-on-you kind of tone said, "America is addicted to oil," I almost pulled a "W" and choked on a pretzel. Bush telling us that we are too obsessed with oil is kind of like a cocaine dealer lecturing his clients on their addiction to what he is pushing.

First of all, when Bush looked into the camera, and . . . said, "America is addicted to oil," I almost pulled a "W" and choked on a pretzel. Bush telling us that we are too obsessed with oil is kind of like a cocaine dealer lecturing his clients on their addiction to what he is pushing.

Mr. President, you are right that we are addicted to oil. In fact, some may argue we are so addicted that we might actually wage an entire war over it, but I suppose that is a little extreme. Regardless, if I were you, I would thank my lucky stars that we are addicted to oil because I know it's not the relatively, measly, presidential salary that is keeping you and the generations of Bushes to come wealthy.

I know you didn't get into Yale by your own merits, but by your dad's money that mostly came from oil. And I know your family is closer to Saudi oil royals than Siamese twins are to each other. This hypocritical statement was purely to appear concerned on the surface, but unfortunately this issue will most likely go onto the back burner along with the Bush administrations' plans to send N.A.S.A. to Mars.

By far, my favorite moment of the show was when the president pointed out the ever more present, terrifying and threatening menace to our society that is human animal hybrids. While neither I nor anyone who I have ever talked to, looked at or passed by on the street has any idea what this is, it sure sounds bad. I mean, what if a chimpanzee and a human blended together to form this idiotic, funny-looking thing that mangled the English language and made ridiculous expressions? That would be awful. I'm glad that was brought to the public's attention so we can all really be aware of the threat.

Unfortunately, the most upsetting and shocking part of the night was not anything that was said by the president, or any member of the Republican Party for that matter. It was the lackluster, passionless rebuttal that Democrat Tim Kain, the governor of Virginia, gave to the handful of crazy liberals who actually stayed tuned, waiting for some kind of solace. As my jaw opened wider with every painful minute that went by, I truly wondered what the heck the Democrats were thinking. They had a heavyweight lineup to choose from, including Hillary, Barak, Reid or Pelosi. So why Kain?

Perhaps they thought the rebuttal should be delivered by someone who could emulate the qualities of the Democratic mascot. However, Kain could not even pull off the jacka persona because he was too busy looking like a deer in headlights.

While it was not a happy ending, the State of the Union was certainly the best show I've seen in a long time. I hope television writers were paying attention so they could get some tips on how to make quality entertainment, but no matter how hard a writer tries, and no matter how much genius and creativity is out there, no one could make up anything that comes close to the ludicrousness of today's political reality.

Debbie Friedman is a Collegian columnist

Endowment over education

Each semester, it becomes clearer that UMass is becoming a private institution. A few years ago, the administration contracted out a private company (Follett) to run the Textbook Annex and the U-Store. Just last year a deal was signed with Coca-Cola over the protests of students who pointed out the atrocities the company was involved with in South America and India.

Jeff Napolitano

The reasons for allowing private business to take a piece out of the school are pretty simple: it takes effort (and sometimes more money) for the administration to maintain existing University services, and in exchange, the University (not the students) gets "kickbacks" from these companies, to the tune of hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars.

Now, with the recent addition of Chancellor Lombardi, the Board of Trustees has made a conscious decision to move the University away from dependence on the state and more towards the independence of privatization. To be fair, the state legislature did cut funding to UMass in the last few years. Last year the state appropriations have increased, and it looks like it will go up again this year. The administration and Board of Trustees, however, don't appear to be interested in relying on the state for money.

So what does that mean? It means everything goes, folks. Everything that doesn't generate money, that is. This is where Lombardi comes in. Our chancellor was best described to me as someone who was chosen "not to bring in a little money, but to bring in a lot of money." In 2003, he created the "University of Massachusetts Amherst Foundation," a non-profit, private corporation which raises funding solely for UMass Amherst. Sounds good, right?

There are a couple of problems with that. First, Lombardi isn't as concerned with running a university as much as he is with building the endowment. That means that students and staff are left primarily to deal with Vice Chancellor Gargano (Lombardi's pick after arriving on campus) for nearly everything that doesn't involve academics. Gargano's mimicry of Lombardi's model for privatization led him to describe the ideal, desired student in his now-famous mantra, "We want more Abercrombie and Fitch and less Old Navy."

Gargano's mimicry of Lombardi's model for privatization led him to describe the ideal, desired student in his now-famous mantra, "We want more Abercrombie and Fitch, and less Old Navy."

When the student government, desperately trying to get things done for the student body, petitioned Lombardi trying to bypass "Roadblock" Gargano, he denied it and restated his full confidence in the vice chancellor. More recently, when employees under the supervision of Gargano expressed their frustration Lombardi, he blew them off. Perhaps most egregiously, when the Commission on Campus Diversity presented their proposal, Lombardi not only didn't listen — instead, he let Gargano write half of the official University response.

Thus, part of the move towards privatization includes a deliberate movement away from the "shared governance" model of the University, in which students, staff, faculty and administration work together to produce a school desired by all. Now we see a push towards a corporate model of "top-down" administration, where every level on the hierarchy takes its orders from the level above. The most distressing aspect of this system is that students are on the bottom level and don't get to say s about what they want the school to look like.

Another problem with Lombardi, and to the dismay of even a few on the Board of Trustees, is that our chancellor is a little rough around the edges. While he demonstrated a talent for fundraising at the University of Florida, he also demonstrated his short temper and "racial insensitivity," (to put it mildly).

While at Florida, he got in trouble for calling a fellow Black administrator an "Oreo" and for treating two visiting deans with "gross discourtesy" as they tried to review the school. These deans described him as an "immature bully" in their report. Such a temperament can't be surprising when the qualifications for the leader of the school is a fundraiser, rather than a consensus-builder.

On an institutional level, perhaps the greatest problem with moving the school towards privatization is that whatever doesn't make money gets de-prioritized. It is no wonder, therefore, that in the past few years, outreach programs for students of color from Massachusetts have been obliterated at UMass. Support programs for them, as well as resources for women, students who don't live in dorms (commuters and Greeks) and the gay and lesbian community have stagnated.

Unions have struggled dealing with Lombardi's administration, and workers' rights have suffered. Last week, the full burden of supporting student businesses (which are a threat to competing private corporations trying to get on campus) has been taken from the administration and put onto the student government.

And those new luxury suites near Sylvan? They'll be for the rich kids who can afford $700+ a month in rent (although the rest of the student body is getting an increase in fees to pay for the construction).

The list goes on and on, but students have woken up and are now raising their voices in defiance. In fact, today at noon, students will be holding a rally on the Student Union steps to protest this privatization. On Wednesday, many students (including myself) will head to the Board of Trustees meeting to demand they freeze fees and ensure fair representation for all constituents of the state. If you give a damn about these changes at our school, show up and raise your voice, too.

Jeff Napolitano is a Collegian columnist

New show plan for C-Span

Dan Nicastro

The marketing department believes that we have come up with a solution to our ratings woes. Although we like your idea of a call-in show where, as you say, "people seem more hitterly partisan, hut are really just bitterly non-partisan," we think C-Span should start moving in another direction.

C-Span has provided an outlet for political junkies for the last 20-plus years, but after watching the Alito hearings, it has become clear that even political junkies have a breaking point. It's time to start reaching out to a new audience, and the next wave of Supreme Court nomination hearings are a perfect place to begin implementing changes (the over-under is 3:1 that Scalia suffers a heart attack delivering one of his rants).

We have always seen a boost in ratings during past confirmation hearings, as people turn them on in order to convince themselves that they are somehow participating in the democratic process. However, after they hear stump speech after stump speech by Joe Biden and see Ted Kennedy grow increasingly red in the face, they generally switch the channel to something more interesting and less frightening.

The American people want to be informed, but they want to be entertained. Given these reasons, we suggest that the confirmation hearings now be billed as "Ultimate Justice: You Make the Call."

The average American does not want to hear about the political ramifications of the Griswold decision, or about the ethics of judicial recusal in regards to mutual funds. The American people want to be informed, hut they want to he entertained. Given these reasons, we suggest that the confirmation hearings now be billed as "Ultimate Justice: You Make the Call."

In this new set of hearings, instead of listening to Jeff Sessions confuse everyone, including himself, the candidate will have to pass through a series of tests in order to prove that he or she is worthy of the job which lies ahead of him or her. To ensure that the show will last for more than four days, we will give the president the opportunity to nominate nine potential justices at the same time (nine nominees, nine justices who sit on the court). By watching the show and calling in for their favorite appeals court judge, the American puhlic will be the final ones to decide who their new Supreme Court Justice becomes.

Much like American Idol, the show will consist of three panelists. First, there will be a rotating celebrity guest. Jessica Simpson and Diddy (or at least I think that's his name now) have already agreed to appear. The second judge will be Fred Dalton Thompson, of "Law & Order" fame, to bring a sense of legitimacy and professionalism to these hearings. The third judge will, of course, be Simon Cowell, who can say all the things we are thinking but don't have the guts to say.

Weeks one through six will consist of a series of pop culture questions which the nominees must answer. Through their answers, the panelists will decide who stays to go on to glory and who will be voted off and sent back to the District Courts of Shame.

In week seven, the real drama begins. Each justice will be able to make a plea to the American people on why he should become the next Associate Justice of the United States. The finalist picked will receive "Fifth Amendment Immunity" and will survive until the next week of the competition.

The final show will be a two-hour-long spectacle. Musical acts from other reality shows will perform, and we'll invite the nominees who were voted off to come back and talk about their experiences. Also, the American public will be able to call in and ask questions of the potential justices.

Before the final vote, each remaining candidate will have to perform a solo skit of their favorite Supreme Court case — and it can't have the words "Brown," "Miranda," "Roe" or "Marbury," in the title — and each will have one more chance to sway the American people.

After each prospective justice has finished their skit and speech, the American people will then vote to confirm the next Associate Justice of the United States of America. Once voting has ended and the winner has been announced, the president will step in and inaugurate the Justice on the spot.

As we hope you agree, this idea has a great deal of potential in cornering the youth audience and bringing direct democracy back to America in full force. The only foreseeable glitch would be getting Congress and the Supreme Court to agree with the changes in the Constitutional process of confirming and swearing in justices, but I'm sure that we could work out the minor details later. I mean, we're C-Span, for God's sake.

Dan Nicastro is a Collegian columnist.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 2006

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Stripped!

Dench film presents viewers with nothing special at all

By Peter Firsman
Collegian Staff

One of the occupational hazards of film criticism is that the reviewer risks forgetting the art of watching movies for its own sake, to see them in the manner the filmmakers intended audiences to see them. The critic is compelled to be analytical of every movie, rather than watch them as a consumer. But the greatest risk of being a critic is that over time, one forms a rigid set of criteria for what makes a film worthy of viewer's patronage and a place in film history books. Occasionally, however, a film comes along that serves as a tonic for such a critic.

Stephen Frears' "Mrs. Henderson Presents" tells the mostly-true story of a newly widowed British woman, Laura Henderson (Judi Dench) who in the late thirties purchases a theater and, together with manager Vivian Van Damm (Bob Hoskins), runs a musical revue. Its gimmicks: non-stop performances and nude ladies, albeit nude ladies required to remain perfectly still (so it can be explained to complainants that it's only slightly different from paintings). The theater enjoys great success, but runs into trouble with the onset of World War II. Henderson and Van Damm must then convince the authorities to let them continue performances amid the country's wartime mentality.

I chastised Bill Paxton's "The Greatest Game Ever Played" for lazily exploiting the Horatio Alger myth and not adding anything to it. "Greatest Game" was a highly simple affair, going through the motions of a stock story of people with a good heart but looked down upon by the dominant society. The downtrodden then manage to prove themselves worthy of respect and become paragons of human achievement. From a literal standpoint, the plot and tone of "Mrs. Henderson" is highly similar to that of "Greatest Game."

And that's not the only problem with the film. "Mrs. Henderson Presents" sloppily tries to insert serious subject matter into its otherwise happy-go-lucky texture. The film addresses callous manipulation (a subplot involving one of the nude models and a young soldier is particularly nasty), wars and casualties of said wars. It even mentions one of the few subjects that is still impervious to being made light of — the Holocaust. While historically accurate, such issues do not sit very well with the film's cheery atmosphere. Whenever such topics are tackled, the viewer gets the feeling that the filmmakers attempted to shoehorn in the material in an attempt to give the film some weight.

One of the main conflicts in the film is between Henderson and Van Damm. Van Damm constantly criticizes Henderson for not living in the real world, assuming good intentions of everyone who has a kind face and gaily assuming a worldview of eventual harmony. A film critic could easily charge this film with the same shortcomings. None of the deeper questions in the film, such as romanticism versus realism or the validity of good-natured trust, are resolved in the course of the movie. The film focuses on its main subject of the crimes of Puritanism upon sexual freedom, and only addresses other topics to use them as examples for the main argument.

But this film seemed to stand defiantly, daring me to attack it on such bases. It did this by causing me to question why a film should automatically be criticized because it brought up such topics and did not fully address them during the course of the movie. After all, is there a rule written somewhere that states that a film fails if it does such a thing? Does the film not succeed in its goals? To answer that question, we must extrapolate from the film what its goals were in the first place. My best guess was that the filmmakers intended to produce a feel-good, humanizing film.

And does it succeed? As a matter of fact, it succeeds exactly where "Greatest Game" failed. You know those stories about idealistic young misfits who try to put on a show for the locals? "Mrs. Henderson" feels like the product of such an effort. It has a soul that "Greatest Game" lacked and tried to compensate for with overwrought cinematography and music. It's like watching Gene Kelly tap-dance: One would be hard-pressed to find someone so world-weary and cynical that they fail to enjoy the spectacle.

Thank goodness for Dame Judi Dench, who demonstrates that upper-class elderly British ladies using four-letter words will always be funny, and no film snob has the right to make anyone feel guilty for laughing. And thank goodness for this film as a whole, for serving as a reminder for film critics not to take movies, particularly ones of these sorts, too seriously.

'Mrs. Henderson Presents'
Directed by Stephen Frears
Starring Judy Dench, Bob Hoskins
BBC Films
Rated R
103 mins
Grade B-

Above: Judy Dench and Bob Hoskins play off of each other in this glamorized new film by Stephen Frears.

Left: Kelly Reilly shines as a showgirl in "Mrs. Henderson Presents." Reilly stars as Maureen.

Ford's performance in 'Firewall' all too familiar

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

It seems everyone likes Harrison Ford. He's second behind Tom Hanks, who holds the record as the all-time highest grossing box-office star ever. He has been in more good movies than some of the most elite actors. He's charismatic and good looking. But "Firewall," Ford's newest film, could be the bucket of cold water that wakes audiences up to the obvious truth: Harrison Ford's range as an actor is little to nil.

When things get tense in "Firewall" Ford darts his eyes around nervously. When angry, he speaks in a deep gravelly voice. But we've seen it before. It's Jack Ryan, the main character in "Patriot Games" and "A Clear and Present Danger." We can only surmise as to why Ford chose to play this character. It may be that Ford, despite the ego-inflation common to most stars today, is quite realistic with himself about his acting abilities. He failed with 2001's "What Lies Beneath," where he had to play a complex character. He's modest decided to play to his strengths. With "Firewall," he returns to the type of role that keeps his box-office revenues up, and his public asleep dreaming of the Harrison Ford that can act.

"Firewall" is a simple story. Paul Bettany plays Bill Cox, who, along with his team of mercenaries, takes Jack Stanfield's (family hostage Stanfield (Harrison Ford) is a security expert at a bank. Cox wants Jack to transfer one hundred million dollars from various accounts at the bank to Cox's off-shore accounts.

To add some sentimentality to it, screenwriter Joe Forte inserts a few contrived family-oriented scenes. "Let's think about something nice," Jack's wife Beth (Virginia Madsen) says to her kids as they lie in bed together. "I know," she says. "We're on board the Lark." That's the name of their boat. Then she continues this dreadful emotionally manipulative line of thought. The scene is stupid, but we'll overlook it because "Firewall" feels like a very tight, suspenseful and well-done thriller.

There's a great scene where Cox fits Jack with a video camera built into a pen and an audio transmitter, then sends him off to work. Cox's men watch what the camera sees but don't notice when Jack stealthily puts the camera-pen in his co-worker Janet's pocket and sents her in his office. As Jack walks around the building trying to find a way out of his predicament he can't let Cox's men, who are listening to what the audio transmitter picks up, know he's left his office. It's a tense and at times funny scene.

It's fun to watch Harrison Ford, the ultimate white-collar conventional type, acting absurd because he has to.

At one point, he's forced to fire Janet although she's done nothing wrong. The best aspects of "Firewall" are in these moments. Even better is the fact that as the story progresses, the conflicts grow greater Ford is framed for the theft of the 100 mil, and we'd think he would need to have some type of run-in with the police at the end of the film. But the film ends abruptly leaving us to guess how it would all work out.

Unfortunately, when the last forty minutes to half hour of the film rolls around, "Firewall" really loses its edge. Jack ends up only being able to find Cox because he has fitted his dog with a GPS Digital Tracker. This isn't entirely implausible, but it's strange to say the least. It is implausible, however, that the men would take the family dog with them.

After that, it you can keep your eyes open, you might notice there seems to be some kind of physical confrontation between Bettany and Ford. But around the same time the dog became crucial to the storyline, we stopped caring about the storyline altogether.

'Firewall'
Directed by Richard Loncraine
Starring Harrison Ford, Alan Arkin
Warner Bros.
Rated PG-13
Grade B-
105 mins

Harrison Ford stars in director Richard Loncraine's crime thriller "Firewall."

There's no skeletons in poet Annie Boutelle's crafty closet

By Dave Master
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON — Annie Boutelle spoke at Broadside Bookshop in Northampton on Wednesday to promote two new collections of poems, "Becoming Bone" and "Nest of Thistles."

Smith College professor Annie Boutelle.

Boutelle was met with a full house of people to hear her speak on Wednesday. She slowly but surely made her rounds through the audience with nothing but smiles. As a professor of English and senior lecturer at Smith College, she had a generous fan base which contained people of all ages. Her introduction was short and sweet. The audience was anxious to hear from her publications.

'Nest of Thistles'
By Annie Boutelle
University of Arkansas press

Boutelle's first readings were from "Becoming Bone," which contains poems dedicated to the life of New Hampshire's best 19th century poet, Celia Thaxter. These poems are set in the Isles of Shoals off the coast of New Hampshire, where Celia Thaxter resided. Boutelle accurately reflects on the hard life of Thaxter, who married at age 16 and had three children, one of whom was injured during birth. Despite her dwindling marriage and her needy first child, Thaxter still found time to write poetry.

Boutelle captures the life of Thaxter through snapshots of poems where clarity becomes reality, as if Boutelle became Thaxter's backbone. She lays out the skeleton of Thaxter's life with interweaving poems. Through describing settings in simmering fields, vast coastlines and living rooms, Boutelle truly recreates the life of Celia Thaxter with poems like "Mt. Hawthorne," "Red" and "Civil War."

The poems in "Nest of Thistles," in contrast, are mostly set in Scotland, reminiscent of Boutelle's upbringing. The collection is based on her personal reflections of Celtic culture and Scotland's history and landscape. Her mother is a blanketing presence.

Boutelle gives a setting for each poem and carefully crafts complimentary descriptions. The first poem Boutelle read from "Nest of Thistles" was called "Births." The opening lines of "Births" are "It was war You were expected to suffer The rain was hammering on the windows of the cottage hospital."

"Which Woman" alludes to Boutelle's memory of her dead mother. She introduced it by writing, "This poem is about my mother, who would have been 102 today if she was alive." With lines like "This woman is not my mother This woman spills crumbs on her chest," Boutelle slowly accepts the state of her aging mother.

"Ancestor Theory" received the most audience reaction. This poem shows Boutelle's ever-present imagination. "Ancestors live inside us," Boutelle said, "as parasites we ignore as a hermit crab afraid to show his Pincers' in my liver, toes."

While reading, Boutelle wore a contagious, childish smile that soon spread throughout the audience.

Along with reading from her two collections of poems, Boutelle also read three unpublished poems that she composed last semester: "Hypothesis," "Other," and "Firefox." In these poems, Boutelle experiments with new concepts ranging from mystic to scientific.

The last poem read was titled "Words," written in two-line stanzas containing mostly Scottish words. This poem seemed to be Boutelle paying homage to Scotland.

It was a pleasant night, with a familial audience which Boutelle proudly commanded. As she finished the words of her last read poem, the audience gave a standing ovation. Boutelle accepted the applause with a smile.

Smith College Professor Annie Boutelle's book "Becoming Bone."

New romance survey suggests love may not be the international language

By Danielle Novy
Daily Toreador (Texas Tech)

LUBBOCK, Texas — Cupid would be well advised to consult his map before he aims his next arrow.

According to a recent study, international borders do more than just separate countries; they dually divide dating tendencies and determine each nation's laws of attraction.

Harlequin Enterprises' 2006 Romance Report surveyed both men and women in 16 countries across the globe to determine how each culture influences dating.

Michelle Renaud, an official in the public relations department of Harlequin Enterprises, said the study polled 2,000 individuals from North America in addition to the pool of 1,000 international participants.

The age-old battle of beauty versus brains was addressed, with Australians ranking intelligence as a low priority. According to the survey, only 10 percent of Aussie women and almost no Australian men identified intelligence as their biggest turn-on, according to the report.

Meanwhile, in Portugal, roughly 40 percent of the men polled placed more importance on smarts than looks in a potential mate. Still, the majority of men across the globe would rather date someone physically beautiful than the owner of a beautiful mind.

Conversely, according to the report, women of the world value a keen a sense of humor with a sharp brain over good looks when it comes to selecting a partner.

About 70 percent of German women and 60 percent of Mexican women named a sense of humor as the most attractive quality in the opposite sex during an initial encounter.

Confidence and financial stability also were found to be universally attractive to both genders. Nearly 70 percent of

A recent study suggests that love cannot be translated into different languages. The study, performed by Harlequin Enterprises, surveyed how each culture influences dating.

Hispanic men responded that the most attractive feature in a female during an initial encounter is confidence, while 30 percent of women from the U.K. and Japan tagged a confident male as "very attractive."

Meanwhile, 40 percent of Portuguese men and 30 percent of women labeled financial insecurity as one of their primary turn-offs in a potential partner.

Even the places men and women look for love varies from country to country.

According to the report, 90 percent of Japanese women rely on their friends to meet a match, while none of the Japanese men or women polled thought that online dating was a good way to meet people.

Monica Belsito, a public relations representative for Harlequin's publicity firm, said she believes such statistics can be attributed to the traditional culture that many Japanese people embrace.

"The Asian culture is much reserved, whereas people from countries globally known as party destinations tend to meet people in bars and clubs," she said.

Roughly 40 percent of French men head to a bar or club when they are looking to meet someone special, while only 10 percent of French women employ the same technique, according to the study.

In Portugal, however, adults are putting down their cocktails and putting their hands to work on a keyboard to search for "the one." About 50 percent of Portuguese women and 40 percent of Portuguese men believe online dating is the best route to meeting someone new.

Renaud said she believes a nation's technological stance played a role in how its citizens approached the dating world.

"The access to technology and social norms in different countries contributes to the differences," she said. "You also have to consider the social climate in each country."

The complete survey is available online at press.harlequin.com.

The Collegian will be holding a rally in support of freeing UMass and Collegian alumna Jill Carroll.

Carroll was kidnapped in Iraq on January 7th, and has yet to be released. The Collegian asks it s readers to gather on the library lawn in front of the Student Union on Thursday, Feb. 16th at noon to support one of our own.

For a new look you'll love!
Our hair designers and color specialists will create your personalized new look!
Call for a complimentary salon consultation.
$5 OFF Style Haircuts & Consultation* *not Wendy, Laura and Kate
or
HIGHLIGHTS Starting at only $45 at this salon
Coupon Expires 03-31-06
Styles by Deborah & Co.
HAIR SALON & SPA
Paul Mitchell Signature Salon

FUN, FUN, FUN!
BARTEND
BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL
Student Discount!
1-800-357-3210 218 Memorial Ave, West Springfield, MA
www.bostonbartender.com

Regency Hair Stylists
Spring... For a New Look!
$5.00 OFF A HAIR CUT
Call for an appointment
189 N. Pleasant St. Amherst, MA 01002
(413) 253-9526

Artist Lecture
Thursday
Feb.16, 2006
4:30 pm
Stirn Auditorium
Reception to follow in museum
Free and open to the public
Duane Michals:
Photography and Reality

LONE WOLF
61 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
No one deserves to be "Lone"ly on Valentine's Day
Serving Valentine's Day Dinner Saturday February 11th and open on Valentine's Day night 5:30pm - 9:30pm
Call for reservations (413) 256-4643
Breakfast hours: Mon - Fri 7-2 Sat - Sun 7-2:30
Lunch served Mon - Fri 11-2 only

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTERS
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Minutemen lose two

HOCKEY from page 10

Eric Thomassian doubled the Terriers' advantage at the 3:36 mark of the third period. Quick stopped two shots in a row from Sean Sullivan, then Brad Zancanaro, but couldn't stop Thomassian's try that beat him over his left leg pad.

Roche then sealed the win with his second of the night with just over five minutes left in the contest. On the goal MacArthur was also able to pick up his second assist of the night. MacArthur fed the puck to Roche, who rocketed a one-timer from about 15 feet out that flew past Quick and into the net.

"The white line is on fire. Roche is playing great, MacArthur is playing great," BU coach Jack Parker said of his second line. "For sure I didn't think [MacArthur] was going to play today. Now it looks like it must have been food poisoning...because he was throwing up all night."

The Mass Attack looked to rebound on Saturday night but was unable to take advantage of a Friar team that had been beaten down by Boston College the night before 8-3.

UMass's offensive problems that plagued them Friday carried over to the game against PC.

Freshman Cory Quirk was able to notch the Minutemen's lone goal on the weekend in the second period to cut the Friars' lead in half to 2-1.

Freshman forward Cory Quirk scored the only goal of the weekend for the Minutemen in a 4-1 loss to Providence on Saturday.

Quirk notched his seventh goal of the season when he stole the puck in the PC zone, then turned quickly and unleashed a shot on goalie Tyler Sims that beat him and found the back of the net.

The home team jumped out to an early lead when the Friars put the Minutemen down, 2-0, at the end of the first period. At 9:35, Nick Mazzolini took a pass from Nate Meyers and put the puck past UMass goalie Gabe Winer. The senior netminder was making his return to the ice after serving a one-game suspension for a fight he was involved in with UMass Lowell on Feb. 4.

About five minutes later Torry Gajda scored the second Friars goal of the period. Gajda's team-leading 14th goal of the season came when he had a breakaway opportunity on Winer. Just when he finished serving a penalty, Gajda received the puck, skated in on the UMass net and flipped a backhander past Winer for the score.

Tony Zancanaro (brother of BU player Brad Zancanaro) added a power-play score and Kyle Laughlin added a goal of his own to close out the Minutemen in the third period.

Tatham keeps UMass rolling

W. HOOP from page 10

the foul line, and Tatham only missed one, while hitting 9-of-10.

Tatham led the team in scoring with 21 points on the afternoon. She also tallied five rebounds, four assists, two blocks and two steals. The Ontario native had a great presence in the paint against Fordham, and she knew that was an area in which she needed to improve on.

"I felt like I needed to finish inside," T. Tatham said. "I've been getting the ball a lot inside, and I've left it short a lot. I just came in focusing on getting the ball up, and getting to the line."

The game began with a 3-pointer by Fordham junior Lisa Carrol nearly two minutes into the first half. That three-point lead would end up being the Rams' largest of the game, as the Minutewomen dominated the rest of the first half.

Senior Patrycja Gulak got UMass on the board when she hit a jumper at 17:32 in the first half. Tatham followed that up with a layup just 26 seconds later to give the Minutewomen a 4-3 lead. They would hold that lead for the remainder of the first half, and went into halftime with a 32-27 lead.

UMass began the second period of play with a 3-pointer by Nelson just 13 seconds into the half. Fordham slowly chipped away at UMass's lead, but sophomore Pam Rosanio was able to knock down a 3-pointer to give the Maroon and White a 46-41 lead with 13:50 remaining in regulation.

Sophomore forward Kate Mills scored 16 points in a 68-63 win over Fordham yesterday. UMass has won six of its last seven games.

The Minutewomen had some missed opportunities down the stretch to let the Rams take the lead for the first time since they led 3-0 to start the game. Carrol nailed a 3-pointer with 6:08 left in the game to make it 53-52 in favor of Fordham.

The lead went back and forth for the next few minutes, but a powerful drive to the basket by Tatham led to a game-changing layup and free throw. Tatham hit the foul shot to complete the three-point play and give the Minutewomen a 64-61 lead with 1:09 remaining in the game.

Fordham was stopped by UMass's solid defense, and was forced to send the Minutewomen to the foul line. Perfect free throw shooting from Nelson and Mills in the final minute of play completed UMass's sixth win in its last seven games.

"We're playing with a lot of confidence," Mills said. "Getting the early lead and success in our games has given us the confidence to know that we can beat any team."

Mixed results for UM track

TRACK from page 10

Lafreniere said.

As for the men, coach Ken O'Brien commented that the Invitational was a continuance of his team's upward trend.

"I thought it was a great day for us," O'Brien said. "We competed very well the week before at the Mega Meet at Rhode Island and I think the [Valentine Invitational] represents a step-up for that performance."

O'Brien mentioned that the standout performances were turned in by Andy McCarron and Sean Calicchio.

McCarron, who O'Brien describes as "our team leader," completed the 5,000-meter run in 14:54, which was approximately 15 seconds faster than his time last week.

Calicchio, a sophomore, threw for a distance of 53 feet, a personal best for him by about a foot.

For the Minutemen, competing at Boston University's track facility was almost as exciting as their slew of fine performances.

"BU is probably one of the top five facilities, in terms of collegiate track facilities, in the country," O'Brien said. "It was a large meet — there were approximately 2,500 competitors from 35 different colleges, from as far away as the University of Miami and Florida International."

As for the A-10 Championships, which will be held next weekend, O'Brien, like Lafreniere, said his team's practice regimen will not be much different than it has been all season long.

"Basically all you're doing, really, is nothing dramatically different," O'Brien said. "It's just a matter of altering a few things here and there to physically and mentally optimize your chances to take the performances to the next level."

Tough start for U.S. in Olympics

By Larry McShane
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy — It was hardly a lost weekend for the U.S. Olympic team. The good news was just hard to find among all the disappointments.

Gold medals for speedskater Chad Hedrick and snowboarder Shaun White were nearly lost in a flurry of Winter Games woes that spread from sport to sport, and star to star. Big names fell short — or got no chance at all.

Skater Michelle Kwan: Shut down by a badly injured groin muscle without ever stepping on the ice. Goodbye to the team's (and television's) most familiar Olympic face, tear-streaked by the turn of events.

Skiers Bode Miller and Daron Rahlves: Shut out in the downhill, where longshot Frenchman Antoine Deneriaz won the gold.

Short track speedskater Apolo Anton Ohno: Skidded into fourth place in a semifinal heat, missing a chance to defend his gold medal in the 1,500 meters.

Luger Tony Benshoof: On the verge of winning the first-ever singles luge medal for the U.S., he slipped into fourth place Sunday — missing a bronze by 0.237 seconds. Instead, Latvia — yes, Latvia — won its first Winter Games medal.

The women's moguls team: Shut out Saturday in the freestyle, despite fielding what was regarded at the deepest squad in the world.

Four years ago, the Americans won a staggering 34 medals with the home field advantage in Salt Lake City — more than double their previous high of 13 in a Winter Games. In Turin, they were just a little staggered: two golds and a silver in two days.

Historically, countries that hosted the games experience a 41 percent drop in medals when they returned to foreign soil for the next Olympics. That would leave the U.S. looking at about 20 medals in Italy.

Burton wins Daytona 500 pole

By Mike Harris
Associated Press

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Richard Childress looked Jeff Burton in a bearhug and didn't want to let go.

The NASCAR Nextel Cup team owner made a big financial and emotional investment during the winter to get his team back to the sport's top echelon. The changes paid their first dividend Sunday, with Burton putting his Richard Childress Racing Chevrolet on the pole for the Daytona 500.

"It's big," said Burton, who hadn't won a pole in more than five years. "Hopefully, it's another sign that this team is getting ready to turn things around."

Childress had one of the strongest teams in the sport until longtime driver and friend Dale Earnhardt was killed in a crash during the 2001 Daytona 500. Kevin Harvick had a good season for RCR after replacing Earnhardt the following week at Rockingham, but the team has struggled in the years since.

Childress was determined to turn things around, making numerous personnel changes and radically improving the team's equipment since the end of the 2005 season. This was the first big test.

"Yeah, it's emotional," Childress said. "We've struggled for the last few years. We've got to put it all together and we've got to start winning."

Burton outran 57 other competitors to earn the top starting spot for the Feb. 19 race, his third career pole and first since the fall 2001 race in Richmond, when he was driving for Roush Racing.

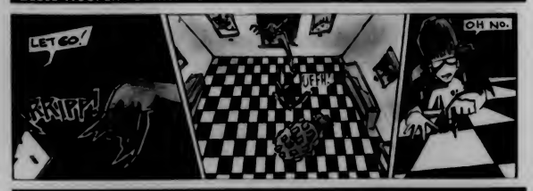
His fast lap of 189.151 mph on a windy, chilly day at Daytona International Speedway was the fastest qualifying run on the 2.5-mile, high-banked oval since Dale Jarrett's 191.091 in February 2000.

"We knew we had a fast car yesterday, we just didn't know how fast these others guys really were," Burton said.

Three-time and defending Daytona 500 winner Jeff Gordon, one of the last drivers to take to the track on the windy afternoon, came close to knocking Burton's Chevrolet off the top spot with a lap of 188.877 in a Hendrick Motorsports Chevrolet.

Harvick, the star of the team's driving trio, was among the fastest in practice on Saturday and was one of the favorites to win the pole, but he wound up 13th in qualifying. Teammates Burton and rookie Clint Bowyer both made it into the top 10, though.

STSTRAVEL.COM
Asia America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA
BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2006
Don't Get Left Behind!
BOOK TODAY!
STS STUDENT TRAVEL SERVICES
1-800-648-4849 / www.ststravel.com



GETS THE ADRENALINE GOING.
YOURS AND WHOEVER READS ABOUT IT ON YOUR RESUME.
Call 413-545-2321 for more information
ENROLL IN ARMY ROTC
BECOME AN ARMY OFFICER

FIND YOUR REACH SCHOOL AND MAKE IT A REALITY.
Do your research.
Get the inside scoop from current students and administrators.
Master the tests.
Learn proven test-taking strategies and build on key skills with practice exams.
Stand out.
Write outstanding essays using tips from admissions officers and students in top programs.
Getting in is achievable with the right tools.
Available at bookstores everywhere.
www.PrincetonReview.com
The Princeton Review

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warner

Elsie Hooper By Robert D. Kryzkowski

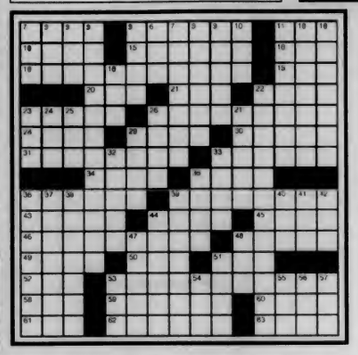
Jack Dogg By Xavier Rhodes

The Family Monster By Josh Shalek

The Zoo By Gabe Strine

Quote of the Day

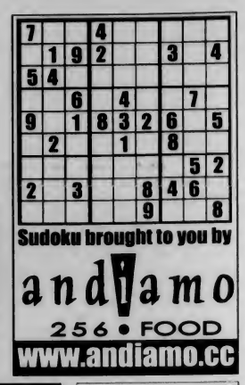
"Our lives begin to end the day we become silent about things that matter."



—Martin Luther King Jr.

ACROSS
1 "The Last Song" singer's last name
5 Coleridge's galaxy
11 Tractor-trailer
14 Actor Morales
15 Nation of Roma
16 Vane dir.
17 Graphic
19 Half a score
20 Sailors' grp.
21 Half a fly?
22 Convinced
23 Road and Arlene
26 Aligns anew
28 Curvy molding
29 Knitter's need
30 Upright marker
31 Training drills
33 King and Blair
34 Pension $$
35 Rani's dress
36 Designer Pierre
39 Of one's folks
43 Bikini blast
44 Embankment
45 National syst.
46 Kingston populace
48 "___ sail oats..."
49 "The Good Earth" heroine
50 Burning
51 Neon or phosphine
52 Actor Chaney
53 New World isthmus populace
58 Bus. letter abbr.
59 More Bohemian
60 French God
61 Actress Sandra
62 Early space station
63 Grade sch.

DOWN
1 Clamgent patriarch
2 Full of suff
3 Is down with
4 "Eyes Wide Shut" star
5 Roman baker's dozen?
6 Org. of Federer
7 Talks idly
8 Winter Lurie
9 Navy Seal, e.g.
10 Abu Dhabi loc.
11 Makes piano repairs
12 Lethargically
13 Origins
18 ER workers
22 Declaring invalid
23 Part of DJIA
24 Gone by
25 That woman
26 Piper's followers
27 Val d' ___, Fr.
29 Dynasty before Ming
32 Pygmy antelope
33 Without clothing
35 5th Avenue store
36 Sweet-talked
37 Ear shell
38 Love novel
39 Duck type
40 Rocky outcrop
41 Blvd. crosser
42 Some NFL linemen
44 Gracefully delicate
47 Dick or Petula
48 Fellow
51 Outfit
53 Faux ___ (bout that)
54 ___ culpa (Sorry 'bout that)
55 Feel unwell
56 Born in Brest
57 Addition figure



Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

Submit your comic!

e-mail collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You have huge scary monsters under your bed.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You will find an inspiring message on a desk today.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You should try not to steal from your roommate anymore.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You should send your mommy a valentine.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Put those flip flops away for at least a few more weeks.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Don't forget your calculator. You will need it today.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Bring a book to class. That lecture is going to be very boring.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You are going to need a lot of quarters very soon.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You are going to have an awesome Valentine's Day this year.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You should go outside and make a snow angel right now.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
If you are going to listen to Celine Dion, use headphones.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Be careful not to slip on any ice on your way to class.

Chicago Pizzaria
Yes, we Deliver!
Nacho Supreme
♡ Introducing our new ♡ special to the menu
♡ for Valentine's Day ♡

Hours
Sun-Wed 3pm-2am
Thurs-Sat 3pm-3am
To order Delivery or Pick-Up Contact
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing St. Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, Ma. 01002

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

TANNING SPECIAL! 25% off all purchases including packages & tanning products! Go to Beach Club Tanning on Monday Feb. 13th and ask for the "Hockey Special" Every purchase helps send the women's ice hockey team to the National Tournament in Missouri!

Montreal Party Weekends $115.00 Total cost. RT Transportation 3 Day, 2 Night, Hotel Downtown + much more. Montreal Express.Net 781-979-9001 Every weekend March + April.

Full Tuition Scholarships and $5,000 cash ARMY ROTC Take the challenge Prepare yourself to excel www.umass.edu/armyrotc

Apartment for Rent

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Childcare

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring – full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288 email:fjmooney@msn.com

Employment

Rent us your Ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837

Employment

P/T Synagogue Office Administrator Spfld – Orthodox Congregation has immediate opening for a skilled administrative person. Must be hands on, knowledgeable in Judaic ritual, and computer literate with background in Microsoft Office, Quickbooks and Excel. Superior communication skills and a flair for marketing are requisite to this post. Reply with full resume to: H/R, Kodimoh Synagogue, 124 Summer Ave, Springfield, MA 01108 or mail@sederfoods.com

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 800-766-7174

Bartending $300/Day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Employment

Become a Summer Orientation Counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/student_jobs/Orientation_position/ The application deadline is February 15th.

Needed NVIVO tutor. Call 253-0691

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288 / email: fjmooney@msn.com

Miscellaneous

Need a Girls' Night Out? Have an Adult Novelty Party and earn Free Gifts. Find out more at www.ATHENASHN.com/Goddess/910

Services

Purchasing a used car? Having your car repaired? Do you know your legal rights? Contact the Student Legal Services Office. 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995.

Pregnant? Consider adoption. Free confidential counselling to help you make fully informed decisions for your baby and you. Choose your baby's parents, meet and stay in touch. Stable, loving two parent families waiting to adopt. Call 24/7 Brightside 1-877-777-7774 License# 1465107

Travel

Spring Break 2006 The Experts Spring Break Since 1988 Hottest Destinations – Biggest Parties The Lowest Prices From $159 www.sunsplashtours.com 1-800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Wanted

Egg Donors Needed $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+, physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

FREE JILL!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian will host a rally Thursday at noon on the the lawn in front of the Student Union in support of Jill Carroll's release.

All are welcome and encouraged to attend.

Please come out and support one of our own.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 2006 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Road woes continue at FSU

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Much has changed since the last meeting between the Massachusetts men's basketball team (10-11, 5-6 Atlantic 10) and the Florida State Seminoles (15-6, 5-5 Atlantic Coast Conference). In last year's 78-68 UMass win at the Mullins Center, Steve Lappas roamed the UMass sidelines, sophomore Maurice Maxwell scored a game-high 19 points and classmate Art Bowers dropped 12 points and seven assists in the UMass victory.

A year later, Bowers and Maxwell are gone, Travis Ford has taken over for Lappas and the roles have reversed — the Seminoles won by 10 this time, and they handled the Minutemen last night 73-63 on the back of some sharp-shooting. Florida State shot 53 percent from 3-point land on 8-of-15 shooting and hit an impressive 90 percent from the free-throw line (19-21).

"I'm disappointed we lost," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "But I think that we made a step in the right direction. I thought we played better than we had in a while."

The Minutemen will be back in action against A-10 leader and No. 8-ranked George Washington on the road on Wednesday night at 7:30 p.m.

Senior Jeff Viggiano led UMass with 11 points in the game, followed by a solid performance by Dante Milligan, who had 10 points with seven boards on 5-of-5 shooting. Junior Brandon Thomas started strong with seven points in the first nine minutes of action, but only added three more points over the rest of the game.

The score was tied at 45 just a few minutes into the second half. Junior James Life had just hit two straight 3-pointers and the Minutemen were hanging with the Seminoles on the offensive end. But Florida State turned on the defensive pressure and UMass looked lost. The Minutemen began to lose steam and the Seminoles continued to push the gas pedal.

"We went on a few offensive droughts that I was disappointed in," Ford said. "We made a few mental mistakes, turning it over against their pressure — things that we've worked on."

From the 9:03 mark to the 6:33 mark in the second half, Florida State went on a 10-2 run, punctuated by two devastating 3-pointers by Florida State's John Galloway and Andrew Wilson, handing the Minutemen a 61-49 deficit to overcome in the waning minutes.

"I thought Florida State had to play one of their best games to beat us," Ford said. "When two teams play well, and Florida State is a better team than us, the better team is probably going to win and I think it was one of those situations."

UMass scored four straight points to get within eight points at 61-53, but Florida State — which went on an 8-2 run after that to push the lead to 14 at 69-55 — was too much to handle.

Thomas, who averaged just two points per game in his previous eight outings, got off to an inspired start, scoring the seven points in the early goings. He was more aggressive, attacking the rim and shooting with confidence, and the junior transfer seemed at ease for the first time since being removed from the starting lineup.

"Brandon was very aggressive and attacked the basket with some nice moves," Ford said.

The Seminoles finished the half on a 9-0 run to take a 35-31 lead into the break. Viggiano and Thomas (3-of-7 from the field, 1-of-2 from 3-point land) led the Minutemen in scoring with seven points each at halftime.

After an FSU 3-pointer, the Minutemen went on an 8-0 run to take a one-point lead at 39-38, but the momentum soon swung to Florida State after the Seminoles inserted some pressure defenses.

KAREN WINCH/COLLEGIAN

Junior forward Stephane Lasme and UMass fell 73-63 at Florida State last night. The loss dropped the Minutmen's record to 10-11 this season.

Mass Attack unable to keep momentum

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team learned the hard way this weekend how quickly fortunes can change in the ultra-competitive Hockey East.

The Minutemen dropped both of their games on the road this weekend against Boston University on Friday night, 3-0, and then traveled to Providence on Saturday only to lose their third game of the season to the Friars, 4-1.

Next weekend the Minutemen will welcome HEA newcomer Vermont to Amherst to play at the Mullins Center both Friday and Saturday night. The weekend series is pivotal for UMass, as it could help paint a clearer conference playoff picture.

With the season series on the line, the Maroon and White traveled to Agganis Arena Friday night for the final meeting of the season with the Terriers in front of 5,947 red-and-white clad fans.

Entering the game, BU was in the midst of a national-best nine-game winning streak.

The opening period was close as both teams showed they could throw their weight around the ice.

The Terriers gained the edge in the period, however, when they opened up the scoring with about five minutes left before the first intermission.

Kenny Roche scored the first of his two goals on the night to put the Minutemen in a 1-0 hole. Bryan Ewing slid the puck to Pete MacArthur, who had made his way to the left point. From there, MacArthur fired a shot on UMass goalie Jon Quick, who made the save but left the rebound out front to his left. Roche collected the puck and fired it into the wide-open net as Quick was still out of position on the right side.

The goal put a damper on the Minutemen's spirits because they had hung with BU for the majority of the period and looked as though they may be on their way to having a chance to break the Terriers' streak. The rest of the game was all BU.

"I thought it was a pretty good period for us in terms of tempo and execution," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after the game. "BU came out and played a strong second and third period but we didn't measure up."

Both teams remained quiet through the second period. Although the score remained 1-0, it looked as though the Terriers may have taken an edge in the contest. Shots in the period were heavily lopsided in favor of BU, 15-4. Throughout the course of the game, UMass managed to get the puck on BU goalie John Curry just 19 times.

The third period sealed the victory for the Terriers when they notched two more scores to run their winning streak to 10 games.

This is the first regular season winning streak of at least 10 games for BU since they won 10 in a row during the 1978-79 season.

See HOCKEY on page 7

No slowing down UM

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Not even a snowstorm could slow down the Massachusetts women's basketball team yesterday afternoon. The Minutewomen (9-14, 6-6 Atlantic 10) battled the rough weather and defeated Fordham 17-16, 2-10 (A-10) 68-63 yesterday at the Mullins Center.

UMass will be back in action when it takes on Xavier at 7 p.m. on Friday night in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Fordham fought back in the final minutes of the second half to take the lead, thanks to some hot 3-point shooting from freshman Danielea Roarke. But the Minutewomen used resiliency to stay with the Rams and come out with a win.

Junior Tamara Tatham's layup with 1:09 left to play in the game gave the Minutewomen the lead and they never looked back. Some solid defense and free throw shooting by UMass in the final minute of regulation sealed the deal in its third consecutive victory.

While the Minutewomen did not have their best shooting day of the season, finishing the game shooting 39 percent from the field, it was their impressive free throw shooting that made the difference.

"I'm just really happy with the way our team finds a way to win," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We managed to get the win. We missed a lot of open shots, layups and open looks. We stayed with it defensively, even though we gave up second shots. We managed to get to the foul line and make the free throws when they count to get the win, and that's what it's all about."

The Minutewomen shot 95 percent from the charity stripe, as they finished the game making 19-of-20 free throws. Senior Katie Nelson and sophomore Kate Mills were perfect from

KAREN WINCH/COLLEGIAN

Junior forward Tamara Tatham led UMass with 21 points and five rebounds in a 68-63 win over Fordham at home yesterday.

See W HOOP on page 7

Minutewomen face top teams

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

It was the seventh inning and freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter was flying high in her first weekend competing as a Massachusetts softball player. The Minutewomen were facing No. 8/7 California as part of the Campbell/Cartier Tournament in San Diego, Calif. yesterday, and with a 3-0 lead, all they needed to do was hold their ground against one of the most powerful softball programs in the country.

Although the Minutewomen ultimately surrendered two unearned runs in the seventh, and then one more in the eighth inning as UMass (1-4) fell to Cal 3-2, Balschmiter capped off her collegiate debut with a near-upset of the Golden Bears. The Minutewomen left the tournament losing four of the five contests, including an 8-0 loss to No. 2 UCLA, a 2-1 win over Sacramento State, a 10-1 loss to UC Santa Barbara and a 1-0 loss to San Diego State.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino and her squad will be back on the road again in two weeks when they take part in the NFCA Leadoff Classic from Feb. 24-26 in Columbus, Georgia.

This past weekend gave Sortino a chance to see her rookies in action for the first time in a game, and they did not disappoint. In her third start of her college career, Balschmiter struck out nine Golden Bears and allowed seven hits. Holding a shutout through six innings, Balschmiter nearly made her weekend seemingly perfect, but two unearned runs led to the eventual loss.

Balschmiter pitched a complete game on Friday, and tallied the Minutewomen's first and only win so far this season — a 2-1 victory over Sacramento State. In that contest, Balschmiter allowed just one run and struck out six batters, while it was fellow newcomer Whitney Mollica who took care of the offensive end.

Mollica nailed a two-run triple in the sixth inning, which sparked the Minutewomen's first win of the season.

In Balschmiter's other start of the weekend, she only allowed one run off of two hits, but the Minutewoman offense could not produce, and the Maroon and White lost a close one to San Diego State 1-0.

Aside from Mollica's two RBIs, senior infielder Kristi Stefanoni was the only other player able to drive runners in this weekend, adding three RBIs off of three total hits. Sophomore Lauren Proctor recorded six hits throughout the weekend, while junior Amanda Morin had three and Amanda Acampora, Candice Molinari and Stacy Cullington each had two hits.

Balschmiter's ERA now stands at an impressive 1.70 after her win and strong showings against Cal and San Diego State. Pitching counterpart senior Jenna Busa, who had to face the No. 2 team in the country in UCLA, compiled an ERA of 6.30 this weekend, while surrendering 16 hits and one home run.

Hawkins duo leads UMass to strong weekend in Vermont

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

On a weekend when the casual skier probably would have stayed indoors, the Hawkins family continued to power the Massachusetts ski teams after a slow start Saturday. Both the men's and women's teams finished second overall in Sunday's giant slalom after struggling the day before in the slalom event.

The season concludes this weekend with two carnivals in two days. Both the men and women will compete in the Colby-Sawyer Carnival giant slalom Friday, followed by the St. Anslem's Carnival slalom on Saturday.

Both the men and women had a tough day on the slopes Saturday. The team competed in the slalom portion of the carnival in poor skiing conditions. With mild temperatures throughout the week, the resort struggled to make enough snow for the event to take place.

"Luckily there was about 48 hours where it was really cold [leading up to the race], and [the resort's grounds crew] did their best trying to make enough snow for us," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said. "The terrain was still pretty rugged. Every athlete on the slopes fought with the conditions that day."

The men's best slalom skier, sophomore Jason Small, fell during his second run, eliminating him from contention after a promising first run.

Junior Rush Hawkins finished an uncharacteristic fifth and was the only Minuteman to place in the top ten.

With the conference's top two skiers struggling, Colby-Sawyer's Travis Plass won the race handily. The UMass men finished third overall, not bad considering the struggles of their top two performers.

The women had an even worse day Saturday, finishing sixth overall.

Sophomore Eliza Hawkins was disqualified for missing a gate on her second run. Just three gates from the finish, Hawkins only got one leg around a gate, effectively straddling it and eliminating her from the race.

The one bright spot for the women was the performance of senior Lisbet Rauh, who finished fifth individually, one of her best performances this season.

Sunday's giant slalom saw a return to normal for the Maroon and White. Rush and Eliza Hawkins finished in first for the men and women respectively, and Small finished second for the men. For the women, Rauh repeated Saturday's performance with another fifth place finish.

Both squads finished second overall on Sunday, which allowed them to hold their positions in the ECSC season standings. The men are currently third behind Plymouth State and Colby-Sawyer, while the women are still second only to Boston College.

Rush Hawkins' injury to his leg may have been worse than what was originally thought. A fall during the Brown Carnival on Feb. 4 kept him out of just one race, but has not fully healed, Hawkins has said.

"Making small turns [on slalom runs] hurts a lot," Hawkins said after Sunday's race.

Hawkins is scheduled to meet with a specialist on Thursday to reexamine the injury. Hawkins remained cautiously optimistic, however, that he will not miss any more races due to the injury.

"I'll probably race [Friday]," Hawkins said. "This weekend hurt [my leg], but not badly enough. If I can still help out the team then [I'll race], but we'll see what the doctor says."

Track teams gear up for A-10s

By Dominic Pidi
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams competed in the Boston University Valentine Invitational on Friday and Saturday for what would serve as a tune-up meet for the Atlantic 10 Championships on Saturday, Feb. 18.

For the women, coach Julie LaFreniere said that several season-best performances highlighted the meet, which proved to be somewhat of a disappointment.

Freshman Jordan Veney had another sensational performance, breaking the UMass indoor shot put record for the third consecutive meet. Her toss of 45-feet, 5.50-inches — a mark that was just shy of qualifying her for the ECAC Championships — surpassed the record she set last week of 44 feet, 0.5 inches. She placed fourth among a field of 55 competitors that represented such schools as Florida International University, Brown University and the United States Military Academy.

She also finished 19th out of 48 athletes in the weight throw event by setting a season best of 45 feet, 0.50 inches.

In the 500 meters, senior Elisabeth Budd placed sixth among 40 sprinters with a season-best time of 1:16.61, and fellow senior Jennifer Marine ran the 800-meter in 2:47.46.

The other season-best performances included freshman Stacy Ossinger, sophomores Christina DeRosa and Jennifer Ripple, juniors Cuisle Kierans and Candice Murray and senior Ashley Creel.

Ossinger and Ripple finished the 400-meter dash with times of 1:03.05 and 1:03.43, respectively.

In the 3,000-meter race, DeRosa placed 22nd out of 69 runners with a time of 10:03.69, while Kierans clocked in at 10:59.22, which was good for 59th place.

Murray and Creel both finished their event, the high jump, with a distance of 5 feet, 0.25 inches.

LaFreniere said that at meets like the Valentine Invitational, it's important for the girls "to step it up a couple notches," something she feels her team failed to do.

"I think overall it was sub-par, unfortunately."

See TRACK on page 7

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, February 14, 2006 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 77

Privatizing UMass?

Members of the Plumbers and Pipefitters Union local 104 hold signs protesting the companies that hold contracts for the new dormitory construction.

Members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers local 7 picket the entrance to the new dorm construction site.

Students protest new administrative policies

By Matt Bellylac
Collegian Staff

Students, faculty and staff of the University of Massachusetts assembled in the Cape Cod Lounge yesterday to protest the latest set of new administrative policies.

The group rallied in support for two motions that student Trustee Valerie Louis will present to the Board of Trustees on Tuesday and Wednesday. The first of these motions, "Fair Representation," addresses the need for improved diversity and accessibility at UMass, while the second motion, "Fee-Freeze," proposes an immediate halt to the trend of rising student fees.

According to Louis, student fees have increased by 100 percent since 2002 at UMass.

UMass Amherst is the fifth most expensive of the country's 67 public flagship schools, according to a recent USA Today survey. Without room and board, the average UMass student pays $9,008.

Heard members, who failed to give the motion a vote on Feb. 8, pointed out that the proposed 3.4 percent increase in mandatory fees is less than the rate of inflation.

"This shouldn't be a debate about the rate of inflation. Arguing that student fees should be tagged to the rate of inflation presumes that the current costs of higher education are affordable, and they're not," said SGA senator Daniel Bender. "Tuition and fees are already too high. Ultimately, public higher education should be free and fully accessible. The status quo is unacceptable, and it is time to move toward a more affordable system."

SGA members remained hopeful that recent news that the legislature will provide the UMass system with an additional $262 million next year may convince the Trustees that the $19 million the system stands to gain from the proposed 3.4 percent fee increase is no longer necessary.

Student and faculty also rallied in support of the "Fair Representation" motion, which calls for a change in the way UMass conducts its admission policies.

"The motion asks the Board to improve UMass's diversity recruitment and retention efforts. The AAMA community at UMass remains at a stagnant 16.5 percent and all indications suggest that the working and middle-class popu-

See RALLY on page 2

Union groups picket at construction site

Several union members blocked the main entrance to the construction site of the new residence halls at the University of Massachusetts yesterday as they began a five-day-long "informational strike."

According to a press release sent out by the UMass Student Government, "Union representatives assert that, despite a regulation that states that University construction projects must employ workers compensated at an equitable rate, poorly compensated, non-union labor has been used for the construction of the new dorms."

Passing motorists driving by the group beeped their horns in support of the workers, who held signs stating their reasons for the strike. Some were members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW) local 7, protesting the Wayne J. Griffin Electric Inc., the company that currently holds the electrical contracts for the new dormitories at UMass. The IBEW members wore signs that said that the company did not "conform to community standards for wages and fringe benefits."

Other participants were the Sheet Metal Workers local 63 and the Plumbers and Pipefitters Union local 104. Both groups were protesting against the fact that Adams Plumbing and Heating, which is based in New York, "doesn't pay area standards on all jobs."

John Kelly, a member of the IBEW local 7, said that the strike was just "a friendly demonstration" and that the union members were unhappy with the way the project of new construction was handled.

The picket line was not meant to prevent people from working, but was just set up in order to attract attention to the issues that union members feel is important. An e-mail sent out about the union picket read, "Tax dollars spent on state projects should use union labor and not be given to out-of-state contractors."

Kevin Mulcahy, a member of the Sheet Metal Workers local 63, also complained that Adams Plumbing and Heating has refused to answer questions from the union regarding how many minorities are employed there.

The union members plan to continue their strike for the rest of the week and will picket the entrance from 6 a.m. until 12 p.m. each day, despite the cold.

Megan Dufey

Amherst College stands against the genocide in Dafur

By David Humphreys
Collegian Correspondent

AMHERST — In an act against the genocide happening in the Darfur region of Sudan, Amherst College's Board of Trustees unanimously voted to divest and abstain from any direct investments with companies who have supported in some way the Sudanese government's mass ethnic cleansing.

The genocide was officially recognized by the United States House of Representatives on June 24, 2004, according to Res Publica, a human rights organization based out of New York.

The fighting is mainly being carried out by the Sudanese-sponsored Janjaweed (or Janjawid) which is backed by the Sudanese air force and the Native farmers of Darfur. These Janjaweed soldiers are a "mounted Arabic militia," explained United Nations-based IRIN News.

The Amherst College Board of Trustees, acting in the best interests of the Natives of Darfur, as well as Amherst College, has officially blacklisted nearly 211 businesses and corporations from gaining their investments. These companies have either "direct business ties to the Sudanese government or companies whose business activities are in direct support of these companies and the activities of the government," according to Amherst Magazine.

Although they are not directly involved with these businesses as of now, Amherst College's Board of Trustees wanted it to be known that they strongly oppose the Sudanese government's actions and will not invest in any company who supports it.

"[An] divestment action should be considered rarely and only in the face of human atrocities that are wholly inconsistent with the moral and ethical values of Amherst College," said the Board after making its decision to abstain from any relations with the companies.

In making this statement, Amherst College hopes "to create a climate in which other colleges and universities will take similar action," said Jide Zeitlin, a chair on the Board. Zeitlin also said that, if enough of the clientele of various investment firms decide to relinquish their holdings in the companies supporting the Sudanese government, then the investing firms will realize that "the Sudanese government isn't worth it, and [the investment firms] will divest their [own] holdings."

Although the Board has decided not to invest in some companies operating in Sudan, it has not stopped investing with all companies in the region. Businesses that do not sponsor the Sudanese government's genocide, and instead help the Sudanese people or remain neutral in the entire matter, the board decided, should not be part of their divestment and should remain open to possible trades and future investments.

The President of Amherst College, Anthony W. Marx, noted that he wants "[other colleges] to examine their own investments in this region." A former denizen of South Africa, Marx has studied political change and believes that financial divestment can be a starting point for an influential change in the government of Sudan.

Learning from the divestment, a number of Amherst's faculty are informing their TIAA-CREF-based retirement funds to stop investing their money in the blacklisted and similar companies.

The predominately European- and Asian-based companies listed in Amherst's divestment include Siemens AG and the Ericsson LM Telephone Co. Both major telecommunications retailers, as well as Royal Dutch Shell Plc.

For an entire list of the companies included in the divestment, see the Amherst Magazine Web site at www.amherst.edu/magazine/darfur.

Springfield union angry with new pay freeze for employees

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — The union that represents many Springfield city employees is upset with the city because it has hired more than 50 new workers to the tune of nearly $2 million while at the same time ordering pay freezes for current employees.

"Employees see it as a slap in the face," Robert DeMusis, a government workers' union representative told The Republican of Springfield. "It's a huge morale buster."

Springfield ran a $21 million deficit last year.

An official of the Springfield Finance Control Board said the new employees were necessary to the city's financial recovery, but union workers, who have had their salaries frozen since 2003, don't see the rationale.

"On one hand they say they can't pay us what they owe us," David A. Wells, representative of a firefighter's union said, "and on the other hand they are creating all these new positions."

A new chief information officer was hired with a salary of more than $100,000 per year and a finance budget director for $75,000.

Finance Director Philip Puccia said if the city had these staff members last year, Springfield might have avoided last year's financial crisis. This year the city projects a $6.5 million deficit.

"The warning bells signaling the financial crisis would have sounded earlier, and louder," he said.

Associated Press

Almost a millionaire

UMass Graduate Mary Robinson, left, was a contestant on Monday's "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?" Robinson only used her first lifeline when she reached the $50,000 question. Unfortunately, Robinson took the wrong advice of the audience and missed the question. However, she still walked away with $25,000.

Bush administration reacts to criticism of Katrina response

By Lara Jakes Jordan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration on Monday pushed back hard against Katrina-response criticism leveled by ex-disaster agency chief Michael Brown and congressional investigators.

"I reject outright the suggestion that President Bush was anything less than fully involved," said White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "unequivocally and strongly" rejected suggestions that his agency was preoccupied with terror threats at the expense of preparing for natural disasters.

Both spoke at a conference of state emergency management directors in suburban Alexandria, Va.

Their rebuttal came as a Republican-written House report blamed government-wide ineptitude for mishandling Hurricane Katrina relief. A report by Congress' investigative arm, the Government Accountability Office, reached similar conclusions and singled out Chertoff for delays.

Both Townsend and Chertoff took swipes at Brown, who resigned under pressure in September as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"There is no place for a lone ranger in emergency management," said Chertoff, whose Department of Homeland Security is FEMA's parent agency.

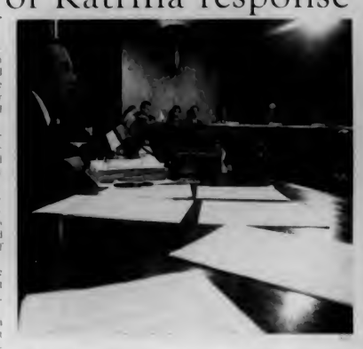
Brown testified before a Senate committee last week that he issued repeated warnings to the White House and DHS the day the hurricane struck, Aug. 29, that levees had failed and New Orleans was seriously flooding.

He suggested that the White House and DHS had dragged their feet. Bush and other federal officials have said they did not know until the next day, Aug. 30, that levees had been breached.

On Monday, Brown defended his performance.

"For Secretary Chertoff to claim that I failed to keep him informed belies the numerous telephone calls and e-mails between me and him prior to, during and after landfall" of the storm, Brown said in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

Brown also applauded congressional investigations into the government's response.



Townsend, without naming names, criticized those at FEMA she said had "become bitter" and lashed out "trying to find someone else, anyone else, to blame."

"We cannot attempt to rewrite history by pointing fingers or laying blame," Townsend said.

Townsend, who at Bush's request is conducting her own "lessons learned" inquiry, said her report would be released later this month.

A Senate panel is conducting a

See KATRINA on page 2

Former FEMA Director Michael Brown speaks before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

ARTS & LIVING
NOT-SO-PRETTY IN PINK
"The Pink Panther" can't compete with the classic.
Page 7

EDITORIAL/OPINION
THE SHOT HEARD AROUND THE WORLD
How could our VP do such a thing to his own buddy?
Page 6

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Sunny, H39
TONIGHT Mostly Cloudy, L25
TOMORROW Partly Sunny, H40°, L29

SPORTS
MAKING A SPLASH
Sophomore diver R.J. Rappe is making is presence felt in the 2006 season.
Page 12

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Eric Athas
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belainger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Katie Huston
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Ian Jones
COPY EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Kristen LaCasse
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Sandifer
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortoriet
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Morgan-Ann Rousseau
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Alex Butler
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Dales
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT SPORTS Rob Greenfield
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Tucker Merrick

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATED AND SUPPORTED BY ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ADELPHIAN, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCENE IN 1901, THE MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. IT RESUMED PUBLICATION AS THE COLLEGIAN AS AN INDEPENDENT SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Julie Teece
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Tiffany Van Langen, Jesse Sussman

Suicide bomber kills 10 as Hussein trial resumes

By Sinan Salaheddin
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — A suicide bomber detonated an explosive belt Monday in a line of Iraqis waiting to receive government payments, killing 10 people and wounding about 40, including children.

Eleven other people were killed in attacks elsewhere in the country, including five policemen and five members of a powerful Shiite religious party.

The attacks came as the trial resumed of Saddam Hussein and his seven co-defendants, with the former president complaining he was forced to attend. Also Monday, Al-Arabiya TV broadcast footage of two German hostages surrounded by their kidnappers, who threatened to kill the captives if Germany doesn't meet their demands.

The suicide attack occurred in a mostly Shiite Muslim eastern district of Baghdad as people lined up at a bank to receive government checks to compensate for incomplete food rations.

Police Lt. Ali Abbas said the attacker joined the line and blew himself up while security guards were searching people before allowing them to enter the bank.

Ten people were killed and at least 40 wounded, Interior Ministry spokesman Maj. Falah al-Mohammedawi said. The wounded included three children and nine women, Abbas said.

British military police said Monday they had arrested one man in their investigation of a video that appeared to show soldiers abusing prisoners in Iraq. The Ministry of Defense declined to identify the man, who was arrested Sunday night.

Video images first reported by the News of the World, a Sunday newspaper, appeared to show soldiers dragging several young Iraqis into a compound and beating them with fists and batons.

The newspaper said the video was filmed in southern Iraq by a corporal two years ago. It did not name the soldier or the unit involved.

Photos of U.S. troops tormenting and humiliating prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad in 2003 caused worldwide revulsion, and British troops have faced other allegations of abuse.

Elsewhere in Iraq, gunmen killed three brothers and two of their sons in an attack on a street in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, police said. All five were identified as members of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the country's leading Shiite political party, police said.

A roadside bomb attack in Iskanduriyah, 30 miles south of Baghdad, killed two policemen and wounded one, police said. Gunmen also shot dead a policeman protecting electricity generating facilities near a hospital in Baghdad's Sadr City, police said.

In the volatile western city of Ramadi, insurgents killed a police colonel as he drove to work, said Lt. Mohsen al-Dulaimi. Drive-by gunmen also killed an Oil Ministry employee as he was driving in western Baghdad and another man in Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad.

Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein speaks at his trial in Baghdad, Iraq in December. Recently, Hussein was required to return to his trial from which he had boycotted.

Hussein shouted "Down with Bush" as he entered the courtroom on Monday and complained that he was being forced to attend the trial. He and his seven co-defendants have boycotted past sessions of the trial, refusing to work with court-appointed defense attorneys named after their own defense team walked out in protest.

The hearing marks the latest turmoil in the trial of Saddam and his co-defendants for the killing of nearly 150 Shiite Muslims after the former ruler survived a 1982 assassination attempt in the town of Dujail, north of Baghdad.

In the latest hostage video, Al-Arabiya TV's newscaster said the kidnappers, identified as Tawhid and Samrah Brigade, warned the German government that it was the "last chance" to comply with their demands or they will kill Thomas Nitschke and Rene Braeunlich, who were abducted Jan. 24 in Beiji, north of Baghdad.

The kidnappers set no deadline, Al-Arabiya said.

In a previous tape, the group called on the German government to cut all ties with Iraq.

Katrina response was lacking say officials separate review due in March.

KATRINA from page 1

While both Chertoff and Townsend acknowledged that the federal response left much to be desired, both suggested federal officials up to Bush had been unfairly criticized.

Bush, who was traveling in Arizona and California the day the storm roared ashore, was "highly engaged" in monitoring its advance, Townsend said.

And she said it was Bush himself who first conceded several days after the storm — one of the nation's worst natural disasters — that "the response to the hurricane was insufficient."

The White House welcomes congressional inquiries into Katrina and the aftermath, and will cooperate with them, Townsend said.

"But let's be clear about the facts," she said. "As you know, President Bush was highly engaged in the preparation and response effort, beginning when Katrina was a tropical storm off the coast of Florida."

Chertoff announced wide-ranging changes to FEMA.

The changes range from creating a full-time response force of 1,500 new employees to establishing a more reliable system to report on disasters as they unfold.

Students say new policies hurt working, middle-class students

RALLY from page 1

lation of UMass is rapidly declining," said Senator and Internal Chair of the African, Latin, Asian Pacific Islander, and Native-American (ALANA) caucus Nate Kapel. "We're simply presenting the Board a model of recruitment that aims to build a campus population that is more representative of the state of Massachusetts."

According to statistics compiled by the Department of Education, African-Americans and Latinos make up 7.3 percent of the entering class at UMass, although they made up over 17 percent of the 12th grade population in Massachusetts in the 2004-05 academic year.

"Over the past five years, we have seen half of the working and middle-class students on our campus disappear, particularly students from poor urban areas," said Louis. "This will have a huge impact on these areas in the coming years, not to mention an impact on the type of students who you see on campus."

Students also protested new "invasive" alcohol policies and the housing charges that are being proposed for the new apartment-style dorms on the north side of the campus.

The group then marched to the construction site of the new dorms on Eastman Lane in order to join the picket demonstration.

Before marching to the construction site, students were asked to sign letters of support in favor of Valerie Louis' motions for the trustees, and they will be asked to sign up to attend the trustees meeting in Dartmouth on Feb. 14 and 15.

Americans want to know past presidents up close and personal

By Jeff Donn
Associated Press

BOSTON — Let historians endlessly contemplate how President Kennedy handled the Cuban missile crisis. Olivia Kennett prefers watching his family videos.

They caught her eye during her history class field trip to the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and Museum in Boston. She could gaze to her satisfaction at the president's bare, chiseled chest and his wife Jackie's mannequinesque perfection.

"He was always the most attractive president. I kind of just appreciated him more as a pop culture icon than as a president," admitted the 17-year-old student from Rindge, N.H., who was blazing her own fashion trail with punked-up red hair and matching red eyeglasses.

What Americans know — or yearn to know — about past presidents is a question worth considering at Presidents' Day, the celebration of Washington and Lincoln that has expanded to honor all who have led the nation.

And what's the answer?

Americans are curious about their leaders — though most can probably live very nicely, thank you, without learning Jefferson's stand on British trade before the War of 1812.

No, instead they tend to focus increasingly on presidents' private lives, often scrutinizing them through the lens of current events. At least that's how it appears if you review questions asked by the public at presidential libraries and museums, as The Associated Press did.

"They're just questions that people can relate to," historian Gerard W. Gawalt says at the Library of Congress, which keeps papers of 23 presidents.

As a result, some questions veer toward anachronism or prurience, museum interpreters suggest.

Questions often spring from the latest social controversy, best-selling presidential expose, or a tangent of commercial and popular culture. Matters of race, sex, religion and personal health that might go unspoken at a cocktail party pass for polite conversation at presidential libraries.

People ask: Was Lincoln gay? How many children did Jefferson father with a slave? Did Franklin Roosevelt hide his paralysis from the public? (The answers: no, probably not; at least four, according to many historians; and not entirely.)

Sometimes visitors relate too closely to the answers. Thomas Schwartz, the Illinois state historian, remembers one tour of the Lincoln Presidential Library and Museum in Springfield: "When I mentioned that Lincoln liked strong coffee, someone from Starbucks immediately picked up on that and said, 'Do you know what brand?'"

Occasionally, questioners won't accept an answer that challenges bogus facts read on the Internet or gleaned from another less-than-unimpeachable source. "Well, my uncle says ..." is the kind of thing docent Karl Welch occasionally hears at the Truman Library and Museum in Independence, Mo.

Other times, the correct answer just doesn't fit into the questioner's world. Welch gives the example of a third-grade boy who was surprised that an elevated personage like Truman would rest beneath the simple tombstone in the library's courtyard.

"Are you sure he's buried here?" the boy asked.

"Yes," said the tour guide.

The boy persisted: "Have you done a DNA test?"

CAREER FAIRS
DRESS UP / BRING YOUR RESUME
Feb. 15 & 16
Career Fairs
Career Services www.umass.edu/careers 413-545-2224
PERMANENT JOBS 02.15.06
Campus-Wide Career Fair 2006 — February 15, 2006 — 10am-3pm — Campus Center Auditorium
Life Sciences Career Fair 2006 — February 15, 2006 — 10am-4pm — Campus Center Lower Level
ALANA Job Fair 2006 — February 15, 2006 — 5pm-7pm — Campus Center Auditorium
INTERNSHIP JOBS 02.16.06
Summer, Co-op and Internship Opportunities 2006 — February 16, 2006 — 10am-3pm — Campus Center Auditorium
CareerServices JOBS
University of Massachusetts Amherst

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referral, Representation and Mediation for UMASS Students
Student & Worker Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

You have options!
Is everyone asking what your plans are after graduation?
Massachusetts School of Law students ACHIEVE!
Get the same edge that MSL graduates enjoy in almost every professional realm
Law, Business, Education, Healthcare, Government, Law Enforcement
A Juris Doctorate degree puts you ahead of the competition.
A Juris Doctorate from MSL affords you the freedom of that competitive advantage without the worries that others suffer behind a mountain of debt.
Interested? Come check us out:
Massachusetts School of Law
Woodland Park, 500 Federal Street, Andover, MA 01810
(978) 681-0800 www.MSLaw.edu

Amherst police log

Police respond to report of breaking and entering

Friday February 10

Amherst police responded to a motor vehicle crash involving a PVTA bus and a mini van at 1:48 p.m. The crash, which occurred at the intersection of East Pleasant and Triangle streets, resulted in the mini van's front headlights breaking and damage to the hood and quarter panel. No damage to the bus was reported, but the driver was issued a warning citation.

Sarah E. Turat, 23, of Amherst and Lauren Ditzian, 22, of Natick were arrested and charged with unlawful noise. A noise complaint drew police to Hawkins Meadow 368D at 368 Northampton Road at 11:37 p.m. The responding officer was met in the hall by the apartment's resident and said that the smell of marijuana was evident when a roommate opened the door.

Saturday February 11

Dorothy D. Glover, 19, of Chelmsford was arrested for carrying a red keg cup of beer and was charged as a person under the age of 21 in possession of alcohol. Amherst police responded to the call, which reported drinking among residents of 51 Hobart Lane at 1:10 a.m.

Police were called to 19 Fairview Way for reports of a fight. The incident reportedly involved multiple parties. Police arrived at 3:14 a.m. and conducted a roadside search of the area. There were no arrests.

Officers responded at 10:34 a.m. to a report of vandalism at 15 Fearing St. The incident involved a red 2001 Toyota Camry Solara. The rear windshield of the car had been broken. There were no arrests.

Police responded to Alpha Epsilon Pi at 401 North Pleasant St. at 12:15 p.m. A North Face jacket with a cell phone in the pocket was stolen from the property. There are no suspects.

Sunday February 12

Officers responded to a report of breaking and entering at the Townehouse Apartments, 50 Meadow St. apartment 48 at 1:17 a.m. The women who made the call were sleeping when they awoke to a tall man in a baseball hat going through their dressers. Wallets and iPods valued in total at more than $1,000 were reportedly stolen. There are no suspects.

Police responded to reports of a fight at Lambda Chi Alpha on 374 North Pleasant St. When the officer arrived at 1:12 a.m., approximately 20 to 25 people fled. One person was reportedly sprayed with pepper spray.

—Compiled by John Fenuccio

Obituary: Georgia P. French

EXETER, NH — Georgia Perkins French, 89, University of Massachusetts alumnae and professor emeritus, formerly of Kennebunkport, Maine and Amherst, Mass., widow of Thomas E. French, Jr., died peacefully with her daughter and son-in-law by her side early Monday, Oct. 3, 2005, at SunBridge of Exeter, after a brief, dignified battle with duodenal cancer, having survived a stroke earlier in her life.

She was born on July 2, 1916 in Springfield, to Lewis H. and Georgianna M. (Lafferty) Perkins, Sr., and resided in Springfield, Lily Bay on Moosehead Lake, Maine, and in Amherst before retiring to Kennebunkport in 1983.

French was a 1932 graduate of Classical High School in Springfield. She then attended the UMass, marrying during of her junior year. She graduated in 1949 with a B.S. from the School of Home Economics Foods and Nutrition, and with a minor in chemistry.

In 1957 she was elected to the UMass Chapter of "The Phi Tau Sigma Honorary Society for Food Science," and, in 1959, to the Massachusetts Chapter of "The Society of the Sigma Xi Devoted to the Promotion of Research in Science." She received her M.S. in nutrition research from UMass in 1959.

French was employed at various locations, including her self-run business, The Georgia Perkins Food Shop, the then-famous Highland Hotel in Springfield, and Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company. She also owned and ran The Lily Bay House and Cabins on Moosehead Lake, near Greenville, Maine with her husband.

UMass also employed French, first as a nutrition researcher and teacher and later as an analytical chemist. After serving as a member of the Faculty Senate, Mrs. French retired from UMass as a professor emeritus in 1981.

A woman of deep faith, French was also a dedicated member of Grace Episcopal Church, in Amherst. She was very active on committees serving the Amherst-area school system. In Kennebunkport, she was a member of the First Congregational Church of Kennebunkport, served on and was a past-president of the Ladies' Society, enthusiastically wrote the church's newsletter, and volunteered and participated in many year-round events.

French was an active voice in state and national politics. She was often in contact with her representatives, and supported causes representing issues of conscience. She supported the country's armed services personnel even when she couldn't support the politics. Her social conscience was a voice for the less fortunate. She fought for others' civil rights when it wasn't popular to do so. She supported health and nutrition education, was a literacy volunteer, and turned many of her energies to supporting environmental issues and education.

While she loved arts and music of many kinds, she was also an avid outdoorswoman. She loved to fish and to teach others to fish, and volunteered to help with many of the Exeter Parks & Recreation Dept.'s fishing derbies.

Mrs. French is survived by her daughter, Jan Dicey and her husband, Doug Dicey, her sister, Fern G. Horwedel, her brother, Lt. Col. (Ret.-USAF) Russell G. Perkins and many other family members and dear friends.

She was predeceased by two sisters, Gertrude Perkins and Doris Gray, and two brothers, Lewis H. "Cy" Perkins, Jr., and Alfred J. Brouillette.

A well-attended memorial service was held Saturday, Oct. 29, 2005 at the First Congregational Church of Kennebunkport. A reception followed in the church's Ober Hall.

In lieu of flowers, memorial donations may be made to the First Congregational Church of Kennebunkport, 141 North St., the Kennebunkport Public Health & Nursing Services, P.O. Box 367, both of Kennebunkport, ME 04046; Seacoast Hospice, 10 Hampton Rd., and SunBridge of Exeter Activities Dept., 8 Hampton Rd., both of Exeter, NH 03833, or a socially or environmentally conscious organization of your choice.

Editor's note: This obituary was submitted by the French family.

Violence permeates protests after Haitian presidential race

By Stevenson Jacobs
Associated Press

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — Supporters of Haitian presidential candidate Rene Preval erected smoldering roadblocks across the capital and occupied a luxury hotel Monday. At least one protester was killed, but U.N. peacekeepers denied witness accounts that they had shot him.

As Port-au-Prince descended into chaos, Preval returned to the capital for the first time since the election Tuesday. He was the clear winner with about 90 percent of the votes counted, but supporters claimed electoral officials were tampering with results to prevent him from getting the majority he needs to avoid a runoff.

Barricades made of old tires were ablaze across the capital, sending plumes of acrid black smoke into the sky. Protesters let only journalists and Red Cross vehicles pass.

"If they don't give us the final results, we're going to burn this country down!" a protester screamed.

The election will replace an interim government installed after former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide was ousted in a bloody rebellion two years ago. A popularly elected government with a clear mandate from the voters is seen as crucial to avoiding a political and economic meltdown in the Western Hemisphere's poorest nation. Gangs have gone on kidnapping sprees and factories have closed for lack of security.

Preval arrived in the capital aboard a U.N. helicopter from his rural home in north Haiti.

"We have questions about the electoral process," he told reporters after meeting with the top U.N. official in Haiti and ambassadors from the United States, France, Canada and Brazil. "We want to see how we can save the process."

Preval also planned to meet with the interim prime minister and president.

Interim Prime Minister Gerard Latortue appealed for calm in a nationally broadcast address.

"People, don't stay in the streets," he said. "I'm asking you to go home. ... The transitional government is not stealing your vote."

In the middle-class Tabarre neighborhood, Associated Press journalists saw the body of a man on a street, blood soaking Preval's image emblazoned on his T-shirt. Dozens of witnesses said Jordanian U.N. peacekeepers in a jeep opened fire, killing two people and wounding four. The body of the second victim was not seen.

Tens of thousands of supporters of presidential front-runner, Rene Preval, took to the streets in the capital city of Port-au-Prince, Haiti before the final tally of the presidential votes were even completed.

Back Forward Stop Refresh Home AutoFill Print Mail
@www.SunraiseInc.com
Screen Printed T's
*White T's ONLY
24 minimum
1 Color, 1 side
Standard Ink
Max Size 10x13
Screen $20
$5
Your Design or Logo!
*Exp. 2.28.06
Apparel Unlimited SCREEN PRINTERS
322 Russell Street Hadley, MA 01035
322 Russell St. Hadley, MA 01035
413-586-7133
www.SunraiseInc.com

Skin Care Center
Pioneer Valley Dermatology
www.pioneervalleyderm.com
Call for a Consultation & Book your Appointment Today!
413.549.7400
Shelly Damon, R.E.
Prepare for Spring Break NOW!
• Electrology
• Microdermabrasion
• Laser Hair Removal
• Glycolic Peels & Beta - Lift Peels
• All Procedures Available For Men and Women of All Skin Tones & Types
Richard Wyatt, M.D., Ph.D.
29-B Cottage St.
Amherst (past Bertucci's)
Dr. Wyatt is available during laser procedures

Be My Valentine
Tuesday, February 14, 2006
From 5 to 8 pm All DC's
MENU FEATURING:
Seafood Bisque, Prime Rib, Chicken Sofia
Buffalo Portabella Mushroom,
Chocolate Cake/Raspberry Mousse
Frost Your Own Heart Shaped Cookies
Pink Icing
White Icing
Chocolate Icing
Heart Sprinkles
Enter Our Raffle Today!
1st Prize
Godiva Chocolates
Two 2nd Prizes
Assorted Chocolate Truffles
from our very own UMass Bake Shop
DRAWINGS TO BE HELD MONDAY, 2/13/06
DINING SERVICES
www.umass.edu/diningservices

FREE JILL!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian will host a rally Thursday at noon on the the lawn in front of the Student Union in support of Jill Carroll's release.

All are welcome and encouraged to attend.

Please come out and support one of our own.

Bill will create grants for low-income students

By Adarsh Bagchoora
Daily Texan (U. Texas)

AUSTIN — A federal bill signed this month by President Bush will create grants of up to $4,000 for low-income college students studying math, science or foreign languages critical to national defense.

Currently, Pell Grants are the most common form of federal grants given to college students. The SMART grant — an acronym for "science and mathematics access to retain talent" — will offer additional funding for students and could be awarded as early as fall 2006.

With more than 7,000 Pell Grant recipients at the University of Texas, the bill has potential to significantly affect UT students. Students must be eligible for Pell Grants to be considered eligible for a SMART Grant.

In addition to studying particular subjects, students must also maintain a grade point average of at least 3.0 and be in their junior or senior year of college.

There's one catch. Students must provide proof that they were born in the United States in order to be eligible for the grant, according to the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a nonprofit organization that researches fiscal policy and public programs. Providing this documentation could prove a problem for hurricane victims who lost such documents in the storm as well as the one in 12 adults with incomes below $25,000 who do not have them in their possession, the Center said.

Henry Urick, UT's assistant director of Student Financial Services, said he believes the program will be beneficial to students statewide, not just at UT. The government implemented a similar grant program in the 1960s in response to Russia developing the satellite Sputnik, Urick said.

The Federal Perkins Loan program initially evolved from the U.S. government's attempt to encourage students to study subjects that were math or science based, Urick said. In both that instance and in the case of the SMART Grant, the government was trying to motivate students to pursue certain fields to help "shape public policy to serve the national demand," he said.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R- Tenn., said in a Feb. 10 written statement that the new SMART Grant program is the U.S. response to China and India producing far more engineers and scientists than the United States.

"Because 85 percent of our nation's economic growth comes from technological change, we must do everything we can to encourage our best and brightest to enter key scientific fields," said Frist, a proponent of the grant.

Although the bill includes funding for the grant program, opponents point out it also includes significant budget cuts to higher education, Medicare and Medicaid.

Democrats said that even with the new grant program, overall federal spending on student aid is being significantly cut. An analysis of President Bush's fiscal year 2007 budget by the Democratic staff of the Senate Budget Committee said a key cut in domestic spending was a $2.1 billion cut in education.

"This is the largest cut in the 26-year history of the Education Department," the analysis said. It "eliminates funding for 42 education programs, totaling $3.5 billion in 2006."

The Democratic staff said that "the administration proposes policy changes resulting in $15 billion in net Medicaid cuts over five years and $11.9 billion over 10 years."

Myspace: a breeding ground for sexual predators?

By Blaire Briody
The California Aggie (UC Davis)

DAVIS, Calif. — As many as seven Connecticut teenagers have recently been sexually assaulted by men they met through the popular Web site Myspace.com. Myspace is available for anyone 14 and over.

Although there are no known sexual assaults in Davis, Calif., that can be attributed to the Web site, Lt. Nader Oweis of the University of California at Davis police department said it has dealt with crimes such as harassment or stalking in which people have initially met online and in chat rooms.

"Anyone can be on these types of Web sites," he said. "Anyone can be anonymous, and you don't know who these people are that you're dealing with. There are people out there that search the Web and look for victims."

Although the Davis Joint Unified School District has an extensive filtering system and blocks the Web site on all campuses, some Davis high school students noted that everyone they know has a Myspace profile.

Sharon Hallberg, librarian at Davis Senior High School, said the filtering system is so extensive it not only blocks students and teachers from inappropriate Web sites, but e-mail as well. She noted she feels it blocks a lot of Web sites that should not be prohibited. She is in charge of a full computer lab in the high school library and conducts an introduction on how to use the lab and how students can protect themselves online.

Brent Buehrin, detective of the Sacramento Valley High-Tech Crime Task Force, puts on a program in Davis titled "Parents Guide to Cyberspace Kids" It addresses the dangers of the Internet and how parents can protect their children.

In his experience with Myspace, Buehrin said he has seen several 14-year-olds signed on, younger kids pretending to be older, name-calling and writing threatening messages.

He said the danger lies in a tendency of young kids to trust those they encounter on the Internet. In interviewing young teens about it he found that a lot of kids don't realize anyone can view their Myspace profiles.

"A lot of kids think it's private and they're just talking to their friends, not the whole world," he said. "Kids don't have a global view."

He asked the teens if they would give out personal information to someone, and they all told him no, that they would only give out such information to a friend. Then he asked them who they would consider their friend. They told him a friend is someone that talks to them for 30 days or more online. After this they would feel comfortable confiding in this person and giving out personal information.

"Kids start putting up personal information such as their full names, phone numbers, addresses, and revealing photos," he said. "If you are a predator targeting someone it is easy to find them."

Three students from Davis Senior High School said they mostly use Myspace to talk to friends, e-mail and comment on each other's profiles. However, according to the youngest of the three, a 15-year-old female, she meets strangers on Myspace all the time.

"I click on guys because they're hot, then I add them as my friend," she said. "Half the people I know do that."

One in particular she started talking to a year ago because she thought he was attractive. They chatted online for a while, and then she gave him her cell phone number.

"I don't care who I give my number to," she said. "I can always just block it on my phone if they start bugging me."

She continues to talk to him. They talk on the phone, and even planned to meet once, but he couldn't make it. She said she would never want her mom to know about him, and chose to remain anonymous for this reason. She said she adds anyone who wants to be her friend, especially males.

"Guys are the only interesting ones to talk to on Myspace," she said. "The girls just have drama."

All three of them said their parents know they have Myspace accounts, but their parents all told them not to talk to anyone they didn't know. The girl's mother asked to see her Myspace page one day. She started looking at her page and saw all the "hot" boys she had added as her friends.

"My mom wanted to know who they were and if I knew them from school," she said. "I said, 'Uh, yeah, sure Mom.'"

High school students gather around a computer to look at a profile on Myspace.com. Recently, some Myspace users have been sexually assaulted by men they met at the site.

In his program, Buehrig recommends that parents make an effort to be involved in their teens' lives. This includes being on their children's computers and talking to them about what they are doing online. He advises that a parent can allow a child to have a computer in his or her room, just not have it connected to the Internet. The Internet should be in the living room or another public household area.

The Myspace Web site also has a section on safety tips for parents. To prevent misuse of the Web site, its creators have developed special software to review the profiles of members, deleting them if the member is underage or involved in "cyber-bullying" others.

In conjunction with WiredSafety.org, the site is developing a special program for parents so they can find if their children have profiles, and they can learn how to review or remove them. Parents may also block the Web site from home, but safety tips encourage them to talk with their children first.

Cameron Wilson, a junior at UC Davis, says she has had a Myspace account for about a year. She used to be on the Web site every day, but now she's trying to cut down. Mainly she uses it for networking with Christian music artists, but also found old high school friends on there. Strange people have occasionally tried to contact her, but she usually just ignores them and they eventually leave her alone.

"I would never give out my phone number or want to meet them," she said.

New bill lightens marijuana possession punishment

BOSTON (AP) — Possession of less than an ounce of marijuana would no longer be considered a criminal offense under a bill which won the backing of a legislative committee on Monday.

The bill, which was approved by the Mental Health and Substance Abuse Committee on 6-1 vote, would make possession of a small amount of marijuana a civil offense punishable by a $250 fine. Those 18 years old or younger would also have their parents notified.

Possession of that amount of marijuana is now considered a criminal offense punishable by up to six months in jail and a $500 fine for the first offense.

Sen. Steven Tolman, D-Brighton, co-chairman of the committee, said the goal was to make sure that someone found with a small amount of marijuana doesn't have a criminal record that could make it difficult for them to get into college, obtain student loans and make it harder to find a job.

Critics of the bill say it could encourage the use of marijuana by easing some of the social stigma.

The House chairwoman of the committee, Rep. Ruth Balser, D-Newton, said the focus should be on prevention, not jail time.

"A priority of our committee is to develop programs of prevention, education, and treatment and shift away from an involvement with the criminal justice system," Balser said.

The committee's approval is just the first step in a long process. The bill must by still approved by the House and Senate and sent to Gov. Mitt Romney's desk. If Romney vetoed the bill, it would need a two-thirds majority in both chambers to override the veto.

Several states have already approved similar legislation.

Associated Press

dailycollegian.com

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Taste of Japan
ESCAPE FOR AN EVENING TO JAPAN
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 2006 – FROM 5–8 PM
Exclusively At The Oakroom Worcester Dining Commons

Sample the Traditional Flavors of Japanese Cuisine and Explore the Culture of Japan

Miso Soup 味噌汁
Tempura 天ぷら
mushrooms, sweet potato, zucchini or shrimp Yakitori 焼き鳥
skewered chicken/teriyaki sauce
Baked Miso Cod 鱈の西京漬け
Nikujaga 肉じゃが
potato, peas, and onions
Spinach Gorna-ae ほうれん草の胡麻和え boiled spinach with ground sesame seed
Shira-ae 白和え ground tofu, soy sauce, and spice
Sushi Bar 寿司バー
Greenie グリーニー
brownie made with white chocolate and green tea powder
Fruit Kanten フルーツ寒天
seaweed jelotin with fruit

Green Tea Demonstration
Video of Japan
Traditional Japanese Music
Origami Demonstration (paper art form)

UMass Dining Services partnering with
JPO (International Programs Organization) | Jones Library | Japan National Tourist Organization

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 2006

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Did he look quail-like, Cheney?

A friend of Dick Cheney's was returning to their hunting party with newly captured prey when the vice president accidentally shot him. The friend, a millionaire attorney named Harry Whittington, is injured but not in any mortal jeopardy. From what I hear, the vice president's public image — already poor — is too low to sustain any further damage.

David B. Lawrence

What surprises me about the incident is that the VP was relaxing by hunting quail in Texas. With the way people talk about him, I had always imagined that he spent his vacations in Iraq, leading horseback cavalry patrols like Teddy Roosevelt in the Spanish-American war. I had pictured the decrepit, old Wyoming native traveling to the desert terrain he grew up in, donning a 19th century-style coat and cap, mounting his steed, brandishing his sword and yelling with the call of trumpets, "Charge" as he lead a platoon of men on horseback into Falluja. Oh well.

But then again, Whittington, who is a ripe 78 years old, was surely more surprised than I when he felt the hot sting of metal that had just been expelled from the official vice presidential 12-gauge. As I write this, a team of doctors is pulling buckshot from his wrinkled skin, each metal ball carefully etched with the vice presidential seal. Perhaps they will save a few for him, as souvenirs. No millionaire lawyer's mantel is complete without a jar of shot labeled with the plaque, "From the time I got shot by the V.P. Feb. 12."

Perhaps I should not make light of the situation, for after all, a man has been shot here. This is a serious situation: he could have been seriously wounded and, at his age, no injury is completely harmless. More serious is the fact that the quail Cheney was aiming at, once slated for a presidential dinner, got away unharmed. Not only will G.W. have to order out, but based on what I've been reading, Cheney's reputation as a marksman is already in question, following poor aim in Iraq and his domestic spying program. It may take yet another serious hit as word of this incident gets out.

The accident marks the second time in the last decade that a presidential scandal has erupted when the wrong person was shot in the face. Democrats eager to exploit the issue in the upcoming elections are already drawing comparisons to the Clinton era scandal in which President Bill Clinton shot then presidential intern Monica Lewinski in the mouth. In an ironic twist of fate, the appropriate target for that shot, First Lady-turned Sen. Hillary Clinton, will likely be among the democratic hopefuls exploiting the issue. The quail, now thrust into the political limelight, has declined to comment on any political aspirations. He is a registered Republican.

The accident marks the second time in the last decade that a presidential scandal has erupted when the wrong person was shot in the face.

Pundits on the right, however, should be optimistic about how this incident will play out. In terms of popular approval. If what I've been reading about him is any indication, people think Cheney is such a monster that they might be impressed that he merely shot, and didn't kill, his hunting buddy. Most Americans seem to think that Cheney would finish off his prey once it has been weakened; and possibly eat its soul. However, in this instance he has shown remarkable restraint, and that may do his public perception some good.

Whether or not the incident helps or hurts Cheney's public perception may not impact the next election, but it will certainly impact his relaxation plans. I doubt the Secret Service will allow him to keep his plans with President Bush to go duck hunting next weekend. It's just as well; Bush is a lousy shot anyway.

David B. Lawrence is a Collegian columnist.

Protest the war on impartiality

"The really frightening thing about totalitarianism is not that it commits 'atrocities' but that it attacks the concept of objective truth." — George Orwell.

I often wonder if, by some freak accident, all the activists, graduate students and faculty suddenly vanished from our campus, there would be any protests at this school at all.

Mike Sances

Dick Bogartz is one of those faculty members. Fed up with the unrelenting carnage that we, in our benevolence, have bestowed upon the benighted population of Iraq, the psychology professor started a daily lunch-hour vigil on the Student Union steps last semester, just as the weather was starting to turn frigid. "Enough is enough," his makeshift sign cried. "Out of Iraq now."

I stood with Professor Bogartz whenever I had time, holding a sign of my own and — after I realized no one could be bothered to stop and have a discussion about the most important issue facing the country today, even if to disagree or call me a traitor — usually staring straight ahead, trying futilely to ignore the cold.

My fellow picketer was luckier, if only by a little. I was particularly impressed when one student, showing no small amount of that smug cynicism which goes so well with apathy, slunk past Bogartz with a sneer, stopping to put his arm around his shoulder. "You ever been to Iraq?" he asked, appraising the sign contemptuously, and barely pausing in his stride. The professor replied that he hadn't. Satisfied, this would-be interlocutor continued on his way. Bogartz shrugged.

Perhaps this person, one of the only ones who showed any reaction at all to the sign or the man standing out in the cold, was speaking for all of the silent, blank faces who passed us by without blinking; perhaps only some of them; perhaps none. Nevertheless, corroborating evidence suggests that this attitude — that we should somehow withhold judgment about the war since we've never been to the country we're attacking — commands a substantial following.

Nevertheless, corroborating evidence suggests that this attitude — that we should somehow withhold judgment about the war since we've never been to the country we're attacking — commands a substantial following.

The negative implications for a democracy should be self-evident, so I'll try not to waste time with them. Instead, I want to suggest that we, college students, have potentially the most well-rounded, thorough, and objective assessment of the war in Iraq — more than the soldiers on the ground, or the journalists and even more than the president.

All these groups I mention are severely restrained in their judgment. Take the soldiers on the ground. No doubt they believe they are helping the Iraqis rebuild their country, that the United States saved the Iraqi people from Saddam Hussein. They have to believe this, because otherwise they would no doubt go insane. Moreover, they are being shot at and attacked every day, and are confined only to small, isolated enclaves in a strange country. Are these conditions that make for an objective view of the war?

The journalists in Iraq, besides the really courageous ones, face the same problems and probably have an even more distorted perspective. Ever wonder why Dexter Filkins of the New York Times always has stories datelined Baghdad, even when he's writing about something halfway across Iraq? It's because he, like any other journalist without a death wish, is afraid to step outside of his hotel room, hidden behind the walls of the fortress that is the Green Zone.

Now let's take the president. No, Dick Bogartz and most anti-war protesters have not been to Iraq — but has the president? OK, so he went there for a Thanksgiving to cheer up the troops. But for obvious reasons, he was in and out of there in a matter of hours. So tell me again why we should defer to the president on the subject of the war?

By contrast, college students are not being fired upon, do not have to worry about driving over a roadside bomb, are not (like major journalists are) on the payroll of a multinational corporation and are not in the stage-managed bubble that is the presidency. We have, in theory at least, a good deal of free time; in practice, incredible access to information, from almost every source imaginable.

We can read the uncensored journalism of Robert Fisk or Jill Carroll and compare it to the boilerplate stuff found in the major papers; we can read the international press; we can read the alternative press; we can read scholarly journals and, most importantly, the relevant history. We can sift through it all and make our own judgment as to what is really going on in Iraq or anywhere else.

When I hear people say that we can probably never really know what's going on over there, I'll admit, I get angry. Of course we'll never "really" know — that's just a truism. But it's also true that we live in a democracy, and that we have a responsibility to evaluate the actions of our government. If not us, then who? The "experts?"

Surely the war against South Vietnam proved just how untrustworthy those "experts" really are. If we've forgotten since then, three letters should bury that fantasy once and for all: WMD

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist

V-Day more painful for guys

I'm not going to bother to look up the official reason and history of Valentine's Day, even though there probably is one worth mentioning. All I know is that Valentine's Day can't come on a worse part of the year. Having it in the dead of winter has to be the ultimate insult to those who don't have a partner to share the day with and who have to freeze their butts off while watching those annoying couples who make it their point to let everyone know that they are in love.

Kevin Dooley

I'll admit, it may be a lonely time for you gals out there, but it's especially painful for us guys. Let me make my point. You see, by Feb. 14, the Super Bowl is over, and thus, there is no more football to enjoy for the next seven months or so. Red Sox fans, and those of you who are Yankees fans here at UMass, won't even be able to start their preseason speculations for another week or so.

By the way, the first Red Sox-Yankees preseason match-up will be played on March 22. No, the Boston Celtics and Boston Bruins aren't going to satisfy my sports cravings until baseball season. Not to mention the constant bombardment of advertisements.

The advertising industry must be currently under the assumption that everyone in this country is suffering from severe Alzheimer's disease. That can be the only reason why we are reminded that Valentine's Day is fast-approaching only as many times as Bush was warned of a possible terrorist threat.

You know the ones I'm talking about: The "Every Kiss begins with Kay" tune. If this advertisement campaign has not been used yet for torture in our prison systems, well, someone better get on that.

Now on to my observations of Valentine's Day: If one were to live in a cave, and have contact with the outside world only through a television set, they would know when Valentine's Day is approaching by the steady barrage of Kay Jeweler advertisements. You know the ones I'm talking about: the "Every Kiss begins with Kay" tune. If this advertisement campaign has not been used yet for torture in our prison systems, well, someone better get on that.

I'm not going to sit here and tell you that I'm an expert when it comes to buying gifts for Valentine's Day. I know one thing, however: buying a box of chocolates for a girl, or anyone, is like having your significant other forced to be a contestant on Fear Factor. Whoever eats a box of chocolate is praying to God to let them avoid those chocolates that not even Star Jones would care to munch on. At least that's the situation I'm in when I get my annual Charlie Brown-version box of chocolates from my mom on Valentine's Day.

One thing I do know about girls, however, is that chocolate has some sort of seductive power over them, no matter what the assortment is. I swear, any girl who receives chocolate for Valentine's Day will inevitably fulfill the freshman 15 by Wednesday morning. I better not make my trip to the gym on Thursday.

And flowers — what's up with girls and flowers? First off, no one ever takes care of them, so they die within two days. Secondly, they cost about a million dollars and even if they were cheaper, they would have to cost only five dollars in order to stay within my measly college budget. Now, I don't think flowers even smell that good, but somehow when you let a girl smell a flower, its like watching Dorothy from the Wizard of Oz faint in that field of poppies.

I guess the attraction to chocolate and flowers is one of those secrets girls keep from us guys — the only secret they can keep, by the way. Can someone explain the attraction of those small candies that have Valentine's Day messages written on them? You know, the ones that say "Be mine" and "Yours forever" on them. I may not have the 411, or any girl's phone number for that matter, but I don't think those candies will result in some lonely guy breaking the ice with a girl he has had his eye on.

By the way, I have forgotten to mention buying a Valentine's Day card. I mean, what would Valentine's Day be if everyone didn't rush out to buy a card and simultaneously contribute to paying for everyone's free vacation to Aruba in the card-making business? To me, when you buy someone a card, you are in reality telling them that you are too lazy to think of something on your own to say, and matters like these can be best handled by having a complete stranger tell her that you love her.

Kevin Dooley is a UMass student.

In the home of San Valentino

If I learned anything from my semester abroad last year, it's that there are three things Italians take seriously: food, politics and, of course, "l'amore." Italians love to be in love, make love and especially to express their love, so it's no surprise that the origins of Valentine's Day are Italian.

Paige Cram

At this time last year, my roommates and I were wondering what it would be like to spend the most romantic day of the year in the most romantic country in the world. We are bombarded with the holiday here in the States, so we assumed that in the home of San Valentino himself, it would be even more overwhelming.

But you know what they say about assumptions.

